THE PREFACE.

HOw vnfit, and how vnworthy a choice I haue made of my ſelfe, to vndertake a worke of this mixture; mine owne reaſon, though exceeding weake, hath ſufficiently reſolued me. For had it beene begotten then with my firſt dawne of day, when the light of common knowledge began to open it ſelfe to my younger yeares: and before any wound receiued, either from Fortune or Time: I might yet well haue doubted, that the darkenes of Age and Death would haue couered ouer both It and Mee, long before the performance. For beginning with the Creation: I haue proceeded with the Hiſtory of the World; and laſtly purpoſed (ſome few ſallies excepted) to confine my Diſcourſe, within this our renowned Iland of Great Brittaine. I confeſſe that it had better ſorted with my diſability, the better part of whoſe times are runne out in other trauailes; to haue ſet together (as I could) the vnioynted and ſcattered frame of our Engliſh affaires, than of the vniuerſall: in whom, had there beene no other defect, (who am all defect) then the time of the day, it were enough; the day of a tempeſtuous life, drawne on to the very euening ere I began. But thoſe inmoſt, and ſoule-peircing wounds, which are euer aking while vncured: with the deſire to ſatisfie thoſe few friends, which I haue tryed by the fire of Aduerſities; the former enforcing, the latter perſwading; haue cauſed me to make my thoughts legible, and my ſelfe the ſubiect of euery opinion wiſe or weake.

To the World I preſent them, to which I am nothing indebted: neither haue others that were, (Fortune changing) ſped much better in any age. For, Proſperity and Aduerſity haue euer-more tyed and vntied vulgar Affections. And as we ſee it in experience, That dogs doe alwayes barke at thoſe they know not; and that it is their nature to accompany one another in thoſe clamours: ſo it is with the inconſiderate multitude. Who, wanting that vertue which wee call Honeſty in all men, and that eſpeciall gift of GOD which we call Charity in Chriſtian men; condemne, without hearing; and wound, without offence giuen: led there-vnto by vncertaine report only; which his Maieſty truly acknowledgeth for the Author of all lies. Blame no man (ſaith Siracides) before thou haue enquired the matter. Vnderſtand firſt, and then reforme righteouſly. Rumor, res ſine teſte, ſine sine iudice, maligna, fallax; Rumor is without witnesse; without iudge, malicious and deceiuable. This vanity of vulgar opinion it was, that gaue St. Augustine Argument to affirme, That he feared the praise of good men, & detested that of the euill. And herein no man hath giuen a better rule, then this of Seneca; Conscientiæ satisfaciamus: nihil in famam laboremus; sequatur vél mala, dum benè merearis. Let vs satisfie our owne consciences, and not trouble our selues with fame: bee it neuer so ill, it is to be despised so we deserue well.

For my selfe, if I haue in any thiug serued my Country, and prised it before my priuate: the general acceptation can yeeld me no other profit at this time than doth a faire sunshine day to a Sea-man after shipwrack; & the contrary no other harme than an outragious tempest after the Port attained. I know that I lost the loue of many, for my fidelity towards Her, whom I must still honor in the dust; though further then the defence of her excellent person, I neuer persecuted any man. Of those that did it, and by what deuice they did it: He that is the Supreame Iudge of all the world, hath taken the accompt, so as for this kinde of suffering, I must say with Seneca, Mala opinio, bene parta, delectat.

As for other men; if there be any that haue made themselues Fathers of that fame, which hath beene begotten for them: I can neither enuy at such their purchased glory, nor much lament mine owne mishap in that kind; but content my selfe to say with Virgil, Sic vos non vobis, in many particulers.

To labour other satisfaction, were an effect of phrenzy, not of hope: seeing it is not Truth, but Opinion, that can trauell the World without a pass-port. For were it otherwise; and were there not as many internall formes of the minde, as there are externall figures of men; there were then some possibility, to perswade by the mouth of one Aduocate, euen Equity alone.

But such is the multiplying and extensiue vertue of dead Earth, and of that breath-giuing life which GOD hath cast vp Slime and Dust: as that among those that were, of whom we read and heare, and among those that are, whom we see and conuerse with; euery one hath receiued a seuerall picture of face, and euery one a diuers picture of minde; euery one a forme apart, euery one a fancy and cogitation differing: there being nothing wherein Nature so much triumpheth, as in dissimilitude. From whence it commeth that there is found so great diuersity of opinions; so strong a contrariety of inclinations; so many naturall and vnnaturall; wise, foolish; manly, and childish affections; and passions in mortall Men. For it is not the visible fashion and shape of plants, and of reasonable Creatures, that makes the difference, of working in the one, and of condition in the other; but the forme internall.

And though it hath pleased GOD, to reserue the Art of reading mens thoughts to himselfe: yet, as the fruit tells the name of the Tree; so doe the outward workes of men (ſo farre as their cogitations are acted) giue vs whereof to gueſſe at the reſt. Nay, it were not hard to expreſſe the one by the other, very neare the life: did not craft in many, feare in the moſt, and the worlds loue in all, teach euery capacity, according to the compaſſe it hath, to qualifie & maske ouer their inward deformities for a time. Though it be alſo true, Nemo poteſt diu perſonam ferre fictam: cito in naturam ſuam reſidunt, quibus veritas non ſubeſt. No man can long continue masked in a counterfeite behauiour the thinges that are forced for pretences, hauing no ground of truth, cannot long diſſemble their owne natures. Neither can any man (ſaith Plutarch ſo change himſelfe, but that his heart may be ſometime ſeene at his tongues end.

In this great diſcord and diſſimilitude of reaſonable Creatures, if wee direct our ſelues to the Multitude; Omnis honeſtæ rei malus iudex eſt vulgus. The common people are euill Iudges of honeſt things, and whoſe wiſedome (ſaith Eccleſiaſtes) is to be deſpiſed; if to the better ſort; euery vnderſtanding hath a peculiar iudgement, by which it both cenſureth other men, and valueth it ſelfe. And therefore vnto me it will not ſeeme ſtrange, though I finde theſe my worthles papers torne with Rats: ſeeing the ſlothfull Cenſurers of all ages haue not ſpared to taxe the Reuerend Fathers of the Church, with Ambition; the ſeuereſt men to themſelues, with Hypocriſie; the greateſt louers of Iuſtice, with Popularity; and thoſe of the trueſt valour and fortitude, with vaine-glorie. But of theſe natures which lye in wait to finde fault, and to turne good into euill, ſeeing Salomon complained long ſince: and that the very age of the world renders it euery day after other more malitious; I muſt leaue the profeſſors to their eaſie wayes of reprehenſion, than which there is nothing of more facility.

Nihil facilius, quam reprehendere alium.

To me it belongs in the firſt part of this Preface, following the common and approued cuſtome of thoſe, who haue left the memories of time paſt to after ages; to giue, as neare as I can, the ſame right to Hiſtory which they haue done. Yet ſeeing therein I ſhould but borrow other mens wordes; I will not trouble the Reader with the repetition. True it is that among many other benefits, for which it hath beene honoured; in this one it triumpheth ouer all humane knowledge, That it hath giuen vs life in our vnderſtanding, ſince the world it ſelfe had life and beginning, euen to this day: yea it hath triũphed ouer time, which beſides it nothing but eternity hath triumphed ouer: for it hath carried our knowledge ouer the vaſt and deuouring ſpace of ſo many thouſands of yeares, and giuen ſo faire and peircing eies to our minde; that we plainly behold liuing now (as if we had liued then) that great World, Magni Dei ſapiens opus, the wiſe worke (ſaith Hermes) of a great GOD, as it was then, when but new to it ſelfe. By it I ſay it is, that we liue in the very time when it was created: we behold how it was gouerned: how it was couered with waters, and againe repeopled: How Kings and Kingdomes haue florished and fallen; and for what vertue and piety GOD made prosperous; and for what vice and deformity he made wretched, both the one and the other. And it is not the least debt which we owe vnto History, that it hath made vs acquainted with our dead Auncestors; and, out of the depth and darkenesse of the earth, deliuered vs their memory and fame. In a word, wee may gather out of History a policy no lesse wise than eternall; by the comparison and application of other mens fore-paßed miseries, with our owne like errours and ill deseruings.

But it is neither of Examples the most liuely instructions, nor the words of the wisest men, nor the terror of future torments, that hath yet so wrought in our blind and stupified mindes; as to make vs remember, That the infinite eye and wisdome of GOD doth peiree through all our pretences; as to make vs remember, That the iustice of GOD doth require none other accuser, than our owne consciences: which neither the false beauty of our apparent actions, nor all the formalities, which (to pacifie the opinions of men) we put on; can in any, or the least kind, couer from his knowledge. And so much did that Heathen wisdome confesse, no way as yet qualified by the knowledge of a true God. If any (saith Euripides) hauing in his life committed wickednesse, thinke he can hide it from the euerlasting gods, he thinkes not well.

To repeat GODS iudgements in particular, vpon those of all degrees, which haue plaied with his mercies; would require a volume a part: for the Sea of examples hath no bottome The markes, set on priuat men, are with their bodies cast into the earth; and their fortunes, written onely in the memories of those that liued with them: so as they who succeed, and haue not seene the fall of others, doe not feare their owne faults. GODS iudgments vpon the greater and greatest, haue beene left to posterity; first, by those happy hands which the Holy Ghost hath guided; and secondly, by their vertue, who haue gathered the acts and ends of men, mighty and remarkeable in the world. Now to poynt farre off, and to speake of the conuersion of Angells into Deuills, for Ambition: Or of the greatest and most glorious Kings, who haue gnawne the graße of the earth with beasts, for pride and ingratitude towards GOD: Or of that wise working of Pharao, when he slue the Infants of Israel, ere they had recouered their Cradles: Or of the policy of Iezabel, in couering the Murder of Naboth by a triall of the Elders, according to the Law: with many thousands of the like: what were it other, than to make an hopelesse proofe, that farre-off examples would not be left to the same farre-off respects, as heretofore? For who hath not obserued, what labour, practise, perill, bloudshed, and cruelty, the Kings and Princes of the world haue vndergone, exercised, taken on them, and committed; to make them-selues and their issues maisters of the world: And yet hath Babylon, Persia, Egypt, Syria, Macedon, Carthage, Rome, and the rest, noe fruit, flower, grasse, nor leafe, springing vpon the face of the earth, of those seeds: No; their very roots and ruines doe hardly remaine. Omnia quæ manu hominum facta sunt, vel manu hominum euertuntur, vel stando & durando deficiunt: All that the hand of man can make, is either ouerturned by the hand of man, or at length by standing and continuing consumed. The reasons of whose ruines, are diuersly giuen by those that ground their opinions on second causes. All Kingdomes and States haue fallen (say the Politicians) by outward and forraine force, or by inward negligence and dissension, or by a third cause arising from both: Others obserue, That the greatest haue sunck downe vnder their owne weight; of which Liuie hath a touch: eo creuit, vt magnitudine laboret sua: Others, That the diuine prouidence (which Cratippus obiected to Pompey*) hath set downe the date and period of euery estate, before their first foundation and erection. But hereof I will giue my selfe a day ouer to resolue.*

For seeing the first bookes of the folowing story, haue vndertaken the discourse of the first Kings and Kingdomes: and that it is impossible for the short life of a Preface, to trauaile after and ouer-take farre off Antiquity, and to iudge of it; I will, for the present, examine what profit hath beene gathered by our owne Kings, and their Neighbour Princes: who hauing beheld, both in diuine and humane letters, the successe of infidelitie, iniustice, and crueltie, haue (notwithstanding) planted after the same patterne.

True it is that the iudgements of all men are not agreeable; nor (which is more strange) the affection of any one man stirred vp alike with examples of like nature: But euery one is touched most, with that which most neerely seemeth to touch his owne priuate; Or otherwise best suteth with his apprehension. But the iudgements of GOD are for euer vnchangeable; neither is hee wearied by the long processe of time, and won to giue his blessing in one age, to that which hee hath cursed in another. Wherefore those that are wise, or whose wisedome, if it be not great, yet is true and well grounded, will be able to discerne the bitter fruites of irreligious policie, as well among those examples that are found in ages remoued farre from the present, as in those of latter times. And that it may no lesse appeare by euident proofe, than by asseueration, That all doing hath alwaies beene attended with ill successe; I will here, by way of preface, runne ouer some examples, which the worke ensuing hath not reached.

Among our Kings of the Norman race, we haue no ſooner paſſed ouer the violence of the Norman Conqueſt, than we encounter with a ſingular and moſt remarkable example of Gods Iuſtice, vpon the children of Henry the firſt. For that King, when both by force, craft and cruelty, hee had diſpoſſeſt ouertreacht, and laſtly made blinde and deſtroyed his elder Brother Robert Duke of Normandy, to make his owne ſonnes Lords of this Land: GOD caſt them all, Male and Female, Nephewes and Neeces (Maud excepted) into the bottome of the Sea, with aboue a hundred and fifty others that attended them; whereof a great many were Noble, and of the King dearely beloued.

To paſſe ouer the reſt, till we come to Edward the Second; it is certaine, that after the murder of that King, the iſſue of blood then made, though it had ſometimes of ſtay and ſtopping, did againe breake out; and that ſo often and in ſuch aboundance, as all our Princes of the Maſculine race (very few excepted) dyed of the ſame diſeaſe. And although the young yeares of Edward the Third, made his knowledge of that horrible fact no more then ſuſpicious: yet in that he after wards cauſed his owne Vncle the Earle of Kent to die, for no other offence than the deſire of his Brothers redemption, whom the Earle as then ſuppoſed to be liuing; the King making that to be treaſon in his Vncle, which was indeed treaſon in him-ſelfe, had his Vncles intelligence beene true) this I ſay made it manifeſt, that he was not ignorant of what had paſt, nor greatly deſirous to haue had it otherwiſe; though he cauſed Mortimer to dye for the ſame.

This cruelty the ſecret and vnſearchable iudgement of GOD reuenged, on the Grand-child of Edward the Third: and ſo it fell out, euen to the laſt of that line, that in the ſecond or third deſcent they were all buried vnder the ruines of thoſe buildings, of which the Mortar had beene tempered with innocent bloud. For Richard the ſecond, who ſaw, both his Treaſurers, his Chaucellor, and his Steward, with diuers others of his Counſailours, ſome of them ſlaughtered by the people, others in his abſence executed by his enemies; yet he alwayes tooke himſelfe for ouer wiſe, to be taught by examples. The Earles of Huntington and Kent, Montague and Spencer, who thought themſelues as great Politicians in thoſe dayes, as others haue done in theſe: hoping to pleaſe the King, and to ſecure themſelues, by the Murder of Glouceſter; died ſoone after, with many other their adherents, by the like violent hands, and farre more ſhamefully then did that Duke. And as for the King himſelfe (who in regard of many deedes, vnworthy of his Greatneſſe, cannot hee excuſed, as the diſauowing him ſelfe by breach of Faith, Charters, Pardons, and Patents) He was in the prime of his youth depoſed, and murdered by his Coſen Germane and vaſſel, Henry of Lancaſter, afterwards Henry the fourth.

This King, whose Title was weake, and his obtaining the Crowne traiterous: who brake faith with the Lords at his landing, protesting to intend onely the recouery of his proper inheritance; brake faith with Richard himselfe; and brake faith with all the Kingdome in Parliament, to whom he swore that the deposed King should liue. After that he had enioyed this Realme some few yeares, and in that time had beene set vpon on all sides by his Subiects, and neuer free from conspiracies and rebellions: he saw (if Soules immortall see and discerne any thinges after the bodies death) his Grand-childe Henry the sixt, and his Son the Prince, suddenly, and without mercy, murdered; the possession of the Crowne (for which he had caused so much blood to be poured out) transferred from his race; and by the Issues of his Enemies worne and enioyd: Enemies, whom by his owne practise hee supposed, that he had left no lesse power lesse, than the succession of the Kingdome questionlesse; by entailing the same vppon his owne Issues by Parliament. And out of doubt, humane reason could haue iudged no otherwise, but that these cautious prouisions of the Father, seconded by the valour and signall victories of his sonne Henry the fift, had buried the hopes of euery Competitor, vnder the despaire of all reconquest and recouery. I say, that humane reason might so haue iudged: were not this passage of Casaubon also true; Dies, hora, momentum euertendis dominationibus sufficit, quæ adamantinis credebantur radicibus esse fundatæ; A day, an houre, a moment, is enough to ouerturne the things, that seemed to haue beene founded and rooted in Adamant.

Now for Henry the sixt, vpon whom the great storme of his Grandfathers grieuous faultes fell, as it formerly had done vpon Richard the Grand-childe of Edward: although he was generally esteemed for a gentle and innocent Prince; yet as he refused the daughter of Armaignac, of the House of Nauarre, the greatest of the Princes of France, to whom hee was affianced (by which match he might haue defended his Inheritance in France) and married the Daughter of Aniou, (by which he lost all that hee had in France) so as in condiscending to the vnworthy death of his Vncle of Gloceſter, the maine and strong Pillar of the house of Lancaster; Hee drew on himselfe and this kingdome the greatest ioynt losse & dishonor, that euer it sustained since the Norman Conquest. Of whom it may truly be said which a Counsellor of his owne spake of Henry the third of France, Qu'il estoit vne fort gentile Prince; mais son reigne est aduenu en vne fort mauuois temps. That he was a very gentle Prince; but his raigne happened in a very vnfortunate season.

It is true that Buckingham and Suffolke were the practisers & contriuers of the Dukes death: Buckingham and Suffolk, because the Duke gaue instructions to their authority, which otherwise vnder the Queene had bin absolute; the Queene, in respect of her personall wound, spretæque iniuria formæ formæ, becauſe Gloceſter diſſwaded her marriage. But the fruit was anſwerable to the ſeed; the ſucceſſe to the Counſaile. For after the cutting downe of Glouceſter, Yorke grew vp ſo faſt, as hee dared to diſpute his right both by arguments and armes; in which quarrell, Suffolke and Buckingham, with the greateſt number of their adherents, were diſſolued. And although for his breach of Oath by Sacrament, it pleaſed God to ſtrike downe Yorke: yet his ſonne the Earle of March, following the plaine path which his Father had troden out, deſpoyled Henry the Father, and Edward, the ſonne, both of their liues aud Kingdomes. And what was the end now of that politique Lady the Queene, other then this, That ſhe liued to behold the wretched ends of all her pertakers: that ſhe liued to looke on, while her Husband the King, and her onely ſonne the Prince, were hewen in ſunder; while the Crowne was ſet on his head that did it. Shee liued to ſee her ſelfe deſpoyled of her Eſtate, and of her moueables: and laſtly, her Father, by rendring vp to the Crowne of France the Earledome of Prouence and other places, for the payment of fifty thouſand crownes for her Ranſome, to become a ſtarke Beggar. And this was the end of that ſubtilty, which Siracides calleth fine but vnrighteous: for other fruit hath it neuer yeelded ſince the world was.

And now it came to Edward the fourths turne (though after many difficulties) to triumph. For all the Plants of Lancaſter were rooted vpp; One onely Earle of Richmond excepted: whome alſo hee had once bought of the Duke of Brittaine, but could not hold him. And yet was not this of Edward ſuch a Plantation, as could any way promiſe it ſelfe ſtability. For this Edward the King (to omit more than many of his other cruelties) beheld and allowed the ſlaughter, which Glouceſter, Dorſet, Haſtings, and others, made of Edward the Prince in his owne preſence: of which tragicall Actors, there was not one that eſcaped the iudgement of GOD in the ſame kinde. And Hee, which (beſides the execution of his brother Clarence, for none other offence then hee him-ſelfe had formed in his owne imagination) inſtructed Glouceſter to kill Henry the ſixt, his Predeceſſour; taught him alſo by the ſame Art to kill his owne ſonnes and Succeſſors Edward and Richard. For thoſe Kings which haue ſold the blood of others at a low rate; haue but made the market for their owne enemies, to buy of theirs at the ſame price.

To Edward the fourth ſucceeded Richard the Third, the greateſt Maiſter in miſchiefe of of all that fore-went him: who although, for the neceſſity of his Tragedie, hee had more parts to play, and more to performe in his owne perſon, then all the reſt; yet hee ſo well fitted euery affection that playd with him, as if each of them had but acted his owne intereſt. For he wrought ſo cunningly vpon the affections of Haſtings, and Buckingham, enemies to the Queene and to all her kindred, as hee easily allured them to condiscend, that Riuers and Grey, the Kings Maternall Vncle and halfe brother, should (for the first) be seuered from him: secondly, hee wrought their consent to haue them imprisoned, and lastly) for the auoyding of future inconuenience) to haue their heads seuered from their bodies. And hauing now brought those his chiefe instruments to exercise that common precept, which the Deuill hath written on euery post, Scelera scelerib⁹ tuenda Sen: de clem. namely, To depresse those whom they had grieued, and to destroy those whom they had depreſt; Hee vrged that argument so farre and so forcibly; as nothing but the death of the yong king himself, and of his brother, could fashion the conclusion. For he caused it to be hammered into Buckinghams head, That, whensoeuer the king or his brother, should haue able yeares to exercise their power; they would take a most seuere reuenge of that cureleſſe wrong, offered to their Vncle and Brother, Riuers and Grey.

But this was not his manner of reasoning with Hastings, whose fidelity to his Masters Sonnes was without suspect: and yet the Diuell, who neuer disswades by impossibility, taught him to try him. And so he did. But when hee found by Catesby, who sounded him, that he was not fordable: He first resolued to kill him sitting in councell: wherein hauing fayled with his sword; He set the Hangman vpon him, with a weapon of more weight. And because nothing else could moue his appetite; He caused his head to be stricken off, before he eate his dinner. A greater iudgement of GOD, than this vpon Hastings, I haue neuer obserued in any storie. For the selfe same daie that the Earle Riuers, Grey, and others, were (without triall of Law, or offence giuen) by Hastings aduice executed at Pomfret: I say Hastings him-selfe in the same daie, and (as I take it) in the same houre, in the same law-leſſe manner, had his head stricken off in the Tower of London. But Buckingham liued a while longer; and with an eloquent oration perswaded the Londoners to elect Richard for their king. And hauing receiued the Earldome of Hereford for reward, besides the high hope of marrying his daughter to the Kings onely sonne; after many grieuous vexations of mind, and vnfortunate attempts, being in the end betrayed and deliuered vp by his trustiest seruant; He had his head seuered from his body at Salisbury, without the trouble of any of his Peeres. And what successe had Richard himself after all these mischefes and murders, policies, and counter-policies to Christian religion: and after such time, as with a most merciless hand he had preſsed out the breath of his Nephews and Naturall Lords; other than the prosperity of so short a life, as it tooke end, ere himselfe could well looke ouer and discerne it? the great outcry of innocent bloud, obtaining at GODS hands the effusion of his; who became a spectacle of shame and dishonor, both to his friends and enemies.

This cruell King, Henry the seauenth cut off; and was therein (no doubt) the immediate instrument of GODS iustice. A politicke Prince hee was if euer there were any, who by the ingine of his wisdome, beat downe and ouerturned as many strong oppositions both before and after hee ware the crowne as euer King of England did: I say by his wisdome, because as he euer left the raines of his affections in the hands of his profit, so he alwaies wayed his vndertakings by his abillities, leauing nothing more to hazard than so much as cannot be denied it in all humaine actions. Hee had well obserued the proceedings of Loys the eleuenth, whom hee followed in all that was royall or royal like, but hee was farre more iust, and begun not their processes whom hee hated or feared by the execution, as Loys did.

Hee could neuer indure any mediation in rewarding his seruants, and therein exceeding wise, for what so euer him-selfe gaue, he him-selfe receiued backe the thanks and the loue, knowing it well that the affections of men (purchased by nothing so reddely as by benefits) were traynes that better became great Kings, than great subiects. On the contrary, in what so-euer he greeued his subiects, he wisely put it off on those, that he found fit ministers for such actions. How-so-euer, the taking off, of Stanles head, who set the Crowne on his, and the death of the young Earle of Warwick, sonne to George D. of Clarence, shews, as the successe also did, that hee held somewhat of the errors of his Ancesters, for his possession in the first line ended in his grand children, as that of Edward the third and Henry the fourth had done.

Now for King Henry the eight: if all the pictures and Patternes of a mercilesse Prince were lost in the World, they might all againe be painted to the life, out of the story of this King. For how many seruants did hee aduance in hast (but for what vertue no man could suspect) and with the change of his fancy ruined againe; no man knowing for what offence? To how many others of more desert gaue hee aboundant floweres from whence to gather hony, and in the end of Harueſt burnt them in the Hiue? How many wiues did he cut off, and cast off, as his fancy and affection changed? How many Princes of the bloud (whereof some of them for age could hardly crawle towards the block) with a world of others of all degrees (of whom our common Chronicles haue kept the accompt) did he execute? yea, in his very death-bed, and when hee was at the point to haue giuen his accompt to GOD for the aboundance of bloud already spilt: He imprisoned the Duke of Nofolke the Father; and executed the Earle of Surrey the sonne; the one, whose deseruings he knew not how to value, hauing neuer omitted any thing that concerned his owne honour, and the Kings seruice; the other, neuer hauing committed any thing worth of his least displeasure: the one exceeding valiant and aduised; the other, no lesse valiant than learned, and of excellent hope. But besides the sorrowes which he heaped vpon the Fatherlesse, and widdowes at home: and besides the vaine enterprises abroade, wherein it is thought that hee consumed more Treasure, than all our victorious

Kings

Kinges did in their ſeuerall Conqueſts: what cauſeleſſe and cruell warres did he make vpon his owne Nephew King Iames the firſt? What Lawes and Wills did he deuiſe, to eſtabliſh this Kingdome in his owne iſſues? vſing his ſharpeſt weapons to cut off, & cut downe thoſe branches, which ſprang from the ſame roote that him-ſelfe did. And in the end (not withſtanding theſe his ſo many irreligious prouiſions) it pleaſed GOD to take away all his owne, without increaſe, though, for themſelues in their ſeuerall kindes, all Princes of eminent vertue. For theſe wordes of Samuell to Agag King of the Amalikites, haue beene verified vpon many others: As thy ſword hath made other women childleſſe: ſo ſhall thy mother be childleſſe among other women. And that blood, which the ſame King Henry affirmed, that the cold aire of Scotland had frozen vp in the North, GOD hath diffuſed by the ſunſhine of his grace: form whence His Maieſty now liuing, and long to liue, is deſcended. Of whome I may ſay it truely, That if all the malice of the world were infuſed into one eie: yet could it not diſcerne in His life, euen to this daie, any one of thoſe foule ſpots, by which the Conſciences of all the forenamed Princes (in effect) haue beene defiled; nor any droppe of that innocent blood on the ſword of his iuſtice, with which the moſt that fore-went him, haue ſtayned both their hands and fame. And for this Crowne of England; it may truely be auowed. That he hath receiued it euen form the hand of GOD, and hath ſtayed the time of putting it on, howſoeuer he were prouoked to haſten it: That Hee neuer tooke reuenge of any man, that ſought to put him beſide it: That Hee refuſed the aſſiſtance of Her enemies, that wore it long, with as great glory as euer Princeſſe did. That his Maieſty entred not by a breach, nor by blood; but by the Ordinary gate, which his owne right ſet open; and into which, by a generall loue and Obedience, Hee was receiued And howſoeuer His Maieſties preceding title to this Kingdome, was preferred by many Princes (witneſſe the Treaty at Cambray in the yeare, 1559) yet hee neuer, pleaſed to diſpute it, during the life of that renowned Lady his Predeceſſor; no, notwithſtanding the iniury of not being declared Heire, in all the time of Her long raigne.

Neither ought wee to forget, or neglect our thankefullneſſe to GOD for the vniting of the Northern partss of Brittany to the South, to wit of Scotland to England, which though they were ſeuered but by ſmall brookes and bankes, yet by reaſon of the long continewed warre, and the cruelties exercized vpon each other, in the affection of the Nations, they were infinitly ſeuered. This I ſay is not the leaſt of Gods bleſſings which His Maieſty hath brought with him vnto this Land. Nay, put all our petty greeuances together, and heap them vp to their hight, they wil appeare but as a Mole-hil compared with the Mountaine of this concord. And if all the Hiſtorians ſince then; haue acknowledged the vniting of the Red-Rose, and the White, for the greatest happinesse (Christian Religion excepted) that euer this Kingdome receiued from GOD, certainely the peace betweene the two Lions of gold and gules, and the making them one, doth by many degrees exceed the former; for by it, besides the sparing of our British blood, heretofore and during the difference so often & abundantly shed, the state of England is more assured, the Kingdome more inable to recouer her auntient honor and rights, and by it made more inuincible, than by all our former alliances, practices, policies and conquests. It is true that hereof we do not yet finde the effect. But had the Duke of Parma in the yeare 1588, ioyned the army which hee commanded, with that of Spaine, and landed it on the south coast; and had his Maiesty at the same time declared himselfe against vs in the north: it is ease to diuine what had become of the liberty of England, certainely we would then without murmur haue brought this vnion a farre greater praise than it hath since cost vs.

It is true, that there was neuer any Common weale or Kingdome in the world, wherein no man had cause to lament. Kings liue in the world and not aboue it. They are not infinit to examine euery mans cause, or to relieue euery mans wants. And yet in the latter, (though to his owne preiudice) His Maiestey hath had more compassion of other mens necessities, than of his owne Coffers. Of whome it may be said as of Salomon Dedit Deus Salomoni latitudinem Cordis: Which if other men doe not vnderstand with Pineda, to be ment by Liberality, but by Latitude of knowledge; yet may it bee better spoken of His Maiesty, than of any King that euer England had, who as well in Diuine, as Humane vnderstanding, hath exceeded all that fore-went him, by many degrees.

Pix comment. in Sal. 1. K. 4.

I could say much more of the Kings Maiestey, without flatterie: did I not feare the imputation of presumption, and withall suspect, that it might befall these papers of mine, (though the losse were little) as it did the Pictures of Queene Elizabeth, made by vnskilfull and common Painters, which by her owne Commandement, were knockt in peeces and cast into the fire. For ill Artists, in setting out the beauty of the externall: and weake writers, in describing the vertues of the internall; doe often leaue to posterity, of well formed faces a deformed memory; and of the most perfect and Princely mindes, a most defectiue representation. It may suffice, and there needes no other discourse; if the honest Reader but compare the cruell and turbulent passages of our former Kings, and of other their Neighbour-Princes (of whome for that purpose I haue inserted this breife discourse) with His Maiesties temperate, reuengelesse, and liberall disposition: I say, that if the honest Reader weigh them iustly, and with an euen hand: and withall but bestow euery deformed child on his true Parent; He shall find, that there is no man that hath so iust cause to complaine, as the King him-selfe hath.

Now

Now as we haue told the succesſe of the trumperies and cruelties of our owne Kings, and other great perſonages: ſo we fiende, that GOD is euery where the ſame GOD. And as it pleaſed him to puniſh the vſurpation, and vnnaturall cruelty of Henry the firſt, and of our third Edward, in their Children for many generations: ſo dealt He with the ſonnes of Loys Debonaire, the ſonne of Charles the great, or Charlemaine. For after ſuch time as Debonaire of France, had torne out the eies of Bernard his Nephew, the ſonne of Pipen, the eldeſt ſonne of Charlemaine, and heire of the Empire, and then cauſed him to die in priſon, as did our Henry to Robert his eldeſt brother: there followed nothing but murders vpon murders, poyſoning, impriſonments, and ciuill warre; till the whole race of that famous Emperour was extinguiſhed.

And though Debonaire, after he had rid himſelfe of his Nephew by a violent death; and of his Baſtard Brothers by a ciuill death (hauing incloſed them with ſure gard, all the daies of their liues, within a Monaſterie) held him ſelfe ſecure from all oppoſition: Yet GOD raiſed vp againſt him (which hee ſuſpected not) his owne ſonnes, to vex him, to inuade him, to take him priſoner, and to depoſe him; his owne ſonnes, with whome (to ſatisfie their ambition) hee had ſhared his eſtate, and giuen them Crownes to wear, and Kingdomes to gouerne, during his owne life. Yea his eldeſt ſonne Lothaire (for hee had foure, three by his firſt wife, and one by his ſecond; to wit, Lothaire, Pipen, Loys, and Charles) made it the cauſe of his depoſition, That he had vſed violence towards his Brothers and Kinſmen; and that he had ſuffered his Nephew (whome hee might haue deliuered) to be ſlaine, eo quod, ſaith the Text, fratribus et propinquis violentiam intulerit, et nepotem ſuum, quem ipſe liberare poterat, interfici permiſerit. Becauſe he vſed violence to his Brothers and Kinſmen, and ſuffred his Nephew to be ſlain whom he might haue deliuered. Step. Paſquier recher. l. 5. c. 1.

Yet did hee that which few Kings doe, namely, repent him of his cruelties. For among many other things, which hee performe in the Generall Aſſemblie of the States, it follows. Poſt hæc autem palam ſe erraſſe cõfeſſus, & imitatus Impe ratoris Theodoſii exemplum, pœnitentiam ſpontaneam ſuſcepit, tam de his, quam quæ in Bernardum propriũ nepotem geſſerat. After this hee did openly confeſſe him ſelfe to haue erred, and following the example of the Emperour Theodoſius hee vnder-went voluntary penance, as well for his other offences, as for that which hee had done againſt Bernard his owne Nephew. Paſq Ibidem.

This hee did: and it was praiſe-worthie. But the bloud that is vniuſtly ſpilt, is not againe gathered vp from the ground by repentance. Theſe Medicines, miniſtred to the dead, haue but dead rewards.

This King, as I haue ſaid, had foure Sonnes. To Lothaire his eldeſt he gaue the Kingdome of Italy; as Charlemaine, his Father, had done to Pepin the Father of Bernard, who was to ſucceed him in the Empire. To Pepin the ſecond ſonne he gaue the Kingdome of Aquitaine: to Loys, the Kingdome of Bauier: and to Charles, whome hee had by a ſecond wife, called Iudith, the remainder of the Kingdome of France. But this ſecond wife, being a Mother-in-law to the reſt, perſwaded Debonaire to caſt his ſonne Pipen out of Aquitaine; thereby to greaten Charles: which, after the death of his ſonne Pipen, he proſequted to effect, againſt his Grandchild bearing the ſame name. In the meane while, being inuaded by his ſonne Loys of Bauier, he dies for greife.

Debonaire dead: Loys of Bauier, and Charles afterwards called the bald, and their Nephew Pipen of Aquitaine, ioyne in league againſt the Emperour Lothaire their eldeſt Brother. They fight neare an Auxerre the moſt blody battle that euer was ſtroken in France: in which, the marueilous loſſe of Nobility, and men of warre, gaue courage to the Saracens to inuade Italie; to the Hunnes, to fall vpon Almaine; and the Danes, to enter vpon Normandy. Charles the Bald by treaſon ſeizeth vpon his Nephew Pepin, kills him in a Cloyſter, Carloman rebells againſt his Father Charles the Bald, the Father burnes out the eies of his ſonne Carloman; Bauire inuades the Emperour Lothaire his Brother, Lothaire quits the Emperour, Hee is aſſailed and wounded to the heart by his owne conſcience, for his rebellion againſt his Father, and for his other cruelties, and dies in a Moneſtarie. Charles the Bald the Vncle oppreſeth his Nephewes the ſonnes of Lothaire, hee vſurpeth the Empire to the preiudice of Loys of Bauire his elder Brother, Bauiers armies and his ſonne Carloman are beaten, hee dies of griefe, and the Vſurper Charles is poyſoned by Zedechias a Iew his Phiſitian, his ſonne Loys le Beque dies of the ſame drinke Beque had Charles the ſimple, and two Baſtards, Loys and Carloman, they rebell againſt their Brother, but the eldeſt breakes his Neck, the younger is ſlaine by a wild Bore; the ſonne of Bauiere had the ſame ill deſtiny and brake his neck by a fall out of a Window in ſporting with his companions Charles the groſſe becomes Lord of all that the ſonnes of Debonaire held in Germanie, wherewith not contented, hee inuades Charles the ſimple, but being forſaken of his Nobility, of his wife, and of his vnderſtanding, hee dies a diſtracted begger. Charles the ſimple is held in Wardſhip by Eudes Maior of the Pallace, then by Robert, the Brother of Eudes, and laſtly being taken by the Earle of Vermandois, hee is forced to die in the priſon of Peron: Loyes the ſonne of Charles the ſimple breakes his Neck in Chaſing a Wolfe, and of the two ſonns of this Loys, the one dies of poyſon, the other dies in the priſon of Orleans, after whome Hugh Capet, of another race, and a ſtranger to the French, makes him-ſelfe King.

These miserable ends had the issues of Debonaire: who after hee had once apparrelled iniustice with authority, his sonnes and successours tooke vp the fashion; and wore that Garment so long without other prouision, as when the same was torne from their shouldiers, euery man despised them as miserable and naked beggers. The wretched successe they had, (saith a learned French-man) shewes, què en ceste mort il y avoit plus du fait des hommes que de Dieu, ou de la iusticè: that in the death of that Prince, to wit of Bernard the sonne of Pepin, the true heire of Charlemaine, men had more medling, than either GOD, or Iustice had.

But to come nearer home; it is certaine that Francis the first, One of the worthiest Kings (except for that fact) that euer the French men had, did neuer enioy him-selfe; after hee had commended the destruction of the Protestants of Mirandol and Cabrieres, to the Parliament of Prouence, which poore people were there-vpon burnt, and murdered; men, woemen, and children. It is true, that the said King Francis repented him-selfe of the fact, and gaue Charge to Henry his sonne, to doe iustice vpon the Murderers; threatning his sonne with GODS iudgmeuts, if he neglected it. But this vnseasonable care of his, GOD was not pleased to accept for payment. For after Henry him-selfe was slaine in sport by Montgomery; we all may remember what became of his foure sonnes, Francis Charles, Henry, and Hercules. Of which although three of them became Kings, and were married to beautifull and vertuous Ladies: Yet were they, one after another, cast out of the world, without stock or seed. And not-with-standing their subtilty, and breach of faith; with all their Massacres, vpon those of the religion, and great effusion of bloud; the Crowne was set on his head, whom they all laboured to dissolue; the Protestants remaine more in number than euer they were; and hold to this day more strong citties than euer they had.

Let vs now see if GOD be not the same GOD in Spaine, as in England and France. Towards whom we will looke no further backe than to Don Pedro of Castile: in respect of which Prince, all the Tyrants of Sicil, our Richard the third, and the great Euan Vasilowick of Moscouia, were but pettie ones: this Castilian, of all Christian and Heathen Kings, hauing beene the most merciless For besides those of his owne bloud and Nobility which hee caused to be slaine in his owne Court and Chamber, as Sancho Ruis the grert Master of Calatraua, Ruis Gonsales, Alphonso Tello, and Don Iohn of Arragon, whom he cut in peeces and cast into the streets, denying him Christian buriall: I say besides these, and the slaughter of Gomes Manriques, Diego Peres, Alphonso Gomes, and the great commander of Castile; He made away the two Infants of Arragon his Cosen-germans, his brother Don Frederick, Don Iohn de la Cerde, Albuquergues, Nugnes de Guzmã, Cornel, Cabrera, Tenorio, Mendes de Toledo.

de Toledo, Guttiere his great Treasurer, and all his Kindred; and a world of others. Neither did he spare his two youngest brothers, innocent Princes: whom after hee had kept in close prison from their Cradles, till one of them had liued sixteene yeares, and the other, foureteene; hee murdered them there. Nay hee spared not his Mother, nor his wife the Lady Blanch of Bourbon. Lastly as he caused the Archbishop of Toledo, and the Deane, to bee killed of purpose to enioy their treasures: so did he put to death Mahomet Aben Alhamar King of Barbary, with seauen and thirty of his Nobilitie; that came vnto him for succour, with a great summe of money, to leuy (by his fauour) some companies of souldiers to returne withall. Yea, he would needs assist the Hangman with his owne hand, in the execution of the old King; in so much as Pope Vrban declared him an enemie both to GOD and Man. But what was his end? Hauing beene formerly beaten out of his Kingdome, and re-established by the valour of the English Nation, led by the famous Duke of Lancaster: He was stabbed to death by his younger Brother the Earle of Astramara, who dispossest all his Children of their inheritance; which, but for the Fathers iniustice and cruelty, had neuer beene in danger of any such thing.

Histo. of Spaine

If we can parallell any man with this King, it must bee Duke Iohn of Burgoigne: who, after his traiterous murder of the Duke of Orleans, caused the Constable of Armagnac, the Chancelour of France, the Bishops of Constance, Bayeux, Eureux, Senlis, Saintes, and other religious and reuerend Church-men, the Earle of gran Prè, Hector of Chartres, and (in effect) all the Officers of iustice, of the Chamber of Accompts, Treasuries, and Request, (with sixteene hundred others to accompany them) to bee suddenly and violently slaine. Hereby, while he hoped to gouerne, and to haue maistred France: He was soone after strucken with an axe in the face, in the presence of the Dauphin; and, without any leisure to repent his misdeeds, presently slaine. These were the Louers of other mens miseries: and miserie found them out.

French Inuent. in Anno. 1418.

Now for the Kings of Spaine, which liued both with Henry the seuenth, Henry the eight, Queene Mary, and Queene Elizabeth; Ferdinand of Arragon was the first: and the first that layd the foundation of the present Austrian greatnesse. For this King did not content himselfe to hold Arragon by the vsurpation of his Ancestor; and to fasten thereunto the Kingdome of Castile and Leon, which Isabel his wife held by strong hand, and his assistance, from her owne Neece the Daughter of the last Henry: but most cruelly and craftily, without all colour or pretence of right, Hee also cast his owne Neece out of the Kingdome of Nauarre; and, contrarie to faith, and the promise that hee made to restore it, fortified the best places, and so wasted the rest, as there was no meanes left for any army to inuade it. This King I say, that betrayed also Ferdinand and Frederick

Kings

Kings of Naples, Princes of his owne bloud, and by double alliance tied vnto him; ſold them to the French: and with the ſame Army, ſent for their ſuccour vnder Gonſaluo, caſt them out; and ſhared their Kingdome with the French, whom afterwards he moſt ſhamefully betrayed.

This wiſe and politique King, who ſold Heauen and his owne Honour, to make his ſonne, the Prince of Spaine, the greateſt Monarch of the world: ſaw him die in the flower of his yeares, and his wife great with childe, with her vntimely birth, at once and together buried. His eldeſt daughter married vnto Don Alphonſo Prince of Portugall, beheld her firſt husband breake his neck in her preſence, and being with childe by her ſecond, dyed with it. A iuſt iudgement of GOD vpon the race of Iohn, father to Alphonſo, now wholly extinguiſhed: who had not onely left many diſconſolate Mothers in Portugall, by the ſlaughter of their children; but had formerly ſlaine with his owne hand, the ſonne and onely comfort of his Aunt the Lady Beatrix, Ducheſſe of Viſeo. The ſecond Daughter of Ferdinand, married to the Arch-duke Philip, turned foole; and died mad and depriued. His third daughter, beſtowed on King Henry the eight, He ſaw caſt off by the King: the mother of many troubles in England; and the mother of a Daughter, that in her vnhappy zeale ſhed a world of innocent bloud; loſt Callice to the French; and died heart-broken without increaſe. To conclude: all thoſe Kingdomes of Ferdinand haue maiſters of a new name; and, by a ſtrange family are gouerned and poſſeſt.

Charles the fift, ſonne to the Arch-duke Philip, in whoſe vaine enterpriſes vpon the French, vpon the Almans, and other Princes and States, ſo many multitudes of Chriſtian ſouldiers, and renowned Captaines, were conſumed: who gaue the while a moſt perilous entrance to the Turkes, and ſuffered Rhodes, the Key of Chriſtendome, to be taken; was in concluſion chaced out of France, and in a ſort out of Germany; and left to the French, Mentz, Toule, and Verdun, places belonging to the Empire; ſtole away from Inſpurg, and ſcaled the Alpes by torch-light, purſued by Duke Maurice, hauing hoped to ſwallow vp all thoſe dominions, wherein hee concolied nothing ſaue his owne diſgraces. And hauing, after the ſlaughter of ſo many Millions of men, no one foote of ground in eyther: Hee crept into a Cloyſter, and made himſelfe a Penſioner of an hundred thouſand Duckets by the yeare to his ſonne Philip; from whom he very ſlowly receiued his meane and ordinary maintenance. Nether. Hiſt. l. 7. fol. 313.

His ſonne againe King Philip the ſecond, not ſatisfied to hold Holland and Zeland, (wreſted by his anceſtors from Iaqueline their lawfull Princeſſe) and to poſſeſſe in peace many other Prouinces of the Netherlands: perſwaded by that miſchieuous Cardinall of Granuile, and other Romiſh Tyrants; not onely forgot the moſt remarkable ſeruices, done to his Father the Emperour by the Nobilitie of thoſe countries; not

onely forgot the preſent, made him vpon his entrie, of forty millions of Florens, called the Nouale aide; nor onely forgot, that hee had twice moſt ſolemnly ſworne to the Generall States, to maintaine and preſerue their auncient rights, priuiledges, and cuſtomes, which they had enioyed vnder their thirty and fiue Earles before him, Conditionall Princes of thoſe Prouinces: but beginning firſt to conſtraine them, and enthrall them by the Spaniſh Inquiſition, and then to impoueriſh them by many new deuiſed and intollerable impoſitions; Hee laſtly, by ſtrong hand and maine force, attempted to make him-ſelfe not onely an abſolute Monarch ouer them, like vnto the Kings and Soueraignes of England and France; but Turke-like, to tread vnder his feet all their Nationall and fundamentall Lawes, Priuiledges, and ancient Rights. To effect which, after he had eaſily obtained from the Pope a Diſpenſation of his former Oathes (which Diſpenſation was the true cauſe of all the warre and bloudſhed ſince then) and after he had tryed what hee could performe, by diuiding of their owne Nobilitie, vnder the gouernment of his baſe ſiſter, Margaret of Auſtria, and the Cardinall Granuile; Hee employed that moſt mercileſſe Spaniard Don Ferdinand Aluarez of Toledo, Duke of Alua, followed with a powerfull army of ſtrange Nations: by whom he firſt ſlaughtered that renowned Captaine the Earle of Egmont, Prince of Gauare; and Philip Montmorency Earle of Horn: made away Montigue, and the Marquis of Bergues; and cut off in thoſe ſixe yeares (that Alua gouerned) of Gentlemen and others, eighteene thouſand and ſixe hundred, by the hands of the Hangman, beſides all his other barbarous murders and maſſacres. By whoſe miniſtry when hee could not yet brings his affaires to their wiſhed ends, hauing it in his hope to worke that by ſubtlety, which hee had failed to performe by force: Hee ſent for gouernour his baſtard brother Don Iohn of Auſtria, a Prince of great hope, and very gracious to thoſe people. But hee, vſing the ſame Papall aduantage that his predeceſſors had done: made no ſcruple to take Oath vpon the Holy Euangeliſts, to obſerue the treaty made with the Generall States; and to diſcharge the Low Countries of all Spaniards, and other ſtrangers, therein garriſond. Towards whoſe Pay and Paſport, the Netherlands ſtrained them-ſelues to make payment of ſixe hundred thouſand pounds. Which monies receiued, He ſuddenly ſurpriſed the Citadells of Antwerp and Nemeures: not doubting (being vnſuſpected by the States) to haue poſſeſt him-ſelfe of all the maiſtring places of thoſe Prouinces. For whatſoeuer hee ouertly pretended: He held in ſecret a contrary councell with the Secretary Eſcouedo, Rhodus, Barlemont, and others, Miniſters of the Spaniſh tyranny, formerly practiſed, and now againe intended. But let vs now ſee the effect and end of this periurie, and of all other the Dukes cruelties. Firſt, for him-ſelfe; after hee had murdered ſo many of the Nobilitie; executed (as aforeſaid) eighteene thouſand ſixe hundred in sixe yeares; and most cruelly slaine Man, Women, and Childe, in Mecklin, Zutphen, Naerden, and other places: and after hee had consumed sixe and thirty millions of treasure in sixe yeares; notwithstanding his Spanish vaunt, That hee would suffocate the Hollanders in their owne butter-barrells, and milke-tubbs: He departed the country no otherwise accompanied, than with the curse and detestation of the whole Nation; leauing his Maisters affaires in a tenfold worse estate, than hee found them at his first arriuall. For Don Iohn, whose haughty conceipe of him-selfe ouer-came the greatest difficulties; though his iudgement were ouer weake to mannage the least: what wonders did his fearefull breach of faith bring forth, other than the King his brothers iealousie and distrust; with the vntimely death that seized him, euen in the floore of his youth. And for Escouedo his sharpe-witted Secretarie; who in his owne imagination had conquered for his Maister both England and the Netherlands, being sent into Spaine vpon some new proiect, He was at the first arriuall, and before any accesse to the King, by certaine Ruffians appointed by Anthony Peres (though by better warrant than his) rudely murdered in his owne lodging. Lastly, if we consider the King of Spaines carriage, his counsaile, and successe in this businesse; there is nothing left to the memory of man more remarkeable. For hee hath paid aboue an hundred Millions, and the liues of aboue foure hundred thousand Christians, for the losse of all those countries; which, for beauty, gaue place to none; and for reuenue, did equall his VVest Indies: for the losse of a nation, which most willingly obeyed him; and who at this day, after forty yeares warre, are in despight of all his forces become free Estate, and farre more rich and powerfull, than they were, when hee first beganne to impouerish and oppresse them.

Oh by what plots, by what forswearings, betrayings, oppressions, imprisonments, tortures, poysonings, and vnder what reasons of State, and politique subteltie, haue these forenamed Kings, both strangers, and of our owne Nation, pulled the vengeance of GOD vpon them-selues, vpon theirs, and vpon their prudent ministers! and in the end haue brought those things to passe for their enemies, and seene an effect so directly contrary to all their owne counsailes and cruelties; as the one could neuer haue hoped for themselues; and the other neuer haue succeeded; if no such opposition had euer beene made. GOD hath said it and performed it euer: Perdam sapientiam sapientum, I will destroy the wisdome of the wise.

But what of all this? and to what end doe we lay before the eyes of the liuing, the fal and fortunes of the dead: seeing the world is the same that it hath bin; & the children of the present time, will still obey their parents? It is in the present time, that all the wits of the world are exercised. To hold the times we haue we hold all things lawfull: and either we hope to hold them for euer; or at least wee hope, that there is nothing after them to be hoped for.

For as wee are content to forget our owne experience, and to counterfeit the ignorance of our owne knowledge, in all things that concerne our ſelues; or perſwade our ſelues, that GOD hath giuen vs letters patents to purſue all our irreligious affections, with a non obſtante: ſo wee neither looke behinde vs what hath beene, nor before vs what ſhall be. It is true, that the quantitie which we haue, is of the body: wee are by it ioyned to the earth: wee are compounded of earth; and wee inhabit it. The Heauens are high, farre off and vnſearchable: we haue ſenſe and feeling of corporall things; and of eternall grace, but by reuelation. No meruaile then that our thoughts are alſo earthlie, and it is leſſe to be wondred at, that the words of worthleſſe men cannot cleanſe them; ſeeing their doctrine and inſtruction, whoſe vnderſtanding the Holy Ghoſt vouchſafed to inhabite, haue not performed it. For as the Prophet Eſai cryed out long agone, Lord, who hath beleeued our reports? And out of doubt, as Eſai complained then for him ſelfe and others: ſo are they leſſe beleeued, euery day after other. For although Religion, and the truth thereof, be in euery mans mouth, yea in the diſcourſe of euery woman, who for the greateſt number are but Idols of vanitie: what is it other than an vniuerſall diſſimulation? Wee profeſſe that wee know GOD, but by workes wee deny him. For Beatitude doth not conſiſt in the knowledge of diuine things, but in a diuine life: for the Diuells know them better than men. Beatitudo non eſt diuinorum cognitio, ſed vita diuina. And certainly there is nothing more to be admired, and more to be lamented, than the priuate contention, the paſſionate diſpute, the perſonall hatred, and the perpetuall warre, maſſacres, and murders, for Religion among Chriſtians: the diſcourſe whereof hath ſo occupied the World, as it hath well neare driuen the practiſe thereof out of the world. Who would not ſoone reſolue, that tooke knowledge but of the religious diſputations among men, and not of their liues which diſpute, that there were no other thing in their deſires, than the purchaſe of Heauen; and that the World it ſelfe were but vſed as it ought, and as an Inne or place, wherein to repoſe our ſelues in paſſing on towards our celeſtiall habitation? when on the contrary, beſides the diſcourſe and outward profeſſion, the ſoule hath nothing but hypocriſie. We are all (in effect) become Comedians in religion: and while we act in geſture and voice, diuine vertues, in all the courſe of our liues wee renounce our Perſons, and the parts wee play. For Charitie, Iuſtice, and Truth, haue but their being in termes, like the Philoſophers Materia prima.

Paul to Titus Ch. 1. ve. 10.

Neither is it that wiſdome, which Salomon defineth to be the Schoole-Miſtreſſe of the knowledge of God, that hath valuation in the world: it is enough that we giue it our good word; but the ſame which is altogether exerciſed in the ſeruice of the World, as the gathering of riches chiefly; by which we purchaſe and obtaine honour, with the many reſpects which attend it.

Theſe

These indeed be the markes, which (when wee haue bent our consciences to the highest) wee all shoote at. For the obtaining whereof it is true, that the care is our owne, the care our owne in this life, the perill our owne in the future; and yet when wee haue gathered the greatest abundance, wee our selues enioy no more thereof, than so much as belongs to one man. For the rest, Hee that had the greatest wisdome, and the greatest abilitie that euer man had, hath told vs what his vse. VVhen goods increase (saith Salomon) they also increase that eate them; and what good commeth to the Owners, but the beholding thereof with their eyes? As for those that deuour the rest, and follow vs in faire weather: they againe forsake vs in the first tempest of misfortune, and steere away before the Sea and Winde, leauing vs to the malice of our destinies. Of these, among a thousand examples, I will take but one out of Maister Dannet, and vse his owne words: VVhilest the Emperour Charles the fift, after the resignation of his Estates, stayed at Vlushing for winde, to carry him his last iourney into Spaine; Hee conferred on a time with Seldius, his brother Ferdinands Embassadour, till the deepe of the night. And when Seldius should depart: the Emperour calling for some of his seruants, and no bodie answering him (for those that attended vpon him, were some gone to their lodgings, and all the rest a sleepe) the Emperour tooke vp the candle himselfe, and went before Seldius to light him downe the staires; and so did, notwithstanding all the resistance that Seldius could make. And when Hee was come to the staires foot, He said thus vnto him: Seldius, remember this of Charles the Emperour, when hee shall be dead and gone, That Him, whom thou hast knowne in thy time enuironed with so many mighty Armies, and Guards of souldiors, thou hast also seene alone, abandoned, and forsaken, yea euen of his owne domesticall seruants, &c. I acknowledge this change of Fortune to proceed from the mighty hand of GOD, which I will by no meanes goe about to withstand.* Eccles. 5. 10.

But you will say that there are some things else, and of greater regard than the former. The first, is the reuerend respect that is held of great men, and the Honour done vnto them by all sorts of people. And it is true indeed: prouided, that an inward loue for their iustice and piety, accompany the outward worship giuen to their places and power; without which what is the applause of the Multitude, but as the outerie of an Heard of Animals, who without the knowledge of any true cause, please themselues with the noyse they make? For seeing it is a thing exceeding rare, to distinguish Vertue and Fortune: the most impious (if prosperous) haue euer beene applauded; the most vertuous (if vnprosperous) haue euer beene despised. For as Fortunes man rides the Horse, so Fortune her-selfe rides the Man. Who, when hee is descended and on foote: the Man taken from his Beast, and Fortune from the Man; a base groome beates the one, and a bitter contempt spurnes at the other, with equall liberties.

The second, is the greatning of our posterity, and the contemplation of their glory whom wee leaue behinde vs. Certainely, of those which conceiue that their soules departed take any comfort therein, it may truly be said of them, which Lactantius spake of certaine Heathen Philosophers, quod sapientes sunt in re stulta. For when our spirits immortall shall be once seperate from our mortall bodies, and disposed by GOD, there remaineth in them no other ioy of their posteritie which succeed, than there doth of pride in that stone, which sleepeth in the Wall of a King's Palace, nor any other sorrow for their pouertie, than there doth of shame in that, which beareth vp a Beggars cotage. Nesciunt mortui, etiam sancti, quid agunt viui, etiam eorum filij, quia animæ mortuorum rebus viuentium non intersunt. The dead though holy, know nothing of the liuing, no, not of their owne children: for the soules of those departed, are not conuersant with their affaires that remaine. And if wee doubt of Saint Augustine, wee cannot of Iob; who tels vs, That wee know not if our sonnes shall be honourable: neither shall we vnderstand concerning them, whether they shalbe of low degree. Which Ecclesiastes also confirmeth: Man walketh in a shadow, and disquieteth him-selfe in vaine: hee heapeth vp riches, and cannot tell who shall gather them. The liuing (saith hee) know that they shall die, but the dead know nothing at all: for who can shew vnto man, what shall be after him vnder the Sunne? Hee therefore accompteth it among the rest of worldly vanities, to labour and trauaile in the world, not knowing after death, whether a foole or a wise man should enioy the fruits thereof: which made mee (saith hee) endeauour euen to abhorre mine owne labour. And what can other men hope, whose blessed or sorrowfull estates after death GOD hath reserued? mans knowledge lying but in his hope, seeing the Prophet Esai confesseth of the elect, That Abraham is ignorant of vs, and Israel knowes vs not. But hereof wee are assured, that the long and darke night of death: (of whose following day we shall neuer behold the dawne, till his returne that hath triumphed ouer it) shall couer vs ouer, till the world be no more. After which, and when we shall againe receiue Organs glorified and incorruptible, the seats of Angelicall affections: in so great admiration shall the soules of the blessed be exercised, as they cannot admit the mixture of any second or lesse ioy; nor any returne of foregone and mortall affection towards friends, kindred, or children. Of whom whether wee shall retaine any particular knowledge, or in any sort distinguish them: no man can assure vs; and the wisest men doubt. But on the contrary, If a diuine life retaine any of those faculties, which the soule exercised in a mortall body; wee shall not at that time so diuide the ioyes of Heauen, as to cast any part thereof on the memory of their felicities which remaine in the World. No; be their estates greater than euer the World gaue, wee shall by the difference knowne vnto vs) euen detest their consideration. And whatsoeuer comfort shall remaine of all forepast, the same will consist in the charity, which we exercised liuing: and in that Pietie, Iustice, and firme Faith, for which it pleased the infinite mercy of GOD to accept of vs, and receiue vs. Shall wee therefore value honour and riches at nothing? and neglect them, as vnnecessary and paine? Certainly no. For that infinite wisdome of GOD, which hath distinguished his Angells by degrees: which hath giuen greater and lesse light and beauty, to Heauenly bodies: which hath made differentes betweene beasts and birds: created the Eagle and the Flye, the Cedar and the Shrub: and among stones, giuen the faireſt tincture to the Rubie, and the quickest light to the Diamond; hath also ordained Kings, Dukes or Leaders of the people, Magistrates, Iudges, and other degrees among men. And as honour is left to posteritie, for a marke and ensigne of the vertue and vnderstanding of their Ancestors: so, seeing Siracides preferreth Death before Beggery: and that titles, without proportionable estates, fall vnder the miserable succour of other mens pitty; I accompt it foolishnesse to condemne such a care: Prouided, that worldly goods be well gotten, and that wee raise not our owne buildings out of other mens ruines. For as Plato doth first preferre the perfection of bodily health; secondly, the forme and beauty; and thirdly, Diuitias nulla fraude quæsitas: so Hieremie cryes, VVoe vnto them that erect their houses by vnrighteousnesse, and their chambers without equitie: and Esai the same, VVoe to those that spoyle and were not spoyled. And it was out of the true wisdome of Salomon, that hee commandeth vs, not to drinke the wine of violence; not to lie in wait for bloud; and not to swallow them vp aliue, whose riches we couet: for such are the wayes (saith hee) of euery one that is greedy of gaine.

And if wee could affoord our selues but so much leisure as to consider, That he which hath most in the world, hath, in respect of the world, nothing in it: and that he which hath the longest time lent him to liue in it, hath yet no proportion at all therein, setting it either by that which is past, when we were not, or by that time which is to come, in which we shall abide for euer: I say, if both, to wit, our proportion in the world, and our time in the world, differ not much from that which is nothing, it is not out of any excellency of vnderstanding, that wee so much prise the one, which hath (in effect) no being: and so much neglect the other, which hath no ending: coueting those mortall things of the world, as if our soules were therein immortall, and neglecting those things which are immortall, as if our selues after the world were but mortall.

But let euery man value his owne wisdome, as hee pleaseth. Let the Rich

Rich man thinke all fooles, that cannot equall his abundance; the Reuenger esteeme all negligent, that haue not trodden downe their opposites; the Politician, all grosse, that cannot merchandize their faith: Yet when wee once come in sight of the Port of death, to which all windes driue vs; and when by letting fall that fatall Anchor, which can neuer be weighed againe, the Nauigation of this life takes end: Then it is I say, that our owne cogitations (those sad and seuere cogitations, formerly beaten from vs by our Health and Felicitie) returne againe, and pay vs to the vttermost for all the pleasing passages of our liues past. It is then that wee crie out to GOD, for mercie; then, when our selues can no longer exercise cruelty towards others: and it is onely then, that wee are strucken through the soule
Gala. 6. 7. with this terrible sentence, That GOD will not be mockt. For if
Pet. 1. 4. according to Saint Peter, The righteous scarcely be saued: and that GOD spared not his Angels: where shall those appeare, who, hauing serued their appetites all their liues, presume to thinke, that the seuere Commandements of the All-powerfull GOD were giuen but in sport; and that the short breath, which wee draw when death presseth vs, if wee can but fashion it to the sound of Mercy (without any kinde of satisfaction or amends) is sufficient? O quam multi, saith a reuerend Father, Cum hac spe ad æternos labores & bella descendunt: I confesse that it is a great comfort to our friends, to haue it said, that we ended well: for we all desire (as Balaam did) to die the death of the righteous. But what shall wee call a disesteeming, an apposing, or (indeed) a mocking of GOD: if those men doe not appose him, disesteeme him, and mocke him, that thinke it enough for GOD, to aske him forgiuenesse at leisure, with the remainder and last drawing of a malicious breath? For what doe they otherwise, that die this kinde of well-dying, but say vnto GOD as followeth? Wee beseech thee O GOD, that all the falshoods, forswearings, and treacheries of our liues past, may be pleasing vnto thee; that thou wilt for our sakes (that haue had no leisure to doe any thing for thine) change thy nature (though impossible) and forget to be a iust GOD, that thou wilt loue iniuries and oppressions, call ambition wisdome, and charitie foolishnesse. For I shall preiudice my sonne (which I am resolued not to doe) if I make restitution; and confesse my selfe to haue beene iniust, (which I am too proud to doe) if I deliuer the oppressed. Certainly, these wise worldlings haue either found out a new GOD; or haue made One, and in all likelihood such a Leaden One, as Lewis the eleuenth ware in his Cappe; which, when he had caused any that he feared, or hated, to be killed, he would take it from his head and kisse it: beseeching it to pardon him this one euill act more, and it should be the last, which, (as at other times) hee did; when by the practise of a Cardinall and a falsified Sacrament, hee caused the Earle of Armagnack to be stabbed to death; mockeries indeed fit to be vsed towards a Leaden, but not towards the

euer-liuing GOD. But of this compoſition are all the deuout louers of the World, that they feare all that is dureleſſe and ridiculous: they feare the plots and practiſes of their oppoſites, and their very whiſperings: they feare the opinions of men which beat but vpon ſhadowes: they flatter and forſake the proſperous and vnproſperous, be they friends or Kings: yea they diue vnder water, like Ducks, at euery pebble ſtone, that's but throwne towards them by a powerfull hand: and on the contrary, they ſhew an obſtinate and Giant-like valour, againſt the terrible iudgements of the All-powerfull GOD: yea they ſhew themſelues Gods againſt GOD, and ſlaues towards men; towards men whoſe bodies and conſciences are alike rotten.

Now for the reſt: If wee truly examine the difference of both conditions; to wit, of the rich and mighty, whom wee call fortunate; and of the poore and oppreſſed, whom wee account wretched: wee ſhall finde the happineſſe of the one, and the miſerable eſtate of the other, ſo tied by GOD to the very inſtant, and both ſo ſubiect to enterchange (witneſſe the ſodaine downefall of the greateſt Princes, and the ſpeedy vpriſing of the meaneſt perſons) as the one hath nothing ſo certaine, whereof to boaſt; nor the other ſo vncertaine, whereof to bewaile it ſelfe. For there is no man ſo aſſured of his honour, of his riches, health, or life; but that hee may be depriued of either or all, the very next houre or day to come. Quid veſper vehat, incertum eſt, VVhat the euening will bring with it, it is vncertaine. And yet yee cannot tell (ſaith Saint Iames) what ſhalbe to morrow. Iam. 4. 14. To day hee is ſet vp; and to morrow hee ſhall not be found: for hee is turned into duſt, and his purpoſe periſheth. And although the aire which compaſſeth aduerſitie, be very obſcure: yet therein wee better diſcerne GOD, than in that ſhining light which enuironeth worldly glorie; through which, for the cleareneſſe thereof, there is no vanitie which eſcapeth our ſight. And let aduerſitie ſeeme what it will; to happy men, ridiculous, who make them-ſelues merry at other mens misfortunes; and to thoſe vnder the croſſe, grieuous: yet this is true, That for all that is paſt, to the very inſtant, the portions remaining are equall to either. For be it that wee haue liued many yeares, and (according to Salomon) in them all wee haue reioyced; or be it that wee haue meaſured the ſame length of daies, and therein haue euer-more ſorrowed: yet looking backe from our preſent being, we finde both the one and the other, to wit, the ioy and the woe, ſailed out of ſight; and death, which doth purſue vs and hold vs in chace, from our infancie, hath gathered it. Quicquid ætatis retro eſt, mors tenet: VVhat-ſo-euer of our age is paſt, death holds it. So as whoſo-euer hee be, to whom Fortune hath beene a ſeruant, and the Time a friend: let him but take the accompt of his memory (for wee haue no other keeper of our pleaſures paſt) and truly examine what it hath reſerued eyther of beauty and youth, or fore-gone delights; what it hath ſaued, that it might last, of his deareſt affections, or of what-euer elſe the amorous Spring-time gaue his thoughts of contentment, then vnualuable; and hee ſhall finde that all the art which his elder yeares haue, can draw no other vapour out of theſe diſſolutions, than heauy, ſecret, and ſad ſighes. Hee ſhall finde nothing remaining, but thoſe ſorrowes, which grow vp after our faſt-ſpringing youth; ouer-take it, when it is at a ſtand; and ouer-top it vtterly, when it beginnes to wither: in ſo much as looking backe from the very inſtant time, and from our now being; the poore, diſeaſed, and captiue creature, hath as little ſence of all his former miſeries and paines; as hee, that is moſt bleſt in common opinion, hath of his fore-paſſed pleaſures and delights. For what-ſo-euer is caſt behinde vs, is iuſt nothing: and what is to come, deceiptfull hope hath it. Omnia quæ euentura ſunt, in incerto iacent. Onely thoſe few blacke Swannes I muſt except: who hauing had the grace to value worldly vanities at no more than their owne price; doe, by retayning the comfortable memory of a well acted life, behold death without dread, and the graue without feare; and embrace both, as neceſſary guides to endleſſe glory.

For my ſelfe, this is my conſolation, and all that I can offer to others, that the ſorrowes of this life, are but of two ſorts: whereof the one hath reſpect to GOD; the other, to the World. In the firſt wee complaine to GOD againſt our ſelues, for our offences againſt him; and confeſſe, Et tu iuſtus es in omnibus quæ venerunt ſuper nos, And thou O Lord art iuſt in all that hath befallen vs. In the ſecond wee complaine to our ſelues againſt GOD: as if hee had done vs wrong, either in not giuing vs worldly goods and honours, anſwering our appetites: or for taking them againe from vs hauing had them; forgetting that humble and iuſt acknowledgement of Iob, The Lord hath giuen, and the Lord hath taken. To the firſt of which Saint Paul hath promiſed bleſſednesſe; to the ſecond, death. And out of doubt hee is either a foole or vngratefull to GOD, or both, that doth not acknowledge, how meane ſo-euer his eſtate be, that the ſame is yet farre greater, than that which God oweth him: or doth not acknowledge, how ſharpe ſo-euer his afflictions be, that the ſame are yet farre leſſe, than thoſe which are due vnto him. And if an Heathen wiſe man call the aduerſities of the world but tributa viuendi, the tributes of liuing: a wiſe Chriſtian man ought to know them, and beare them, but as the tributes of offending. He ought to beare them man-like, and reſoluedly; & not as thoſe whining ſouldiors doe, qui gementes ſequuntur imperatorē, For ſeeing God, who is the Author of all our tragedies, hath written out for vs, and appointed vs all the parts we are to play: and hath not, in their diſtribution, beene partiall to the moſt mighty Princes of the world; That gaue vnto Darius the part of the greateſt Emperour, and the part of the moſt miſerable begger, a begger begging water of an Enemie, to quench the great drought of death; That appointed Baiazet to play the Gran Signior of the Turkes in the morning, and in the same day the Foote-stoole of Tamerlane (both which parts Valerian had also plaid, being taken by Sapores) that made Belliſarius play the moſt victorious Captaine, and laſtly the part of a blinde beggar; of which examples many thouſands may be produced: why ſhould other men, who are but as the leaſt wormes, complaine of wrongs? Certainly there is no other account to be made of this ridiculous world, than to reſolue, That the change of fortune on the great Theater, is but as the change of gatments on the leſſe. For when on the one and the other, euery man weares but his owne skin; the Players are all alike. Now if any man, out of weakneſſe, priſe the paſſages of this world otherwiſe (for ſaith Petrarch, Magni ingenij eſt reuocare mentem a ſenſibus) it is by reaſon of that vnhappy fantaſie of ours, which forgeth in the braines of Man all the miſeries (the corporall excepted) whereunto he is ſubiect: Therein it is, that Misfortune and Aduerſitie worke all that they worke. For ſeeing Death, in the end of the Play, takes from all, whatſoeuer Fortune or Force takes from any one: it were a fooliſh madneſſe in the ſhip-wracke of worldly things, where all ſinkes but the Sorrow, to ſaue it. That were, as Seneca ſaith, Fortunæ ſuccumbere, quod triſtius eſt omni fato, to fall vnder Fortune, of all other the moſt miſerable deſtinie.

But it is now time to ſound a retrait; and to deſire to be excuſed of this long purſuit: and withall, that the good intent, which hath moued me to draw the picture of time paſt (which wee call Hiſtorie) in ſo large a table, may alſo be accepted in place of a better reaſon.

The examples of diuine prouidence, euery where found (the firſt diuine Hiſtories being nothing elſe but a continuation of ſuch examples) haue perſwaded me to fetch my beginning from the beginning of all things; to wit, Creation. For though theſe two glorious actions of the Almightie be ſo neare, and (as it were) linked together, that the one neceſſarily implyeth the other: Creation, inferring Prouidence (for what father forſaketh the childe that he hath begotten?) and Prouidence preſuppoſing Creation) Yet many of thoſe that haue ſeemed to excell in worldly wiſedome, haue gone about to diſioyne this coherence; the Epicure denying both Creation and Prouidence, but granting that the world had a Beginning; the Ariſtotelian granting Prouidence, but denying both the Creation and the Beginning.

Now although this doctrine of Faith, touching the Creation in time (for by Faith we vnderſtand, that the world was made by the word of God) be too weighty a worke for Ariſtotles rotten ground to beare vp, vpon which he hath (notwithſtanding) founded the Defences & Fortreſſes of all his Verball Doctrine: Yet that the neceſſity of infinite power, and the worlds beginning, and the impoſſibility of the contrary euen in the iudgement of Naturall reaſon, wherein hee beleeued, had not better informed him; it is greatly to be maruailed at. And it is no leſſe ſtrange, that thoſe men which are deſirous of knowledge (ſeeing Ariſtotle hath failed in this maine point; and taught little other than termes in the reſt) haue ſo retrencht their mindes from the following and ouertaking of truth, and ſo abſolutely ſubiected them-ſelues to the law of thoſe Philoſophicall principles, as all contrary kinde of teaching, in the ſearch of cauſes, they haue condemned either for phantaſticall, or curious. But doth it follow, that the poſitions of Heathen Philoſophers, are vndoubted grounds and principles indeed, becauſe ſo called? Or that ipſi dixerunt, doth make them to be ſuch? certainely no. But this is true, That where naturall reaſon hath built any thing ſo ſtrong againſt it ſelfe, as the ſame reaſon can hardly aſſaile it, much leſſe batter it downe: the ſame in euery queſtion of Nature, and finite power, may be approued for a fundamentall law of humane knowledge. For ſaith Charron in his booke of wiſdome, Tout propoſition humaine a autant d'authorité que l'autre, ſi la raiſon n'on fait la difference; Euery humane propoſition hath equall authoritie, if reaſon make not the difference, the reſt being but the fables of principles. But hereof how ſhall the vpright and vnpartiall iudgement of man giue a ſentence, where oppoſition and examination are not admitted to giue in euidence? And to this purpoſe it was well ſaid of Lactantius, Sapientiam ſibi adimunt, qui ſine vllo iudicio inuenta maiorum probant, & ab alijs pecudum more ducuntur: They neglect their owne wiſdome, who without any iudgement approue the inuention of thoſe that fore-went them; and ſuffer them-ſelues, after the manner of Beaſts, to be led by them. By the aduantage of which ſlouth and dulneſſe, ignorance is now become ſo powerfull a Tyrant: as it hath ſet true Philoſophie, Phiſick, and Diuinity, in a Pillory; and written ouer the firſt, Contra negantem Principia; ouer the ſecond, Vertus ſpecifica; and ouer the third, Eccleſia Romana.

But for my ſelfe, I ſhall neuer be perſwaded, that GOD hath ſhut vp all light of Learning within the lantherne of Ariſtotles braines: or that it was euer ſaid vnto him, as vnto Eſdras, Accendam in Corde tuo Lucernam intellectus: that GOD hath giuen inuention but to the Heathen; and that they onely haue inuaded Nature, and found the ſtrength and bottome thereof; the ſame Nature hauing conſumed all her ſtore, and left nothing of price to after-ages. That theſe and theſe be the cauſes of theſe and theſe effects, Time hath taught vs; and not reaſon: and ſo hath experience, without Art. The Cheeſe-wife knoweth it as well as the Philoſopher, that ſowre Rennet doth coagulate her milke into a curd. But if wee aske a reaſon of this cauſe, why the ſowreneſſe doth it? whereby it doth it? and the manner how? I thinke that there is nothing to be found in vulgar Philoſophie, to ſatisfie this and many other like vulgar queſtions. But man to couer his ignorance in the leaſt things, who cannot giue a true reaſon for the Grasse vnder his feete, why it should be greene rather then red, or of any other colour; that could neuer yet discouer the way and reason of Natures working, in those which are farre lesse noble creatures than himselfe; who is farre more Noble than the Heauens themselues: Man (saith Salomon) that can hardly discerne the things that are vpon the Earth, and with great labour finde out the things that are before vs; that hath so short a time in the world, as hee no sooner beginnes to learne, than to die; that hath in his memory but borrowed knowledge; in his vnderstanding, nothing truly; that is ignorant of the Essence of his owne soule, and which the wisest of the Naturalists (if Aristotle be hee) could neuer so much as define, but by the Action and effect, telling vs what it workes (which all men know as well as hee) but not what it is, which neither hee, nor any else, doth know, but GOD that created it; (for though I were perfect, yet I know not my soule, saith Iob.) Man I say, that is but an Idiot in the next cause of his owne life, and in the cause of all the actions of his life: will (notwithstanding) examine the Art of GOD in creating the World; of GOD, who (saith Iob) is so excellent as wee know him not; and examine the beginning of the worke, which had end before Man-kinde had a beginning of being. Hee will disable GODS power to make a world, without matter to make it of. He will rather giue the mothes of the Aire for a cause; cast the worke on necessity or chance; bestow the honour thereof on Nature; make two powers, the one to be the Author of the Matter, the other of the Forme; and lastly, for want of a worke-man, haue it Eternall: which latter opinion Aristotle, to make him-selfe the Author of a new Doctrine, brought into the World: and his Sectatours haue maintained it; parati ac coniurati, quos sequuntur, Philosophorum animis inuictis opiniones tueri. For Hermes, who liued at once with, or soone after, Moses, Zoroaster, Musæus, Orpheus, Linus, Anaximenes, Anaxagoras, Empedocles, Melissus, Pherecydes, Thales, Cleanthes, Pythagoras, Plato, and many others (whose opinions are exquisitely gathered by Steuchius Eugubinus) found in the necessitie of inuincible reason, One eternal and infinite Being, to be the Parent of the vniuersall. Horum omnium sententia quamuis sit incerta, eodem tamen spectat, vt Prouidentiam vnam esse consentiant: siue enim Natura, siue Æther, siue Ratio, siue mens, siue fatalis necessitas, siue diuina Lex; idem esse quod a nobis dicitur Deus: All these mens opinions (saith Lactantius) though vncertaine, come to this; That they agree vpon one Prouidence; whether the same be Nature, or light, or Reason, or vnderstanding, or destinie, or diuine ordinance; that it is the same which we call GOD. Certainly, as all the Riuers in the world, though they haue diuers risings, and diuers runnings; though they some-times hide them-selues for a while vnder ground, and seeme to be lost in Sea-like

Lakes; doe at laſt finde, and fall into the great Ocean: ſo after all the ſearches that humaine capacitie hath; and after all Philoſophicall contemplation and curioſitie; in the neceſsitie of this infinite power, all the reaſon of man ends and diſſolues it ſelfe.

As for others; and firſt touching thoſe, which conceiue the matter of the World to haue been eternall, and that God did not create the World ex nihilo, but ex materiâ præexiſtente: the Suppoſition is ſo weake, as is hardly worth the anſwering. For (ſaith Euſebius) Mihi videntur qui hoc dicunt, fortunam quoque Deo annectere, They ſeeme vnto me, which affirme this, to giue part of the work to God, and part to Fortune: inſomuch as if God had not found this firſt matter by chance, Hee had neither beene Author, nor Father, nor Creator, nor Lord of the Vniuerſall. For were the Matter or Chaos, eternall, it then followes, That either this ſuppoſed Matter did fit it ſelfe to God; or God, accommodate himſelfe to the matter. For the firſt; it is impoſsible, that things without ſenſe could proportion themſelues to the Workmans will. For the ſecond, it were horrible to conceiue of God, That as an Artificer he applyed himſelfe, according to the proportion of Matter which he lighted vpon.

Euſeb: de prep. Euang. l. 7. c. 8.

But let it be ſuppoſed, That this matter had beene made by any Power, not Omnipotent, and infinitely wiſe: I would gladly learne how it came to paſſe, that the ſame was proportionable to his intention, that was Omnipotent and infinitely wiſe; and no more, nor no leſſe, than ſerued to receiue the forme of the Vniuerſall. For, had it wanted any thing of what was ſufficient; then muſt it be granted, That God created out of nothing ſo much of new matter, as ſerued to finiſh the worke of the World: Or had there beene more of this matter, than ſufficed; then God did diſſolue and annihilate whatſoeuer remained and was ſuperfluous. And this muſt euery reaſonable ſoule confeſſe, That it is the ſame worke of God alone, to create any thing out of nothing, And by the ſame art and power, and by none other, can thoſe things, or any part of that eternall matter, be againe changed into Nothing; by which thoſe things, that once were nothing, obtained a beginning of being.

Againe, to ſay that this matter was the cauſe of it ſelfe; this, of all other, were the greateſt idiotiſme. For, if it were the cauſe of it ſelfe at any time; then there was alſo a time when it ſelfe was not: at which time of not being, it is eaſie enough to conceiue, that it could neither produce it ſelfe, nor any thing elſe. For to be, and not to be, at once, is impoſsible. Nihil autem ſeipſum præcedit, neq; ſeipſum componit corpus. There is nothing that doth præcede it ſelfe, neither doe bodies compound themſelues.

For the reſt; Thoſe that faine this matter to be eternall, muſt of neceſsitie confeſſe, that Infinite cannot be ſeparate from Eternitie. And then had infinite matter left no place for infinite forme, but that the firſt matter was finite, the forme which it receiued proues it. For concluſion of this part; who-ſo-euer will make choyce, rather to beleeue in eternall deformitie, or in eternall dead matter, than in eternall light and eternall life: let eternall death be his reward. For it is a madneſſe of that kinde, as wanteth tearmes to expreſſe it. For what reaſon of man (whom the curſe of preſumption hath not ſtupified) hath doubted, That infinite power (of which wee can comprehend but a kind of ſhadow, quia comprehenſio eſt intra terminos, qui infinito repugnant) hath any thing wanting in it ſelfe, either for matter or forme; yea for as many worlds (if ſuch had beene GODS will) as the Sea hath ſands? For where the power is without limitation; the worke hath no other limitation, than the workmans will. Yea Reaſon it ſelfe findes it more eaſie for infinite power, to deliuer from it ſelfe a finite world, without the helpe of matter prepared; than for a finite man, a foole and duſt, to change the forme of matter made to his hands. They are Dionyſius his words, Deus in vna exiſtentia omnia præhabet: and againe, Eſſe omnium eſt ipſa Diuinitas, omne quod vides, & quod nõ vides; to wit, cauſaliter, or in better tearmes, non tanquam forma, ſed tanquam cauſa vniuerſalis. Neither hath the world vniuerſall cloſed vp all of GOD: For the moſt parts of his workes (ſaith Siracides) are hid. Neither can the depth of his wiſdome be opened, by the glorious worke of the world: which neuer brought to knowledge all it can; for then were his infinite power bounded, and made finite. And hereof it comes; That we ſeldome entitle GOD the all-ſhewing, or the all-willing; but the all-mighty, that is, infinitely able. Cap. 16. v. 21.

But now for thoſe, who from that ground, That out of nothing nothing is made, inferre the Worlds eternity; and yet not ſo ſaluage therein, as thoſe are, which giue an eternall being to dead matter: It is true, if the word (nothing) be taken in the affirmatiue; and the making, impoſed vpon Naturall Agents and finite power; That out of nothing, nothing is made. But ſeeing their great Doctor Ariſtotle him-ſelfe confeſſeth, quod omnes antiqui decreuerunt quaſi quoddam rerum principium, ipſumq; infinitum, That all the ancient decree a kinde of beginning, and the ſame to be infinite: and a little after, more largely and plainely, Principium eius eſt nullum, ſed ipſum omnium cernitur eſſe principium, ac omnia complecti ac regere: it is ſtrange that this Philoſopher, with his followers, ſhould rather make choyce out of falſhood, to conclude falſly; than out of truth, to reſolue truly. For if wee compare the world Vniuerſall, and all the vnmeaſurable Orbes of Heauen, and thoſe mercilous bodies of the Sunne, Moone, and Starres, with ipſum infinitum: it may truly be ſaid of them all, which him-ſelfe affirmeth of his imaginary Materia prima, That they are neither quid, quale, nor quantum; and there- Stenc. Eug. l. 3. c. 9. ex Ariſt. Phyſ. 3. 20.

fore to bring finite (which hath no proportion with infinite) out of infinite (qui deſtruit omnem proportionem) is no wonder in GODS power. And therefore Anaximander, Meliſſus, and Empedocles, call the world vniuerſall, but particulam Vniuerſitatis and infinitatis, a parcell of that which is the vniuerſalitie and the infinitie it ſelfe; and Plato, but a ſhadow of GOD. But the other, to proue the worlds eternitie, vrgeth this Maxime, That, A ſufficient and effectuall cauſe being granted, an anſwerable effect thereof is alſo granted: inferring, that GOD being for euer a ſufficient and effectuall cauſe of the world, the effect of the cauſe ſhould alſo haue beene for euer; to wit, the world vniuerſall. But what a ſtrange mockery is this in ſo great a Maiſter, to confeſſe a ſufficient and effectuall cauſe of the world, (to wit, an almighty GOD) in his Antecedent; and the ſame GOD to be a GOD reſtrained in his concluſion; to make GOD free in power, and bound in will; able to effect, vnable to determine; able to make all things, and yet vnable to make choyce of the time when? For this were impiouſly to reſolue of GOD, as of naturall neceſſitie; which hath neither choice, nor will, nor vnderſtanding; which cannot but worke matter being preſent; as fire, to burne things combuſtible.

Againe he thus diſputeth, That euery Agent which can worke, and doth not worke: if it after-ward worke, it is either thereto moued by it ſelfe, or by ſome-what elſe; and ſo it paſſeth from power to Act. But GOD (ſaith he) is immouable, and is neither moued by him-ſelfe, nor by any other; but being alwaies the ſame, doth alwaies worke: Whence he concludeth, if the world were cauſed by GOD, that hee was for euer the cauſe thereof; and therefore eternall. The anſwer to this is very eaſie, For that GODS performing in due time that, which hee euer determined at length to performe, doth not argue any alteration or change, but rather conſtancie in him. For the ſame action of his will, which made the world for euer, did alſo with-hold the effect to the time ordained. To this anſwere, in it ſelfe ſufficient, others adde further, that the patterne or Image of the World may be ſaid to be eternall: which the Platonicks call, ſpiritualem mundum; and doe in this ſort diſtinguiſh the Idæa and Creation in time. Spiritualis ille mundus, mundi huius exemplar, primumque Dei opus, vita æquali eſt Architecto; fuit ſemper cum illo, eritque ſemper. Mundus autem corporalis, quod ſecundum opus eſt Dei, decedit iam ab opifice ex parte vna, quia non fuit ſemper, retinet alteram, quia ſit ſemper futurus. That repreſentatiue, or the intentionall world (ſay they) the ſampler of this viſible world, the firſt worke of GOD, was æqually ancient with the Architect; for it was for euer with him, and euer ſhalbe. This materiall world, the ſecond worke or creature of GOD, doth differ from the worker in this, That it was not from euerlaſting, and in this it doth agree, that it ſhall be for euer to come.

Mor. Ficin. de immort. Anima. l. 18. c. 1.

The

The first point, That it was not for euer, all Christians confesse: The other they vnderstand no other-wise, than that after the consummation of this World, there shalbe a new Heauen and a new Earth; without any new creation of matter. But of these things wee need not here stand to argue: though such opinions be not vnworthy the propounding; in this consideration, of an eternall and vnchangeable cause, producing a changeable and temporall effect. Touching which point Proclus the Platonist disputeth, That the compounded essence of the World (and because compounded, therefore dissipable) is continued, and knit to the Diuine Being, by an indiuiduall and inseperable power, flowing from diuine vnitie; and that the Worlds naturall appetite of GOD sheweth, that the same proceedeth from a goodnesse and vnderstanding diuine; and that this vertue, by which the World is continued and knit together, must be infinite, that it may infinitely and euerlastingly continue and preserue the same. Which infinite Vertue, the finite World (saith hee) is not capable of, but receiueth it from the diuine infinite, according to the temporall Nature it hath, successiuely euery moment by little and little; euen as the whole Materiall World is not altogether: but the abolished parts are departed by small degrees, and the parts yet to come, doe by the same small degrees succeed; as the shadow of a tree in a Riuer, seemeth to haue continued the same a long time in the water, but it is perpetually renued, in the continuall ebbing and flowing thereof.

But to returne to them, which denying that euer the World had any beginning, withall denie that euer it shall haue any end; and to this purpose affirme, That it was neuer heard, neuer read, neuer seene, no not by any reason perceiued, that the Heauens haue euer suffered corruption; or that they appeare any way the Elder by continuance; or in any sort other-wise than they were; which had they beene subiect to finall corruption, some change would haue beene discerned in so long a time: To this it is answered, That the little change as yet perceiued, doth rather proue their newnesse, and that they haue not continued so long; than that they will continue for euer as they are. And if coniecturall arguments may receiue answer by coniectures; it then seemeth that some alteration may be found. For either Aristotle, Plinie, Strabo, Beda, Aquinas, and others, were grossely mistaken; or else those parts of the world, lying within the burnt Zone, were not in elder times habitable, by reason of the Sunnes heat; neither were the Seas, vnder the Equinoctiall, nauigable. But wee know by experience, that those Regions, so situate, are filled with people, and exceeding temperate; and the Sea, ouer which wee Nauigate, passable enough. Wee read also many Histories of deluges: and how that in the time of Phaeton, diuers places in the world were burnt vp, by the Sunnes violent heat.

But in a Word, this obſeruation is exceeding feeble. For we know it for certaine, That ſtone-wals, of matter moldring and friable, haue ſtood two, or three thouſand yeares: that many things haue beene digged vp out of the earth, of that depth, as ſuppoſed to haue beene buried by the generall floud; without any alteration either of ſubſtance or figure, yea it is beleiued, and it is very probable, that the gold which is daily found in Mynes, and Rockes, vnder ground, was created together with the Earth.

And if bodies elementary, and compounded, the eldeſt times haue not inuaded and corrupted: what great alteration ſhould wee looke for in Celeſtiall and quinteſſentiall bodies? And yet wee haue reaſon to thinke, that the Sunne, by whoſe helpe all Creatures are generate, doth not in theſe latter Ages aſſiſt Nature, as here-to-fore. We haue neither Gyants, ſuch as the eldeſt world had: nor mighty men, ſuch as the elder world had; but all things in generall are reputed of leſſe vertue, which from the Heauens receiue vertue. Whence, if the nature of a Preface would permit a larger diſcourſe, wee might eaſily fetch ſtore of proofe; as that this world ſhall at length haue end, as that once it had beginning.

And I ſee no good anſwer that can bee made to this obiection: If the World were eternall; why not all things in the World Eternall? If there were no firſt, no cauſe, no Father, no Creator, no incomprehenſible wiſedome, but that euery Nature had beene a-like eternall; and Man more rationall than euery other Nature: Why had not the eternall reaſon of Man, prouided for his eternall being in the World? For if all were equall: why not equall conditions to all? why ſhould heauenly bodies liue for euer; and the bodies of Men rot and die?

Againe, who was it that appointed the Earth to keepe the center, and gaue Order that it ſhould hang in the Aire: that the Sunne ſhould trauaile betweene the Tropicks, and neuer exceed thoſe bounds, nor faile to performe that Progreſſe once in euery yeare: the Moone to liue by borrowed light: the firſt Starres (according to common opinion) to be faſtned like Nailes in a Cart-wheele; and the Planets to wander at their pleaſure? Or if none of theſe had power ouer other: was it out of Charity and Loue, that the Sunne by his perpetuall trauaile within thoſe two Circles, hath viſited, giuen light vnto, and releiued all parts of the Earth, and the Creatures therein, by turnes and times? Out of doubt, if the Sunne haue of his owne accord kept this courſe in all eternitie: He may iuſtly be called eternall Charity, and euerlaſting Loue. The ſame may be ſaid of all the Starres: who being all of them moſt large and cleare fountaines of vertue and operation, may alſo be called eternall vertues: the Earth

may be called eternall patience; the Moone, an eternall borrower and begger; and Man of all other the most miserable, eternally mortall. And what were this, but to beleiue againe in the old Play of the gods? Yea in more gods by Millions, than euer Hesiodus dreampt of. But in steed of this mad follie, wee see it well enough with our feeble and mortall eyes: and the eyes of our reason discerne it better; That the Sunne, Moone, Starres, and the Earth, are limited, bounded, and constrained: themselues they haue not constrained, nor could. Omne determinatum causam habet aliquam efficientem, quæ illud determinauerit, Euery thing bounded hath some efficient cause, by which it is bounded.

Now for Nature; As by the ambiguity of this name, the schoole of Aristotle hath both commended many errours vnto vs, and sought also thereby to obscure the glory of the high Moderator of all things, shining in the Creation, and in the gouerning of the World: so if the best definition be taken out of the second of Aristotles physicks, or primo de Cælo, or out of the fifth of his Metaphysicks; I say that the best is but nominall, and serue onely to difference the beginning of Naturall motion, from Artificiall: which yet the Academicks open better, when they call it A Seminary strength, infused into matter by the Soule of the VVorld: but giue the first place to Prouidence, the second to Fate, and but the third to Nature. Prouidentia (by which they vnderstand GOD) dux & caput; Fatum, medium ex prouidentia prodiens; Natura postremum. But be it what hee will, or be it any of these (GOD excepted) or participating of all: yet that it hath choice or vnderstanding (both which are necessarily in the cause of all things) no man hath avowed. For this is vnanswerable of Lactantius, Is autem facit aliquid, qui aut voluntatem faciendi habet, aut scientiam; Hee onely can be said to be the doer of a thing, that hath either will or knowledge in the doing it.

But the will and science of Nature, are in these words truely expresst by Ficinus: Potest vbique Natura, vel per diuersa media, vel ex diuersis materijs, diuersa facere: sublata vero mediorum materiarumque diuersitate, vel vnicum vel similimum operatur, neque potest quando adest materia non operari; It is the power of Nature by diuersity of meanes, or out of diuersity of matter, to produce diuers things: but taking away the diuersity of meanes, and the diuersity of matter, it then workes but one or the like worke; neither can it but worke, matter being present. Now if Nature made choice of diuersity of matter, to worke all these variable workes of Heauen and Earth, it had then both vnderstanding and will; it had counsaile to beginne; reason to dispose; vertue and knowledge to finish; and power to gouerne: without which, all things had beene but one and the same: all of the matter of Heauen; or all of the matter of Earth. And if we grant Nature this will, and this vnderstanding, Ficin: in Plat.

this counſaile, reaſon, and power: Cur Natura potius quam Deus nominetur? Why ſhould wee then call ſuch a cauſe rather Nature, than God? God, of whom all men haue notion, and giue the firſt and higheſt place to Diuine power: Omnes homines notionem deorum habent, omneſq; ſummum locum diuino cuidam numini aſſignant. And this I ſay in ſhort; that it is a true effect of true reaſon in man (were there no authority more binding than reaſon) to acknowledge and adore the firſt and moſt ſublime power. Vera Philoſophia, eſt aſcenſus ab his quæ fluunt, & oriuntur, & occidunt, ad ea quæ vere ſunt, & ſemper eadem: True Philoſophy, is an aſcending from the things which flow, and riſe, and fall, to the things that are for euer the ſame.

Lact. de ira Dei l. 1. c. 10.

Ariſt. l. 1. de Cœlo. c. 3. T. 22.

For the reſt, I do alſo account it not the meaneſt, but an impiety monſtrous, to confound God and Nature: be it but in tearmes. For it is God, that only diſpoſeth of all things according to his owne will; and maketh of one Earth, Veſſels of honor and diſhonor. It is Nature that can diſpoſe of nothing, but according to the will of the matter wherein it worketh. It is God, that commandeth all: It is Nature that is obedient to all. It is God that doth good vnto all, knowing and louing the good hee doth: It is Nature, that ſecondarily doth alſo good, but it neither knoweth nor loueth the good it doth. It is God, that hath all things in himſelfe: Nature, nothing in it ſelfe. It is God, which is the Father, and hath begotten all things: It is Nature, which is begotten by all things; in which it liueth and laboureth; for by it ſelfe it exiſteth not. For ſhall we ſay, that it is out of affection to the earth, that heauy things fall towards it? Shall wee call it Reaſon, which doth conduct euery Riuer into the ſalt Sea? Shall we tearme it knowledge in fire, that makes it to conſume combuſtible matter? If it be Affection, Reaſon, and Knowledge in theſe: by the ſame Affection, Reaſon, and Knowledge it is, that Nature worketh. And therefore ſeeing all things worke as they doe, (call it by forme, by Nature, or by what you pleaſe) yet becauſe they worke by an impulſion, which they cannot reſiſt; or by a faculty, infuſed by the ſepremeſt power: we are neither to wonder at, nor to worſhip, the faculty that worketh, nor the Creature wherein it worketh. But herein lyes the wonder: and to him is the worſhip due, who hath created ſuch a Nature in things, and ſuch a faculty, as neither knowing it ſelfe, the matter wherein it worketh, nor the vertue and power which it hath; doth yet worke all things to their laſt and vttermoſt perfection. And therefore euery reaſonable man, taking to himſelfe for a ground that which is granted by all Antiquity, and by all men truly learned that euer the world had; to wit; That there is a power infinit, and eternall (which alſo neceſsity doth proue vnto vs, without the helpe of Faith; and Reaſon, without the force of Authoritie) all things doe as eaſily follow which haue beene deliuered by diuine letters, as the waters of a running Riuer doe ſucceſsiuely purſue each other from the firſt fountaines.

This

This much I ſay it is, that Reaſon it ſelfe hath taught vs: and this is the beginning of knowledge. Sapientia præcedit, Religio ſequitur: quia prius eſt Deum ſcire, conſequens colere; Sapience goes before, Religion followes: becauſe it is firſt to know God, and then to worſhip him. This Sapience Plato calleth, abſoluti boni ſcientiam, The ſcience of the abſolute good: and another, ſcientiam rerum primarum, ſempiternarum, perpetuarum. For Faith (ſaith Iſidore) is not extorted by violence; but by reaſon and examples perſwaded: fides nequaquam vi extorquetur; ſed ratione & exemplis ſuadetur. I confeſſe it, That to enquire further, as of the eſſence of God, of his power, of his Art, and by what meane He created the world: Or of his ſecret iudgement, and the cauſes; is not an effect of Reaſon: Sed cum ratione inſaniunt, but they grow mad with reaſon, that inquire after it: For as it is no ſhame nor diſhonor (ſaith a French Author) de faire arreſt au but qu'on naſceu ſurpaſſer, For a man to reſt himſelfe there, where he finds it impoſſible to paſſe on further: ſo whatſoeuer is beyond, and out of the reach of true reaſon, It acknowledgeth it to be ſo; as vnderſtanding it ſelfe not to be infinite, but according to the Name and Nature it hath, to be a Teacher, that beſt knowes the end of his own Art. For ſeeing both Reaſon and Neceſsity teach vs (Reaſon, which is pars diuini ſpiritus in corpus humanũ merſi) that the world was made by a power infinite; and yet how it was made, it cannot teach vs: and ſeeing the ſame Reaſon and Neceſsity make vs know, that the ſame infinit power is euery where in the world; and yet how euery where, it cannot informe vs: our beleefe hereof is not weakned, but greatly ſtrengthened, by our ignorance; becauſe it is the ſame Reaſon that tels vs, That ſuch a Nature cannot be ſaid to be God, that can be in all conceiued by man.

Lact. l. 4. c. 4. de vera Sapientia.

Iſaac de defin.

Quod eſt infinitum & non ſecundum naturam terminatũ, non continetur à ſcientia. Ariſt. poſter.

I haue beene already ouer-long, to make any large diſcourſe either of the parts of the following Story, or in mine owne excuſe: eſpecially in the excuſe of this or that paſſage; ſeeing the whole is exceeding weake and defectiue. Among the groſeſt, the vnſutable diuiſion of the bookes, I could not know how to excuſe, had I not beene directed to inlarge the building after the foundation was laid, and the firſt part finiſhed. All men know that there is no great Art in the diuiding euenly of thoſe things, which are ſubiect to number and meaſure. For the reſt, it ſutes well enough with a great many Bookes of this age, which ſpeake too much, and yet ſay little; Ipſi nobis furto ſubducimur, We are ſtollen away from our ſelues, ſetting a high price on all that is our owne. But hereof, though a late good Writer, make complaint, yet ſhall it not lay hold on me, becauſe I beleeue as hee doth; that who ſo thinkes himſelfe the wiſeſt man, is but a poore and miſerable ignorant. Thoſe that are the beſt men of war, againſt all the vanities and fooleries of the World, doe alwaies keepe the ſtrongeſt guards againſt themſelues, to defend them from themſelues, from ſelfe loue, ſelfe eſtimation, and ſelfe opinion.

Generally concerning the order of the worke, I haue onely taken counſaile from the Argument. For of the Aſſyrians, which after the downefall of Babel take vp the firſt part, and were the firſt great Kings of the World, there came little to the view of poſteritie: ſome few enterpriſes, greater in fame than faith, of Ninus and Semiramis excepted.

It was the ſtory of the Hebrewes, of all before the Olympiads, that ouercame the conſuming diſeaſe of time; and preſerued it ſelfe, from the very cradle and beginning to this day: and yet not ſo entire, but that the large diſcourſes thereof (to which in many Scriptures wee are referred) are no where found. The Fragments of other Stories, with the actions of thoſe Kings and Princes which ſhot vp here and there in the ſame time, I am driuen to relate by way of digreſſion: of which we may ſay with Virgil.

Apparent rari nantes in gurgite vaſto;
They appeare here and there floting in the great gulfe of time.

To the ſame firſt Ages doe belong the report of many Inuentions therein found, and from them deriued to vs; though moſt of the Authors Names, haue periſhed in ſo long a Nauigation. For thoſe Ages had their Lawes; they had diuerſity of Gouernment; they had Kingly rule; Nobilitie, Pollicie in warre; Nauigation; and all, or the moſt of needfull Trades. To ſpeake therefore of theſe (ſeeing in a generall Hiſtorie we ſhould haue left a great deale of Nakednesſe, by their omiſſion) it cannot properly be called a digreſſion. True it is that I haue alſo made many others: which if they ſhall be layd to my charge, I muſt caſt the fault into the great heape of humane error. For ſeeing wee digreſſe in all the wayes of our liues: yea, ſeeing the life of man is nothing elſe but digreſſion; I may the better be excuſed, in writing their liues and actions. I am not altogether ignorant in the Lawes of Hiſtorie, and of the Kindes.

The ſame hath beene taught by many; but by no man better, and with greater breuity, than by that excellent learned Gentleman Sir Francis Bacon. Chriſtian Lawes are alſo taught vs by the Prophets and Apoſtles; and euery day preacht vnto vs. But wee ſtill make large digreſſions: yea the teachers themſelues doe not (in all) keepe the path which they point out to others.

For the reſt; after ſuch time as the Perſians had wreſted the Empire from the Chaldæans, and had raiſed a great Monarchie, producing Actions of more importance then were elſe-where to be found: it was agreeable to the Order of Story, to attend this Empire; whileſt it ſo floriſhed, that the affaires of the nations adioyning had reference there-vnto. The like obſeruance was to be vſed towards the fortunes of Greece, when they againe began to get ground vpon the Perſians, as alſo towards the affaires of

Rome

Rome, when the Romans grew more mighty then the Greekes.

As for the Medes, the Macedonians, the Sicilians, the Carthaginians, and other Nations, who reſiſted the beginnings of the former Empires, and afterwards became but parts of their compoſition and enlargement: it ſeemed beſt to remember what was knowne of them from their ſeuerall beginnings, in ſuch times and places, as they in their flouriſhing eſtates oppoſed thoſe Monarchies; which in the end ſwallowed them vp. And herein I haue followed the beſt Geographers: who ſeldome giue names to thoſe ſmall brookes, whereof many, ioyned together, make great Riuers; till ſuch time as they become vnited, and runne in a maine ſtreame to the Ocean Sea. If the Phraſe be weake, and the Stile not euery-where like it ſelfe: the firſt, ſhewes their legitimation and true Parent; the ſecond will excuſe it ſelfe vpon the Variety of Matter. For Virgil, who wrote his Eclogues, gracili auena, vſed ſtronger pipes, when he ſounded the warres of Aeneas. It may alſo be layd to my charge that I vſe diuers Hebrew words in my firſt booke, and elſe-where: in which language others may thinke, and I my-ſelfe acknowledge it, that I am altogether ignorant: but it is true, that ſome of them I finde in Montanus; others in lattaine Carecter in S. Senenſis, and of the reſt I haue borrowed the interpretation of ſome of my learned friends. But ſay I had beene beholding to neyther, yet were it not to be wondred at, hauing had a eleuen yeares leaſure, to attaine the knowledge of that, or of any other tongue; How-ſoeuer, I know that it will be ſaid by many, That I might haue beene more pleaſing to the Reader, if I had written the Story of mine owne times, hauing beene permitted to draw water as neare the Well-head as another. To this I anſwere, that who-ſo-euer in writing a moderne Hiſtory, ſhall follow truth too neare the heeles, it may happily ſtrike out his teeth. There is no Miſtreſſe or Guide, that hath led her followers and ſeruants into greater miſeries. Hee that goes after her too farre off, looſeth her ſight, and looſeth him-ſelfe: and hee that walkes after her at a midle diſtance; I know not whether I ſhould call that kinde of courſe Temper or Baſeneſſe. It is true, that I neuer trauailed after mens opinions, when I might haue made the beſt vſe of them: and I haue now too few dayes remaining, to imitate thoſe, that eyther out of extreame ambition, or extreame cowardiſe, or both, do yet, (when death hath them on his ſhoulders) flatter the world, betweene the bed and the graue. It is enough for me (being in that ſtate I am) to write of the eldeſt times: wherein alſo why may it not be ſaid, that in ſpeaking of the paſt, I point at the preſent, and taxe the vices of thoſe that are yet liuing, in their perſons that are long ſince dead; and haue it laid to my charge? But this I cannot helpe, though innocent. And certainely if there be any, that finding themſelues ſpotted like the Tigers of old time, ſhall finde fault with me for painting them ouer a new; they ſhall therein accuſe themſelues iuſtly, and me falſly.

For

For I proteſt before the Maieſty of GOD, That I malice no man vnder the Sunne. Impoſſible I know it is to pleaſe all: ſeeing few or none are ſo pleaſed with themſelues, or ſo aſſured of themſelues, by reaſon of their ſubiection to their priuate paſſions; but that they ſeeme diuers perſons in one and the ſame day. Seneca hath ſaid it, and ſo doe I: Vnus mihi pro populo erat: and to the ſame effect Epicurus, Hoc ego non multis ſed tibi; or (as it hath ſince lamentably fallen out) I may borrow the reſolution of an ancient Philoſopher, Satis eſt vnus, Satis eſt nullus. For it was for the ſeruice of that ineſtimable Prince Henry, the ſucceſſiue hope, and one of the greateſt of the Chriſtian World, that I vndertooke this Worke. It pleaſed him to pervſe ſome part thereof, and to pardon what was amiſſe. It is now left to the world without a Maiſter: from which all that is preſented, hath receiued both blowes and thankes. Eadem probamus, eadem reprehendimus: hic exitus eſt omnis iudicij, in quo lis ſecundum plures datur. But theſe diſcourſes are idle. I know that as the charitable will iudge charitably: ſo againſt thoſe, qui gloriantur in malitia, my preſent aduerſity hath diſarmed me. I am on the ground already; and therefore haue not farre to fall: and for riſing againe, as in the Naturall priuation there is no receſſion to habit; ſo it is ſeldome ſeene in the priuation politique. I doe therefore for-beare to ſtile my Readers Gentle, Courteous, and Friendly, thereby to beg their good opinions, or to promiſe a ſecond and third volume (which I alſo intend) if the firſt receiue grace and good acceptance. For that which is already done, may be thought enough; and too much: and it is certaine, let vs claw the Reader with neuer ſo many courteous phraſes; yet ſhall wee euer-more be thought fooles, that write fooliſhly. For concluſion; all the hope I haue lies in this, That I haue already found more vngentle and vncourteous Readers of my Loue towards them, and well-deſeruing of them, than euer I ſhall doe againe. For had it beene otherwiſe, I ſhould hardly haue had this leiſure, to haue made my ſelfe a foole in print.

THE

CHAPTER I.

Of the Creation, and Preseruation of the World.

§. I.

THat the inuisible God is seene in his Creatures.

§. II.

That the wisest of the Heathen, whose authoritie is not to bee despised, haue acknowledged the World to haue beene created by God.

§. III.

Of the meaning of In principio, Gen. 1.1.

§. IIII.

Of the meaning of the words [Heauen and Earth,] Gen. 1.1.

§. V.

That the substance of the Waters, as mixt in the bodie of the Earth, is by Moses vnderstood in the Word [Earth:] and that the Earth, by the Attributes of Vnformed and Void, is described as the Chaos of the ancient Heathen.

§. VI.

How it is to bee vnderstood, that the Spirit of God moued vpon the waters: and that this is not to be searched curiously.

§. VII.

Of the Light created, as the materiall substance of the Sunne: and of the nature of it, and difficultie of knowledge of it: and of the excellencie and vse of it: and of motion, and heat annexed vnto it.

§. VIII.

Of the Firmament, and of the Waters aboue the Firmament: and whether there bee any Crystaline Heauen, or any Primum Mobile.

A conclusion, repeating the summe of the workes in the Creation, which are reduced to three heads: The creation of matter; The forming of it; The finishing of it.

§. X.

That Nature is no Principium per se; nor Forme, the giuer of being: and of our ignorance, how second causes should haue any proportion with their effects.

§. XI.

Of Fate; and that the Stars haue great influence: and that their operations may diuersly be preuented or furthered.

§. XII.

Of Prescience.

§. XIII.

Of Prouidence.

§. XIIII.

Of Predestination.

§. XV.

Of Fortune: and of the reason of some things that seeme to bee by Fortune, and against Reason and Prouidence.

CHAP. II.

Of Mans estate in his first Creation; and of Gods rest.

§. I.

OF the Image of God according to which Man was first created.

§. II.

Of the intellectuall minde of Man, in which there is much of the Image of God: and that this Image is much deformed by sinne.

§. III.

Of our base and fraile bodies: and that the care thereof should yeeld to the immortall Soule.

§. IIII.

Of the Spirit of life which God breathed into Man in his Creation.

§. V.

That Man is (as it were) a little world: with a digression touching our mortalitie.

§. VI.

Of the free power, which Man had in his first Creation to dispose of himselfe.

§. VII.

Of Gods ceasing to create any more: and of the cause thereof, because the vniuersall created was exceeding good.

CHAP. III.

Of the place of Paradise.

§. I.

THat the seate of Paradise is greatly mistaken: and that it is no maruaile that men should erre.

§. II.

A recitall of strange opinions touching Paradise.

§. III.

That there was a true locall Paradise, Eastward, in the Countrie of Eden.

§. IIII.

Why it should bee needfull to intreat diligently of the place of Paradise.

§. V.

That the Floud hath not vtterly defaced the markes of Paradise, nor caused Hils in the Earth.

§. VI.

That Paradise was not the whole Earth, as some haue thought, making the Ocean to bee the fountaine of those foure Riuers.

§. VII.

Of their opinion which make Paradise as high as the Moone: and of others which make it higher then the middle Region of the Ayre.

§. VIII.

Of their opinion that seat Paradise vnder the Æquinoctiall: and of the pleasant habitation vnder those Climates.

Of the change of the names of places: and that besides that Eden in Cœlesyria, there is a Countrie in Babylon, once of this name, as is proued out of Esay 37. and Ezech. 27.

§. X.

Of diuers other testimonies of the Land of Eden: and that this is the Eden of Paradise.

§. XI.

Of the difficultie in the Text, which seemeth to make the foure Riuers to rise from one streame.

§. XII.

Of the strange fertilitie and happinesse of the Babylonian Soyle, as it is certaine that Eden was such.

§. XIII.

Of the Riuer Pison, and the Land of Hauilah.

§. XIIII.

Of the Riuer Gehon, and the Land of Cush: and of the ill translating of Æthiopia for Cush. 2. Chron. 21. 16.

§. XV.

A conclusion, by way of repetition of some things spoken of before.

CHAP.

CHAP. IIII.

Of the two chiefe Trees in the Garden of Paradise.

§. I.

THat the Tree of Life was a materiall Tree: and in what sense it is to be taken, that Man by his eating the forbidden fruit, is made subiect to death.

§. II.

Of Becanus his opinion, that the Tree of Knowledge was Ficus Indica.

§. III.

Of Becanus his not vnwitty allegorizing of the storie of his Ficus Indica.

§. IIII.

Of the name of the Tree of Knowledge of good and euill: with some other notes touching the storie of Adams sinne.

CHAP. V.

Of diuers memorable things betweene the fall of Adam, and the Floud of Noah.

§. I.

OF the cause, and the reuenge of Cains sinne: and of his going out from God.

§. II.

Of Cains dwelling in the Land of Nod: and of his Citie Enoch.

§. III.

Of Moses his omitting sundry things concerning Cains Generation.

§. IIII.

Of the diuersities in the Ages of the Patriarchs, when they begat their children.

§. V.

Of the long liues of the Patriarchs: and some of late memorie.

§. VI.

Of the Patriarchs deliuering their knowledge by Tradition: and that Enoch writ before the Floud.

§. VII.

Of the men of renowne before the Floud.

§. VIII.

That the Giants, by Moses so called, were indeed men of huge bodies: as also diuers in later times.

CHAP. VI.

Of Idolatrous corruptions, quickly rising, and hardly at length vanishing in the World: and of the Reliques of Truth touching these ancient times, obscurely appearing in Fables and old Legends.

§. I.

THat in olde corruptions wee may find some signes of more ancient truth.

§. II.

That the corruptions themselues were very ancient: as in the Family of Noah, and in the old Ægyptians.

§. III.

That in processe of time these lesser errors drew on greater, as appeareth in the grosse Superstitions of the Ægyptians.

§. IIII.

That from the Reliques of ancient Records among the Ægyptians and others, the first Idols and Fables were inuented: and that the first Iupiter was Cain; Vulcan, Tubalcain, &c.

§. V.

Of the three chiefest Iupiters; and the strange storie of the third.

§. VI.
Of Cham, and other wicked ones, whereof some gat, some affected the name of Gods.

§. VII.
That the wiser of the ancient Heathen had farre better opinions of God.

§. VIII.
That Heathenisme and Iudaisme, after many wounds, were at length about the same time vnder Iulian miraculously confounded.

Of the last refuges of the Deuill to maintaine his Kingdome.

CHAP. VII.
Of Noahs Floud.

§. I.
OF Gods fore-warning: and some humane testimonies: and some doubting touching the truth of Noahs Floud.

§. II.
Of the floud in the time of Ogyges: and that this was not Noahs Floud.

§. III.
Of Deucalions floud: and that this was not Noahs Floud: nor the Vmbri in Italie a remnant of any vniuersall floud.

§. IIII.
Of some other Records testifying the vniuersall floud: and of two ancient Deluges in Ægypt: and of some elsewhere.

§. V.
That the Floud of Noah was supernaturall, though some say it might haue beene foreseene by the Starres.

§. VI.
That there was no need of any new Creation of matter to make the vniuersall Floud: and what are Cataractæ Cœli, Gen. 7. v. 11.

§. VII.
Of some remainder of the memorie of Noah among the Heathen.

§. VIII.
Of sundrie particulars touching the Arke: as the place where it was made; the matter; fashion; and name.

That the Arke was of sufficient capacitie.

§. X.
That the Arke rested vpon part of the Hill Taurus (or Caucasus*) betweene the East* Indies and Scythia.

†. I.
A Preterition of some questions lesse materiall: with a note of the vse of this question, to find out the Metropolis of nations.

†. II.
A proposall of the common opinion, that the Arke rested vpon some of the Hils of Armenia.

†. III.
The first Argument against the common opinio. They that came to build Babel, would haue come sooner, had they come from so neere a place as Armenia.

†. IIII.
The second Argument; That the Easterne people were more ancient in populositie, and in all humane glorie.

†. V.
The third Argument; From the wonderfull resistance which Semiramis *found in the East-*Indies.

†. VI.
The fourth Argument; From diuers considerations in the person of Noah.

†. VII.
Of the sewseleſſe opinion of Annius the Commenter vpon Berosus, that the Arke rested vpon Montes Caspij in Armenia; and yet vpon Gordiæi, which are three hundred miles distant also in Armenia, and yet in Scythia.

†. VIII.
The fift Argument; The Vine must grow naturally neere the place where the Arke rested.

Answere to an obiection out of the words of the Text, The Lord scattered them from thence vpon the face of the whole Earth.

†. X.
An answere to the obiection from the name of Ararat, taken for Armenia: and the height of the Hils there.

†. XI.
Of Caucasus, and diuers farre higher Hils than the Armenian.

†. XII.
Of diuers incongruities, if in this Storie we should take Ararat for Armenia.

†. XIII.

† XIII.
Of the contrarie situation of Armenia to the place noted in the Text: and that it is no maruaile, that the same ledge of Hils running from Armenia to India, should keep the same name all along, and euen in India, bee called Ararat.

† XIIII.
Of the best Vine naturally growing on the South-side of the Mountaines Caucasi, and toward the East Indies: and of other excellencies of the soyle.

† XV.
The conclusion, with a briefe repeating of diuers chiefe points.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the first planting of Nations after the Floud: and of the Sonnes of Noah; Sem, Ham, and Iaphet, by whom the Earth was repeopled.

§. I.

WHether Shem and Ham were elder then Iaphet.

§. II.

Of diuers things that in all reason are to bee presumed, touching the first planting of the World; as that all Histories must yeeld to Moses: that the World was not planted all at once, nor without great direction: and that the knowne great Lords of the first Ages, were of the issue of Ham.

§. III.

Of the Iles of the Gentils in Iaphets portion: of Berosus his too speedie seating Gomer the sonne of Iaphet in Italie; and another of Iaphets sonnes Tubal in Spaine: and of the Antiquitie of longinque Nauigation.

§. IIII.

Of Gog and Magog, Tubal, and Mesech, seated first about Asia the lesse; out of Ezechiel, Chap. 38. 39.

§. V.

Against the fabulous Berosus his Fiction, That the Italian Ianus was Noah.

§. VI.

That Gomer also and his Sonne Togorma, of the Posteritie of Iaphet, were first seated about Asia the lesse: and that from thence they spread Westward into Europe; and Northward into Sarmatia.

§. VII.

Of Iauan the fourth sonne of Iaphet; and of Mesch, of Aram, & Meshech of Iaphet.

§. VIII.

Of Ascanez and Riphath, the two elder sonnes of Gomer.

Of the foure sonnes of Iauan: and of the double signification of Tharsis, eyther for a proper name, or for the Sea.

§. X.

That the seat of Chush, the eldest sonne of Ham, was in Arabia, not in Æthiopia: and of strange Fables, and ill translations of Scripture, grounded vpon the mistaking of this point.

† I.

OF Iosephus his Tale of an Æthiopesse; wife to Moses, grounded on the mistaking of the seat of Chush.

† II.

A dispute against the Tale of Iosephus.

† III.

Chush ill expounded for Æthiopia. Ezech. 29. 10.

† IIII.

Another place of Ezechiel, chap. 30. v. 9. in like manner mistaken.

† V.

A place, Esay 18. v. 1. in like manner corrupted by taking Chush for Æthiopia.

† VI.

That vpon the like mistaking, both Terhaka in the Story of Senacherib, and Zera in the Story of Asa, are vnaduisedly made Æthiopians.

† VII.

A farther exposition of the place. Esay 18. 1.

§. XI.

Of the Plantation and Antiquities of Ægypt.

†. I.

THat Mizraim the chiefe Planter of Ægypt, and the reſt of the ſonnes of Ham, were ſeated in order, one by another.

†. II.

Of the time, about which the name of Ægypt began to be knowne: and of the Ægyptians Lunarie yeeres, which made their Antiquities ſeeme the more fabulous.

†. III.

Of certaine vaine aſſertions of the Antiquitie of the Ægyptians.

†. IIII.

Againſt Pererius; That it is not vnlikely, but that Ægypt was peopled within two hundred yeeres after the Creation; at leaſt that both it, and the moſt parts of the World, were peopled before the Floud.

†. V.

Of ſome other reaſons againſt the opinion of Pererius.

†. VI.

Of the words of Moſes, Geneſ. 10. v. vlt. whereupon Pererius grounded his opinion.

†. VII.

A concluſion, reſoluing of that which is moſt likely, touching the Ægyptian Antiquities: with ſomewhat of Phut, another ſonne of Ham, which peopled Lybia.

¶. XII.

Of the eleuen ſonnes of Canaan, the fourth ſonne of Ham.

†. I.

OF the bounds of the Land of Canaan; with the names of his eleuen ſonnes.

†. II.

Of the portions of Zidon and Heth.

†. III.

Of the Iebuſites, and Amorites.

†. IIII.

Of the Gergeſites, Heuites, & Harkites.

†. V.

Of Sini and Aruadi.

†. VI.

Of Zemari.

†. VII.

Of Hamathi.

¶. XIII.

Of the ſonnes of Chuſh, excepting Nimrod, of whom hereafter.

†. I.

THat the moſt of the ſonnes of Chuſh were ſeated in Arabia the happy: and of the Sabæans that robbed Iob: and of the Queene that came to Salomon.

†. II.

Ioſephus his opinion of Dedan, one of the iſſue of Chuſh, to haue beene ſeated in the Weſt Æthiopia, diſproued out of Ezechiel and Hieremie.

¶. XIIII.

Of the iſſue of Mizraim: and of the place of Hieremie, chap. 9. v. 7.

¶. XV.

Of the iſſue of Sem.

†. I.

OF Elam, Aſſur, Arphaxad, and Lud.

†. II.

Of Aram, and his ſonnes.

†. III.

Of the diuiſion of the Earth in the time of Phaleg, one of the ſonnes of Heber, of the iſſue of Sem.

†. IIII.

Of the ſonnes of Ioctan, the other ſonne of Heber.

†. V.

Of Ophir, one of Ioctans ſonnes, and of Peru: and of that Voyage of Salomon.

†. VI.

Of Hauilah the ſonne of Ioctan, who alſo paſſed into the Eaſt Indies: and of Meſha, & Sepher, named in the bordering of the Families of Ioctan: with a concluſion of this diſcourſe touching the Plantation of the World.

CHAP. IX.

Of the beginning and eſtabliſhing of Gouernment.

¶. I.

OF the proceeding from the firſt Gouernement vnder the eldeſt of Families to Regall, and from Regall abſolute to Regall tempered with Lawes.

¶. II.

Of the three commendable ſorts of Gouernement, with their oppoſites: and of the degrees of humane ſocietie.

¶. III.

§. III.
Of the good Gouernement of the first Kings.

§. IIII.
Of the beginning of Nobilitie: and of the vaine vaunt thereof without vertue.

CHAP. X.

Of Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus: and of memorable things about those times.

§. I.
That Nimrod was the first after the Flood that reigned like Soueraigne Lord: and that his beginning seemeth to haue beene of iust authoritie.

§. II.
That Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus, were three distinct persons.

§. III.
That Nimrod, not Assur, built Niniue: and that it is probable out of Esay 23. 13. that Assur built Vr of the Chaldees.

§. IIII.
Of the acts of Nimrod and Belus, as farre as now they are knowne.

§. V.
That we are not to mervaile how so many kingdomes could be erected about these times: and of Vexoris of Ægypt; and Tanais of Scythia.

§. VI.
Of the Name of Belus, and other Names affine vnto it.

§. VII.
Of the worshipping of Images, begunne from Belus in Babel.

§. VIII.
Of the Warres of Ninus: and lastly, of his Warre against Zoroaster.

CHAP. XI.

Of Zoroaster, supposed to haue beene the chiefe Author of Magicke Arts; and of diuers kindes of Magicke.

§. I.
That Zoroaster was not Cham, nor the first Inuenter of Astrologie, or of Magicke: and that there were diuers great Magicians of this name.

§. II.
Of the Name of Magia: and that it was anciently farre diuers from Coniuring and Witchcraft.

§. III.
That the good knowledge in the ancient Magicke is not to be condemned; though the Deuill here, as in other kindes, hath sought to obtrude euill things vnder the name and colour of good things.

§. IIII.
That Daniels misliking Nabuchodonosors condemning of the Magicians, doth not iustifie all their practices.

§. V.
The abuse of things, which may be found in all kindes, is not to condemne the right vse of them.

§. VI.
Of the diuers kindes of vnlawfull Magick.

§. VII.
Of diuers wayes by which the Deuill seemeth to worke his wonders.

§. VIII.
That none was euer raysed from the dead by the power of the Deuill: and that it was not the true Samuel which appeared to Saul.

CHAP. XII.

Of the memorable buildings of Ninus : and of his wife Semiramis : and of other her acts.

§. I.

OF the magnificent building of Ninive by Ninus : and of Babylon by Semiramis.

§. II.

Of the end of Ninus : and beginning of Semiramis reigne.

§. III.

Of Semiramis Parentage, and education : and Metamorphosis of her Mother.

§. IIII.

Of her Expedition into India, and death after discomfiture : with a note of the improbabilitie of her vices.

§. V.

Of the Temple of Belus, built by Semiramis : and of the Pyramides of Ægypt.

The Contents of the Chapters, Paragraphes, and Sections, in the second Booke of the first Part of the Historie of the World.

CHAPTER I.

Of the Time of the birth of Abraham : and of the vse of this question, for the ordering of the storie of the Assyrian Empire.

§. I.

OF some of the successors of Semiramis : with a briefe transition to the question, about the Time of the birth of Abraham.

§. II.

A proposall of reasons or arguments, that are brought to proue Abraham was borne in the yeere 292. after the Floud, and not in the yeere 352.

§. III.

The answere to one of the obiections proposed, shewing that Abraham made but one iourney out of Mesopotamia into Canaan ; and it, after his Fathers death.

§. IIII.

The answere to another of the obiections proposed, shewing that it was not vnlikely, that Terah should beget Abraham in his hundred and thirtieth yeere.

§. V.

The answere to two more of the obiections, shewing that we may haue certayntie of Abrahams age from the Scripture, though we make not Abraham the eldest sonne : and that there was great cause, why in the storie of Abraham his two brethren should be respected.

§. VI.

That the naming of Abraham first of the three Brethren, Gen. 11. v. 26 doth not proue that hee was the eldest : together with diuers reasons, prouing that Abraham was not the eldest sonne of Terah.

§. VII.

A conclusion of this dispute, noting the Authors on both sides : with an admonition, that they which shorten the times, make all ancient stories the more vnprobable.

§. VIII.

§. VIII.
A computation of the times of the Assyrians and others, grounded vpon the times noted in the storie of Abraham.

That Amraphel, one of the foure Kings whom Abraham ouerthrew, Gen. 14. may probably be thought to haue beene Ninias the sonne of Ninus.

§. X.
Of Arioch, another of the foure Kings: and that Ellas, whereof hee is said to haue beene King, lyes betweene Cœlesyria, and Arabia Petræa.

§. XI.
Of Tidal, another of the foure Kings.

§. XII.
That Chedorlaomer, the chiefe of the foure Kings, was not of Assyria, but of Persia: and that the Assyrian Empire at this time was much impayred.

§. XIII.
That it is not vnprobable, that the foure Kings had no Dominion in the Countries named, but that they had elsewhere with their Colonies planted themselues, and so retayned the names of the Countries whence they came: which if it be so, we neede not to say that Amraphel was Ninias, nor trouble our selues with many other difficulties.

CHAP. II.

Of the Kings of Ægypt from the first peopling of it after the Floud, to the time of the deliuery of the Israelites from thence.

§. I.
A Briefe of the Names and Times of the first Kings of Ægypt: with a note of the causes of difficultie in resoluing of the truth in these points.

§. II.
That by the account of the Ægyptian Dynasties, & otherwise, it appeares that Chams reigne in Ægypt began in the yeere after the Floud 191.

§. III.
That these Dynasties were not diuers families of Kings, but rather successions of Regents; oft-times many vnder one King.

§. IIII.
Of Cham, and his sonne Mizraim, or Osiris.

§. V.
Of the time when Osiris reigne ended: and that Iacob came into Ægypt in the time of Orus, the sonne of Osiris.

§. VI.
Of Typhon, Hercules Ægyptius, Orus, and the two Sesostres, succeßiuely reigning after Mizraim: and of diuers errors about the former Sesostres.

§. VII.
Of Busiris, the first Oppressor of the Israelites: and of his successor Queene Thermutis, that tooke vp Moses out of the Water.

§. VIII.
Of the two bretheren of Queene Thermutis: and what King it was, vnder whom Moses was borne: and who it was that perished in the Red Sea.

CHAP. III.

Of the deliuery of Israel out of Ægypt.

§. I.
O*F the time of* Moses birth: and how long the Israelites were oppressed in Ægypt.

§. II.
Of diuers Cities and Places in Ægypt, mentioned in this storie or elsewhere in the Scripture.

§. III.

§. III.

Of the crueltie against the Israelites yong children in Ægypt: and of Moses his preseruation and education.

§. IIII.

Of Moses his flying out of Ægypt; and the opinions of certayne ancient Historians, of his Warre in Æthiopia; and of his marriage there: Philo his iudgement of his Pastorall life: and that of Pererius of the Bookes of Genesis, and Iob.

§. V.

Of Pharaohs pursuit of the Israelites: and of their passage towards the Red Sea, so farre as Succoth.

§. VI.

Of the Solarie and Lunarie yeeres: and how they are reconciled: with the forme of the Hebrew yeere, and their manner of intercalation.

§. VII.

Of the passage of Israel from Succoth towards the Red Sea: and of the diuers wayes leading out of Ægypt.

§. VIII.

Of their passage ouer the Red Sea: and of the Red Sea it selfe.

That the passage through the Red Sea was miraculous; and not at a low Ebbe.

CHAP. IIII.

Of the iournying of the Israelites from the Red Sea, to the place where the Law was giuen them: with a discourse of Lawes.

§. I.

A Transition, by way of recapitulation of some things touching Chronologie: with a continuance of the storie, vntill the Amalekites met with the Israelites.

§. II.

Of the Amalekites, Madianites, and Kenites, vpon occasion of the battell with the Amalekites, and Iethro's comming, who being a Kenite, was Priest of Madian.

§. III.

Of the time when the Law was giuen: with diuers commendations of the inuention of Lawes.

§. IIII.

Of the name and meaning of the wordes, Law, and Right.

§. V.

Of the definition of Lawes, and of the Law eternall.

§. VI.

Of the Law of Nature.

§. VII.

Of the written Law of God.

§. VIII.

Of the vnwritten Law of God, giuen to the Patriarchs by Tradition.

Of the Morall, Iudiciall, and Ceremoniall Law: with a Note prefixed, How the Scripture speaketh not alway in one sense, when it nameth the Law of Moses.

§. X.

A proposall of nine other points to be considered; with a touch of the fiue first.

§. XI.

Of the sixt point, to wit, of the difference and agreement of the Old and New Testament.

§. XII.

Of the rest of the points proposed.

§. XIII.

Of the seuerall Commandements of the Decalogue: and that the difficultie is not in respect of the Commandements, but by our default.

§. XIIII.

THE FIRST PART OF THE HISTORIE OF THE WORLD: INTREATING OF THE Beginning, and first ages of the same, from the Creation, vnto ABRAHAM.

THE FIRST BOOKE.

CHAP. I.

Of the Creation, and Preseruation of the World.

§. I.

That the inuisible God is seene in his Creatures.

GOD, whom the wisest men acknowledge to bee a Power vnessable, and Vertue infinite, a Light by abundant clarity inuisible, an Vnderstanding, which it selfe can onely comprehend, an Essence eternall and spirituall, of absolute pureness and simplicitie, was, and is pleased to make himselfe knowne by the worke of the World: in the wonderfull magnitude whereof, (all which hee imbraceth, filleth, and sustaineth) wee behold the Image of that glorie, which cannot be measured, and withall that one, and yet vniuersall Nature, which cannot bee defined. In the glorious Lights of Heauen, wee perceiue a shadow of his diuine Countenance; in his mercifull prouision for all that liue, his manifold goodnesse: and lastly, in creating and making existent the world vniuersall, by the absolute art of his owne word, his Power and almightinesse, which Power, Light, Vertue, Wisedome, and Goodnesse, being all but attributes of one simple Essence, and one God, wee in all admire, and in part discerne per speculum creaturarum, that is, in the disposition order, and varietie of celestiall and terrestriall bodies: terrestriall, in their strange and manifold diuersities; celestiall, in their beautie and magnitude; which in their continuall & contrary trarie motions, are neither repugnant, intermixt, nor confounded. By these potent effects, wee approach to the knowledge of the omnipotent cause, and by these motions, their Almightie Mouer.

In these more then wonderfull workes, God (saith Hugo) speaketh vnto man, and it is true, that these be those discourses of God, whose effects, all that liue, witnesse in themselues; the sensible, in their sensible natures; the reasonable, in their reasonable soules: for according to S. Gregorie, Omnis homo eo ipso quòd rationalis conditus est, ex ipsa ratione, illum qui se condidit, Deum esse colligere debet: Euery man, in that he is reasonable, out of the same reason may know, that he which made him, is God. This God all men behold (saith Iob) which is according to the Fathers, Dominationem illius conspicere in creaturis, to discerne him in his prouidence by his creatures. That God hath beene otherwise seene, to wit, with corporall eyes, exceedeth the small proportion of my vnderstanding, grounded on these places of S. Iohn, and S. Paul, Yee haue not heard his voice at any time, neither haue ye seene his shape. And againe, Whom neuer man saw, nor can see.

And this I am sure agreeth with the nature of Gods simplicitie, of which S. Augustine, ipsa enim natura, vel substantia, vel quolibet alio nomine appellandum est, idipsum quod Deus est, corporaliter videri non potest, That nature, or that substance, or by whatsoeuer name that is to be called which is God, whatsoeuer that be, the same cannot be corporally perceiued. And of this opinion were Origen, Cyrill, Chrysostome, Gregorie Nazianzenus, Hierome, Augustine, Gregorie the Great, Euaristus, Alcuinus, Dionysius Areopagita, Aquinas, and all others of authoritie. But by his owne word, and by this visible world, is God perceiued of men, which is also the vnderstood language of the Almightie, vouchsafed to all his Creatures, whose Hieroglyphicall Characters, are the vnnumbred Starres, the Sunne & Moone, written on these large volumes of the Firmament: written also on the Earth and the Seas, by the letters of all those liuing Creatures, and plants, which inhabite and reside therein. Therefore said that learned Cusanus, Mundus vniuersus nihil aliud est, quàm Deus explicatus, The world vniuersall, is nothing else but God expresst. And the inuisible things of God (saith S. Paul) are seene by creation of the world, being considered in his Creatures. Of all which, there was no other cause preceding, then his owne will, no other matter then his owne power, no other workman then his owne word, no other consideration, then his owne infinite goodnesse. The example & patterne of these his Creatures, as he beheld the same in all eternitie in the abundance of his owne loue, so was it at length in the most wise order, by his vnchanged will mooued, by his high wisedome disposed, and by his almightie power perfected, and made visible. And therefore (saith Mirandula) we ought to loue God, Ex fide, & ex effectibus, (that is) both perswaded by his word, and by the effects of the worlds creation: Neq; enim qui causa caret, ex causa & origine sciri, cognosciq; potest, sed vel ex rerum, quæ facie sunt, queque fiunt & gubernantur obseruatione & collatione, vel ex ipsius Dei verbo. For he of whom there is no higher cause, cannot be knowne by any knowledge of cause or beginning, (saith Montanus) but either by the obseruing and conferring of things, which hee hath, or doth create and gouerne, or else by the word of God himselfe.

Hugo super Eccles. Hom. 8. Greg. in Mor. Herm. ad fil. Tat. l. 5. Vnus verò ingenitus, & non apparens & immanifestus, omnia autem manifestans, per omnia apparet, & in omnibus. Apparentia solùm generatorum est, nihil apparitio quàm generatio. Iohn. 5. 3. 1. Tim. 6. 16. Origen. lib. 2. περὶ ἀρχῶν. cap. 22. Cyril. & Chrysost. in Iohn, Hom. 14. *Greg. Naz. l. 2. §. II.

That the wisest, of the Heathen, whose authoritie is not to be despised, haue acknowledged the world to haue beene created by GOD.

THis worke and creation of the world, did most of the ancient & learned Philosophers acknowledge, though by diuers termes, and in a different maner expresst, I meane al those who are entitled by S. Augustine, Summi Philosophi, Philosophers of highest iudgement and vnderstanding. Mercurius Trismegistus calleth God, Principium vniuersorum, The originall

of the vniuersall: to whom he giueth also the attributes of Mens, natura, actus, necessitas, finis, & renouatio. And wherein hee truely, with S. Paul, casteth vpon God all power; confessing also, that the world was made by Gods almighty word, and not by hands: verbo, non manibus fabricatus est mundus. ZOROASTER (whom Heraclitus followed in opinion) tooke the word Fire, to expresse God by (as in Deuteronomie, and in S. Paul it is vsed) Omnia ex vno igne genita sunt; All things (saith he) are Deut. 4. 24. Hebr. 12. 29. caused, or produced out of one fire.

So did Orpheus plainely teach, that the world had beginning in time, from the will of the most High God; whose remarkeable words are thus conuerted: Cum abscondisset omnia IVPITER summus, deinde in lumen gratum emisit, ex sacro corde operans cogitata & mirabilia: Of which I conceiue this sense; When great IVPITER had hidden all things in himselfe; working out of the loue of his sacred heart, he sent thence, or brought forth into gratefull light, the admirable workes which he had fore-thought. Orph. de sum. loue.

Pindarus the Poet, and one of the wisest, acknowledged also one God, the most High, to bee the Father and Creator of all things; Vnus Deus Pater Creator summus. Plato calleth God the cause and originall, the nature and reason of the vniuersall; totius rerum natura, causa, & origo Deus. But heereof more at large heereafter. Vid. cap. 6.

Now, although the curiositie of some men haue found it superfluous, to remember the opinions of Philosophers, in matters of Diuinity: (it being true, that the Scripture hath not want of any forraine testimony) yet as the Fathers, with others excellently learned, are my examples heerein; so S. Paul himselfe did not despise, but thought it lawfull, & profitable, to remember whatsoeuer he found agreeable to the word of God, among the Heathen, that he might thereby take from them all escape, by way of ignorance, God rendring vengeance to them that know him not: as in his Epistle to Titus, he citeth Epimenides against the Cretians, and to the Corinthians, Menander, and in the seuenteenth of the Acts, Aratus, &c. for Truth (saith S. Ambrose) by whomsoeuer vttered, is of the holy Ghost; Veritas à quocunq; dicatur, à Spiritu sancto est: and lastly, let those kinde of men learne this rule; Quæ sacris seruiunt, prophana non sunt; Nothing is prophane that serueth to the vse of holy things.

§. III.

Of the meaning of In Principio Genes. 1. 1.

THis visible World of which Moses writeth, God created in the beginning, or first of all: in which (saith Tertullian) things beganne to bee. This word beginning (in which the Hebrewes seeke some hidden mysterie, and which in the Iewes Targum is conuerted by the word Sapientia) cannot be referred to succession of time, nor to order, as some men haue conceiued, both which are subsequent; but onely to creation then. For before that beginning, there was neither primary matter to bee informed, nor forme to informe, nor any being, but the eternall. Nature was not, nor the next parent of time begotten, time properly and naturally taken; for if God had but disposed of matter already in being, then as the word beginning could not bee referred to all things, so must it follow, that the institution of matter proceeded from a greater power, then that of God. And by what name shall we then call such a one (saith Lactantius) as exceedeth God in potencie: for it is an act of more excellencie to make, then to dispose of things made? whereupon it may be concluded, that matter could not be before this beginning: except we faine a double creation, or allow of two powers, and both infinite, the impossibilitie whereof scorneth defence. Nam impossibile plura esse infinita: quoniam alterum esset in altero finitum; There cannot bee more infinites then one; for one of them would limit the other. Cusan. de mente lib. 3.

§. IIII.

Of the meaning of the words Heauen and Earth.

Geneſis 2. 1.

THe vniuerſall matter of the world (which Moyſes comprehendeth vnder the names of Heauen and Earth) is by diuers diuerſly vnderſtood: for there are that conceiue, that by thoſe wordes, was meant the firſt matter, as the Peripatetikes vnderſtand it, to which, S. Auguſtine and Iſidore ſeeme to adhere. Feciſti mundum (ſaith S. Auguſtine) de materia informi, quam feciſti de nulla re, penè nullam rem: (that is) Thou haſt made the world of a matter without forme; which matter thou madeſt of nothing, and being made, it was little other then nothing.

But this potentiall and imaginary materia prima, cannot exiſt without forme. Peter Lombard, the Schoole-men, Beda, Lyranus, Comeſtor, Toſtatus and others, affirme, that it pleaſed God firſt of all to create the Empyrean Heauen: which at the ſucceeding inſtant (ſaith Beda and Strabo) hee filled with Angels. This Empyrean Heauen Steuchius Eugubinus calleth Diuine claritie, and vncreated: an errour, for which hee is ſharply charged by Pererius, though (as I conceiue) he rather failed in the ſubſequent, when he made it to be a place, and the ſeate of Angels, & iuſt Soules; then in the former affirmation: for of the firſt, That God liueth in eternall light, it is written; My ſoule, praiſe thou the Lord, that couereth himſelfe with light: and in the Reuelation; And the Citie hath no neede of Sunne, neither of the Moone to ſhine in it: for the glory of God did light it. And herein alſo Iohn Mercer vpon Geneſis differeth not in opinion from Eugubinus: for as by Heauen created in the beginning, was not meant the inuiſible or ſuperceleſtiall, ſo in his iudgement, becauſe it was in all eternity, the glorious ſeat of God himſelfe, it was not neceſſary to be created; Quem mundum ſupercæleſtem meo iudicio creari (ſaith MERCER) non erat neceſſe.

But as Moſes forbare to ſpeake of Angels, and of things inuiſible, and incorporate, for the weakenes of their capacities, whom he then cared to informe of thoſe things, which were more manifeſt, (to wit) that God did not only by a ſtrong hand deliuer them from the bondage of Egypt, according to his promiſe made to their forefathers: but alſo that he created, and was the ſole cauſe of this aſpectable, and perceiueable Vniuerſall; ſo on the other ſide I dare not thinke, that any ſuperceleſtiall Heauen, or whatſoeuer elſe (not himſelfe) was increate and eternall: and as for the place of God before the world created, the finite wiſedome of mortall men hath no perception of it, neither can it limit the ſeate of infinite power, no more then infinite power it ſelfe can be limited: for his place is in himſelfe, whom no magnitude elſe can containe: How great is the Houſe of God (ſaith BARVCH) how large is the place of his poſſeſſions! it is great, and hath no end, it is high and vnmeaſurable.

Bar. 3. 24. 25.

But leauing multiplicitie of opinion, it is more probable and allowed, that by the wordes, Heauen and Earth, was meant the ſolid matter and ſubſtance, aſwell of all the Heauens, and Orbes ſupernall, as of the Globe of the Earth and Waters, which couered it ouer, (to wit) that very matter of all things, materia, Chaos, poſſibilitas, ſine poſſe fieri. Which matter (ſaith Caluin) was ſo called, quòd totius mundi ſemen fuerit; Becauſe it was the ſeed of the Vniuerſall: an opinion of ancient Philoſophers long before.

§. V.

That the substance of the waters, as mixt in the body of the earth, is by MOSES vnderstood in the word Earth: and that the Earth, by the attributes of vnformed and voide, is described as the Chaos of the ancient Heathen.

MOSES first nameth Heauen and Earth (putting waters but in the third place) as comprehending waters in the word Earth, but afterwards hee nameth them apart, when God by his Spirit began to distinguish the confused Masse, and (as Basil saith) præparare naturam aquæ ad fœcunditatem vitalem; to prepare the nature of water to a vitall fruitfulnesse.

For vnder the word Heauen, was the matter of all heauenly bodies, and natures expresst: and by the name of Earth and Waters, all was meant, whatsoeuer is vnder the Moone, and subiect to alteration. Corrupt seedes bring foorth corrupt plants; to which the pure heauens are not subiect, though subiect to perishing. They shall perish (saith Dauid) and the heauens shall vanish away like smoke, saith Esay. Neither were the waters the matter of Earth: for it is written, Let the waters vnder the heauens be gathered into one place, and let the dry land appeare: which prooueth that the dry land was mixt and couered with the waters, and not yet distinguished; but no way, that the waters were the matter or seede of the Earth, much lesse of the Vniuersall. Initio tu Domine terram fundasti, Thou, O Lord, in the beginning hast founded the Earth: and againe, The Earth was couered with the Deepe (meaning with waters) as with a garment, saith Dauid. And if by naturall arguments it may be prooued, that water by condensation may become earth, the same reason teacheth vs also, that earth rarified may become water: water, aire: aire, fire; and so on the contrary, Deus ignis substantiam per aerem in aquam conuertit, God turneth the substance of fire, by aire, into water. For the Heauens and the Earth remained in the same state, in which they were created, as touching their substance, though there was afterwards added multiplicitie of perfection, in respect of beauty and ornament. Cælum verò & terra in statu creationis remanserunt, quantum ad substantiam, licèt multiplex perfectio decoris & ornatus eis postmodum superaddita est. And the word which the Hebrewes call Maim, is not to be vnderstood according to the Latine translation simply, and as specifical water; but the same more properly signifieth liquor. For (according to Montanus) Est autem Maim liquor geminus, & hoc nomen propter verborum penuriam, Latina lingua plurali numero aquas fecit. For Maim (saith he) is a double liquor, (that is, of diuers natures) and this name or word the Latines wanting a voice to expresse it, call it in the Plural, Aquas, Waters.

This Masse, or indigested matter, or Chaos created in the beginning, was without forme, that is, without the proper forme, which it afterwards acquired, when the Spirit of God had separated the Earth, and digested it from the waters: And the earth was voide: that is, not producing any creatures, or adorned with any plants, fruits, or flowers. But after the Spirit of God had moued vpon the waters, and wrought this indigested matter into that forme, which it now retayneth, then did the earth budde forth the hearbe, which seedeth seede, and the fruitfull tree according to his kinde, and God saw that it was good; which attribute was not giuen to the Earth, while it was confused, nor to the Heauens, before they had motion, and adornement. God saw that it was good; that is, made perfect: for perfection is that, to which nothing is wanting. Et perfecti Dei perfecta sunt opera, The workes of the perfect God, are perfect.

From this lumpe of imperfect matter had the ancient Poets their inuention of Demogorgon: HESIODVS and ANAXAGORAS the knowledge of that Chaos, of which Ouid:

§. VI.

How it is to be vnderstood that the Spirit of God mooued vpon the waters, and that this is not to be searched curiously.

AFter the creation of Heauen and Earth, then voide and without forme, the Spirit of God moued vpon the waters. The Seuenty Interpreters vse the word super-ferebatur, mooued vpon or ouer: incubabat, or fouebat (saith Hierome) out of Basil; and Basil out of a Syrian Doctor; Equidem non meam tibi, sed viri cuiusdam Syri sententiam recenseo (saith Basil) which wordes incubare or fouere importing warmth, hatching, or quickening, haue a speciall likenesse. Verbum translatum est ab auibus pullitiei suæ incubantibus, quàmuis spirituali, & planè inenarrabili, non autem corporali modo; The word is taken of birds hatching their yong, not corporally, but in a spirituall and vnexpressible manner.

Basil. Hexam.

Iunius.

Some of the Hebrewes conuert it to this effect, Spiritus Dei volitabat, The Spirit of God did flutter: the Chaldæan Paraphraft in this sense, ventus à conspectu Dei sufflabat, or as other vnderstand the Chaldæan, flabat, pellebat, remouebat: the wind from the face of God did blow vnder, driue, or remoue, or did blow vpon, according to the 147. Psalme. He caused his winde to blow, and the waters increase: but there was yet no winde nor exhalation: Arias Montanus in these wordes, Et spiritus Elohim Meracheset, id est, efficaciter motitans, confouens, ac agitans super facies gemini liquoris; The Spirit of God effectually and often mouing, keeping warme, and cherishing, quickning and stirring vpon the face of this double liquor. For he maketh foure originals, whereof three are agents, and the last passiue and materiall, to wit, causa, which is the diuine goodnesse: Iehi, which is, fiat, siue erit, let it be, or it shall be. Quæ vox verbo Dei prima prolata fuit: which voice (saith he) was the first that was vttered by the word of God. The third Spiritus Elohim, the Spirit of God, id est, vis quædam diuina, agilis ac præsens per omnia pertingens, omnia complens, that is, a certaine diuine power, or strength euery where, actiue and extending, and stretching through all, filling and finishing all things. The fourth hee calleth Maim, id est, materies ad omnem rem conficiendam habilis; matter apt to become euery thing. For my selfe I am resolued (Cùm Deus sit superrationale omni ratione, Seeing God is in all reason aboue reason) that although the effects which follow his wonderfull wayes of working, may in a measure be perceiued by mans vnderstanding, yet the manner and first operation of his diuine power cannot bee conceiued by any minde, or spirit, compassed with a mortall body. Animalis homo quæ Dei sunt non percipit: For my thoughts (sayth the Lord in Esay) are not your thoughts, neither are your wayes my wayes. And as the world hath not knowne God himselfe: so are his wayes (according to S. Paul) past finding out. O righteous Father, the world hath not knowne thee, saith CHRIST. And therfore, whether that motion, vitality and operation, were by incubation, or how else, the maner is onely knowne to God, Quemadmodum in omnibus sit rebus vel per essentiam, vel per potentiam, intellectus noster non capit; For how God (sayth S. Augustine, speaking of his Vbiquitie) is in all things, either by essence, presence, or power, our vnderstanding cannot comprehend. Nihil inter Deum hominemq; distaret, si consilia, & dispositiones illius maiestatis æternæ, cogitatio assequeretur humana: There would be no difference betweene God and Man, if mans vnderstanding could conceiue the counsels counsels and disposing of that eternall Maiestie; and therefore to be ouer-curious in searching how the all-powerfull Word of God wrought in the creation of the World or his all-piercing and operatiue Spirit distinguishing, gaue forme to the matter of the Vniuersall, is a labour and search like vnto his, who not contented with a knowne and safe foord, will presume to passe ouer the greatest Riuer in all parts, where hee is ignorant of their depths: for so doth the one lose his life, and the other his vnderstanding. We behold the Sunne, and enioy his light, as long as we looke towards it, but tenderly, and circumspectly: we warme our selues safely, while we stand neere the fire; but if we seeke to outface the one, to enter into the other, we forthwith become blinde or burnt.

But to eschew curiositie: this is true, that the English word (moued) is most proper and significant: for of motion proceedeth all production, and all whatsoeuer is effected. And this omnipotent Spirit of God, which may indeede be truely called, Principium motus, and with Mirandula, vis causæ efficientis, The force of the efficient cause, Saint Augustine sometimes taketh for the holy Ghost; sometime for a winde or breath, Sub nomine Spiritus, vnder the name of a Spirit, which is sometimes so taken: or for virtualis creatura, for a created virtuality: Tertullian and Theodoret call it also a breath or winde: Mercurius nameth it, Spiritum tenuem intelligibilem, a pure or thinne intelligible spirit: ANAXAGORAS, mentem: TOSTATVS, voluntatem & mentem Dei, The will and minde of God; which mens, Plato in Timæo, maketh animam mundi, The soule of the world: and in his sixt Booke de Republica, he calleth it the law of Heauen; in his Epistles, the leader of things to come, and the presence of things past. But as Cyprian wrote of the Incarnation of CHRIST our Sauiour, Mens deficit, vox silet, & non mea tantùm, sed etiam Angelorum: My minde faileth, my voice is silent, and not mine onely, but euen the voice of Angels: so may al men else say in the vnderstanding, and vtterance of the wayes and workes of the Creation; for to him (saith Nazianzenus) there is not one substance by which he is, and another, by which he can, Sed consubstantiale illi est, quicquid eius est, & quicquid est, Whatsoeuer attribute of him there is, and whatsoeuer he is, it is the very same substance that himselfe is. Nazian. lib. 2. Theol.

But the Spirit of God which moued vpon the waters, cannot be taken for a breath or winde, nor for any other creature, separate from the infinite actiue power of God, which then formed and distinguished, and which now sustaineth, and giueth continuance to the Vniuersall. For the Spirit of the Lord filleth all the world; and the same is it which maintaineth all things, saith SALOMON. If thou send forth thy Spirit, (saith DAVID) they are created: And GREGORIE, Deus suo præsentiali esse, dat omnibus rebus esse, ita quòd, si se rebus subtraheret, sicut de nihilo facta sunt omnia, sic in nihilum defluerent vniuersa; God giueth being to all things, by being present with all things, so as if he should withdraw himselfe from them, then, as of nothing the world was made, it would againe fall away and vanish into nothing. And this working of Gods Spirit in all things, Virgil hath expreste excellently: Wisd. cap. 1. Vers. 7.

Principio cœlum ac terras, campos q; liquentes,

Virg. Aeneid. lib. 8. 724.

The Moones bright Globe, and Starres Titanian,
A Spirit within maintaines: and their whole Masse,
A Minde, which through each part infus'd doth passe,

All this great Body of the Vniuerse.

And this was the same Spirit, which moued in the Vniuersall, and thereby both distinguished and adorned it. His Spirit hath garnished the Heauens, sayth Iob. So Iob c. 26. v. 13.

then

then the Spirit of God moued vpon the waters, and created in them their ſpiritualitie, and naturall motion; motion brought forth heat; and heat rariſaction, and ſubtilitie of parts. By this Spirit, (which gaue heat and motion, and thereby, operation to euery nature, while it moued vpon the waters, which were in one indigeſted lump, and Chaos, diſpoſed to all formes alike) was begotten ayre: an element ſuperior, as lighter then the waters, through whoſe vaſt, open, ſubtile, diaphanicke, or tranſparent body, the light afterwards created might eaſily tranſpierce: light, for the excellencie thereof, being the firſt creature which God called good, whoſe creation immediatly followed. This Spirit Chryſoſtome calleth a vitall Operation, aquis à Deo inſitam, ex qua aquæ non ſolùm motionem, ſed & vim procreandi animalia habuerint. He calleth it, A vitall Operation giuen by God vnto the waters, whereby the waters had not onely motion, but alſo power to procreate or bring foorth liuing creatures.

Gen.1.5.

§. VII.

Of the light created, as the materiall ſubſtance of the Sunne: and of the nature of it, and difficultie of knowledge of it: and of the excellencie and vſe of it: and of motion, and heat annexed vnto it.

THeſe waters were afterwards congregated, and called the Sea: and this light afterwards (in the fourth day) gathered and vnited, and called the Sunne, the Organ, and inſtrument of created light. For this firſt and diſperſed light did not (as I conceiue) diſtinguiſh the night from the day, but with a reference to the Sunnes creation, and the vniting of the diſperſed light therein. This is proued by theſe words, Let there be lights in the firmament, to ſeparate the day from the night: which lights in the firmament of heauen were alſo made for ſignes, and for ſeaſons, and for dayes, and for yeeres, implying a motion inſtantly to follow, by which dayes and yeeres are diſtinguiſhed; after which ſucceeded Time, or together with which, that Time (which was the meaſure of motion) began. For that ſpace of the firſt three dayes which preceded the Suns creation, or formall perfection, when as yet there was not any motion to bee meaſured, and the day named in the fift verſe, was but ſuch a ſpace, as afterwards by the Sunnes motion made a ciuill or naturall day. And as Waters were the matter of ayre, of the firmament, and of the lower and vpper waters, and of the Seas, and creatures therein: Earth, the matter of Beaſts, Plants, Minerals, and Mans body: ſo may light (for expreſſion ſake) be called the Chaos, or materiall ſubſtance of the Sunne, and other lights of heauen: Howbeit, neither the Sunne, nor any thing ſenſible, is that light it ſelfe, quæ cauſa eſt lucidorum, which is the cauſe that things are lightſome (though it make it ſelfe and all things elſe viſible) but a body moſt illightned, which illuminateth the Moone, by whom the neighbouring Region (which the Greekes call Æther, the place of the ſuppoſed Element of fire) is affected and qualified, and by it all bodies liuing in this our ayre. For this light Auicenna calleth vehiculum & fomentum omnium cæleſtium virtutum, & impreſſionum: The conducter, and preſeruer or nouriſher of all Celeſtiall vertues and impreſſions, nothing deſcending of heauenly influences, but by the medium, or meanes of light. Ariſtotle calleth light, a qualitie, inherent, or cleauing to a Diaphanous body, Lumen eſt qualitas inhærens Diaphano: but this may be better auouched of the heat, which it tranſporteth and bringeth with it, or conducteth: which heat (ſay the Platonickes) abeunte lumine reſidet in ſubiecto, the light being departed, doth reſide in the ſubiect, as warmth in the aire, though the ſame bee depriued of light. This light Plotinus and all the Academikes make incorporal, and ſo doth MONTANVS, Cui nec duritia reſiſtit, nec ſpatium: Which neither hardneſſe reſiſteth, nor ſpace leaueth.

Ariſtotle findeth corporalitie in the beames of light; but it is but by way of repetition of other mens opinions, ſaith Picolomineus. Democritus, Leucippus, and Epicurus, giue giue materiality to light it ſelfe, but improperly: for it paſſeth at an inſtant, from the Heauen to the Earth, nor is it reſiſted by any hardneſſe, becauſe it pierceth through the ſolid body of glaſſe, or other Criſtalline matter; and whereas it is withſtood by vncleane, and vnpure earthy ſubſtances, leſſe hard, and more eaſie to inuade then the former, the ſame is, Quòd obſtaculum naturâ terreum atq; ſordidum, non capit candidam luminis puritatem: Becauſe an obſtacle, by nature earthie and foule, doth not receiue the pure clearenеſſe of light: alluding to that moſt diuine light, which onely ſhineth on thoſe mindes, which are purged from all worldly droſſe, and humane vncleanneſſe. Plotin.

But of this created light, there is no agreement in opinion; neither doe I maruaile at it, for it cannot be found either in the Fathers, Philoſophers, or Schoole-men, or other ancient or later Writers, that any of them vnderſtood either it or themſelues therein: all men (to caſt off ignorance) haue diſputed heereof, but there is no man that hath beene taught thereby. Thomas Aquinas (not inferiour to any in wit) as he hath ſhewed little ſtrength of argument in re'uting the opinions of Beda, Hugo, Lombard, Lyranus, and others: ſo is his owne iudgement heerein, as weake as any mans; and moſt of the Schoole-men were rather curious in the nature of termes, and more ſubtile in diſtinguiſhing vpon the parts of doctrine already laid down, then diſcouerers of any thing hidden, either in Philoſophie or Diuinitie: of whom it may be truly ſaid, Nihil ſapientiæ odioſius acumine nimio: Nothing is more odious to true wiſedome, then too acute ſharpneſſe. Neither hath the length of time, and the ſearch of many learned men, (which the ſame time hath brought forth and deuoured) reſolued vs, whether this light be ſubſtantiall, corporall, or incorporall: Corporall they ſay it cannot be, becauſe then it could neither pierce the Aire, nor thoſe hard, ſolid, and Diaphanous bodies, which it doth, and yet euery day we ſee the Aire illightened: incorporal it cannot be, becauſe it is ſenſible: ſenſible it is, becauſe it ſomtime affecteth the ſight of the eye with offence, and therefore by moſt of the Fathers ſo eſteemed: others ſay, (as Patricius) that it cannot be matter, becauſe no forme ſo excellent as it ſelfe to informe it: neither can it be any accident, which is not ſeparable without the deſtruction of the ſubiect: for light being taken from the Sunne, the Sunne is no more the Sunne in exiſtence. Secondly, if light were proceeding from matter and forme, then either, or both muſt be one of theſe, Lucide or bright, darke or opake, Diaphanous or tranſparent; but darkeneſſe cannot bee parent of light; and things Diaphanous (being neither light, nor darkeneſſe, but capable of either) cannot be the cauſe of either, and therefore muſt the matter, or forme, or both, be Lucide and ſhining. Lucide and ſhining obtaine their ſo being of the light; and therefore, if we deriue this being of light from a former, then would the progreſſe goe on infinitely, and againſt nature; and therefore he concludeth, that light in the Sunne hath his being primarily, and immediatly of it ſelfe, and is therefore the Sunnes forme, and the forme of all Lucide and ſhining bodies: but what is taught heereby, let others iudge.

Lucida corpora ſunt plena ſuæ luce, alienis tenebris impervia. Opaca ſunt plena ſuis tenebris alieno lumine. Tranſparentia ſeu Diaphana carent ſuis & lumine & tenebris: alienis & lumine & tenebris permeantur.

But in my vnderſtanding lumen, (which may be Engliſhed by the word Shine) is an intentionall Species of that, which may bee Engliſhed by Light, and ſo, this ſhining which proceedeth from the Sun, or other lights of Heauen, or from any other light, is an image, or intentionall Species thereof; and an intentional Species may be vnderſtood by the example of a red, or greene colour, occaſioned by the ſhining of the Sunne through red or greene glaſſe: for then wee perceiue the ſame colour caſt vpon any thing oppoſite; which redneſſe or other colour, we cal the intentionall Species of the colour in that glaſſe. And againe, as this light, touching his ſimple nature, is no way yet vnderſtood: ſo it is diſputed, whether this light firſt created, bee the ſame, which the Sunne inholdeth and caſteth forth, or whether it had continuance any longer, then till the Sunnes creation. Scal. ſubt. ex. 71.

But by the moſt wiſe and vnchanged order, which God obſerued in the worke of the world, I gather, that the light, in the firſt day created, was the ſubſtance of the Sunne: for Moſes repeateth twiſe the maine parts of the vniuerſall; firſt, as they were created in matter; ſecondly, as they were adorned with forme: firſt, naming the Geneſ. 1. Verſ. 12. 9.

Heauens,

Heauens, the Earth, the Waters, all confused, and afterward, the Waters congregated, the Earth made dry land, and the Heauens distinguished from both, and beautified. And therefore the Earth, as it was earth, before it was vncouered, and before it was called Arida, or dry land; and the Waters were waters, before they were congregated, and called the Sea, though neither of them perfect, or inriched with their vertuall formes: so the Sunne, although it had not his formall perfection, his circle, beauty, and bounded magnitude, till the fourth day, yet was the substance thereof in the first day (vnder the name of Light) created; and this Light formerly dispersed, was in the same fourth day vnited, and set in the Firmament of Heauen: for to Light created in the first day, God gaue no proper place or fixation; and therefore the effects named by Anticipation, (which was to separate day from night) were precisely performed, after this Light was congregated, and had obtained life and motion. Neither did the wisedome of God finde cause why it should moue (by which motion, dayes and nights are distinguished) till then: because there was not yet any Creature produced, to which, by mouing, the Sunne might giue light, heat, and operation.

But after the Earth (distinguished from waters) began to budde forth the budde of the herbe, &c. God caused the Sunne to moue, and (by interchange of time) to visite euery part of the inferiour world; by his heat to stirre vp the fire of generation, and to giue actiuity to the seedes of all natures: For, as a King, which commandeth some goodly building to bee erected, doth accommodate the same to that vse and end, to which it was ordained; so it pleased God (saith Procopius) to command the Light to be; which by his all-powerfull word he approued, and approuing it, disposed thereof, to the vse and comfort of his future Creatures.

But in that it pleased God to aske of IOB, By what way is the light parted, and where is the way where light dwelleth? wee thereby know, that the nature thereof falleth not vnder mans vnderstanding; and therefore let it suffice, that by Gods grace we enioy the effects thereof. For this light is of the treasure of God (saith ESDRAS.) And those which inhabite the Heauens, doe onely know the essence thereof. Nihil ignotum in cœlo, nihil notum in terra: Nothing vnknowne in Heauen, nothing perfectly knowne on earth. Res veræ sunt in mundo inuisibili, in mundo visibili vmbræ rerum: Things themselues are in the inuisible world, in the world visible, but their shadowes; Surely, if this light be not spirituall, yet it approcheth neerest vnto spirituality; and if it haue any corporality, then of all other the most subtile and pure; for howsoeuer, it is of all things seene, the most beautifull, and of the swiftest motion, of all other the most necessary and beneficiall. For it ministreth to men, and other creatures, all celestiall influences; it dissipateth those sad thoughts and sorrowes, which the darkenesse both begetteth and maintaineth; it discouereth vnto vs the glorious workes of God, and carrieth vp with an Angelicall swiftnesse, our eyes vnto Heauen, that by the sight thereof, our mindes being informed of his visible maruailes, may continually trauaile to surmount these perceiued Heauens, and to finde out their omnipotent cause and Creatour. Cognitio non quiescit in rebus creatis; Our knowledge doth not quiet it selfe in things created. Et ipsa lux facit, vt cætera mundi membra digna sint laudibus, cùm suam bonitatem & decorem omnibus communicet; It is the light, (saith S. AMBROSE) that maketh the other part of the world so worthy of praise, seeing that it selfe communicateth its goodnesse and beauty vnto all: of which Ouid out of Orpheus:

The world discernes it selfe, while I the world behold,
By me the longest yeeres, and other times are told,
I the worlds eye.

Lastly,

Lastly, if we may behold in any creature, any one sparke of that eternall fire, or any farre-off-dawning of Gods glorious brightnesse, the same in the beauty, motion, and vertue of this light may be perceiued. Therefore was God called lux ipsa, and the light, by Hermes named lux sancta, and Christ our Sauiour said to bee that Light, which lighteneth euery man that commeth into the world. Yet in respect of Gods incomprehensible sublimitie, and puritie, this is also true, that God is neither a minde, nor a Spirit of the nature of other Spirits; nor a light, such as can be discerned. Deus profectò non mens est, at verò vt sit mens causa est, nec spiritus, sed causa qua spiritus extat; nec lumen, sed causa qua lumen existit. God (saith HERMES in PŒMANDRO) certainely is not a minde, but the cause that the minde hath his being; nor spirit, but the cause by which euery spirit is; nor light, but the cause by which the light existeth. Iob. 1. 9. & 14. 46.

So then the Masse and Chaos being first created, void, darke, and imformed, was by the operatiue Spirit of God, pierced and quickened, and the Waters hauing now receiued Spirit & motion, resolued their thinner parts into Aire, which God illightned: the Earth also by being contiguat, and mixt with waters (participating the same diuine vertue) brought foorth the budde of the herbe that seedeth seede, &c. and for a meane and organ, by which this operatiue vertue might bee continued, God appointed the light to be vnited, and gaue it also motion and heat, which heat caused a continuance of those seuerall species, which the Earth (being made fruitfull by the Spirit) produced, and with motion begate the time and times succeeding. Gen. 1. 16.

§. VIII.

Of the Firmament, and of the waters aboue the Firmament: and whether there bee any cristalline Heauen, or any Primum mobile.

AFter that the Spirit of God had moued vpon the waters, and light was created, God said, Let there bee a Firmament in the middest of the waters, and let it separate the waters from the waters: that is, those waters which by rarifaction and euaporation were ascended, and those of the Earth and Sea.

But these waters separate aboue this extension, which the Latine Translation calleth firmamentum, for expansum (for so Vatablus, Pagninus, and Iunius turne it) are not the cristalline Heauens, created in the imaginations of men; which opinion Basilius Magnus calleth a childish supposition, making in the same place many learned arguments against this fancie. For the waters aboue the Firmament, are the waters in the Aire aboue vs, where the same is more solid and condense, which God separated from the nether waters by a Firmament, that is, by an extended distance and vast space: the wordes Raquia, which Montanus writeth Rakiagh, and Shamaÿm, being indifferently taken for the Heauen & for Aire, and more properly for the Aire & æther, then for the Heauens, as the best Hæbricians vnderstand them; quo suprema & tenuia ab infimis crassis deducta, interfectaq; distarent, for that whereby the supreme and thinne bodies were placed in distance, being seuered and cut off from low and grosse matters: and the waters aboue the Firmament, expresst in the word Maÿm, are in that tongue taken properly for the waters aboue the Aire, or in the vppermost Region of the same. Mont. nat. hist. fol. 152.

And that the word Heauen is vsed for the Aire, the Scriptures euery-where witnesse, as in the blessings of Ioseph, and in the 104. Psalme. By these springs shall the fowle of the Heauen dwell*; and [a] vpon Sodome and Gomorrha it rained brimstone and fire out of the Heauen; and in Isaacs blessing to IACOB, God giue thee therefore of the dew of Heauen; and in Deuteronomie the 11. But the land whither you goe to possesse it, is a land, that drinketh water of the raine of Heauen; and in IOB, Who hath ingendred the frosts of Heauen; and in S. MATTHEVV, Behold the Fowles of Heauen, for they sowe not. Gen. 49. 25. * Psal. 104. 12. [a] Gen. 19. 24. Cap. 27. 28. Deut. 11. 11. Iob. 38. 29. Matt. 6. 26.

So

So as in all the Scriptures of the old Testament throughout, is the word Heauen very often vsed for aire, and taken also hyperbolically for any great heighth, as; Let vs build vs a Tower, whose toppe may reach to Heauen, &c. And in this very place Basil auoucheth, that this appellation of Heauen for the Firmament, is but by way of similitude: his owne wordes be these; Et vocauit Deus firmamentum cælum. Hæc appellatio alij quidem propriè accommodatur; huic autem nunc ad similitudinem; And God called the firmament Heauen: This appellation (saith Basil) is properly applyed to another (that is, to the Starry Heauen) but to this, (that is, to the Firmament diuiding the waters) it is imposed by similitude: and if there were no other proofe, that by the Firmament was meant the Aire, and not the Heauen, the wordes of MOSES in the eighth Verse, conferred with the same word Firmament in the twentieth Verse, makes it manifest: for in the eighth Verse it is written, that God called the Firmament, which diuided waters from waters, Heauen; and in the 20. Verse hee calleth the Firmament of Heauen, Aire, in these words: And let the fowle flie vpon the earth in the open firmament of Heauen: and what vse there should bee of this ycie, or cristalline, or waterie Heauen, I conceiue not, except it be to moderate and temper the heat, which the Primum mobile would otherwise gather and increase: though in very truth, in stead of this helpe, it would adde an vnmeasurable greatnesse of circle, whereby the swiftnesse of that first Moueable would exceede all possibilitie of beleefe. Sed nemo tenetur ad impossibilia; but no man ought to be held to impossibilities; and faith it selfe (which surmounteth the heighth of all humane reason) hath for a forcible Conducter, the Word of Truth, which also may be called lumen omnis rationis & intellectus; the light of all reason and vnderstanding. Now that this supposed first Moueable, turneth it selfe so many hundred thousand miles in an instant (seeing the Scriptures teach it not) let those that can beleeue mens imaginations, apprehend it, for I can not: but of these many Heauens, let the Reader that desireth satisfaction, search Orontius, and of this waterie Heauen, Basilius Magnus in his Hexam. fol. 40. 41. &c. and Matth. Beroaldus, his second Booke, and sixt Chapter. For my selfe, I am perswaded, that the waters, called, The waters aboue the Heauens, are but the cloudes and waters ingendred in the vppermost Aire.

Gen. 11. 4.

A conclusion repeating the summe of the workes in the Creation, which are reduced to three heads: The creation of matter, The forming of it, The finishing of it.

TO conclude, it may bee gathered out of the first Chapter of Genesis, that this was the order of the most wise GOD in the beginning, and when there was no other nature, or being, but Gods incomprehensible eternitie. First, hee created the matter of all things: and in the first three daies he distinguished & gaue to euery nature his proper forme; the forme of leuitie to that which ascended, to that which descended, the forme of grauitie: for he separated light from darkenesse, diuided waters from waters, and gathered the waters vnder the Firmament into one place. In the last three dayes, God adorned, beautified, and repleni shed the world: he set in the Firmament of Heauen, the Sunne, Moone, and Starres; filled the Earth with Beasts, the Aire with Fowle, and the Sea with Fish, giuing to all that haue life, a power generatiue, thereby to continue their Species and kindes, to Creatures vegetatiue and growing, their seeds in themselues; for hee created all things, that they might haue their being: and the generations of the world are preserued.

That Nature is no Principium per ſe; nor forme the giuer of being: and of our ignorance, how ſecond cauſes ſhould haue any proportion with their effects.

AND for this working power, which wee call Nature, the beginning of motion and reſt, according to Ariſtotle, the ſame is nothing elſe, but the ſtrength and facultie, which God hath infuſed into euery creature, hauing no other ſelfe-abilitie, then a Clocke, after it is wound vp by a mans hand, hath. Theſe therefore that attribute vnto this facultie, any firſt or ſole power, haue therein no other vnderſtanding, then ſuch a one hath, who looking into the Sterne of a Ship, and finding it guided by the Helme and Rudder, doth aſcribe ſome abſolute vertue to the piece of wood, without all conſideration of the hand, that guides it, or of the iudgement, which alſo directeth and commandeth that hand; forgetting in this and in all elſe, that by the vertue of the firſt act, all Agents worke whatſoeuer they worke: Virtute primi actus agunt agentia omnia quicquid agunt: for as the minde of man ſeeth by the Organ of the eye, heareth by the eares, and maketh choice by the will: and therefore we attribute ſight to the eye, and hearing to the eares, &c. and yet it is the minde only, that giueth abilitie, life, and motion to all theſe his inſtruments and Organs; ſo God worketh by Angels, by the Sunne, by the Starres, by Nature, or infuſed properties, and by men, as by ſeuerall organs, ſeueral effects; all ſecond cauſes whatſoeuer, being but inſtruments, conduits, and pipes, which carrie and diſperſe what they haue receiued from the head and fountaine of the Vniuerſall. For as it is Gods infinite power, and euery-where-preſence (compaſſing, embracing, and piercing all things) that giueth to the Sunne power to draw vp vapours, to vapours to bee made cloudes, cloudes to containe raine, and raine to fall: ſo all ſecond and inſtrumentall cauſes, together with Nature it ſelfe, without that operatiue facultie which God gaue them, would become altogether ſilent, vertueleſſe, and dead: of which excellently ORPHEVS; Per te vireſcunt omnia, All things by thee ſpring forth in youthfull greene. I enforce not theſe things, thereby to annihilate thoſe variable vertues, which God hath giuen to his creatures, animate and inanimate, to heauenly and earthly bodies, &c. for all his workes in their vertues prayſe him: but of the manner how God worketh in them, or they in or with each other, which the Heathen Philoſophers, and thoſe that follow them, haue taken on them to teach: I ſay, there is not any one among them, nor any one among vs, that could euer yet conceiue it, or expreſſe it, euer enrich his own vnderſtanding with any certaine truth, or euer edifie others (not fooliſh by ſelfe-flatterie) therein. For (ſayth Lactantius, ſpeaking of the wiſedome of the Philoſophers) ſi facultas inueniendæ veritatis huic ſtudio ſubiaceret, aliquandò eſſet inuenta; cùm verò tot temporibus, tot ingenijs in eius inquiſitione contritis, non ſit comprehenſa, apparet nullam ibi eſſe ſapientiam; If in this ſtudie (ſayth hee) were meanes to find out the truth, it had ere this beene found out: but ſeeing it is not yet comprehended, after that ſo much time, and ſo many wits haue beene worne out in the inquiry of it, it appeareth, that there is no wiſedome there to be had. Nam ſi de vnâ re præciſa ſcientia haberetur, omnium rerum ſcientia neceſſariò haberetur: If the preciſe knowledge of any one thing were to bee had, it ſhould neceſſarily follow, that the knowledge of all things were to bee had. And as the Philoſophers were ignorant in Nature, and the wayes of her working: ſo were they more curious, then knowing, in their firſt matter and Phyſicall forme. For if their firſt matter had any being, it were not then the firſt matter: for, as it is the firſt matter, it hath only a power of being, which it altogether leaueth, when it doth ſubſiſt. And ſeeing it is neyther a ſubſtance pefect, nor a ſubſtance inchoate, or in the way of perfection, how any other ſubſtance ſhould thence take concreſcence, it hath not beene taught, neyther are theſe formes (ſayth a learned Authour) any thing, ſi ex ea exprimantur potentia, Natura enim remota prouidentia & poteſtate diuina, prorſus nihil eſt. Lact. de falſ. Sapientia, l. 3. cap. 28.

potentia, quæ nihil est. Againe, how this first matter should bee subiectum formarum, and passiue, which is vnderstood to precede the forme, it is hard to conceiue: for to make forme which is the cause, to bee subsequent to the thing caused (to wit, to the first matter) is contrary to all reason, diuine and humane: only it may be said, that originally there is no other difference betweene matter & forme, then betweene heat and fire, of which the one cannot subsist without the other, but in a kind of rationall consideration. Leauing therefore these Riddles to their Louers, who by certaine scholasticall distinctions wrest and peruert the truth of all things, and by which Aristotle hath laboured to prooue a false eternitie of the World, I thinke it farre safer to affirme with Saint AVGVSTINE, That all species and kinds are from God, from whom, whatsoeuer is naturall proceedeth, of what kind or estimation soeuer, from whence are the seeds of all formes, and the formes of all seeds and their motions; A quo est omnis species, à quo est quicquid naturaliter est, cuiuscunq; generis est, cuiuscunq; æstimationis est, à quo sunt semina formarum, formæ seminum, motus seminum atq; formarum. And thus much Auerrois is forced to confesse. For all formes (sayth he) are in primo motore; which is also the opinion of Aristotle in the twelfth of his Metaph. and of Albertus vpon Dionysius.

Of Fate; and that the Starres haue great influence: and that their operations may diuersly be preuented or furthered.

AND, as of Nature, such is the dispute and contention concerning Fate or Destinie, of which the opinions of those learned men that haue written thereof, may be safely receiued, had they not thereunto annexed and fastened an ineuitable necessitie, and made it more generall, and vniuersally powerfull then it is, by giuing it Dominion ouer the mind of man, and ouer his will; of which Ouid and Iuuenal.

Basil. Esa. 4. Aug. de hæres. 70. c. 35. Thom. cont. Gent. 3. cap. 83. Ficin. in 12. de leg. Cic. de fat.

An errour of the Chaldeans, and after them of the Stoicks, the Pharisees, Priscillianists, the Bardisanists, and others, as Basil, Augustine, and Thomas haue obserued: but, that Fate is an obedience of second causes to the first, was well conceiued of Hermes, and Apuleius the Platonist. Plotinus out of the Astronomers calleth it a disposition from the acts of celestial Orbes, vnchangeably working in inferiour bodies, the same being also true enough, in respect of all those things, which a rationall mind doth not order nor direct. Ptolomie, Seneca, Democritus, Epicurus, Chrysippus, Empedocles, and the Stoicks, some of them more largely, others more strictly, ascribe to Fate a binding and ineuitable necessitie; and that it is the same which is spoken and determined by God (quod de vnoquoq; nostrûm fatus est Deus) and the definite lot of all liuing. And certainly it cannot be doubted, but the Starres are instruments of farre greater vse, then to giue an obscure light, and for men to gaze on after Sun-set: it being manifest, that the diuersitie of seasons, the Winters and Summers, more hot and cold, are not so vncertained by the Sunne and Moone alone, who alway keepe one and the same course, but that the Starres haue also their working therein.

And if we cannot denie, but that God hath giuen vertues to Springs, and Fountaines, taines, to cold earth, to plants and stones, Minerals, and to the excrementall parts of the baseſt liuing creatures, why ſhould wee rob the beautifull Starres of their working powers? for ſeeing they are many in number and of eminent beauty and magnitude, we may not thinke, that in the treaſury of his wiſedome who is infinite, there can bee wanting (euen for euery Starre) a peculiar vertue and operation; as euery herbe, plant, fruit, and flower, adorning the face of the Earth hath the like. For as theſe were not created to beautifie the earth alone, and to couer and ſhadow her duſtie face, but otherwiſe for the vſe of man and beaſt, to feed them and cure them: ſo were not thoſe vncountable glorious bodies ſet in the Firmament, to no other end, then to adorne it, but for inſtruments and organs of his diuine prouidence, ſo far as it hath pleaſed his iuſt will to determine. Origen vpon this place of Geneſis, Let there be light in the Firmament, &c. affirmeth that the Starres are not cauſes (meaning perchance binding cauſes) but are as open Bookes, wherein are contained and ſet downe all things whatſoeuer to come; but not to be read by the eyes of humane wiſedome: which latter part I beleeue well, and this ſaying of Syracides withall: That there are hid yet greater things then theſe bee, and wee haue ſeene but a few of his workes. And though, for the capacitie of men, we know ſomewhat, yet in the true and vttermoſt vertues of herbes and plants, which our ſelues ſow and ſet, and which grow vnder our feet, we are in effect ignorant; much more in the powers and working of celeſtiall bodies: for hardly (ſayth SALOMON) can we diſcerne the things that are vpon the earth, and with great labour find we out thoſe things that are before vs: who can then inueſtigate the things that are in Heauen? Multum eſt de rebus cœleſtibus aliquid cognoſcere: It is much to know a little of heauenly things. But in this queſtion of Fate, the middle courſe is to be followed, that as with the Heathen we doe not bind God to his creatures, in this ſuppoſed neceſſitie of deſtinie, ſo on the contrary we doe not rob thoſe beautifull creatures of their powers and offices. For had any of theſe ſecond cauſes deſpoyled God of his prerogatiue, or had God himſelfe conſtrained the minde and will of man to impious acts by any celeſtiall inforcements, then ſure the impious excuſe of ſome were iuſtifiable; of whom Saint AVGVSTINE: Impiâ peruerſitate in malis factis rectiſſimè reprehendendis ingerunt accuſandum potius auctorum ſyderum, quàm commiſſorem ſcelerum. Where wee reprehend them of euill deeds, they againe with wicked peruerſeneſſe vrge, that rather the Authour and Creatour of the Starres, then the doer of the euill is to be accuſed.

But that the Stars and other celeſtiall bodies incline the will by mediation of the ſenſitiue appetite, which is alſo ſtirred by the conſtitution and complexion, it cannot be doubted. Corpora cœleſtia (ſayth DAMASCENE) conſtituunt in nobis habitus, complexiones, & diſpoſitiones, The heauenly bodies (ſayth he) make in vs habits, complexions, and diſpoſitions: for the bodie (though Galen inforce it further) hath vndoubtedly a kind of drawing after it the affections of the minde, eſpecially bodies ſtrong in humour, and mindes weake in vertues: for thoſe of cholericke complexion are ſubiect to anger, and the furious effects thereof, by which they ſuffer themſelues to be tranſported, where the minde hath not reaſon to remember, that paſſions ought to be her Vaſſals, not her Maſters. And that they wholly direct the reaſonleſſe minde I am reſolued: For all thoſe which were created mortall, as birds beaſts, and the like, are left to their naturall appetites, ouer all which, celeſtiall bodies (as inſtruments and Executioners of Gods prouidence) haue abſolute dominion. What we ſhould iudge of men, who little differ from beaſts, I cannot tell: for as he that contendeth againſt thoſe inforcements, may eaſily maſter or reſiſt them: ſo whoſoeuer ſhall neglect the remedies by vertue and pietie prepared, putteth himſelfe altogether vnder the power of his ſenſuall appetite; Vincitur fatum ſi reſiſtas, vincit ſi contempſeris: Fate will be ouercome, if thou reſiſt it, if thou neglect, it conquereth.

But that either the Starres or the Sunne haue any power ouer the minds of men immediately, it is abſurd to thinke, other then as aforeſaid, as the ſame by the bodies temper may be effected. Lumen ſolis ad generationem ſenſibilium corporum confert, &

Hex. lib. 4. de-term. 3.

But howſoeuer wee are by the Starres inclined at our birth, yet there are many things both in Nature and Art, that encounter the ſame, and weaken their operation: and Ariſtotle himſelfe confeſſeth, that the Heauens doe not alwayes worke their effects in inferiour bodies, no more then the ſignes of raine and wind doe alwaies come to paſſe. And it is diuers times ſeene, that paternall vertue and vice hath his counter-working to theſe inclinations. Eſt in Iuuencis patrum virtus; In the young off-ſpring the Fathers vertue is, and ſo the contrary, patrum vitia: and herein alſo there is often found an enterchange; the Sonnes of vertuous men, by an ill conſtellation become inclinable to vice, and of vicious men, to vertue.

Hor. lib. 4. Od. 4. 30.

Egregia eſt ſoboles, ſceleratо nata parente.

A worthy ſonne is borne of a wicked father.

But there is nothing (after Gods reſerued power) that ſo much ſetteth this art of influence out of ſquare and rule, as education doth: for there are none in the world ſo wickedly inclined, but that a religious inſtruction and bringing vp may faſhion anew, and reforme them; nor any ſo well diſpoſed, whom (the reines being let looſe) the continuall fellowſhip and familiaritie, and the examples of diſſolute men may not corrupt and deforme. Veſſels will euer retaine a ſauour of their firſt liquor: it being equally difficult eyther to clenſe the mind once corrupted, or to extinguiſh the ſweet ſauour of vertue firſt receiued, when the mind was yet tender, open, and eaſily ſeaſoned; but where a fauourable conſtellation (allowing that the Stars incline the will) and a vertuous education doe happily arriue, or the contrary in both, therby it is that men are found ſo exceeding vertuous or vicious, Heauen and Earth (as it were) running together, and agreeing in one: for as the ſeedes of vertue may by the art and huſbandry of Chriſtian counſaile produce better and more beautifull fruit, then the ſtrength of ſelfe-nature and kind could haue yeelded them; ſo the plants apt to grow wild, and to change themſelues into weedes, by being ſet in a ſoyle futable, and like themſelues, are made more vnſauoury and filled with poyſon. It was therefore truly affirmed, Sapiens adiuuabit opus aſtrorum, quemadmodum agricola terræ naturam; A wiſe man aſſiſteth the worke of the Starres, as the Husbandman helpeth the nature of the ſoile. And Ptolomie himſelfe confeſſeth thus much, Sapiens, & omina ſapientis medici dominabuntur aſtris, A wiſeman, and the ominous art of a wiſe Phyſician ſhall preuaile againſt the Starres. Laſtly, wee ought all to know, that GOD created the Starres, as he did the reſt of the Vniuerſall, whoſe influences may be called his reſerued and vnwritten Lawes. But let vs conſider how they bind: euen as the Lawes of men doe; for although the Kings and Princes of the world haue by their Lawes decreed, that a Thiefe and a murderer ſhall ſuffer death; and though their Ordinances are daily by Iudges and Magiſtrates (the Starres of Kings) executed accordingly, yet theſe Lawes doe not depriue Kings of their naturall or religious compaſſion, or bind them without prerogatiue, to ſuch a ſeuere execution, as that there ſhould bee nothing left of libertie to iudgement, power, or conſcience: the Law in his owne nature being no other then a deafe Tyrant. But ſeeing that it is otherwiſe, and that Princes (who ought to imitate God in all they can) doe ſometimes for cauſes to themſelues knowne, and by mediation, pardon offences both againſt others and themſelues, it were then impious to take that power and libertie from God himſelfe, which his Subſtitutes enioy; God being mercy, goodneſſe, and charitie it ſelfe. Otherwiſe that example of Prayer by our Sauiour taught; And let vs not bee led vnto temptation, but deliuer vs from euill, had beene no other but an expence of words and time; but that God (which only knoweth the operation of his owne creatures truely) hath aſſured vs, that there is no inclination or temptation ſo forcible, which our humble Prayers and deſires may not make fruſtrate, and breake aſunder: for were it (as the Stoicks conceiue) that Fate or Deſtinie, though depending vpon eternall power, yet being once ordered and diſpoſed, had ſuch a connexion and immutable dependencie, that God himſelfe ſhould in a kind haue ſhut vp himſelfe therein: How miſerable then were the condition of men (ſayth Saint AVGVSTINE) left altogether without hope! Mat.6.13.

And if this ſtrength of the Starres were ſo transfer'd, as that God had quitted vnto them all dominion ouer his creatures; be he Pagan or Chriſtian that ſo beleeueth, the only true God of the one, and the imaginary gods of the other would thereby be deſpoyled of all worſhip, reuerence, or reſpect.

And ceatainely, GOD which hath promiſed vs the reward of wel-doing, which Chriſt himſelfe claimed at the hands of the Father, (I haue finiſhed the worke which thou gaueſt mee to doe.) And the ſame God, who hath threatned vnto vs the ſorrow and torment of offences, could not contrary to his mercifull nature be ſo vniuſt, as to bind vs ineuitably to the Deſtinies, or influences of the Starres, or ſubiect our ſoules to any impoſed neceſſitie. But it was well ſayd of Plotinus, that the Stars were ſignificant, but not efficient, giuing them yet ſomething leſſe then their due: and therefore as I doe not conſent with thoſe, who would make thoſe glorious creatures of God vertueleſſe: ſo I think that we derogate from his eternal and abſolute power and prouidence, to aſcribe to them the ſame dominion ouer our immortall ſoules, which they haue ouer all bodily ſubſtances, and periſhable natures: for the ſoules of men, louing and fearing God, receiue influence from that diuine light it ſelfe, whereof the Sunnes claritie, and that of the Stars is by Plato called but a ſhadow. Lumen eſt vmbra Dei, & Deus eſt lumen luminis; Light is the ſhadow of Gods brightneſſe, who is the light of light: But to end this queſtion, becauſe this Deſtinie, together with Prouidence, Preſcience, and Predeſtination are often confounded, I thinke it not impertinent to touch the difference in a word or two, for euery man hath not obſerued it, though all learned men haue. Ioh.18.4. Plat.pol.6. Ficin. in l.7. pol.

§. XII.

Of Preſcience.

PReſcience, or fore-knowledge (which the Greekes call Prognoſis, the Latines præcognitio, or præſcientia) conſidered in order and nature (if we may ſpeake of God after the manner of men) goeth before Prouidence: for God fore-knew all things, before hee had created them, or before they had being to be cared for; and Preſcience is no other then an infallible fore-knowledge. For whatſoeuer our ſelues fore-know, except the ſame be to ſucceede accordingly, it cannot be true that we fore-know it. But this Preſcience of God (as it is Preſcience onely) is not the cauſe of any thing futurely ſucceeding: neither doth Gods fore-knowledge impoſe any neceſſity, or binde. For in that we fore-know that the Sunne will riſe, and ſet; that all men borne in the world ſhall die againe; that after Winter, the Spring ſhall come; after the Spring Summer and Harueſt, and that according to the ſeuerall ſeedes that we ſow, we ſhall reape ſeuerall ſorts of graine, yet is not our fore-knowledge the cauſe of this, or any of theſe: neither doth the knowledge in vs binde or conſtraine the Sunne to riſe and ſet, or men to die; for the cauſes (as men perſwade themſelues) are otherwiſe manifeſt and knowne to all. The eye of man (ſaith BOETIVS) beholdeth thoſe things ſubiect to sense, as they are; the eye seeth that such a beast is a horse, it seeth men, trees, and houses, &c. but our seeing of them (as they are) is not the cause of their so being, for such they bee in their owne natures. And againe out of the same Authour; Diuina prouidentia rebus generandis non imponit necessitatem, quid si omnia euenirent ex necessitate, præmia bonorum, & pœna malorum periret; Diuine prouidence (sayth he) imposeth no necessitie vpon things that are to exist, for if all came to passe of necessitie, there should neyther be reward of good, nor punishment of euill.

§. XIII.

Of Prouidence.

NOw Prouidence (which the Greekes call Pronoia) is an intellectuall knowledge, both fore-seeing, caring for, and ordering all things, and doth not onely behold all past, all present, and all to come, but is the cause of their so being, which Prescience (simply taken) is not: and therefore Prouidence by the Philosophers (saith Saint Augustine) is deuided into Memory, Knowledge, and Care: Memory of the past, Knowledge of the present, and Care of the future; and we our selues account such a man for prouident, as, remembring things past, and obseruing things present, can by iudgement, and comparing the one with the other, prouide for the future, and times succeeding. That such a thing there is as Prouidence, the Scriptures euery-where teach vs, Moses in many places, the Prophets in their Predictions: Christ himselfe and his Apostles assure vs hereof; and, besides the Scriptures, Hermes, Orpheus, Euripides, Pythagoras, Plato, Plotinus, and (in effect) all learned men acknowledge the Prouidence of God: yea, the Turkes themselues are so confident therein, as they refuse not to accompany and visit each other, in the most pestilent diseases, nor shun any perill whatsoeuer, though death therein doe manifestly present it selfe.

The places of Scripture prooving Prouidence, are so many, both in generall and particular, as I shall need to repeat but a few of them in this place. Sing vnto God (sayth DAVID) which couereth the Heauens with cloudes, and prepareth raine for the earth, and maketh the grasse to grow vpon the Mountaines, which giueth to beasts their food, and feedeth the young Rauen that cryes: all these wait vpon thee, that thou maiest giue them food in due season. And thou shalt drinke of the Riuer Cheareth (sayth God to ELIAH) and I haue commanded the Rauens to feed thee there. Behold, the Fowles of the Ayre, they sow not, nor reape, and yet your heauenly Father feedeth them: againe, are not two Sparrowes sold for a farthing? and one of them shall not fall on the ground without your Father: yea all the haires of your head are numbred: And Saint PETER, Cast all your care on him, for he careth for you; And his iudgements are written (sayth DAVID.)

Psal. 147. 8. 9. Psal. 104. 27. 145. 15. 1. Reg. 17. 4. Mat. 6. 26. Luke 12. 6. 7. 1. Pet. 5. 7. Psal. 36. 6.

God therefore, who is euery-where present, who filleth the Heauens and the Earth, whose eyes are vpon the righteous, and his countenance against them that doe euill, was therefore by Orpheus called, oculus infinitus, an infinite eye, beholding all things, and cannot therefore be esteemed as an idle looker on, as if he had transferred his power to any other: for it is contrary to his owne Word: Gloriam meam alteri non dabo: I will not giue my glory to another. No man commandeth in the Kings presence, but by the Kings direction; but God is euery-where present, and King of Kings. The example of Gods vniuersall Prouidence is seene in his creatures. The Father prouideth for his children: beasts and birds and all liuings for their young ones. If Prouidence be found in second Fathers, much more in the first and Vniuersall: and if there be a naturall louing care in men, and beasts, much more in God, who hath formed this nature, and whose Diuine loue was the beginning, and is the bond of the Vniuersall: Amor diuinus rerum omnium est principium, & vinculum vniuersi (saith PLATO.) Amor Dei est nodus perpetuus, mundi copula, partiumq; eius immobile sustentaculum, ac

vniuerſæ machinæ fundamentum; The loue of God is the perpetuall knot, and linke or chayne of the world, and the immoueable piller of euery part thereof, and the Baſis and foundation of the vniuerſall. God therefore who could only be the cauſe of all, can onely prouide for all, and ſuſtayne all; ſo as to abſolute power; to euery-where preſence; to perfect goodneſſe; to pure and diuine loue; this attribute and tranſcendent habilitie of Prouidence is only proper and belonging. Ioh.ep.1.c.4.v.8 God is loue.

§. XIIII.

Of Predeſtination.

NOw for Predeſtination; we can difference it no otherwiſe, from Prouidence and Preſcience, then in this, that Preſcience only fore-ſeeth: Prouidence fore-ſeeth and careth for, and hath reſpect to al creatures, euen from the brighteſt Angels of heauen, to the vnworthieſt wormes of the earth, and Predeſtination (as it is vſed ſpecially by Diuines) is only of men, and yet not of all to men belonging, but of their ſaluation properly, in the common vſe of Diuines, or perdition, as ſome haue vſed it. Yet Peter Lombard, Thomas, Bernenſis Theologus, and others, take the word Predeſtination more ſtrictly, and for a preparation to felicitie: diuers of the Fathers take it more largely ſometimes: among whom S. Auguſtine ſpeaking of two Cities, and two Societies, vſeth theſe wordes, Quarum eſt vna, quæ prædeſtinata eſt in æternum regnare cum Deo, altera æternum ſupplicium ſubire cum Diabolo; Whereof one is it, which is predeſtinated to raigne for euer with God, but the other is to vndergoe euerlaſting torment with the Deuill: for according to NONIVS MARCELLVS, deſtinare eſt præparare; and of the ſame opinion are many Proteſtant writers, as Caluin, Beza, Buchanus, Danæus, and ſuch like: and as for the manifold queſtions hereof ariſing, I leaue them to the Diuines; and why it hath pleaſed God to create ſome veſſels of honor, and ſome of diſhonor, I will anſwere with Gregorie, who ſaith, Qui in facti is Dei rationem non videt, infirmitatem ſuam conſiderans, cur non videat, rationem videt; He that ſeeth no reaſon in the actions of God, by conſideration of his owne infirmitie perceiueth the reaſon of his blindneſſe. And againe with S. AVGVSTINE, Occulta eſſe cauſa poteſt, iniuſta eſſe non poteſt; Hidden the cauſe of his Predeſtination may be, vniuſt it cannot be.

§. XV.

Of Fortune: and of the reaſon of ſome things that ſeeme to be by fortune, and againſt Reaſon and Prouidence.

LAſtly, ſeeing Deſtinie or Neceſſitie is ſubſequent to Gods prouidence, and ſeeing that the Starres haue no other dominion, then is before ſpoken, and that Nature is nothing, but as Plato calleth it, Dei artem, vel artificioſam Dei Organum; The art, or artificiall Organ of God: and CVSANVS, Diuini præcepti inſtrumentum; The inſtrument of the diuine precept: we may then with better reaſon reiect that kinde of Idolatrie, or God of fooles, called Fortune or Chance: a Goddeſſe, the moſt reuerenced, and the moſt reuiled of all other, but not ancient; for Homer maketh her the Daughter of Oceanus, as Pauſanias witneſſeth in his Meſſeniacks. The Greekes call her τύχη, ſignifying a relatiue being, or betiding, ſo as before Homers time this great Lady was ſcarce heard of; and Heſiodus, who hath taught the birth and beginning of all theſe counterfait gods, hath not a word of Fortune: yet afterward ſhee grew ſo great and omnipotent, as from Kings

Kings and Kingdomes, to Beggers and Cottages, she ordered all things, resisting the wisdome of the wisest, by making the Possessor thereof miserable: valuing the folly of the most foolish by making their successe prosperous, insomuch as the actions of men were said to be but the sports of Fortune, and the variable accidents happening in mens liues, but her pastimes: of which PALLADIVS, Vita hominum ludus fortunæ est; The life of man is the play of Fortune: and because it often falleth out, that enterprises guided by ill counsels haue equall successe to those by the best iudgement conducted, therefore had Fortune the same externall figure with Sapience: whereof Athenæus:

Aur.vict.de pertinace Sen.ep.74 Demetrius Poliorcetes in the great & often changes of his Fortune, is said to haue vsed to cry out vpon Fortune, applying to her a Verse of Æschylus, Tu me extulisti, eadem me is (sentio) perditum.

Longissimè à Sapientia Fors dissidet,
Sed multa perficit tamen simillima.

From Wisedome Fortune differs farre,
And yet in workes most like they are.

But I will forbeare to be curious in that, which (as it is commonly vnderstood) is nothing else but a power imaginarie, to which the successe of humane actions and endeuours were for their varietie ascribed; for when a manifest cause could not be giuen, then was it attributed to Fortune, as if there were no cause of those things, of which most men are ignorant, contrary to this true ground of PLATO: Nihil est ortum sub Sole, cuius causa legitima non præcesserit; Nothing euer came to passe vnder the Sunne, of which there was not a iust preceding cause. But Aquinas hath herein answered in one distinction, whatsoeuer may be obiected; for many things there are (saith he) which happen, besides the intention of the Inferior, but not besides the intention of the Superior; Præter intentionem inferioris, sed non præter intentionem superioris, (to wit) the ordinance of God; and therefore (saith MELANCHTON) Quod Poeta fortunam, nos Deum appellamus; Whom the Poets call Fortune, we know to be God, and that this is true, the Scripture in many places teacheth vs, as in the law of Murder. He that smiteth a man, and he die, shall die the death, and if a man hath not laid waite, but God hath offered him into his hands, then I will appoint thee a place whither he shall flee. Now, where the Scripture hath these wordes, God hath offered him into his hands, we say, if he hurt him by Chance: and in Deuteronomie the nineteenth, where the slipping of an Axe from the helue, whereby another is slaine, was the worke of God himselfe, we in our phrase attribute this accident to Chance or Fortune: and in the Prouerbs the sixteenth, The lot is cast into the lap, but the whole disposition thereof is of the Lord: so as that which seemeth most casuall and subiect to Fortune, is yet disposed by the ordinance of God, as all things else; and hereof the wiser sort, and the best learned of the Philosophers were not ignorant, as Cicero witnesseth for them, gathering the opinion of Aristotle and his Sectators, with those of Plato, and the Academikes to this effect, That the same power which they called animam mundi; The soule of the world, was no other then that incomprehensible wisdome, which we expresse by the name of God, gouerning euery being aswell in heauen as in earth; to which wisedome and power they sometime gaue the title of Necessitie or Fate, because it bindeth by inexuitable ordinance: sometime, the stile of Fortune, because of many effects there appeare vnto vs no certaine causes. To this effect speaketh S. Augustine in his questions vpon Genesis the first Booke: the same hath Seneca in his fourth of Benefits; which was also the doctrine of the Stoicks, of which Sect he was: For whatsoeuer (saith he) thou callest God, be it Nature, Fate, or Fortune, all are but one and the same, differenced by diuers termes, according as he vseth, and exerciseth his power diuersly.

Cic.ac.quæst.l.1.

Senec.l.4.c.7.

But it may be obiected, that if Fortune and Chance were not sometimes the causes of good and euill in men, but an idle voice, whereby we expresse successe, how comes it then, that so many worthy and wise men depend vpon so many vnworthy and and emptie-headed fooles; that riches and honor are giuen to externall men, and without kernell: and ſo many learned, vertuous, and valiant men weare out their liues in poore and deiected eſtates. In a word there is nō other inferior, or apparent cauſe, beſide the partialitie of mans affection, but the faſhioning and not faſhioning of our ſelues according to the nature of the time wherein we liue, for whoſoeuer is moſt able, and beſt ſufficient to diſcerne, and hath withall an honeſt and open heart and louing truth, if Princes, or thoſe that gouerne, endure nō other diſcourſe then their owne flatteries, then I ſay ſuch an one, whoſe vertue and courage forbiddeth him to be baſe and a diſſembler, ſhall euermore hang vnder the wheele, which kind of deſeruing well and receiuing ill, we alwayes falſly charge Fortune withall. For whoſoeuer ſhall tell any great Man or Magiſtrate, that he is not iuſt, the Generall of an Armie, that he is not valiant, and great Ladies that they are not faire, ſhall neuer be made a Counſeller, a Captayne, or a Courtier. Neither is it ſufficient to be wiſe with a wiſe Prince, valiant with a valiant, and iuſt with him that is iuſt, for ſuch a one hath no eſtate in his proſperitie; but he muſt alſo change with the ſucceſſor, if he be of contrary qualities, ſaile with the tyde of the time, and alter forme and condition, as the Eſtate or the Eſtates Maſter changeth: Otherwiſe how were it poſſible, that the moſt baſe men, and ſeparate from all imitable qualities, could ſo often attayne to honor and riches, but by ſuch an obſeruant ſlauiſh courſe? Theſe men hauing nothing elſe to value themſelues by, but a counterfait kinde of wondring at other men, and by making them beleeue that all their vices are vertues, and all their duſtie actions criſtalline, haue yet in all ages proſpered equally with the moſt vertuous, if not exceeded them. For according to MENANDER, Omnis inſipiens arrogantia & plauſibus capitur; Euery foole is wonne with his owne pride, and others flattering applauſe: ſo as whoſoeuer will liue altogether out of himſelfe, and ſtudie other mens humours, and obſerue them, ſhall neuer be vnfortunate; and on the contrary, that man which prizeth truth and vertue (except the ſeaſon wherein he liueth be of all theſe, and of all ſorts of goodneſſe fruitfull) ſhall neuer proſper by the poſſeſſion or profeſſion thereof. It is alſo a token of a worldly wiſe man, not to warre or contend in vaine againſt the nature of times wherein he liueth: for ſuch a one is often the authour of his owne miſerie, but beſt it were to follow the aduice, which the Pope gaue the Biſhops of that age, out of Ouid, while the Arian Hereſie raged:

Dùm furor in curſu eſt, currenti cede furori. Ouid. rem. am. lib. 1.

While furie gallops on the way,
Let no man furies gallop ſtay.

And if Cicero (then whom that world begat not a man of more reputed iudgement) had followed the counſaile of his brother QVINTVS, Potuiſſet (ſaith PETRARCH) in lectulo ſuo mori, potuiſſet integro cadauere ſepeliri; He might then haue dyed the death of nature, and beene with an vntorne and vndiſſeuered body buryed; for as Petrarch in the ſame place noteth: Quid ſtultius quàm deſperantem (præſertim de effectu) litibus perpetuis implicari; What more fooliſh then for him that deſpaires, eſpecially of the effect, to be entangled with endleſſe contentions? Whoſoeuer therefore will ſet before him MACHIAVELS two markes to ſhoote at (to wit) riches, and glorie, muſt ſet on and take off a back of yron to a weake woodden Bow, that it may fit both the ſtrong and the feeble: for as he, that firſt deuiſed to adde ſayles to rowing veſſells, did either ſo proportion them, as being faſtened aloft, and towards the head of his Maſt, he might abide all windes and ſtormes, or elſe he ſometime or other periſhed by his owne inuention: ſo that man which prizeth vertue for it ſelfe, & cannot endure to hoiſe and ſtrike his ſailes, as the diuers natures of calmes & ſtormes require, muſt cut his ſailes, and his cloth, of meane length and breadth, and content himſelfe with a ſlow and ſure nauigation, (to wit) a meane and free eſtate. But of this diſpute of Fortune, and the the rest, or of whatsoeuer Lords or Gods, imaginarie powers, or causes, the wit (or rather foolishnesse) of man hath found out: let vs resolue with S. Paul, who hath taught vs, that there is but one God, the Father, of whom are all things, and we in him, and one Lord, Iesus Christ, by whom are all things, and we by him; there are diuersities of operations, but God is the same which worketh all in all.

CHAP. II.

Of mans estate in his first Creation, and of Gods rest.

§. I.

Of the Image of God, according to which man was first created.

THE creation of all other creatures being finished, the heauens adorned, and the earth repleniſhed, GOD said, Let vs make man in our owne Image, according to our likenesse.

Gen.1.26.

Man is the last and most admirable of Gods workes to vs knowne, ingens miraculum homo, Man is the greatest wonder (saith PLATO out of MERCVRIVS:) Naturæ ardentissimæ artificium, The artificiall worke of the most ardent or fire-like nature (as saith Zoroaster) though the same be meant, not for any excellencie externall, but in respect of his internal forme, both in the nature, qualities, and other attributes thereof: in nature, because it hath an essence immortall, and spirituall; in qualities, because the same was by God created holy and righteous in truth; in other attributes, because Man was made Lord of the world, and of the creatures therein.

More holy then the rest, and vnderstanding more
A liuing creature wants, to rule all made before,
So man began to be.

Of this Image and similitude of God, there is much dispute among the Fathers, Schoole-men, and late Writers: Some of the Fathers conceiue, that man was made after the Image of God, in respect chiefly of Empire & Dominion, as S. Chrysostome, Ambrose, and some others: which Saint Ambrose denyeth to the woman in these wordes, Vt sicut Deus vnus, ab eo fieret homo vnus, & quomodò ex Deo vno omnia, ità ex vno homine omne genus esset super faciem totius terræ: Vnus igitur vnum fecit, qui vnitatis eius haberet imaginem; That as God is one, one man might be made by him, and that in what manner all things are of one God, likewise of one man the whole kinde should be vpon the face of the whole earth: Therefore he being one made one, that should haue the Image of his vnitie. But whereas it is gathered out of the following wordes of the same ſame Verſe, that man was after the image of God in reſpect of rule and power, it is written Dominamini in the plurall number, and let them rule ouer the fiſh in the Sea, &c. and therefore cannot the woman be excluded. Others conceiue, that man is ſaid to be after the image of God in reſpect of his immortall ſoule only, becauſe as God is inuiſible, ſo the ſoule of man is inuiſible, as God is immortall and incorporall, ſo is the ſoule of man immortall and incorporall; and as there is but one God which gouerneth the world, ſo but one ſoule which gouerneth the body of man; and as God is wholly in euery part of the world, ſo is the ſoule of man wholly in euery part of the body: Anima eſt tota in toto, & tota in qualibet parte; The ſoule is wholly in the whole body, and wholly in euery part thereof, according to Ariſtotle; though Chalcidius, and other learned men denie that doctrine; which that it is otherwiſe then potentially true, all the Ariſtotelians in the world ſhall neuer proue. Theſe and the like arguments doe the Iewes make (ſaith Toſtatus) and theſe reſemblances, betweene the infinite God, and the finite Man.

The Schoole-men reſemble the Minde or Soule of Man to God, in this reſpect eſpecially; becauſe that as in the Minde there are three diſtinct powers, or faculties, (to wit) Memorie, Vnderſtanding, and Will, and yet all theſe, being of reall differences, are but one minde: ſo in God there are three diſtinct perſons, the Father, Sonne, and holy Ghoſt, and yet but one God. They alſo make the Image and Similitude diuers; and againe, they diſtinguiſh betweene imaginem Dei, and ad imaginem Dei, and ſpinne into ſmall threds, with ſubtile diſtinctions, many times the plaineneſſe, and ſinceritie of the Scriptures: their wits being like that ſtrong water, that eateth through and diſſolueth the pureſt gold. Victorinus alſo maketh the image of God to be ſubſtantiall, but not the ſimilitude: ſed in ſubſtantia nomen qualitatis declaratiuum; A word-declaring qualitie in the ſubſtance. Out of which wordes, and that which followeth, it is infer'd, that as the image and ſimilitude doe greatly differ: ſo the ſinnefull ſoule doth not therefore leaue to be the image of God; but it hath not his ſimilitude, except it be holy and righteous. S. Auguſtine alſo againſt Adimantus the Manichee affirmeth, that by ſinne, the perfection of this image is loſt in man, and in his Retractations maintayneth the ſame opinion, and alſo affirmeth that the Similitude is more largely taken, then the Image.

But howſoeuer the Schoole-men and others diſtinguiſh, or whatſoeuer the Fathers conceiue, ſure I am that S. Paul maketh the ſame ſenſe of the image, which Victorinus doth of the ſimilitude, who ſaith: As we haue borne the image of the earthly, ſo ſhall we beare the image of the heauenly; and it cannot be gathered out of the Scriptures, that the wordes image and ſimilitude were vſed but in one ſenſe, and in this place the better to expreſſe each other; whatſoeuer Lombard hath ſaid to the contrary. For God knowes, what a multitude of meanings the wit of man imagineth to himſelfe in the Scriptures, which neither Moſes, the Prophets, or Apoſtles, euer conceiued. Now as S. Paul vſeth the word (image) for both: ſo S. Iames vſeth the word (ſimilitude) for both in theſe wordes: Therewith bleſſe we God euen the Father, and therewith curſe we Men, which are made after the ſimilitude of God: Howſoeuer therefore S. Auguſtine ſeemeth, out of a kinde of elegancy in writing, to make ſome difference, as where he writeth, Confitemur imaginem in æternitate, ſimilitudinem in moribus inueniri; We confeſſe that this image is found in eternitie, but his ſimilitude in manners, that is, in the ſpirituall diſpoſitions and qualities of the minde, yet thus he elſewhere ſpeaketh plainely: Quaſi verò poſſit eſſe imago aliqua in qua ſimilitudo non ſit: ſi enim omninò ſimilis non eſt, procùl dubio nec imago eſt; As if (ſaith he) there could be any image, where the ſimilitude is not: no, out of doubt, where there is no likeneſſe, there is no image. The very wordes of the Text make this moſt manifeſt, as, Let vs make man in our image, according to our likeneſſe: which is, Let vs make man in our image, that he may be like vs; and in the next Verſe following, God himſelfe maketh it plaine, for there he vſeth the word (image) only, as thus: God created the man in his image, in the image of God created he him. And to take away all diſpute or ambiguitie, in the Zanchius laboureth to proue, that man was formed after the image of God, both in body and minde: Nulla pars in homine quæ non fuerit huiusce imaginis particeps, No

*Zanch. de op. Dei l.*3. *c.*1. part in a man (saith he) which was not participating Gods image: for God said, Let vs make man according to our owne image. But the soule alone is not man, but the Hypostasis or whole man compounded of body and soule. The body of man (saith he) is the Image of the world, and called therefore Microcosmus; but the Idea and exemplar of the world was first in God, so that man, according to his body must needs be the image of God. Against which opinion of this learned man, his owne obiection seemeth to me sufficient, where he alleageth, that it may be said, that Moses spake by the figure Synecdoche, as when a man is called a mortall man, yet is not the whole man mortall, but the body only: so when God said, Let vs make man after our image, he meant the soule of man, and not the body of earth and dust: Maledictus qui deitatem ad ho-
In Gen. minis lineamenta refert (saith S. AVGVSTINE,) Cursed is he that referreth the Deitie of God to the lineaments of mans body. Deus enim non est humanæ formæ particeps, neque corpus humanum diuinæ (saith PHILO,) God is not partaker of humane forme, nor humane body of the forme diuine: The Hebrew word for image is Tselem, which signifieth a shaddow or obscure resemblance: In imagine pertransit homo; Man passeth away in a shaddow: Let vs then know and consider, that God, who is eternall and infinite, hath not any bodily shape or composition, for it is both against his Nature & his Word; an error of the Anthropomorphitæ, against the very essence and Maiestie of God.

Surely Cicero, who was but a Heathen, had yet a more diuine vnderstanding then these grosse Heretikes: Ad similitudinem Dei propius accedebat humana virtus, quàm figura; The vertue which is in man (saith he) came neerer the similitude of God, then the figure. For God is a spirituall substance, inuisible, and most simple; God is a iust God: God is Mercifull: God is Charitie it selfe, and (in a word) Goodnesse it selfe, and none else simply good. And thus much it hath pleased God himselfe to teach vs, and to make vs know of himselfe. What then can be the shadow of such a substance, the image of such a nature, or wherin can man be said to resemble his vnexcogitable
*Eph.*6.12. power and perfectnesse? certainely, not in dominion alone: for the Deuill is said to
*Io.*18.36. be the Prince of this world, and the Kingdome of Christ was not thereof, who was the true and perfect image of his Father; neither, because man hath an immortall soule, and therein the faculties of Memorie, Vnderstanding, and Will, for the Deuils
Plat. in Cratyl. are also immortall, and participate those faculties, being called Dæmones, because scientes of Knowledge, and subtility; neither because we are reasonable creatures, by which we are distinguished from beasts: for who haue rebelled against God? who haue made Gods of the vilest beasts, of Serpents, of Cats, of Owles, yea, euen of shamefull parts, of lusts and pleasures, but reasonable men? Yet doe I not condemne *Osorius de Iust. lib.*5. the opinion of S. Chrysostome and Ambrose, as touching dominion, but that, in respect thereof, man was in some sort after the image of God, if we take Dominion, such as it ought to be, that is, accompanyed with Iustice and Pietie: for God did not onely make man a Ruler and Gouernor ouer the Fishes of the Sea, the Fowles of Heauen (or of the aire) and ouer the Beasts of the Field; but God gaue vnto man a dominion ouer men, he appointed Kings to gouerne them, and Iudges, to iudge them in equitie. Neither doe I exclude Reason, as it is the abilitie of Vnderstanding. For I doe not conceiue, that Irenæus did therefore call man, the image of God, because he was animal rationale only; but that he vnderstood it better, with SYBILLA: Imago mea est homo, rectam rationem habens: Man, that is endued with right reason, is said to resemble God, (that is) by right reason to know and confesse God his Creatour, and the same God to serue, loue, and obey: and therefore said Saint Augustine (who herein came neerer the Truth) Fecit Deus hominem ad imaginem & similitudinem suam in mente God made man, in respect of the intellect, after his owne Image and similitude; and REYNERIVS; Homo, quòd habet mentem, factus est ad imaginem Dei, Man was made after the Image of God, in minde, or in that he had a minde. §. II.

Of the intellectuall mind of man, in which there is much of the Image of God: and that this Image is much deformed by sinne.

BVT Mens is not taken here for anima physica, according to Aristotle, which is forma, vel natura hominis: The forme or nature of man; but this facultie or gift of God, called Mens, is taken for prima vis animi, the principall strength of the minde, or soule, cuius actus est perpetua veritatis contemplatio; whose act, exercise, or office, is the perpetuall contemplation of truth; and therefore it is also called intellectus diuinus, intellectus contemplatiuus, & anima contemplatiua, A diuine vnderstanding, and an intellect or minde contemplatiue. Est autem mens nostra (saith CVSANVS) vis comprehendendi, & totum virtuale ex omnibus comprehendendi virtutibus compositum: Our intellectuall minde (saith hee) is a power of comprehending, euen the whole, that is in this kind powerfull, compounded of all the powers of comprehension: vnto which Mercurius attributeth so much (if his meaning accompany his words) that he esteemeth it to be the very essence of God (which was also the errour of the Manichees and others) and no otherwise separate from God (sayth hee) then the light from the Sunne: for this Mens or vnderstanding (sayth MERCVRIVS) est Deus in hominibus: Is God in men, or rather (and which I take to be his meaning) is the image of God in man. For as the Sunne is not of the same essence or nature with the diuine light, but a body illightned, and an illumination created; so is this Mens or vnderstanding in men, not of the essence of Gods infinite vnderstanding, but a power and facultie of our soules the purest; or the lumen animæ rationalis, by the true and eternall light illightned. And this Mens others call animam animæ, The soule of the soule, or with S. Augustine, the eye of the soule, or receptacle of Sapience and diuine knowledge, quæ amorem sapientiæ tanquàm ducem sequitur, Which followeth after the loue of sapience as her guide (saith Philo) betweene which and reason, betweene which and the minde, called anima, betweene which and that power which the Latines call animus, there is this difference. Reason is that facultie by which wee iudge and discourse; Anima, by which we liue. Hereof it is said, Anima corpus animat, id est, viuificat; anima, or the soule is that which doth animate the body, that is, giueth it life: for death is the separation of body and soule; and the same strength (sayth Philo) which God the great Director hath in the World, the same hath this Anima, or mind, or soule in man. Animus, is that, by which wee will and make election; and to this Basil agreeth, which calleth this Mens, or diuine vnderstanding, perspicacem animæ partem, the perceiuing part of the minde, or the light by which the Soule discerneth: dormientium mens, non anima, sopitur, & in furiosis mens extinguitur, anima manet, In men that sleep it is this (mens) or vnderstanding, and not the minde or soule, which resteth, during which time it is but habituall in wise men, and in mad men this (mens) is extinguished, and not the Soule: for mad men doe liue, though distract. Pamander. De mente. Idiota. l. 3. Sen. Ep. 65. f. & 31. f.

Therefore this word being often vsed for the Soule giuing life, is attributed abusiuely to mad men, when wee say that they are of a distract minde, in stead of a broken vnderstanding, which word (mind) we vse also for opinion, as, I am of this mind, or that minde: and ſometimes for mens conditions or vertues, as, hee is of an honeſt minde, or, a man of a iuſt minde: ſometimes for affection, as I doe this for my mindes ſake; and Ariſtotle ſometimes vſeth this word (Mens) for the phantaſie, which is the ſtrength of the imagination: ſometimes for the knowledge of principles, which we haue without diſcourſe: oftentimes for Spirits, Angels and Intelligences: but as it is vſed in the proper ſignification, including both the vnderſtanding agent & poſſible, it is deſcribed to be a pure, ſimple, ſubſtantiall act, not depending vpon matter, but hauing relation to that, which is intelligible, as to his firſt obiect: or more at large thus; a part or particle of the Soule, whereby it doth vnderſtand, not depending vpon matter, nor needing any organ, free from paſſion comming from without, and apt to bee diſſeuered, as, eternall from that which is mortall. Hereof excellently MERCVRIVS: Anima eſt imago mentis, mens imago Dei. Deus menti præeſt, mens animæ, anima corpori; The Soule (meaning that which giueth life) is the Image of this vnderſtanding, or Mens, and this (Mens) or vnderſtanding is the Image of God. God is Preſident or Ruler ouer this vnderſtanding, this vnderſtanding ouer the Soule, and this Soule ouer the bodie. This diuiſion and diſtinction out of the Platonikes and Peripatetikes, I leaue to the Reader to iudge of. That, Mens humana hath no need of any organ, Marſilius Ficinus in his ninth Booke of the Soules immortalitie laboureth to proue. Zanchius doth not differ from Ficinus in words, for (ſayth hee) ad facultatem intelligentem exercendam non eget Mens organo, tanquàm medio, per quod intelligat, quanquàm eget obiecto in quod intueatur, & ex quo intellectionem concipiat: hoc autem obiectum ſunt phantaſmata, ſeù rerum à ſenſibus perceptarum ſimulachra ad phantaſiam prolata, To exerciſe the facultie of vnderſtanding, the mind of man (ſayth hee) needeth no inſtrument, as a meane, by which it may vnderſtand: but it needeth an obiect, whereon to looke, and whence to conceiue the act of vnderſtanding. This obiect are the phantaſmes, or the reſemblances of things receiued from the ſenſe, and carried to the phantaſie: But in effect his concluſion ſeemeth to carry a contrarie ſenſe, when he maketh the Phantaſie, in repreſenting the obiect to the vnderſtanding, to be a corporall Organum; neither can it be vnderſtood to be an Organum of any thing; but of the vnderſtanding. And he addeth that the reſemblance of things in mans imagination, are to his vnderſtanding and minde, as colours are to the ſight: whence it ſo followeth, that the imagination or phantaſie it ſelfe is to the facultie of vnderſtanding, as the eye is to the facultie of ſeeing, and as this is an Organum: ſo that. Of this queſtion, How the Mind in all her actions maketh vſe of the body, and hath communion with the body, I referre the Reader to a moſt graue and learned Diſcourſe in the laſt Reply of Maſter Doctor Bilſon, late Biſhop of Wincheſter, vnto Henry Iacob. Howſoeuer the Truth be determined, wee muſt conclude, that it is neither in reſpect of reaſon alone, by which wee diſcourſe, nor in reſpect of the minde it ſelfe, by which we liue, nor in reſpect of our ſoules ſimply, by which we are immortall, that we are made after the Image of God. But moſt ſafely may wee reſemble our ſelues to God, in mente, and in reſpect of that pure facultie which is neuer ſeparate from the contemplation and loue of God. Yet this is not all. For Saint Bernard maketh a true difference betweene the nature and faculties of the Minde or Soule, and betweene the infuſion of qualities, endowments and gifts of grace, wherewith it is adorned and enriched, which, being added to the nature, eſſence, and faculties, maketh it altogether to be after the Image of God, whoſe words are theſe: Non propterea imago Dei eſt, quia ſui meminit Mens, ſeq; intelligit & diligit (which was alſo the opinion of Saint AVGVSTINE) ſed quia poteſt meminiſſe, intelligere ac diligere eum à quo facta eſt, (that is) The minde (or Mens) was not therefore the Image of God, becauſe it remembreth, vnderſtandeth, and loueth it ſelfe, but becauſe it can remember, vnderſtand, and loue God, who created it. And, that this Image may bee deformed and made vnprofitable, heare BASIL: Homo ad imaginem & ſimilitudinem Dei factus eſt, peccatum verò imaginis huius pulchritudinem deformauit: & inutilem reddidit, dum animam corruptis concupiſcentiæ affectibus immerſit: Man was made after the Image and ſimilitude of GOD, but Sinne hath deformed the beautie of this Image, and made it it vnprofitable by drawing our minds into corrupt concupiscence.

It is not therefore (as aforesaid) by reason of Immortalitie, nor in Reason, nor in Dominion, nor in any one of these by it selfe, nor in all these ioyned, by any of which, or by all which wee resemble, or may be called the shadow of God, though by reason and vnderstanding, with the other faculties of the Soule, we are made capable of this print; but chiefly, in respect of the habit of Originall righteousnesse, most perfectly infused by God into the mind and Soule of man in his first Creation. For it is not by nature, nor by her liberalitie, that wee were printed with the seale of Gods Image (though Reason may be said to be of her gift, which ioyned to the soule is a part of the Essentiall constitution of our proper Species) but from the bountifull grace of the Lord of all goodnesse, who breathed life into Earth, and contriued within the Truncke of Dust and Clay, the inimitable habilitie of his owne Iustice, Pietie, and Righteousnesse.

So long therefore (for that resemblance which Dominion hath) doe those that are powerfull retaine the Image of God, as acording to his Commandements they exercise the Office of Magistracy to which they are called, and sincerely walke in the wayes of God, which in the Scriptures is called, walking with God; and all other men so long retaine this Image, as they feare, loue, and serue God truely, (that is) for the loue of God alone, and do not bruise and deface his Seale by the waight of manifold and voluntary offences, and obstinate sinnes. For the vniust minde cannot bee after the Image of God, seeing God is Iustice it selfe; The bloud-thirstie hath it not; for God is Charitie, and mercie it selfe: Falshood, cunning practice, and ambition, are properties of Sathan; and therefore cannot dwell in one soule, together with GOD; and to bee short, there is no likelihood betweene pure light and blacke darkenesse, betweene beautie and deformitie, or betweene righteousnesse and reprobation. And though Nature, according to common vnderstanding, haue made vs capable by the power of reason, and apt enough to receiue this Image of Gods goodnesse, which the sensuall soules of beasts cannot perceiue; yet were that aptitude naturall more inclinable to follow and imbrace the false and dureleſse pleasures of this Stage-play World, then to become the shadow of God by walking after him, had not the exceeding workmanship of Gods wisedome, and the liberalitie of his mercy, formed eyes to our soules, as to our bodies, which, piercing through the impuritie of our flesh, behold the Highest Heauens, and thence bring Knowledge and Obiect to the Mind and Soule, to contemplate the euer-during glory, and termeleſse ioy, prepared for those, which retaine the Image and similitude of their Creatour, preseruing vndefiled and vnrent the garment of the new man, which, after the Image of GOD, is created in Righteousnesse, and true Holinesse, as saith Saint Paul. Now, whereas it is thought by some of the Fathers, as by Saint Augustine, with whom Saint Ambrose ioyneth, that, by sinne, the perfection of the Image is lost, and not the Image it selfe; both opinions by this distinction may be well reconciled (to wit) that the Image of God, in man, may be taken two wayes; for eyther it is considered, according to naturall gifts, and consisteth therein: namely to haue a reasonable and vnderstanding nature, &c. and in this sense, the Image of God is more lost by sinne, then the very reasonable or vnderstanding nature, &c. is lost: (or sinne doth not abolish and take away these naturall gifts) or, the Image of God is considered, according to supernaturall gifts, namely, of Diuine grace, and heauenly glory, which is indeed the perfection and accomplishment of the naturall Image; and this manner of similitude and Image of God, is wholly blotted out and destroyed by sinne.

Of our base and fraile bodies: and that the care thereof should yeeld to the immortall Soule.

THE externall man God formed out of the dust of the Earth, or according to the signification of the word, Adam of Adamath, of red Earth, or, ex limo terræ, out of the slime of the Earth, or a mixed matter of Earth and Water. Non ex qualibet humo, sed ex ghaphar adamath (id est) ex pinguissima & mollissima: Not that God made an Image or Statue of Clay, but out of Clay, Earth or dust God formed and made flesh, bloud, and bone, with all parts of man.

Arias Mont. de nat. f. 156.

That Man was formed of Earth and Dust, did Abraham acknowledge, when in humble feare he called vnto God, to saue Sodome: Let not my Lord now be angry, if I speake, I, that am but dust and ashes: And in these houses of Clay, whose foundation is in the dust, doe our soules inhabite, according to Iob, and though our owne eyes doe euerywhere behold the sudden and resistlesse assaults of Death, and Nature assureth vs by neuer-failing experience, and Reason by infallible demonstration, that our times vpon the Earth haue neither certaintie nor durabilitie, that our Bodies are but the Anduiles of paine and diseases, and our Minds the Hiues of vnnumbred cares, sorrowes, and passions: and that (when we are most glorified) wee are but those painted posts, against which Enuie and Fortune direct their Darts; yet such is the true vnhappinesse of our condition, and the darke ignorance, which couereth the eyes of our vnderstanding, that wee only prize, pamper, and exalt this Vassall and Slaue of Death, and forget altogether (or only remember at our cast-away leisure) the imprisoned immortall Soule, which can neyther dye with the Reprobate, nor perish with the mortall parts of vertuous men: seeing Gods Iustice in the one, and his goodnesse in the other is exercised for euermore, as the euer-liuing subiects of his reward and punishment. But when is it that we examine this great accompt? neuer while wee haue one vanitie left vs to spend: we plead for Titles, till our breath faile vs; digge for Riches, while our strength enableth vs; exercise malice, while wee can reuenge; and then, when Time hath beaten from vs both youth, pleasure, and health, and that nature it selfe hateth the house of old age, we remember with Iob, that wee must goe the way from whence we shall not returne, and that our bed is made ready for vs in the darke; And then I say, looking ouer-late into the bottome of our conscience (which Pleasure and Ambition had locked vp from vs all our liues, we behold therein the feareful Images of our actions past, and withall, this terrible inscription: That God will bring euerie worke into iudgement, that man hath done vnder the Sunne.

But let vs not flatter our immortall ſoules herein: for to neglect God all our liues, and know that we neglect him, to offend God voluntarily, and know that we offend him, caſting our hopes on the Peace, which we truſt to make at parting, is no other then a rebellious preſumption, and (that which is the worſt of all) euen a contemptuous laughing to ſcorne, and deriding of God, his Lawes and Precepts. Fruſtrà ſperant, qui ſic de miſericordia Dei ſibi blandiuntur; They hope in vaine, ſayth BERNARD, which in this ſort flatter themſelues with Gods mercie. Bern. in Pſ. §. IIII.

Of the Spirit of life, which God breathed into man, in his Creation.

IN this frame and carcaſſe God breathed the breath of life; and the man was a liuing ſoule: (that is) God gaue to a Body of earth and of corruptible matter, a Soule ſpirituall and incorruptible; not that GOD had any ſuch bodily inſtruments as men vſe, but God breathed the Spirit of life and immortalitie into man, as he breatheth his grace daily into ſuch as loue and feare him. The Spirit of God (ſaith ELIHV in IOB) hath made me, and the breath of the Almightie hath giuen me life: In qua ſententia (ſaith RABANVS) vitanda eſt paupertas ſenſus carnalis, nè forte putemus Deum, vel manibus corporeis de limo formaſſe corpus hominis, vel faucibus aut labijs ſuis inſpirâſſe in faciem formati, vt viuere poſſit, & ſpiraculum vitæ habere: Nam & Propheta cùm ait, Manus tuæ fecerunt me, &c. Tropica hac locutione magis quàm propria, (id eſt) iuxta conſuetudinem, qua ſolent homines operari, loquutus eſt: In which ſentence (ſaith he) the beggerlineſſe of carnall ſenſe is to bee auoided, leſt perhaps we ſhould thinke, eyther that God with bodily hands made mans body of ſlime, or breathed with iawes or lips vpon his face (being formed) that hee might liue, and haue the ſpirit of life: for the Prophet alſo when he ſaith; Thy hands haue made me, ſpake this Tropically, rather then properly (that is) according to the cuſtome which men vſe in working. Quantum eſt periculi hijs, qui Scripturas ſenſu corporeo legunt? In what danger are they that read the Scriptures in a carnall ſenſe? By this breath was infuſed into man both life and ſoule; and therefore this (Soule) the Philoſophers call Animam, quæ viuificat corpus, & animat, Which doth animate, & giue life to the body. The inſpiration of the Almighty gineth vnderſtanding, ſaith Iob; and this ſpirit, which God breathed into man, which is the reaſonable ſoule of man, returneth againe to God that gaue it, as the body returneth vnto the Earth, out of which it was taken, according to Eccleſiaſtes: And duſt ſhall returne to the Earth, out of which it was taken, and the ſpirit ſhall returne to God that gaue it. Neither is this word (ſpirit) vſually otherwiſe taken in the Scriptures, then for the ſoule; as when Stephen cryed vnto God: Domine, ſuſcipe ſpiritum meum; Lord Ieſus, receiue my ſpirit: and in Saint IOHN, And Ieſus bowed his head, and gaue vp the Ghoſt, or ſpirit, (which was) that his life and ſoule left his body dead. And that the immortall ſoule of man differeth from the ſoules of beaſts, the manner of the creation maketh it manifeſt: for it is written, Let the waters bring forth in aboundance euery creeping thing, and let the Earth bring forth the liuing thing, according to his kind, the beaſt of the Earth, &c. But of Man it is written, Let vs make man in our owne Image, &c. and further, that the Lord breathed in his face the breath of life. Wherefore, as from the Water and Earth were thoſe creatures brought forth, and thence receiued life: ſo ſhall they againe be diſſolued into the ſame firſt matter, whence they were taken: but the life of breath euerlaſting, which God breathed into man, ſhall according to Eccleſiaſtes, returne againe to God that gaue it,

§. V.

That man is (as it were) a little World: with a digression touching our mortalitie.

MAN, thus compounded and formed by God, was an abstract or modell, or briefe Storie of the Vniuersall: in whom God concluded the Creation, and worke of the World, and whom he made the last and most excellent of his Creatures, being internally endued with a diuine vnderstanding, by which he might contemplate and serue his Creatour, after whose Image hee was formed, and endued with the powers and faculties of reason and other abilities, that thereby also he might gouerne and rule the World, and all other Gods creatures therein. And whereas GOD created three sorts of liuing natures, (to wit) Angelicall, Rationall, and Brutall; giuing to Angels an intellectuall, and to Beasts a sensuall nature, hee vouchsafed vnto Man, both the intellectuall of Angels, the sensitiue of Beasts, and the proper rationall belonging vnto man; and therefore (saith GREGORY NAZIANZENE:) Homo est vtriusq; naturæ vinculum, Man is the bond and chaine which tyeth together both natures: and because in the little frame of mans body there is a representation of the Vniuersall, and (by allusion) a kind of participation of all the parts thereof, therefore was man called Microcosmos, or the little World. Deus igitur hominem factum, velut alterum quendam mundum, in breui magnum, atq; exiguo totum, in terris statuit, God therefore placed in the Earth the man whom hee had made, as it were another World, the great and large World in the small and little World: for out of the Earth and Dust was formed the flesh of Man, and therefore heauie and lumpish; the bones of his body wee may compare to the hard Rockes and Stones, and therefore strong and durable; of which Ouid:

His bloud, which disperseth it selfe by the branches of veines through all the bodie, may be resembled to those waters, which are carried by brookes and riuers ouer all the Earth; his breath to the Aire, his naturall heate to the inclosed warmth, which the Earth hath in it selfe, which stirred vp by the heate of the Sunne, assisteth Nature in the speedier procreation of those varieties, which the Earth bringeth forth; Our radicall moisture, Oile, or Balsamum (whereon the naturall heat feedeth and is maintained) is resembled to the fat and fertilitie of the Earth; the haires of mans bodie, which adornes or ouer-shadowes it, to the grasse, which couereth the vpper face and skin of the Earth; our generatiue power, to Nature, which produceth all things; our determinations, to the light, wandring and vnstable clouds, carried euery where with vncertaine winds; our eies, to the light of the Sun and Moone, and the beauty of our youth, to the flowers of the Spring, which, either in a very short time, or with the Suns heat dry vp, and wither away, or the fierce puffes of wind blow them from the stalkes; the thoughts of our mind, to the motion of Angels; and our pure vnderstanding (formerly called Mens, and that which alwaies looketh vpwards) to those intellectuall natures, which are alwaies present with God; and lastly, our immortall soules while they are righteous) are by God himselfe beautified with the title of his owne Image and similitude: And although, in respect of God, there is no man iust, or good, or righteous: for in Angelis deprehensa est stultitia, Behold, hee found folly in his Angels, (saith Iob) yet with such a kind of difference, as there is betweene the substance, and the shadow, there may bee found a goodnesse in man: which God being pleased to accept, hath therefore called man, the Image and similitude of his own righteousnes.

In

In this also is the little World of man compared, and made more like the Vniuersall (man being the measure of all things; Homo est mensura omnium rerum, saith Aristotle and Pythagoras) that the foure Complexions resemble the foure Elements, and the seuen Ages of man the seuen Planets: Whereof our Infancie is compared to the Moone, in which wee seeme onely to liue and grow, as Plants; the second Age to Mercurie, wherein we are taught and instructed; our third Age to Venus, the dayes of loue, desire, and vanitie; the fourth to the Sunne, the strong, flourishing, and beautifull age of mans life; the fifth to Mars, in which we seeke honor and victorie, and in which our thoughts trauaile to ambitious ends; the sixth Age is ascribed to Iupiter, in which we begin to take accompt of our times, iudge of our selues, and grow to the perfection of our vnderstanding; the last and seuenth to Saturne, wherein our dayes are sad and ouer-cast, and in which we finde by deare and lamentable experience, and by the losse which can neuer be repayred, that of all our vaine passions and affections past, the sorrow only abideth: Our attendants are sicknesses, and variable infirmities; and by how much the more we are accompanied with plentie, by so much the more greedily is our end desired, whom when Time hath made vnsociable to others, we become a burthen to our selues: being of no other vse, then to hold the riches we haue, from our Successors. In this time it is, when (as aforesaid) we, for the most part, and neuer before, prepare for our eternall habitation, which we passe on vnto, with many sighes, grones, and sad thoughts, and in the end, by the workemanship of death, finish the sorrowfull businesse of a wretched life, towards which we alwayes trauaile both sleeping and waking: neither haue those beloued companions of honor and riches any power at all, to hold vs any one day, by the promises of glorious entertainments; but by what crooked path soeuer we walke, the same leadeth on directly to the house of death: whose dores lye open at all houres, and to all persons. For this tyde of mans life, after it once turneth and declineth, euer runneth with a perpetuall Ebbe and falling Streame, but neuer floweth againe: our Leafe once fallen, springeth no more, neither doth the Sunne or the Summer adorne vs againe, with the garments of new Leaues and Flowers.

For if there were any bayting place, or rest, in the course or race of mans life, then, according to the doctrine of the Academickes, the same might also perpetually be mainmaintayned; but as there is a continuance of motion in naturall liuing things, and as the ſap and iuyce, wherein the life of Plants is preſerued, doth euermore aſcend or deſcend: ſo is it with the life of man, which is alwayes either encreaſing towards ripeneſſe and perfection, or declining and decreaſing towards rottenneſſe and diſſolution.

§. VI.

Of the free power, which man had in his first creation, to diſpoſe of himſelfe.

THeſe be the miſeries which our firſt Parents brought on all mankinde, vnto whom God in his creation gaue a free and vnconſtrayned will, and on whom he beſtowed the liberall choice of all things, with one only prohibition, to trie his gratitude and obedience. God ſet before him, a mortall and immortall Life, a Nature celeſtiall and terrene, and (indeed) God gaue man to himſelfe, to be his owne guide, his owne workeman, and his owne painter, that he might frame or deſcribe vnto himſelfe what he pleaſed, and make election of his owne forme. God made man in the beginning (ſaith SIRACIDES) and left him in the hands of his owne counſaile. Such was the liberalitie of God, and mans felicitie: whereas beaſts, and all other creatures reaſonleſſe brought with them into the world (ſaith Lucilius) and that euen when they firſt fell from the bodies of their Dammes, the nature, which they could not change; and the ſupernall Spirits or Angels were from the beginning, or ſoone after, of that condition, in which they remaine in perpetuall eternitie. But (as aforeſaid) God gaue vnto man all kinde of ſeedes and grafts of life (to wit) the vegetatiue life of Plants, the ſenſuall of Beaſts, the rationall of Man, and the intellectuall of Angels, wherof which ſoeuer he tooke pleaſure to plant and cultiue, the ſame ſhould futurely grow in him, and bring forth fruit, agreeable to his owne choice and plantation. This freedome of the firſt man Adam, and our firſt Father, was ænigmatically deſcribed by Aſclepius Athenienſis (ſaith Mirandula) in the perſon and fable of Proteus, who was ſaid, as often as he pleaſed, to change his ſhape. To the ſame end were all thoſe celebrated Metamorphoſes among the Pythagorians, and ancient Poets, wherein it was fayned, that men were transformed into diuers ſhapes of beaſts, thereby to ſhew the change of mens conditions, from Reaſon to Brutalitie, from Vertue to Vice, from Meekneſſe to Crueltie, and from Iuſtice to Oppreſſion. For by the liuely image of other creatures did thoſe Ancients repreſent the variable paſſions, and affections of mortall men; as by Serpents, were ſignified Deceiuers; by Lyons, Oppreſſors, and cruell men; by Swine, Men giuen ouer to luſt and ſenſualitie; by Wolues, rauening and greedie Men; which alſo S. Matthew reſembleth to falſe prophets, Which come to you in ſheepes clothing, but inwardly they are rauening Wolues, by the images of ſtones and ſtocks, fooliſh and ignorant men, by Vipers, vngratefull men: of which S. Of Gods ceaſing to create any more: and of the cauſe thereof, becauſe the Vniuerſall created was exceeding good.

IN this worke of Man, God finiſhed the creation; not that God laboured as a man, and therefore reſted: for God commanded, and it was finiſhed, Cui voluiſſe eſt feciſſe; With whom, to will is to make, ſaith Beda. Neither did God ſo reſt, that he left the world made, and the creatures therein to themſelues: for my Father worketh to this day (ſaith Chriſt) and I worke; but God

God rested, (that is) he created no new species or kindes of creatures, but (as aforesaid) gaue vnto man a power generatiue, and so to the rest of liuing creatures, and to Plants and Flowers their seedes in themselues; and commanded man to multiply and fill the earth; and the Earth and Sea to bring forth creatures according to their seuerall kindes: all which being finished, God saw that his workes were good; not that he fore-knew not, and comprehended not the beginning and end before they were; for God made euery Plant of the field before it was in the Earth, but he gaue to all things which he had created the name of good, thereby to teach men, that from so good a God there was nothing made, but that which was perfect good, and from whose simple puritie and from so excellent a cause, there could proceede no impure or imperfect effect. For man hauing a free will and liberall choyce, purchased by disobedience his owne death and mortalitie, and for the crueltie of mans heart, was the earth afterward cursed, and all creatures of the first age destroied: but the righteous man Noah, and his familie, with those creatures which the Arke contayned, reserued by God to repleniſh the earth. Gen. 1. 28. 22. 24.

CHAP. III.

Of the place of Paradise.

§. I.

ONCERNING the first habitation of man we reade, that the Lord God planted a Garden, Eastward, in Eden, and there he put the man whom he made, GEN. 2. 6. Of this seate and place of Paradise, all ages haue held dispute; and the opinions and iudgements haue been in effect, as diuers, among those that haue written vpon this part of Genesis, as vpon any one place therein, seeming most obscure: some there are, that haue conceiued the being of the terrestriall Paradise, without all regard of the worlds Geographie, and without any respect of East and West, or any consideration of the place where Moses wrote, and from whence he directed (by the quarters of the heauens) the way how to finde out and iudge, in what Region of the world this garden was by God planted, wherein he was exceeding respectiue and precise. Others, by being themselues ignorant in the Hebrew, followed the first interpretation, or trusting to their owne iudgements, vnderstood one place for another; and one error is so fruitfull, as it begetteth a thousand Children, if the licentiousnesse thereof be not timely restrayned. And thirdly, those Writers which gaue themselues to follow and imitate others, were in all things so obseruant Sectators of those Masters, whom they admired and beleeued in, as they thought it safer to condemne their owne vnderstanding, then to examine theirs. For (saith Vadianus in his Epistle of Paradise) Magnos errores (magnorum virorum auctoritate persuasi) transmittimus; We passe ouer many grosse errors, by the authoritie of great men led and perswaded. And it is true, that many of the Fathers were farre wide from the vnderstanding of this place. I speake it not, that I my selfe dare presume to censure them, for I reuerence both their learning learning and their pietie, and yet not bound to follow them any further, then they are guided by truth: for they were men; Et humanum est errare. And to the end that no man should be proude of himselfe, God hath distributed vnto men such a proportion of knowledge, as the wisest may behold in themselues their owne weakenesse: Nulli vnquam dedit omnia Deus; God neuer gaue the knowledge of all things to any one. S. Paul confest that he knew not, whether he were taken vp into the third heauen in the flesh, or out of the flesh; and Christ himselfe acknowledgeth thus much, that neither Men, nor Angels knew of the latter day; and therefore, seeing knowledge is infinite, it is God (according to S. Iude) who is only wise. Sapientia vbi inuenitur? (saith Iob) but where is wisedome found? and where is the place of vnderstanding? man knoweth not the price thereof, for it is not found in the Land of the liuing. And therefore seeing God found folly in his Angels, mens iudgements (which inhabite in houses of clay) cannot be without their mistakings: and so the Fathers, and other learned men excusable in particulars, especially in those whereupon our saluation dependeth not.

§. II.

A recitall of strange opinions, touching Paradise.

NOw as touching Paradise, first it is to be enquired, whether there were a Paradise, or no? or whether Moses description were altogether mysticall, and allegoricall? as Origen, Philo, Fran. Georgius, with others haue affirmed, and that vnder the names of those foure Riuers, Pison, Gehon, Hidekel, and Perath. The tree of life, and the tree of Knowledge, there were deliuered vnto vs other mysteries and significations; as, that by the foure Riuers were meant the foure Cardinall vertues, Iustice, Temperance, Fortitude, and Prudence, or (by other) Oyle, Wine, Milke, and Honny. This Allegoricall vnderstanding of Paradise by Origen diuulged, was againe by Franciscus Georgius receiued (saith Sixtus Senensis) whose friuolous imaginations Sixtus himselfe doth fully and learnedly answere, in the 34. Annotation of his fift Booke, fol. 338. the last Edition.

Bartas. sem. 2. l. 1. 143.

S. Ambrose also leaned wholly to the Allegoricall construction, and set Paradise in the third heauen, and in the vertues of the minde, & in nostro principali, which is, as I conceiue it, in mente, or in our soules: to the particulars whereof he alludeth in this sort. By the place or garden of Paradise, was meant the soule or minde; by Adam, Mens, or Vnderstanding; by Eue, the Sense; by the Serpent, Delectation; by the Tree of good and euill, Sapience; and by the rest of the Trees, the vertues of the minde, or in the minde planted, or from thence springing. Notwithstanding all which, vpon the first of the Corinthians, cap. 6. he in direct wordes alloweth both of a celestiall and terrestriall Paradise; the one, into which S. Paul was rapt; the other, into which Adam was put by God. Aug. Chrysamensis was of opinion, that a Paradise had beene, but that there was not now any marke thereof on the earth: the same being not onely defaced, but withall the places now not so much as existing. To which Luther seemeth to adhere.

Amb. de Parad.

The Manichees also vnderstood, that by Paradise was meant the whole Earth; to which opinion Vadianus inclineth, as I conceiue his wordes in two seuerall places. First, vpon this: Fill the earth, GEN. 10. Of which he giueth this iudgement. Hoc ipso etiam quod dixit, Replete terram, dominamini vniuersis animantibus, subijcite terram, clarissimè docet, totam terram extantem, & omnigenis (vt tum erat) fructibus constitam, sedem & hortum illud ADAE, & posteritatis futuræ fuisse; These wordes (saith he) in which God said, Bring forth fruit and multiply, and fill the earth, and subdue it, and rule ouer euery creature, doe cleerely shew, that the Vniuersall earth set or filled with all sorts of fruits (as then it was) was the garden and seate of ADAM, and of his future posteritie. And afterward he acknowledgeth the place, out of the Acts the 17. Apostolus ex vno sanguine guine omne genus humanum adeò factum docet, vt habitarent ſuper vniuerſam faciem terræ: tota igitur terra Paradiſus ille erat; The Apoſtle (ſaith he) teacheth, that God hath made of one bloud all mankinde, to dwell ouer all the face of the earth: and therefore all the earth (ſaith he) was that Paradiſe. Which coniectures I will anſwere in order. Goropius Becanus differeth not much from this opinion, but yet he acknowledgeth that Adam was firſt planted by God in one certaine place, and peculiar Garden; which place Goropius findeth neere the Riuer of Aceſines, in the confines of India.

Vers. 26.

Tertullian, Bonauenture, and Durandus, make Paradiſe vnder the Æquinoctiall, and Poſtellus, quite contrarie, vnder the North pole: the Chaldeans alſo for the moſt part, and all their Sectators, followed the opinion of Origen, or rather Origen theirs, who would either make Paradiſe a figure, or Sacrament only, or elſe would haue it ſeated out of this ſenſible world, or rayſed into ſome high and remote Region of the Aire. Strabus, and Rabanus, were both ſicke of this vanitie, with Origen, and Philo: ſo was our venerable Beda, and Pet. Comeſtor, and Moſes Barcephas the Syrian, tranſlated by Maſius. But as Hopkins ſayes of Philo Iudæus, that he wondred, Quo malo genio afflatus; By what euill Angell he was blowne vp into this error: ſo can I not but greatly maruaile at theſe learned men, who ſo groſly and blindly wandred; ſeeing Moſes, and after him the Prophets, doe ſo plainely deſcribe this place, by the Region, in which it was planted, by the Kingdomes and Prouinces bordering it, by the Riuers which watered it, and by the points of the Compaſſe vpon which it lay, in reſpect of Iudæa, or Canaan.

Bart. 16. 17. 6.

Bed. Pet. cap. Moſes Par.

Noniomagus alſo, vpon Beda, De natura rerum, beleeueth that all the Earth was taken for Paradiſe, and not any one place. For the whole Earth (ſaith he) hath the ſame beautie adſcribed to Paradiſe. He addeth, that the Ocean was that Fountayne, from whence the foure Riuers, Piſon, Gehon, Tigris, and Euphrates, had their beginning: for he could not thinke it poſſible, that theſe Riuers of Ganges, Nilus, Tigris, and Euphrates, (whereof the one ranne through India, the other through Ægypt, and the other two through Meſopotamia and Armenia) could riſe out of one Fountayne, were it not out of the Fountayne of the Ocean.

§. III.

That there was a true locall Paradiſe Eaſtward, in the Countrie of Eden.

TO the firſt therefore, that ſuch a place there was vpon the earth, the words of Moſes make it manifeſt, where it is written, And the Lord God planted a garden Eaſtward in Eden, and there he put the man whom he had made. And howſoeuer the vulgar tranſlation, called Hieromes tranſlation, hath conuerted this place thus, Plantauerat Dominus Deus Paradiſum voluptatis à principio; The Lord God planted a Paradiſe of pleaſure from the beginning; putting the word (pleaſure) for Eden, and (from the beginning) for Eaſtward: It is manifeſt, that in this place Eden is the proper name of a Region. For what ſenſe hath this tranſlation (ſaith our Hopkins, in his Treatiſe of Paradiſe) that he planted a garden in pleaſure, or that a Riuer went out of pleaſure to water the garden? But the ſeuentie Interpreters call it Paradiſum Edenis, the Paradiſe of Eden, and ſo doth the Chaldean Paraphraſt truely take it for the proper name of a place, and for a Noune appellatiue; which Region in reſpect of the fertilitie of the ſoile, of the many beautifull Riuers, and goodly Woods, & that the trees (as in the Indies) doe alwaies keepe their leaues, was called Eden, which ſignifieth in the Hebrew, pleaſantneſſe or delicacie, as the Spaniards call the Countrie, oppoſite to the Iſle of Cuba, Florida: and this is the miſtaking, which may end the diſpute, as touching the double ſenſe of the word, that as Florida was a Countrie, ſo called for the flouriſhing beautie thereof, ſo was Eden a Region called pleaſure, or delicacie, for the pleaſure, or delicacie: and as Florida ſignifieth flouriſhing: ſo Eden ſignifieth pleaſure, and yet both are the proper names names of Countries; for Eden being the proper name of a Region (called Pleasure in the Hebrew) and Paradise being the choice seate of all that Region, Paradise was truely the Garden of Eden, and truely the Garden of Pleasure.

Now, for Eastward, to translate it, from the beginning, it is also contrarie to the translation of the Seuentie; to the ancient Greeke Fathers, as Basil, Chrysostome, Theodoret, Gregorie; and to the Rabbines, as Ramban, Rabbi Salomon, R. Abraham, and Chimchi; and of the Latines, Seuerinus, Damascenus, &c. who plainely take Eden for the proper name of a Region, and set the word (Eastward) for ab initio: for Damascens owne wordes are these, Paradisus est locus Dei manibus in Eden ad Orientem mirabiliter consitus; Paradise is a place, marualiously planted by the hands of God, in Eden, toward the East.

And after all these Fathers, Guilhelmus Parisiensis, a great learned man, and Sixtus Senensis, of later times, doe both vnderstand these words of Eden, and of the East, contrarie to the vulgar translation; Parisiensis, as indifferent to both, and Sixtus Senensis, directly against the vulgar: of which these are their owne wordes: After this I will beginne to speake of Paradise terrestriall, which God planted from the beginning, or Eastward, &c. Posthac incipiam loqui de Paradiso terrestri, quem plantâsse Deum ab initio vel ad Orientem, &c. And then Senensis; MOSES enim clarissimè prodit, Paradisum à Deo consitum in regione terræ Orientalis, quæ dicitur Heden: Heden autem esse proprium nomen apparet ex quarto capite Gen. vbi legimus CHAM habitâsse ad Orientalem plagam Heden; For MOSES (saith he) doth shew most cleerely, that Paradise was planted of God in a Region of the East Countrie, which is called Heden: but that Heden is a proper name, it appeareth by the fourth Chapter of Genesis, where we reade, that CHAM dwelt on the East border of Heden. PERERIVS endeuoureth to qualifie this translation: for this particle (saith he) ab initio, is referred to all the time of the creation, and not to the very first day; alleaging this place of Christ, that although the Deuill was said to be a man-slayer from the beginning, yet that was meant but after the sixth day. But surely, as I thinke (referring my selfe to better iudgement) the Deuill was from the instant of his fall a man-slayer in disposition, though he had not whereon to practise till mans creation. And for conclusion, S. Hierome (if that be his translation) aduiseth himselfe better in the end of the third Chapter of Genesis, conuerting the word (Eden) by (ante) and not (à principio) as, God did set a Cherubin before the Garden of Eden; Collocauit Deus ante Paradisum voluptatis Cherubin; and Pererius himselfe acknowledgeth, that this is the true sense of this place, precisely taken, according to the Hebrew. Posuit à parte Orientali horti Heden, Cherubin; He set on the East-side of the Garden of Heden, Cherubin. BECANVS affirmeth, that the Hebrew word (Be) signifieth (with) aswell as (in) and so the Text beareth this sense; That God planted a Garden with pleasure (that is to say) full of pleasure. But Becanus followeth this construction, only to the end, to finde Paradise vpon the Riuer of Acesines: for there he hath heard of the Indian Fig-tree in great abundance, which he supposeth to be the tree of Knowledge of good, and euill, and would therefore draw Paradise to the Fig-tree: which conceit of his I will answere hereafter.

Vers.16.

Iohn 8.44.

Gen.3.24.

Now, because Paradise was seated by Moses toward the East, thence came the custome of praying toward the East, and not by imitation of the Chaldæans: and therefore all our Churches are built East and West, as to the point where the Sunne riseth in March, which is directly ouer Paradise (saith Damascenus:) affirming, that we alwayes pray towards the East, as looking towards Paradise, whence we were cast out; and yet the Temple of Salomon had their Priests and Sacrifices, which turned themselues in their seruice and diuine ceremonies, alwayes toward the West, thereby to auoid the superstition of the Ægyptians and Chaldæans.

But because East and West are but in respect of places; (for although Paradise were East from Iudæa, yet it was West from Persia) and the seruing of God is euery where in the world, the matter is not great which way we turne our faces, so our hearts stand right, other than this, that we who dwell West from Paradise, and pray turning our ſelues towards the Eaſt, may remember thereby to beſeech God, that as by Adams fall we haue loſt the Paradiſe on Earth: ſo by Chriſts death and paſſion we may be made partakers of the Paradiſe celeſtiall, and the Kingdome of Heauen. To conclude, I conceiue, that there was no other myſterie in adding the word (Eaſt) to Eden by Moſes, then to ſhew, that the Region of Eden, in which Paradiſe was, lay Eaſtward from Iudæa and Canaan: for the Scriptures alwayes called the people of thoſe Nations, the Sonnes of the Eaſt, which inhabited Arabia, Meſopotamia, Chaldæa, and Perſia: of which Ouid:

Eurus ad Auroram, Nabatæaq; regna receſſit,
Perſidaq; & radijs iuga ſubdita matutinis.

The Eaſt wind with Aurora hath abiding
Among th' Arabian, and the Perſian Hils, Whom Phœbus firſt ſalutes at his vp-riſing.

And if it be obiected, that Hieremie the Prophet threatning the deſtruction of Hieruſalem, doth often make mention of Northerne Nations, it is to bee noted, that the North is there named, in reſpect of thoſe Nations that followed Nabuchodonoſor, and of whom the greateſt part of his Armie was compounded; not that Babylon it ſelfe ſtood North from Hieruſalem, though inclining from the Eaſt toward the North.

Now to the difference of this Tranſlation, Peter Comeſtor giueth beſt ſatisfaction: for he vſeth the word, From the beginning, that is, from the firſt part of the World, (à principio) id eſt (ſayth hee) à prima orbis parte, and afterward hee affirmeth, that (à principio, and ad Orientem) haue the ſame ſignification; From the beginning and Eaſtward is all one, à principio idem eſt quod ad Orientem.

But to returne to the proofe of this place, and that this Story of Mankind was not Allegoricall, it followeth in the Text of the ſecond Chapter and ninth Verſe, in theſe words: For out of the ground made the Lord God to grow euery Tree pleaſant to the ſight, and good for meate, &c. ſo as firſt it appeared that God created Adam elſewhere, as in the World at large, and then, put him into the Garden: and the end why, is expreſt: that hee might dreſſe it and keepe it; Paradiſe being a Garden or Orchard filled with Plants, and Trees, of the moſt excellent kinds, pleaſant to behold, and (withall) good for meate: which proueth that Paradiſe was a terreſtriall Garden, garniſhed with Fruits, delighting both the eye and taſte. And to make it more plaine, and to take away all opinion of Allegoricall conſtruction, hee affirmeth that it was watered and beautified with a Riuer; expreſſing alſo the Region, out of which this Riuer ſprang, which he calleth Heden; and that Heden is alſo a Countrie neere vnto Charan in Meſopotamia, Ezechiel witneſſeth. Verſe 18. Verſe 10. Ezech. 6. 27. 23.

But to all theſe Cabaliſts, which draw the Truth and Story of the Scriptures into Allegories, Epiphanius anſwereth in theſe wordes: Si Paradiſus non eſt ſenſibilis, non eſt etiam fons, ſi non eſt fons, non eſt flumen, ſi non eſt flumen, non ſunt quatuor principia, non Piſon, non Gehon, non Tigris, nec Euphrates; non eſt ficus, non folia, non comedit EVA de arbore, non eſt ADAM, non ſunt homines, ſed veritas iam fabula eſt, & omnia ad Allegorias reuocantur: If Paradiſe be not ſenſible, then there was no fountaine, and then no Riuer; if no Riuer, then no ſuch foure heads or branches; and then not any ſuch Riuer as Piſon, or Gehon, Tigris, or Euphrates, no ſuch Fig-tree, or fruit, or leaues, EVE then did not eat of the fruit, neither was there any ADAM, or any man, the truth was but a Fable, and all things eſteemed are called backe into Allegories. Words to the ſame effect hath Saint Hierome vpon DANIEL: Contiteſcant eorum deliramenta, qui vmbras & imagines in veritate ſequentes, ipſam conantur euertere veritatem, vt Paradiſum & flumina, & arbores putent Allegoriæ Legibus ſe debere ſubruere, Let the dotages of them bee ſilent, who following ſhadowes and Images in the Truth, endeauor to ſubuert the Truth it ſelfe, and thinke that they ought to bring Paradise, and the Riuers and the Trees vnder the rules of Allegorie.

Furthermore, by the continuation and order of the Storie is the place made more manifest. For God gaue Adam free libertie to eate of euery Tree of the Garden, (the Tree of knowledge excepted) which Trees Moses in the ninth verse saith that they were good to eate; meaning the fruit which they bare. Besides, God left all beasts to Adam to be named, which he had formerly made; and these beasts were neither in the third Heauen, nor neere the Circle of the Moone, nor beasts in imagination: for if all these things were Enygmaticall or Mysticall, the same might also bee said of the creation of all things. And Ezechiel speaking of the glory of the Assyrian Kings vseth this speech: All the Trees of Eden, which were in the Garden of God, enuied him, which proueth both Eden, and Paradise therein seated to bee terrestriall: for the Prophets made no imaginary comparisons. But Moses wrote plainly, and in a simple stile, fit for the capacities of ignorant men, and he was more large and precise in the description of Paradise, then in any other place of Scripture; of purpose to take away all scruple from the incredulitie of future ages, whom he knew (out of the gift of Prophecie) to be apt to fabulous inuentions, and that if he had not described both the Region and the Riuers, and how it stood from Canaan, many of the vnbeleeing Israelites, and others after them, would haue misconstrued this Storie of Mankind. And is it likely, there would haue beene so often mention made of Paradise in the Scriptures, if the same had beene an Vtopia? For we find that the Valley, wherein Sodome and Gomorrha stood, (sometimes called Pentapolis, of the fiue principall Cities therein) was before the destruction (which their vnnaturall sinne purchased) compared to the Paradise of the Lord, and like to the Land of Ægypt toward Zoar; In like manner was Israel resembled to the Paradise of God, before the Babylonians wasted it: which proueth plainly, that Paradise it selfe exceeded in beautie and fertilitie, and that these places had but a resemblance thereof: being compared to a seat and soyle of farre exceeding excellencie.

Ezech.31.9.

Gen.13.10.

Besides, whence had Homer his inuention of Alcinous Gardens, as Iustin Martyr noteth, but out of Moses his description of Paradise? Gen.2. and whence are their prayses of the Elisian fields, but out of the Storie of Paradise? to which also appertaine those Verses of the Golden Age in Ouid:

Ouid.Metam.l.1

Ver erat æternum, placidiq; tepentibus auris
Mulcebant Zephyri natos sine semine flores.

The ioyfull Spring did euer last,
And Zephyrus did breed
Without the helpe of seed
Sweet flowres by his gentle blast.

And it is manifest, that Orphus, Linus, Pyndarus, Hesiodus, and Homer, and after him, Ouid, one out of another, and all these together with Pythagoras and Plato, and their Sectatours, did greatly enrich their inuentions, by venting the stolne Treasures of Diuine Letters, altered by prophane additions, and disguised by poeticall conuersions, as if they had beene conceiued out of their owne speculations and contemplations.

But besides all these testimonies, if we find what Region Heden or Eden was; if we proue the Riuer that ranne out of it, and that the same afterwards was diuided into foure branches; together with the Kingdomes of Hauila and Cush, and that all these are Eastward from Canaan, or the Desarts of the Amorites, where Moses wrote, I then conceiue, that there is no man that will doubt, but that such a place there was. And yet I doe not exclude the Allegoricall sense of the Scripture; for aswell in this there were many figures of Christ, as in all the old Testament throughout: the Storie being directly true notwithstanding. And to this purpose (saith Saint Augustine)

Tres

Tres sunt de Paradiso generales sententiæ: vna est eorum, qui tantummodò corporaliter Paradisum intelligi volunt: alia eorum, qui spiritualiter tantùm (id est) Ecclesiam: tertia eorum, qui vtrog; modo Paradisum accipiunt, (that is) There are three opinions of Paradise: the one of those men, which will haue it altogether corporall: a second of those which conceiue it altogether spirituall, and to be a figure of the Church: the third of those, which take it in both senses; which third opinion Saint Augustine approueth, and of which Suidas giueth this allowable iudgement: Quemadmodum homo sensibilis, & intelligibilis simul conditus erat: sic & huius sanctissimum nemus, sensibile simul & intelligibile, & duplici specie est præditum, (that is) As man was created at one time both sensible and intelligible: so was this holy Groue or Garden to be taken both wayes, and endued with a double forme.

§. IIII.

Why it should bee needfull to intreate diligently of the place of Paradise.

BVT it may be obiected, that it is needlesse, and a kind of curiositie to enquire so diligently after this place of Paradise, and that the knowledge thereof is of little or no vse. To which I answere, that there is nothing written in the Scriptures, but for our instruction; and if the truth of the Storie be necessary, then by the place proued, the same is also made more apparent. For if we should conceiue that Paradise were not on the Earth, but lifted vp as high as the Moone; or that it were beyond all the Ocean, and in no part of the knowne World, from whence Adam was sayd to wade through the Sea, and thence to haue come into Iudæa, (out of doubt) there would be few men in the World, that would giue any credit vnto it. For what could seeme more ridiculous then the report of such a place? and besides, what maketh this feare of Paradise so much disputed and doubted of, but the conceit that Pishon should bee Ganges, which watereth the East India, and Gehon, Nilus, which enricheth Ægypt, and these two Riuers so far distant, as (except all the World were Paradise) these streames can no way be comprized therein?

Secondly, if the birth and workes, and death of our Sauiour, were said to haue beene in some such Countrey, of which no man euer heard tell, and that his Miracles had beene performed in the Ayre, or no place certainly knowne: I assure my selfe, that the Christian Religion would haue taken but a slender roote in the minds of men; for times and places are approued witnesses of worldly actions.

Thirdly, if we should relye, or giue place to the iudgements of some Writers vpon this place of Genesis (though otherwise for their doctrine in general, they are worthy of honour and reuerence) I say that there is no fable among the Græcians or Ægyptians more ridiculous: for who would beleeue that there were a piece of the World so set by it selfe and separated, as to hang in the Ayre vnder the Circle of the Moone? or who so doltish to conceiue, that from thence the foure Riuers of Ganges, Nilus, Euphrates, and Tigris, should fall downe, and runne vnder all the Ocean, and rise vp againe in this our habitable World, and in those places where they are now found? Which left any man thinke, that I enforce or straine to the worst, these are Peter Comestors owne words. Est autem locus amœnissimus, longo terræ & maris tractu à nostra habitabili Zona secretus, adeò eleuatus, vt vsq; ad Lunarem globum attingat, &c. (that is) It is a most pleasant place, seuered from our habitable Zone by a long tract of Land and Sea, eleuated so, that it reacheth to the Globe of the Moone.

And Moses Barcephas vpon this place writeth in this manner: Deinde hoc quoq; responsum volumus, Paradisum multò sublimiore positum esse regione, atq; hæc nostra extet terra, eoq; fieri, vt illinc per præcipitium delabantur fluuij tanto cum impetu, quantum verbis exprimere non possis; eoq; impetu impulsi præsiq; sub Oceani vada rapiuntur, vnde rursus prosiliant ebulliantq; in hoc à nobis culto orbe: which haue this sense: Furthermore Barc. conuerted by Masius.

(sayth he) we giue this for an answere, that Paradise is set in a Region farre raysed aboue this part which wee inhabite; whereby it comes to passe, that from thence these Riuers fall downe with such a headlong violence, as words cannot expresse; and with that force so impulsed and prest, they are carried vnder the deepe Ocean, and doe againe arise and boyle vp in this our habitable World: and to this he addeth the opinion of Ephram, which is this. Ephram dicit Paradisum ambire terram, atq; vltra Oceanum ita positum esse, vt totum terrarum orbem ab omni circumdet regione, non aliter atq; Lunæ orbis Lunam cingit, (which is) That Paradise doth compasse or embrace the whole Earth, and is so set beyond the Ocean Sea, as it enuironeth the whole Orbe of the Earth on euery side, as the Orbe of the Moone doth embrace the Moone. To the end therefore that these ridiculous expositions and opinions doe not bring question vnto Truth it selfe, or make the same subiect to doubts or disputes, it is necessarie to discouer the true place of Paradise, which God in his wisdome appointed in the very Nauel of this our World, and (as Melanchton saies) in parte terræ meliore, in the best part thereof, that from thence, as from a Centre; the Vniuersall might be filled with people and planted; and by knowing this place, wee shall the better iudge of the beginning of Nations, and of the Worlds inhabitation: for neere vnto this did the Sonnes of Noah also disperse themselues after the Floud, into all other remote Regions and Countries. And if it be a generous desire in men, to know from whence their owne forefathers haue come, and out of what Regions and Nations, it cannot be displeasing to vnderstaud the place of our first Ancester, from whence all the streames and branches of Mankind haue followed and beene deduced. If then it doe appeare by the former, that such a place there was as Paradise, and that the knowledge of this place cannot be vnprofitable, it followeth in order to examine the seuerall opinions before remembred, by the Truth it selfe; and to see how they agree with the sense of the Scripture, and with common reason, and afterward to prooue directly, and to delineate the Region in which God first planted this delightfull Garden.

§. V.

That the Floud hath not vtterly defaced the markes of Paradise, nor caused Hils in the Earth.

AND first, whereas it is supposed by Aug. Chysamensis, that the Floud hath altered, deformed, or rather annihilated this place, in such sort, as no man can find any marke or memory thereof: (of which opinion there were others also, ascribing to the Floud the cause of those high Mountaines, which are found on all the Earth ouer, with many other strange effects) for my owne opinion, I thinke neither the one nor the other to bee true. For although I cannot denie, but that the face of Paradise was after the Floud withered, and growne old, in respect of the first beautie: (for both the ages of men, and the nature of all things Time hath changed) yet if there had beene no signe of any such place, or if the soile and seate had not remained, then would not Moses, who wrote of Paradise about 850. yeeres after the Floud, haue described it so particularly, and the Prophets long after Moses would not haue made so often mention thereof. And though the very Garden it selfe were not then to bee found, but that the Floud, and other accidents of time made it one common field and pasture with the Land of Eden, yet the place is still the same, and the Riuers still remaine the same Riuers. By two of which (neuer doubted of) to wit, Tigris, and Euphrates, wee are sure to find in what longitude Paradise lay; and learning out one of these Riuers, which afterward doth diuide it selfe into foure branches, wee are sure that the partition is at the very border of the Garden it selfe. For it is written, that out of Eden went a Riuer to water the Garden, and from thence it was diuided and became into foure heads: Now whether the word in the Latine Translation (Inde) from thence, be referred to Eden it selfe,

Gen. 2. 10.

ſelfe, or to Paradiſe, yet the diuiſion and branching of thoſe Riuers muſt bee in the North or South ſide of the very Garden (if the Riuers runne as they doe, North and South) and therefore theſe Riuers yet remaining, and Eden manifeſtly knowne, there could be no ſuch defacing by the Floud, as is ſuppoſed. Furthermore, as there is no likelihood, that the place could be ſo altered as future ages know it not, ſo is there no probability, that eyther theſe Riuers were turned out of their courſes, or new Riuers created by the Floud which were not, or that the Floud (as aforeſaid) by a violent motion, when it began to decreaſe, was the cauſe of high Hils, or deepe Vallies. For what deſcent of waters could there bee in a Spherical and round bodie, wherein there is nor high nor low? ſeeing that all violent force of waters is eyther by the ſtrength of winde, by deſcent from a higher to a lower, or by the ebbe or floud of the Sea. But that there was any winde (whereby the Seas are moſt enraged) it appeareth not, rather the contrary is probable: for it is written, Therefore God made a winde to paſſe vpon the Earth, and the waters ceaſed. So as it appeareth not, that, vntill the waters ſanke, there was any winde at all, but that God afterward, out of his goodneſſe, cauſed the winde to blow, to dry vp the abundant ſlime and mudde of the Earth, and make the Land more firme, and to cleanſe the Ayre of thicke vapours and vnholeſome miſts; and this we know by experience, that all downe-right raines doe euermore diſſeuer the violence of outragious winds, and beat downe, and leuell the ſwelling and mountainous billow of the Sea: for any ebbes and flouds there could be none, when the waters were equall and of one heighth ouer all the face of the Earth, and when there were no Indraughts, Bayes, or Gulfes to receiue a Floud, or any deſcent, or violent falling of waters in the round forme of the Earth and waters, as aforeſaid: and therefore it ſeemeth moſt agreeable to reaſon, that the waters rather ſtood in a quiet calme, then that they moued with any raging or ouer-bearing violence. And for a more direct proofe that the Floud made no ſuch deſtroying alteration, Ioſeph. auoweth that one of thoſe pillars erected by Seth, the third from Adam, was to bee ſeene in his dayes, which Pillars were ſet vp aboue 1426. yeeres before the floud, counting Seth to be an hundred yeeres old at the erection of them, and Ioſeph. himſelfe, to haue liued ſome 40. or 50. yeeres after Chriſt: of whom although there be no cauſe to beleeue all that he wrote, yet that, which hee auouched of his owne time, cannot (without great derogation) be called in queſtion. And therefore it may be poſſible, that ſome foundation or ruine thereof might then be ſeene. Now that ſuch Pillars were rayſed by Seth, all Antiquitie hath auowed. It is alſo written in Beroſus (to whom although I giue little credit, yet I cannot condeme him in all) that the Citie of Enoch built by Cain, about the Mountaines of Libanus, was not defaced by length of time: yea the ruines thereof Annius (who commented vpon that inuented Fragment) ſaith, were to be ſeene in his dayes, who liued in the Raigne of Ferdinand and Iſabella of Caſtile; and if theſe his words bee not true, then was hee exceeding impudent. For, ſpeaking of this Citie of Enoch, he concludeth in this ſort: Cuius maxima & ingentis molis fundamenta viſuntur, & vocatur ab incolis regionis, Ciuitas Cain, vt noſtri mercatores, & peregrini referunt; The foundation of which huge Maſſe is now to be ſeene, and the place is called by the people of that Region, the Citie of Cain, as both our ſtrangers and Merchants report. It is alſo auowed by Pomponius Mela, (to whom I giue more credit in theſe things) that the Citie of Ioppa was built before the Floud, ouer which Cepha was King: whoſe name with his Brother Phineus, together with the grounds and principles of their Religion, was found grauen vpon certaine Altars of ſtone; and it is not vnpoſſible, that the ruines of this other Citie, called Enoch by Annius, might be ſeene, though founded in the firſt Age: but it could not be of the firſt Citie of the World, built by Cain, the place, rather then the time, denying it. Gen.4.17.

And to prooue directly, that the floud was not the cauſe of Mountaines, but that there were Mountains from the Creation, it is written, that the waters of the floud ouerflowed by fifteene Cubits the higheſt Mountaines. And Maſius Damaſcenus ſpeaking of Gen.8.1.

the Floud, writeth in this manner. Et supra Minyadam excelsus mons in Armenia (què Baris appellatur) in quo confugientes multos sermo est diluuij tempore liberatos, And vpon Minyada there is an high Mountaine, in Armenia (called Baris) vnto which (as it is said) that many fled in the time of the Deluge, and that they saued themselues thereon. Now although it is contrary to Gods Word, that any more were saued then eight persons (which Masius doth not auouch, but by report) yet it is a testimonie, that such Mountaines were before the Floud, which were afterwards, and euer since, knowne by the same names; and on which Mountaines it is generally receiued that the Arke rested: but vntruely, as I shall prooue heereafter. And againe it appeareth, that the Mount Sion (though by another name) was knowne before the Floud: on which the Thalmudists report, that many Giants saued themselues also; but (as Annius saith) without all authoritie, eyther Diuine or Humane.

Lastly, it appeareth that the Floud did not so turne vpside-downe the face of the Earth, as thereby it was made past knowledge, after the waters were decreased, by this that, when NOAH sent out the Doue the second time, she returned with an Oliue leafe in her mouth, which shee had pluckt, and which (vntill the Trees were discouered) shee found not: for otherwise shee might haue found them floting on the water; a manifest proofe, that the Trees were not torne vp by the rootes, nor swamme vpon the waters, for it is written: folium Oliuæ, raptum or decerptum, a leafe pluckt, (which is) to take from a Tree, or to teare off. By this it is apparent, (there being nothing written to the contrarie) that the Floud made no such alteration, as was supposed, but that the place of Paradise might be seene to succeeding Ages, especially vnto Moses, by whom it pleased God to teach the truth of the Worlds Creation, and vnto the Prophets which succedeed him: both which I take for my warrant, and to guide me in this Discouerie.

Gen 8.11.

§. VI.

That Paradise was not the whole Earth, as some haue thought: making the Ocean to bee the fountaine of those foure Riuers.

THIS conceit of Aug. Chysamensis being answered, who only giueth his opinion for reason, I will in a few words examine that of the Manichies, of Nouiomagus, Vadianus, Goropius Becanus, and all those that vnderstood, that by Paradise was meant the whole Earth. But in this I shall not trouble the Reader with many words, because by those places of Scripture formerly remembred, this Vniuersalitie will appeare altogether improper. The places which Vadianus alleageth, Bring forth fruit and multiply; fill the Earth and subdue it, rule ouer euery Creature, &c. with this of the Acts, and hath made of one bloud all Mankind, to dwell on all the face of the Earth, doe no way proue such a generalitie: for the World was made for man, of which he was Lord and Gouernour, and all things therin were ordained of God for his vse: Now although all men were of one and the same fountaine of bloud originally; and Adams Posteritie inhabited in processe of time ouer all the face of the Earth; yet it disproueth in nothing the particular Garden, assigned to Adam, to dresse and cultiue, in which he liued in so blessed an estate before his transgression. For if there had beene no other choice, but that Adam had bin left to the Vniuersall; Moses would not then haue sayd, Eastward in Eden, seeing the World hath nor East nor West, but respectiuely. And to what end had the Angell of God beene set to keepe the East-side, and entrance into Paradise after Adams expulsion, if the Vniuersall had beene Paradise? for then must Adam haue beene chased also out of the World. For if All the Earth were Paradise, that place can receiue no better construction then this, That Adam was driuen out of the World into the World, and out of Paradise into Paradise, except we should beleeue with Metrodorus, that there were infinite Worlds. Which to denie, hee thinkes all one, as to affirme, firme, That in so large a field, as the vniuersall, there should grow but one thistle. NOVIOMAGVS vpon Beda, seemeth to be led by this, that it was vnpossible for those three Riuers, Ganges, Nilus, and Euphrates (which water three portions of the World so farre distant) to rise out of one Fountayne, except the Ocean be taken for the Well, and the World for the Garden.

And it is true, that those foure Riuers, being so vnderstood, there could be no coniecture more probable; but it shall plainely appeare, that Pison was falsly taken for Ganges, and Gehon falsly for Nilus, although Ganges be a Riuer by Hauilah in India, and Nilus runne through Æthiopia. The Seuentie write Chus for Æthiopia, and thereby the errors of the Manichees, and the mistakings of Noniomagus, Goropius, and Vadianus, with others, are made manifest. Yet was their coniecture farre more probable, then that of Ephram, Cyrillus, and Athanasius: That Paradise was seated farre beyond the Ocean Sea, and that Adam waded through it, and at last came toward the Countrie, in which he was created, and was buryed at Mount Caluary, in Hierusalem. And certainely, though all those of the first Age were of great stature, and so continued many yeeres after the floud, yet Adams shin-bones must haue contayned a thousand fadome, and much more, if he had foorded the Ocean; but this opinion is so ridiculous, as it needes no argument to disproue it.

§. VII.

Of their opinion, which make Paradise as high as the Moone: and of others, which make it higher than the middle Region of the ayre.

THirdly, whereas Beda saith, and as the Schoole-men affirme, Paradise to be a place, altogether remoued from the knowledge of men (locus à cognitione hominum remotissimus) and Barcephas conceiued, that Paradise was farre in the East, but mounted aboue the Ocean, and all the Earth, and neere the Orbe of the Moone (which opinion, though the Schoole-men charge Beda withall, yet Pererius layes it off from Beda vpon Strabus, and his Master Rabanus:) and wheras Rupertus in his Geographie of Paradise, doth not much differ from the rest, but findes it seated next or neerest heauen; It may seeme, that all these borrowed this doctrine out of Plato, and Plato out of Socrates; but neither of them (as I conceiue) well vnderstood: who (vndoubtedly) tooke this place for heauen it selfe, into which the soules of the blessed were carryed after death.

True it is, that these Philosophers durst not for feare of the Areopagites (in this and many other diuine apprehensions) set downe what they beleeued in plaine termes, especially Plato: though Socrates in the end suffered death, for acknowledging one onely powerfull God; and therefore did the Deuill himselfe doe him that right, as by an Oracle, to pronounce him the wisest man. Iustine Martyr affirmeth, that Plato had read the Scriptures; and S. Augustine gaue this iudgement of him, as his opinion, that (few things changed) he might be counted a Christian. And it seemeth to me, that both Tertullian and Eusebius conceiue, that Socrates, by that place aforesaid, meant the celestiall Paradise, and not this of Eden. Solinus, I grant, reporteth, that there is a place exceeding delightfull and healthfull, vpon the top of Mount Athos (called Acrothonos) which being aboue all clouds of rayne, or other inconuenience, the people (by reason of their many yeeres) are called Macrobioi (that is) Long-liued. A further argument is vsed, for proofe of the heighth of this place, because therein was Enoch preserued from the violence of the floud: approued by Isidore, and Peter Lombard; in which place also Tertullian conceiued, that the blessed soules were preserued till the last iudgement; which Irenæus, and Iustine Martyr also beleeued. But this opinion was of all Catholike Diuines reproued, and in the Florentine Councell damned; of which S. Augustine more modestly gaue this iudgement.

Diog. Laert. in Sco.

Iustin. Mart. adm. ad Gent. Aug.

iudgement. Sicut certum est ENOCH & ELIAM nunc viuere: ita vbi nunc sunt, an in Paradiso an alibi, incertum est; (that is) As it is certayne that ENOCH and ELIAS doe now liue: so where they now liue, in Paradise or elsewhere, it is vncertayne. But Barcephas giues a third cause, though of all other the weakest. For (saith he) it was necessarie that Paradise should be set at such a distance and heighth, because the foure Riuers (had they not fallen so precipitate) could not haue had sufficient force to haue thrust themselues vnder the great Ocean, and afterwards haue forced their passage through the earth, and haue risen againe in the farre distant Regions of India, Ægypt, and Armenia.

These strange fancies and dreames haue beene answered by diuers learned men long since, and lately by Hopkins and Pererius writing vpon this subiect; of whose arguments I will repeate these few: for to vse long discourse against those things, which are both against Scripture and Reason, might rightly be iudged a vanitie in the Answerer, not much inferior to that of the Inuenter.

It is first therefore alleaged, that such a place cannot be commodious to liue in: for being set so neere the Moone, it had beene too neere the Sunne, and other heauenly bodies. Secondly, because it must haue beene too ioynct a Neighbour to the Element of fire. Thirdly, because the aire in that Region is so violently moued, and carryed about with such swiftnesse, as nothing in that place can consist or haue abiding. Fourthly, because the place betweene the Earth and the Moone (according to Ptolemie and Alfraganus) is seuenteene times the Diameter of the Earth, which makes by a grosse account about one hundred and twentie thousand miles. Hereupon it must follow, that Paradise, being raised to this heighth, must haue the compasse of the whole earth for a Basis & foundation. But had it been so raised, it could hardly be hidden from the knowledge, or eyes of men: seeing it would depriue vs of the Sunnes light, all the fore-part of the day, being seated in the East, as they suppose. Now, to fortifie the former opinions, Tostatus addeth this, that those people which dwell neere those falls of waters, are deafe from their infancie, like those which dwell neere the Catadupæ, or ouer-falls of Nilus. But this I hold as fayned. For I haue seene in the Indies, far greater water-falls, than those of Nilus, and yet the people dwelling neere them, are not deafe at all. Tostatus (the better to strengthen himselfe) citeth Basil and Ambrose together: to which PERERIVS, Sed ego hac apud BASILIVM & AMBROSIVM in eorum scriptis, quæ nunc extant, nusquam me legere memini; But I doe not remember (saith he) that I euer read those things, either in BASIL or AMBROSE.

Cicero Somn. Scip.

But for the bodies of Enoch and Elias, God hath disposed of them according to his wisdome. Their taking vp might be into the celestiall Paradise, for ought we know. For although flesh and bloud, subiect to corruption, cannot inherit the Kingdome of heauen, and the seede must rot in the ground before it grow, yet we shall not all die (saith S. PAVL) but all shall be changed: which change, in Enoch and Elias, was easie to him that is Almightie. But for the rest, the Scriptures are manifest, that by the floud all perished on the earth, sauing eight persons, and therefore in the terrestriall Paradise they could not be.

1. Cor. 15. 36. 51. 1. Pet. 3. 20.

For Tostatus his owne opinion, who soared not altogether so high as the rest, but beleeued that Paradise was raysed aboue the middle Region of the aire, and twentie cubits aboue all Mountaines, that the floud did not therefore reach it: (which Scotus and other later Schoole-men also beleeued; for, say they, there were no sinners in Paradise, and therefore no cause to ouer-whelme it:) this is also contrarie to the expresse letter of the Scripture: which directly, and without admitting of any distinction teacheth vs, that the waters ouer-flowed all the mountaynes vnder heauen. And were it otherwise, then might we aswell giue credit to Masius Damascenus, and the Thalmudists, who affirme, that there were of the Giants that saued themselues on the Mountayne Baris, and on Sion. But to helpe this, Scotus, being (as the rest of the Schoolemen are) full of distinctions, saith; That the waters stood at Paradise, as they did in the Red Sea, and at Iordan; and as the floud was not naturall, so was Paradise saued by miracle. And Thomas Aquinas qualifieth this high conceit with this supposition, That it was not beleeued, that Paradise was so seated, as Beda and others seeme to affirme in wordes, but by Hyperbole and comparatiuely, for the delicacie and beautie so resembled. But this I dare auow of all those Schoole-men, that though they were exceeding wittie, yet they better teach all their Followers to shift, then to resolue, by their distinctions. Wherefore not to stay long in answering this opinion of Tostatus, I confesse that it is written, that the Mountaynes of Olympus, Atho, and Atlas, ouer-reach and surmount all windes and clouds, and that (notwithstanding) there is found on the heads of the Hills both springs and fruits; and the Pagan Priests, sacrificing on these Mountaine tops, do not find the ashes (remaining of their sacrifices) blowne thence, nor thence washt off by raines, when they returne: yet experience hath resolued vs, that these reports are fabulous, and Plinie himselfe (who was not sparing in the report of wonders) auoweth the contrarie. But were it granted, yet the heighth of these Mountaynes is far vnder the supposed place of Paradise; and on these selfe Hills the ayre is so thinne (saith S. Augustine, whom herein I mistrust) that it is not sufficient to beare vp the body of a bird, hauing therein no feeling of her wings, or any sensible resistance of ayre to mount her selfe by.

by

§. VIII.

Of their opinion that seate Paradise vnder the Æquinoctiall: and of the pleasant habitation vnder those Climates.

THose which come neerer vnto reason, finde Paradise vnder the Æquinoctiall line, as Tertullian, Bonauenture, and Durandus: iudging, that there-vnder might be found most pleasure, and the greatest fertilitie of soile: but against it Thomas Aquinas obiecteth the distemperate heate, which he supposeth to be in all places so directly vnder the Sunne; but this is (non causa pro causa) for although Paradise could not be vnder the line, because Eden is farre from it, in which Paradise was; and because there is no part of Euphrates, Tigris, or Ganges vnder it, (Ganges being one of the foure Riuers, as they suppose) yet this conceit of distemper, (being but an old opinion) is found to be very vntrue, though for the coniecture not to be condemned, considering the age when those Fathers wrote, grounded chiefly on this: that whereas it appeared, that euery Countrie, as it lay by degrees neerer the Tropick, and so toward the Æquinoctiall, did so much the more exceede in heate; It was therefore a reasonable coniecture, that those Countries which were situated directly vnder it, were of a distemper vninhabitable: but it seemeth that Tertullian conceiued better, and so did Auicenne, for they both thought them habitable enough; and though (perchance) in those dayes it might be thought a fantasticall opinion (as all are which goe against the vulgar) yet we now finde, that if there be any place vpon the earth of that nature, beautie, and delight, that Paradise had, the same must be found within that supposed vninhabitable burnt Zone, or within the Tropicks, and neerest to the line it selfe. For hereof experience hath informed Reason, and Time hath made those things apparent, which were hidden and could not by any contemplation be discouered. Indeede it hath so pleased God to prouide for all liuing creatures, wherewith he hath filled the world, that such inconueniences which we contemplate a-farre off, are found by tryall and the witnesse of mens trauailes, to be so qualified, as there is no portion of the earth made in vaine, or as a fruitlesse lump to fashion out the rest. For, God himselfe (saith ISAY) that formed the earth and made it, he that prepared it, he created it not in vaine, he formed it to be inhabited. Now we finde that these hottest Regions of the world, seated vnder the Æquinoctiall line, or neere it, are so refreshed with a daily gale of Easternely winde (which the Spaniards call the Brize, that doth euermore blow strongest in the heate of Isay 45.18.

of the day, as the downe-right beames of the Sunne cannot so much master it, that there is any inconuenience or distemperate heate found thereby. Secondly, the nights are so cold, fresh, and equall, by reason of the entire interposition of the earth, as (for those places which my selfe haue seene, neere the Line and vnder it) I know no other part of the world of better, or equall temper: Onely there are some tracts, which by accident of high Mountaynes are barr'd from this aire and fresh wind, and some few sandie parts without trees, which are not therefore so well inhabited as the rest; and such difference of soiles we finde also in all other parts of the World. But (for the greatest part) those Regions haue so many goodly Riuers, Fountaynes and little Brookes, abundance of high Cedars, and other stately trees casting shade, so many sorts of delicate fruits, euer bearing, and at all times beautified with blossome and fruit, both greene and ripe, as it may of all other parts be best compared to the Paradise of Eden: the boughes and branches are neuer vnclothed and left naked, their sap creepeth not vnder ground into the roote, fearing the iniurie of the frost: neither doth Pomona at any times despise her withered husband Vertumnus, in his winter quarters and old age. Therefore are these Countries called Terra vitiosa; Vicious Countries: for Nature being liberall to all without labour, necessitie imposing no industrie or trauell, idlenesse bringeth forth no other fruits then vaine thoughts, and licentious pleasures. So that to conclude this part, Tertullian and those of his opinion were not deceiued in the nature of the place: but Aquinas, who misliked this opinion, and followed a worse. And (to say the truth) all the Schoole-men were grosse in this particular.

Of the change of the names of places: and that besides that Eden in Cœlesyria, there is a Countrey in Babylon, once of this name, as is proued out of ESA. 37. and EZECH. 27.

THese opinions answered, and the Region of Eden not found in any of those imaginarie worlds, nor vnder Torrida Zona; it followeth that now we discouer and finde out the seate thereof, for in it was Paradise by God planted. The difficultie of which search resteth chiefly in this, That as all Nations haue often changed names with their Masters; so are most of these places, by Moses remembred, forgotten by those names of all Historians and Geographers, as well ancient as moderne.

Besides, we finde that the Assyrians, Babylonians, Medes and Persians (Cyrus only and few other excepted) sought to extinguish the Hebrewes. The Gracians hated both their Nation and their Religion; and the Romanes despised once to remember them in any of their stories. And as those three Monarchies succeeded each other: so did they transforme the names of all those principall Places & Cities in the East: and after them, the Turke hath sought (what he could) to extinguish in all things, the ancient memorie of those people; which he hath subiected and inthralled.

Now besides those notable markes, Euphrates & Tigris, the better to find the way, which leadeth to the Countrie of Eden, we are to take for guides these two considerations (to wit) That it lay Eastward from Canaan & Iudæa; and that it was of all other the most beautiful and fertile. First then in respect of situation, the next Country to Iudæa Eastward was Arabia Petræa; but in this Region was Moses himselfe when he wrote: and the next vnto it Eastward also was Arabia the Desart, both which in respect of the infertilitie could not be Eden, neither haue any of the Arabians any such Riuers, as are expreſt to run out of it: So as it followeth of necessitie, that Eden must be Eastward, and beyond both Arabia Petræa, and Deserta. But because Eden is by Moses named by it selfe, and by the fertilitie, and the Riuers only described, we must ſeeke it in other Scriptures, and where it is by the additions of the neighbour Nations better deſcribed. In the Prophet Iſay I finde it coupled and accompanyed with other adjacent Countries, in theſe wordes, ſpoken in the perſon of Senacherib by RABSAKEH: Haue the gods of the Nations deliuered them, which my Fathers haue deſtroyed, as GOSAN, and HARAN, and RESEPH, and the children of EDEN, which were at Telaſſar? and in Ezechiel, where he prophecieth againſt the Tyrians: They of Haran, and Canneh, and Eden, the Merchants of Sheba, Aſhur, and Chilmad, were thy Merchants, &c. Iſai. 37. v. 12. Cap. 27. verſ. 23.

But to auoid confuſion, we muſt vnderſtand that there were two Edens, one of which the Prophet Amos remembreth, where he diuideth Syria into three Prouinces, whereof, the firſt he maketh Syria Damaſcene, or Decapolitan: the ſecond part is that Valley called Auenis, otherwiſe Conuallis, or the Tract of Chamath, where Aſſyria is ioyned to Arabia the Deſart, and where Ptolemie placeth the Citie of Aueria: and the third is knowne by the name of Domus Edenis, or Cœleſyria, otherwiſe Vallis cana, or the hollow Valley, becauſe the Mountaynes of Libanus and Antilibanus, take all the length of it on both ſides, and border it: for Coele in Greeke is Caua in Latine. But this is not that Eden, which we ſeeke: neither doth this Prouince lye Eaſt from Canaan, but North, and ſo ioyneth vnto it, as it could not be vnknowne to the Hebrewes. Yet, becauſe there is a little Citie therein called Paradiſe, the Iewes beleeued this Cœleſyria to be the ſame which Moſes deſcribeth. For the ſame cauſe doth Hopkins in his Treatiſe of Paradiſe reprehend Beroaldus, in that he confoundeth this Eden, with the other Eden of Paradiſe: though to giue Beroaldus his right, I conceiue that he led the way to Hopkins, and to all other later Writers, ſauing, That he fayled in diſtinguiſhing theſe two Regions, both called Eden: and that he altogether miſvnderſtood two of the foure Riuers (to wit) Piſon and Gehon, as ſhall appeare hereafter. Now to finde out Eden, which (as Moſes teacheth vs) lay Eaſtward from the Deſarts, where he wrote, after he had paſſed the Red Sea; wee muſt conſider where thoſe other Countries are found, which the Prophet Iſay and Ezechiel ioyneth with it. For (ſaith ESAIAH) Goſan, Haran, and Reſeph, and the children of Eden, which were at Telaſſar. Alſo Ezechiel ioyneth Haran with Eden, who, together with thoſe of Sheba, Aſhur, and Chilmad, were the Merchants that traded with the Citie of Tyre, which was then (ſaith EZECHIEL) the Mart of the people for many Iſles. And it hath euer beene the cuſtome, that the Perſians conueyed their merchandiſe to Babylon, and to thoſe Cities vpon Euphrates, and Tigris, and from thence tranſported them into Syria, now Soria, and to the Port of the Mediterrane Sea: as in ancient times to the Citie of Tyre, afterward to Tripoly, and now to Aleppo, from whence they imbarque them at the Port of Alexandretta, in the Bay of Iſicus, now Laiazzo. Ezechiel in the deſcription of the magnificence of Tyre, and of the exceeding trade that it had with all the Nations of the Eaſt, as the onely Mart-towne of that part of the world, reciteth both the people, with whom they had commerce, and alſo what commodities euery Countrie yeelded: and hauing counted the ſeuerall People and Countries, he addeth the particular trade, which each of them exerciſed: They were thy Merchants (ſaith the Prophet) in all ſorts of things, in rayments of blue ſilke, and of broidered workes, fine linnen, corrall and pearle: and afterwards ſpeaking of the Merchants of Sheba and Raamah, and what kindes they traded, he hath theſe wordes: The Merchants of Sheba and Raamah were thy Merchants, they occupied in thy Fayres, with the chiefe of all Spices, and with all precious ſtones and gold. Now theſe be indeed the riches which Perſia and Arabia Fœlix yeeld: and becauſe Sheba and Raama are thoſe parts of Arabia, which border the Sea, called the Perſian Gulfe, therefore did thoſe Nations both vent ſuch Spice, ſweet Gummes, and Pearles, as their owne Countries yeelded, and (withall) hauing trade with their Neighbours of India, had from them alſo all ſorts of ſpices, and plentie of gold. The better to conuey theſe commodities to that great Mart of Tyre, the Shebans or Arabians entred by the mouth of Tigris, and from the Citie of Terredon (built or enlarged by Nabuchodonozor, now called Balſara) thence thence sent vp all these rich merchandises by boate to Babylon, from whence by the body of Euphrates, as farre as it bended Westward, and afterward by a branch thereof, which reacheth within three dayes iourney of Aleppo, and then ouer Land they past to Tyre, as they did afterward to Tripoly (formerly Hieropolis) and thence to Alexandretta, as aforesaid. Now the Merchants of Canneh, which Ezechiel ioyneth with Eden, inhabited farre vp the Riuer, and receiued this trade from Arabia & India, besides those proper commodities which themselues had, and which they receiued out of Persia, which bordered them. S. Hierome vnderstandeth by Canneh, Seleucia, which is seated vpon Euphrates, where it breaketh into foure heads, and which tooke that name from Seleucus, who made thereof a magnificent Citie. Hierosolymitanus thinkes it to be Ctesiphon, but Ctesiphon is seated downe low vpon Tigris, and Canneh cannot be on that side, I meane on the East-side of Tigris, for then were it out of the Valley of Shinar. Plinie placeth the Schenite vpon Euphrates, where the same beginneth to be foordable, which is toward the border of Syria, after it leaueth to be the bound of Arabia the Desart, & where the Riuer of Euphrates reflecteth from the Desart of Palmirena: for these people of Canneh (afterward Schenitæ) inhabited both borders of Euphrates, stretching themselues from their owne Citie of Canneh in Shinar Westward along the banks of Euphrates, as farre as the Citie of Thapsacus, where Ptolemie appointed the Foords of Euphrates: which also agreeth with the description of the Schenitæ by Strabo, whose wordes are these: Mercatoribus ex Syria Seleuciam & Babyloniam euntibus iter est per Schenitas; The Merchants which trauaile from Syria to Seleucia and Babylon, take their way by the Schenites. Therefore those which take Canneh for Charran, doe much mistake it. For Charran, to which Abraham came from Vr in Chaldæa (called by God) standeth also in Mesopotamia, not vpon Euphrates it selfe, but vpon the Riuer of Chaboras, which falleth into Euphrates: and the Merchants of Charran are distinctly named with those of Canneh in Ezechiel (as) they of Haran, and Canneh, and Eden, the Merchants of Sheba, Asshur, and Chilmad were thy Merchants. Wherefore Charran which is sometime called Charre, and Haran, and Aran, is but the same Charran of Mesopotamia; and when it is written Aran, then it is taken for the Region of Mesopotamia: or Aran fluuiorum, the Greeke word (Mesopotamia) importing, a Countrie betweene Riuers: for Meso in Greeke, is Medius in Latine, and Potamos, fluuius; and when it is written Haran or Aran, it is then taken for the Citie it selfe, to which Abraham came from Vr (as aforesaid.) For Strabo in the description of Arabia, giueth that Tract of Land from the borders of Cœlesyria, to the edge of Mesopotamia, to the Schenitæ, who also inhabited on both sides of Euphrates, and were in after-ages accounted of these Arabians which inhabite Batanea, and the North part of the Desarts, stretching themselues toward the vnhabited Solitude of Palmirena, which lyeth betweene Syria, and Arabia the Desart. So as these of Canneh lay in the very high-way from Babylon to Tyre, and were Neighbours (indifferent) to Charran and to Eden: and therefore they are by the Prophet Ezechiel coupled together, They of Haran, and Canneh, and Eden, &c. But S. Hierome made a good interpretation of Canneh, or Chalne, by Seleucia: for Seleucia was anciently called Chalanne (witnesse Appian;) and so Rabanus Maurus calleth it in his Commentaries vpon Genesis; the name by time and mixture of languages being changed from Chalne or Canneh, to Chalanne: of which name there are two other Cities, standing in Triangle with Seleucia, and almost the next vnto it, (as) Thelbe-canne, and Mann-canne; the one a little to the West of Seleucia, and the other opposite vnto it, where these Riuers of Tigris and Euphrates are readie to ioyne. Therefore, which of these the ancient Canne was, (being all three within the bound of the Valley Shinar) it is vncertayne: but it is a note aswell of the importance of the place, as of the certayne seate thereof, that so many other Cities did retayne a part of the name in so many ages after. Neither is it vnlikely, that these additions of Thelbe and Mann to the word Canne, were but to make difference betweene the East and the West, or the greater and the lesse Canne, or betweene Canne the old, and the new: which additions to distinguish Cities by, are ordinarie in all the Regions of the world.

Gen.11.31.

Now

Now of the other Citie ioyned with Eden, as Haran or Charran, S. Hierome on the Iudges speaketh thereof in these wordes: Cumq; reuerterentur, peruenerunt ad Charran, quæ est in medio itinere contra Niniuen, vndecimo die; When they returned, they came to Charran, (which is the mid-way against Niniue) the eleuenth day. Iud. 1.

This Citie is by the Martyr Stephen named Charran (speaking to the high Priest:) Yee Men, Brethren, and Fathers, harken: The God of glorie appeared to our Father ABRAHAM, while he was in Mesopotamia, before he dwelt in Charran. Act. 7. 1. But the seate of this Citie is not doubted of: for it is not only remembred in many Scriptures, but, withall, exceeding famous for the death and ouerthrow of Crassus the Romane, who for his vnsatiable greedinesse was called Gurges auaritiæ; The gulfe of auarice. Whereof Lucan:

Assyrius Latio maculauit sanguine Carras, Lucan. l. 1. 105.

With Roman bloud th'Assyrian Carre he defil'd.

But this Citie Canne or Chalne is made manifest by Moses himselfe, where it is written of NIMROD: And the beginning of his Kingdome was Babel, and Erech, and Acad, and Chalne, in the Land of Sinaar, or Shinar: where Moses sheweth the first composition of the Babylonian Empire, and what Cities and People were subiect vnto Nimrod, all which lay in the said Valley of Shinar or neere it; and this Valley of Shinar is that Tract, afterwards called Babylonia and Chaldæa, into which also Eden stretcheth it selfe. Chaldæa, Babylonia, Sinaar, idem sunt (saith COMESTOR.) Three names of one Countrie: which Region of Babylonia tooke name of the Towre Babel; and the Towre, of the confusion of tongues. And that Shinar was Babylonia, it is proued in the eleuenth Chapter of Genesis, in these wordes: And as they went from the East, they found a Playne in the Land of Shinar, and there they abode: in which Playne Babylon was built (as aforesaid.) Gen. 10. 10. Vers. 2.

Now Shinar being Babylonia, and Canneh, in the first beginning of Nimrods greatnesse, and before he had subdued any strange, or farre-off Nations, being one part of his Dominion, and also named by Moses to be in Shinar, it proueth, that Canneh ioyneth to Babylonia; which also Ezechiel coupleth with Eden, and (further) affirmeth, that those of Eden were also the Merchants, which traded with the Tyrians: and Esay in the threats of Senacherib against Hierusalem (with other Nations that Senacherib vaunted that his Fathers had destroyed) nameth the children of Eden which were at Telassar. But before I conclude where Eden it selfe lyeth, it is necessarie to describe those other Countries, which Ezechiel ioyneth therewith in the places before remembred, as, those of Sheba and Raamah. It is written in Genesis the tenth: Moreouer the sonnes of HAM were CVSH, &c. And the sons of CVSH were SEBA, and HAVILAH, and SABTAH, & RAAMAH, &c. And the sons of RAAMAH were SHEBA, &c. and anon after, CVSH begat NIMROD: so as Sheba was the grand-child of Cush, and Nimrod the sonne of Cush, whose elder brother was Sebah: though some there are that conceiue to the contrarie, that Nimrod was the elder in valour and vnderstanding, though not in time and precedence of birth; who inhabited that part of Shinar, where Babel was built, afterwards Babylonia. His brother Raamah or Regma tooke that part adioyning to Shinar, toward the Sea side and Persian Gulfe (called afterward Raama and Sheba, by the Father and his Sonnes, which possessed it.) For (saith EZECHIEL) the Merchants of Raamah and Sheba were thy Merchants, they occupyed in thy Faires with the chiefe of all spices, and all precious stones, and gold. So as Sheba was that Tract of Countrie, which parteth Arabia Deserta from Arabia Fœlix, and which ioyneth to the Sea where Tigris and Euphrates fall out, and render themselues to the Ocean. This part, and the confining Countrie Strabo calleth Catabaria, where the best Myrrhe and Frankincense is gathered; which people haue an interchange or trade with Elana, lying on Vers. 7. Strabo, l. 16.

the East side of the Persian Gulfe. By this it appeareth who were the Shebeans, spoken of by Ezechiel, and said to haue beene the Merchants of Tyre, for gold, spices, and precious stones: of which they had not onely plentie of their owne, but were also furnished from that part of India (called Elana, according to Strabo) for exchange of their Aromatiques, and other proper commodities. For as Strabo reporteth out of ERATOSTHENES: In Persicæ oræ initio Insula est, in qua multi & pretiosi vniones gignantur: in alijs vero, clari & perlucidi lapilli. ERATOSTHENES (saith STRABO) affirmeth, that in the beginning of the Persian Gulfe, there is an Island, in which there are many precious pearles bred: and in other, very cleare and shining stones. Now, the difference betweene Sheba, the sonne of Raamah, and Seba, the sonne of Cush, is in this, That Seba is written with the Hebrew (Samech;) and Sheba with (Schin:) but whatsoeuer the difference may be in the Hebrew Orthographie, their Countries and habitations are diuers. For Sheba is that part which bordereth the Persian Sea; and Saba (whence the Queene of Saba) neighboured the red Sea; and so that place of the 72. Psalme, expounded, Reges Arabum & Saba, hath in the Hebrew this sense: Reges Shebæ & Sabæ.

The Shebans, Ezechiel nameth together with the Edenites, because they inhabited vpon the Out-let of the same riuer, vpon which the Edenites were seated: and so those of Sheba, towards the Sea-coast, and vpon it, past vp the Countrie, by Tigris and Euphrates, being ioined in one maine streame, and so through the Region of Eden, which Tigris boundeth, thereby the better to conuey their merchandise toward Tyre. And as the Cities of Charran, and Canneh, border Eden on the West and Northwest: so doth Sheba on the South, and Chilmad on the North-east. Chilmad being a Region of the higher Media, as appeareth in the Chaldæan Paraphrast, which Countrie by the Geographers is called Coromitena, (L) placed by exchange for (R:) which change the Hebrewes also often vse.

Thus much of those Countries which border Eden, and who altogether traded with the Tyrians: of which, the chiefe were the Edenites, inhabiting Telassar: for these Senacharib vaunted, that his Fathers had destroyed; and this place of Telassar lay most conuenient, both to receiue the Trade from Sheba and Arabia, and also to conuey it ouer into Syria, and to Tyrus. Now to make these things the more plaine, we must remember, that before the death of Senacharib, many parts of the Babylonian Empire fell from his obedience, and after his death these Monarchies were vtterly disioyned.

For it appeareth both in Esai the 37. and in the second of Kings, by the threates of Rabsache, the while the Armie of Assyria lay before Hierusalem, that the Cities of Gosan, Haran, Reseph, and the Edenites at Telassar, had resisted the Assyrians, though by them (in a sort) mastered and recouered. Esa. 37. v. 12. Haue the gods of the Nations deliuered them, whom my Fathers haue destroyed, as Gosan, and Haran, Reseph, and the children of Eden, which were at Telassar? But it appeared manifestly after Senacharibs death, that these Nations formerly contending, were then freed from the others subiection: for Esar-Haddon held Assyria, and Merodach Baladan, Babylonia. And after that the Armie of Senacharib, commanded by Rabsache, which lay before Hierusalem (Ezechias then raigning) while Senacharib was in Egypt, was by the Angell of God destroyed: 2. Kings 19. 35. the King of Babel sent to Ezechias, both to congratulate the recouerie of his health, 20. 12. and his victorie obtained ouer the Assyrians. After which ouerthrow, Senacharib Esa. 39. 1. himselfe was slaine by his owne sonnes in the Temple of his Idoles, Esar-Haddon succeeding him in Assyria. To the Babylonian Ambassadours sent by Merodach, Ezechias Esa. 37. 38. shewed all his treasures, aswell proper as consecrate, which inuited the Kings of Babylon afterward to vndertake their conquest and subuersion. So as, the suspition of warre encreasing betweene Babylon and Assyria, the Edenites which inhabited the Esa. 39. 1. borders of Shinar towards the North, and towards Assyria, were imployed to beare off the incursions of the Assyrians; and their Garrison-place was at Telassar: and the very word (Telassar) saith Iunius, signifying as much, as a Bulwarke against the Assyrians.

rians. This place Hieroſolymitanus takes for Reſem; others for Seleucia: but this Telaſſar is the ſame, which Am. Marcellinus in the Hiſtorie of Iulian (whom he followed in the enterprize of Perſia) calleth Thilutha in ſtead of Telaſſar, who deſcribeth the exceeding ſtrength thereof in his 24. Booke: It is ſeated in an Iſland of Euphrates vpon a ſteepe and vnaſſaultable Rocke, in ſo much as the Emperour Iulian durſt not attempt it; and therefore it was a conuenient place for a Garriſon againſt the Aſſyrians, being alſo a paſſage out of Meſopotamia into Babylonia, and in which the Edenites of the Countrey adioyning were lodged to defend the ſame. This place Ptolomie calleth Teridata, hauing Reſeph (which he calleth Reſepha) on the left hand, and Canneh, (which he calleth Thelbe-canne) on the right hand, not far from whence is alſo found the Citie of Mann-canne vpon Tigris, and all theſe ſeated together, as Eſay and Exechiel haue ſorted them. Aſia. Tab. 4.

But the vnderſtanding of theſe places is the more difficult, becauſe Aſſyria (which the Chaldæans call Atturia) and Meſopotamia, were ſo often confounded: the one taken for the other by interchange of Dominion. Aſſyria & Meſopotamia in Babyloniæ nomen tranſierunt (ſaith NIGER,) Aſſyria and Meſopotamia tooke the name of Babylonia. Laſtly, it appeareth by thoſe adiacent Regions by the Prophets named, in what part of the world Eden is ſeated, as, by Charran or Haran in Meſopotamia: alſo by Canneh and Reſeph, according to the opinion of Vatablus, who in theſe wordes tranſlateth this place: Plantauerat autem IEHOVAH Deus hortum in Eden, ab Oriente, The Lord God planted a garden in Eden, Eaſtward: that is (ſaith he in his Annotations.) Iuſſerat naſci arbores in Eden, Regione Orientali, in finibus Arabiæ & Meſopotamiæ, He commanded trees to grow in Eden, an Eaſterne Region in the borders of Arabia and Meſopotamia. Coſmog. Aſiæ.

§. X.

Of diuers other teſtimonies of the land of Eden; and that this is the Eden of Paradiſe.

AND for a more particular pointing out of this Eden, it ſeemes by the two Epiſtles of the Neſtorian Chriſtians, that inhabite Meſopotamia, which Epiſtles in the yeere 1552. they ſent to the Pope about the confirming of their Patriarch, and Andreas Maſius hath publiſhed them, tranſlated out of Syriac into Latine. By theſe Epiſtles (I ſay) it ſeemes we may haue ſome farther light for the proofe of that, which we haue ſaid about the Region of Eden in thoſe parts. For in them both there is mention of the Iſland of Eden in the Riuer Tigris, or at leaſt, Tigris in both theſe Epiſtles is called the Riuer of Eden. This Iſland, as Maſius in his Præface to theſe Epiſtles ſaith, is commonly called Gezoria (as it were, the Iſland, by an eminencie) It hath (ſaith he) tenne miles in circuit, and was ſometimes walled round about, which name of the Iſland Eden may (doubtleſſe) remaine to this day; though in the reſt of the Region ſo called this name be ſwallowed vp, with the fame of thoſe flouriſhing Kingdomes of Meſopotamia, Aſſyria, Babylonia, and Chaldæa. This Iſland of Eden hath vp the Riuer, and not farre beyond it, the Citie of Haſan-Cepha, otherwiſe Fortis Petra: below it, it hath Moſal or Moſel, from which (as in that which followeth it ſhall appeare out of Maſius) it is not aboue twelue miles diſtant. Neither is it to trouble vs, that Moſal or Moſel by Marius Niger is remembred among the Cities higher vp Tigris, in theſe wordes. Iuxta autem Tigrim, Ciuitates ſunt Dorbeta prope Taurum montem, quæ nunc Moſel dicitur; magna ſanè, &c. (that is) By Tigris are theſe Cities, Dorbeta neere vnto mount Taurus (which is now called Moſel) which is a great one, &c. This opinion of Niger, diſplacing Moſel, and making it to be Dorbeta (I ſay) needes not here to trouble vs: ſeeing for this matter, the teſtimonie of Maſius informed by the Chriſtians that dwelt there (the Seat of whoſe Patriarch it is) ought to be of credit, auowing that this Moſal (or Mozal) is in the confines of Meſopotamia and Aſſyria, ſeated vpon Tigris, and in the neighbour- Vt ſupra.

hood of Ninive; and that it is the famous Seleucia Parthorum. The Nestorian Christians in their former Epistle, call it Attur in these words: Ex omnibus Ciuitatibus & pagis quæ sunt circum Ciuitatem Mozal (hoc est) Attur in vicinia Niniues; Of all the Cities and townes which are about the Citie of Mozal (that is) Attur in the neighbourhood of Ninive. As also Niger acknowledgeth Ctesiphon, a Citie thereabout to be called Assur (which is the same as Attur, after the Dialect of those Nations, which change Sh into T.) Neither is it much that he should mistake Ctesiphon (which is not farre off Seleucia) for Seleucia, to be Assur. By this then wee may come somewhat neere the end of our purpose. For the Ile of Eden, which lyeth in the brest of Tigris, is but twelue miles from Mosal, and that ancient Citie, which Ptolomie and Tacitus call Ninus, and the Scriptures Nineue, Philostratus, and Simeon Sethi, Mosula, and Iohn Leon Mosal, others Mosse, (though it bee not the same with Mosal) is set but a little higher vpon the same riuer of Tigris, neere Mosal: so that wee are like to finde this Ile of Eden here-about. For the same Andræas Masius, which placeth it aboue Mosal, makes it to be belowe Hasan-chepha, which is vpon the same riuer of Tigris.

The onely difficultie is this, that some perhaps may thinke, that the words of the Nestorians in both their Epistles, speake not of any Ile in Tigris, called the Ile of Eden, but of an Ile in Tigris, a riuer of Eden. But this sense of their words in my opinion seemeth the more vnprobable. And yet if this were the meaning heere, we haue a testimonie from the learned of those parts, that not onely Euphrates, but also Tigris was a riuer of Eden, and that the name of Eden in those parts is not yet quite worne out, though the Region hath beene subiect to the same change, that all other kingdomes of the world haue beene, and hath by conquest, and corruption of other languages, receiued new and differing names. For the South part of Eden, which stretcheth ouer Euphrates, was after the floud called Shinar, and then of the tower of Babel, Babylonia; and the North part of Eden is that Tract of Mesopotamia, Assyria, and Armenia, which embraceth both the banks of Tigris, betweene Mount Taurus, and Seleucia. And of this Region of Eden that ancient ÆTHICVS maketh mention, (not that latter ÆTHICVS, disciple of CALLINICVS, otherwise by PLVTARCH and ATHENÆVS called ISTRI, who liued in Ægypt in the reigne of PHILADELPHVS, but another of a farre higher and remote time) the same being made Latine out of Greeke by S. HIEROME. And though by corruption of the ancient copie it bee written in ÆTHICVS, Adonis for Edenis; yet Adonis being a riuer of Phœnicia, cannot be vnderstood to bee the Region named by ÆTHICVS. For ÆTHICVS makes it a Countrie, and not a riuer, and ioyneth it with Mesopotamia and Æthiopia, calling the land of CHVS Æthiopia, after the Vulgar, and Septuagint. And lastly, the Riuer which watereth the Regions (sayth ÆTHICVS) falleth into the Gulfe of Persia: which Riuer hee calleth Armodius, for Tigris; Tigris being but a name imposed for the swiftnesse thereof. And out of Armenia both Tigris and Euphrates haue their originall: for out of Eden came a riuer, or riuers, to water the Garden, both which Riuers (to wit) Tigris and Euphrates, come out of Armenia, and both of them trauerse Mesopotamia, Regions first of all knowne by the name of Eden for their beautie and fertilitie. And it is very probable, that Eden contained also some part of Armenia, and the excellent fertilitie thereof in diuers places, is not vnworthie the name of Eden. For in some part thereof (sayth STRABO) the leaues are alwayes greene, and therefore therein a perpetuall Spring. Also STEPHANVS de vrbibus mentioneth the Citie of Adana vpon Euphrates: and the name of Eden was in vse in Amos time, though he speake not of Eden in the East, but of Eden in Celesyria. But to the end I may not burden the Readers patience with too long a discourse, it may suffice to know, that Euphrates and Tigris (once ioyned together, and afterward separate) are two of those foure heads, into which these Riuers which are said to water the Garden of Paradise, were diuided: whose courses being knowne, Eden, (out of which they are said to come) cannot be vnknowne. Now that Hiddekel and Perath were Tigris and Euphrates, it is agreed by all: for the Sententie and all others conuert Perath by Euphrates: & Hiddekel Tigrim omnes exponunt: and all men vnderſtand Hiddekel by Tigris (ſayth VATABLE.) And becauſe that which I haue ſayd of the Ile of Eden, ſhall not bee ſubiect to the cenſure of ſelfe-inuention, I haue heere-vnder ſet downe the words out of the two generall Epiſtles of the Neſtorians, as Maſius (ad verbum) hath conuerted them into Latine. The occaſion of thoſe Letters and Supplications to the Pope were, that the Neſtorian Chriſtians which inhabit Meſopotamia, Aſſyria, Perſia, and Babylonia, and haue to this day (at leaſt in Queene Maries time they had) fifteene Churches in one Citie, called Seleucia Parthorum, or Moſel vpon the Riuer of Tigris, hauing no ſufficient authoritie to chooſe themſelues a Patriarch (which cannot be done without foure or three Metropolitane Biſhops at leaſt) ſent to the Biſhop of Rome in the yeere of Chriſt 1552. (as aforeſaid) a Petition to obtaine allowance vnto ſuch an election as themſelues had made: hauing three hundred yeere before that vpon the like defect, ſent one Marius thither to bee confirmed; and in this negotiation they made knowne to the Biſhop of Rome the ſtate of the Chriſtian Church in thoſe parts: for vpon the death of their Patriarch (who of a couetous deſire to enrich himſelfe had forborne to inſtitute Metropolitane Biſhops, when the places fell void) they all aſſembled themſelues together to conſult of the Church-gouernment. And becauſe all the Patriarchs for 100. yeeres had beene of one houſe and family to the preiudice of the Church, and that there yet remained one Biſhop of the ſame Stocke and Kindred, who aſpired to the ſame dignitie, which his Predeceſſours had held, the reſt of the Profeſſours refuſed to allow him. Vpon which occaſion, and for the choice of a Gouernour more ſufficient, the Teachers in all the Churches aſſembled themſelues. The words of the generall Epiſtle to the Pope are theſe, about the middle of the ſaid Epiſtle: Verùm nos non acceptauimus neq; proclamauimus ipſum, ſed ſubitò conuenimus ex omnibus locis Orientalibus, & ex omnibus Ciuitatibus & Pagis quæ ſunt circum Ciuitatem Moſel (hoc eſt) Attur, in vicinia Niniues, ex Babylonia, ex Charrha, ex Arbella, ex Inſula quæ eſt in medio Tigris, fluminis Eden, ex Tauris Perſiæ, ex Niſibi, &c. which is: But wee did neyther accept of this man, neyther pronounced him: but ſuddenly we aſſembled our ſelues out of all parts of the Eaſt, and out of all the Cities and Villages which are about Moſel (or Attur) neighbouring Niniue, and out of Babylon, Carrha, Arbella, and out of the Iland which lyeth in the middle of Tigris, a Riuer of Eden, or rather, out of the Ile of Eden, which lyeth in the Riuer Tigris. And in a ſecond Epiſtle at the ſametime ſent, they vſe theſe words: Neq; ſuperſunt apud nos Metropolitæ, quorum eſt ordinare Catholicum, ſed ſoli pauci Epiſcopi, Epiſcopus Arbelæ, Epiſcopus Salmaſti, Epiſcopus Adurbeigan; en è veſtigio conuenimus in Inſulam, quæ eſt intra Tigrim flumen, Eden, fecimuſq; compactum inter nos, &c. (which is) Neyther are there remaining among vs any Metropolitan Biſhops to whom it belongs to ordaine a Patriarch, but onely a few Biſhops, as the Biſhop of Arbela, the Biſhop of Salmaſtus, and the Biſhop of Adurbeigan: but loe, we aſſembled ſpeedily in the Iland Eden, which is in Tigris; and agreed betweene our ſelues, &c.

Now this Iland of Eden Maſius deſcribeth with other places; which being well conceiued, the Neſtorian Epiſtles, and the ſtate of the Church may bee in thoſe parts (ſayth he) the better vnderſtood. And after hee hath diſtinguiſhed the foure ſorts of Chriſtians in thoſe parts of the World, and in the South part of Africa, which hee calleth Neſtorians, Iacobites, Maronita, and Cophti, hee goeth on in theſe wordes: Mox, audita illius morte, concurriſſe aiebant tumultuario in illam quam modo dixi Tigris Inſulam, quæ duodecim circiter paſſuum millibus ſupra Moſal poſita, decem ferè millia paſſuum ſuo ambitu continet, muris vndiq; cincta, & à paucis alijs quàm Chriſtianis hominibus habitata: which is, Now hearing of the death of the Patriarch, (as thoſe that came to Rome reported) they ran tumultuouſly together into that Iland of Tigris or Eden before ſpoken of, which Iland is ſituated about 12. miles aboue Moſel, containing very neere ten miles in compaſſe, and euery where inuironed with a wall, inhabited by a few other men than Chriſtians. And afterward he maketh a recapitulation of the Chriſtian Churches; among the reſt he addeth the Iſle of Eden by the name of Geſerta, Inſula Tigris: ſiue Geſerta.

Furthermore, describing the Citie of Hosan-cepha, or Fortis Petra, he placeth it supra prædictam Tigris Insulam rupi asperæ impositam; Aboue the foresaid Iland of Tigris, being seated on a steepe rocke. Of this Iland of Geserta, Andrew Theuet maketh mention in his tenth booke of his generall Cosmographie in these wordes: Geserta ou Gesire est au milieu de la riuiere du Tigre, & pense que c'est vne terre des plus fertiles de toute l'Asie; Geserta or Gesire is in the middle of Tigris, the soile the most fertile of all Asia.

By this we see that the ancient name of Eden liueth, and of that Eden, which lyeth Eastward from Arabia Petræa, and the Desart where Moses wrote, and that Eden which bordereth Charran according to Ezechiel, and that Eden which is seated according to the assertion of the said Prophet, and ioyned with those Nations of Reseph, Canneh, and Charran, and the rest which traded with the Tyrians, and is found at this day in the parting of the two Regions of Assyria and Babylonia, where the Edenites in Thelassar were garrisond to resist the Assyrians, whose displantation Senacherib vaunted of (as aboue written) and lastly, the same Eden, which embraceth Tigris, and looketh on Euphrates, two of the knowne Riuers of those foure, which are by all men ascribed to Paradise.

§. XI.

Of the difficultie in the Text, which seemeth to make the foure Riuers to rise from one streame.

BVt it may be obiected, that it is written in the Text, That a Riuer went out of Eden, and not Riuers, in the Plurall, which scruple Matthew Beroaldus hath thus answered in his Chronologie: The Latine Translation (saith he) hath these wordes: Et fluuius egrediebatur de loco voluptatis ad irrigandum Paradisum, qui inde diuidebatur in quatuor capita: Quæ verba melius consentient cum rei narratione, & eiusdem explicatione, si ita reddantur. Et fluuius erat egrediens ex Edene, (hoc est) fluuij procedebant ex Edene regione ad rigandum pomarium, & inde diuidebatur, & erat in quatuor capita: which is, And a Riuer went out of the place of pleasure to water Paradise, and thence was diuided into foure heads: which wordes (saith Beroaldus) doe better agree with the narration and explication of the place, if they be thus translated: And a Riuer was going forth of Eden (that is) Riuers went forth, and ran out of the Region of Eden to water the Orchard, and from thence it was diuided, and they became foure heads. The Tigurine differs from the Vulgar or Latine, for it conuerts it thus: Et fluuius egrediebatur de delicijs; And a Riuer went out of pleasure, in stead of Eden; and the Latine addeth the word locus, or place, Et fluuius egrediebatur de loco voluptatis; And a Riuer went out of the place of pleasure: and so the word (place) may rightly be referred to Eden, which was (of all other) a Region most delightfull and fertile; and so also the word (inde) and thence was diuided, hath reference to the Countrie of Eden, and not to the Garden it selfe.

And for the word (Riuer) for Riuers, it is vsuall among the Hebrewes: for it is
Gen. 1. 11. written: Let the earth bud forth the bud of the herbe, that seedeth seede, the fruitfull tree,
3. 2. &c. Here the Hebrew vseth the Singular for the Plurall, Herbe and Tree, for Herbs and Trees; and againe, we eate of the fruit of the tree, in stead of (trees:) And thirdly,
8. The man and his wife hid themselues from the presence of God; In medio ligni Paradisi; In the middle of the tree of the Garden, for (trees.) And of this opinion is Dauid Kimhi, and Vatablus, who vpon this place of Genesis say, that the Hebrewes doe often put the Singular for the Plurall, as illud, for vnumquodq; illorum, and he giueth an instance in this question it selfe, as, A Riuer (for Riuers) went out of Eden.

And this answere out of diuers of the learned, may, not without good reason, be giuen to the obiection, That Moses speaketh but of one Riuer, from which the heads should diuide themselues. Howbeit I denie not, but with as good (and perhaps better) reason, we may expound the foure heads, to be foure notable passages into famous mous Countries. And ſo we may take the word (Riuer) Verſe the tenth for one Riuer (to wit) Euphrates, as this name comprehendeth all the braneches thereof. For this Riuer, after he is paſt the place, where we ſuppoſe Paradiſe to haue beene, diuides it ſelfe, and ere long yeeldeth foure notable paſſages into ſeuerall Countries, though not all the way downe ſtreame, (for this is no where in the Text) where it is noted, that following the Riuer downward, there is conueyance into the Countries named in the Text, though part of the way to one of the Countries (to wit, to Aſſyria) were vp Tigris.

To this end the Text ſpeaking of Hiddekel, as it riſeth from the Riuer of Eden, doth not ſay it compaſſeth or waſheth the whole Region of Aſſyria, (as it had vſed this phraſe of Piſon and Gehon) but that it runneth toward Aſſyria. The firſt branch Piſon, is Nahar-malcha, (by interpretation) Baſilius, or flumen regium, which runneth into Tigris vnder Apamia, whence ariſeth the name of Paſi-tigris, (as it were) Piſo-tigris. This leadeth to the Land of Hauila or Suſiana. The ſecond branch Gehon, is that which in Hiſtorians is Nabarſares, or Narragas, for Nahar-ragas: both which names ſignifie flumen deriuatum (a Riuer deriued) alſo Acracanus, quaſi Ranoſus, by reaſon of the froggie Fennes which it maketh: this Gehon leadeth to the firſt ſeate of Chus, about the borders of Chaldæa and Arabia, and it is loſt at length in the Lakes of Chaldæa. The third branch, Hiddekel, may be expounded the vpper ſtreame of Piſon, or Baſilius, which runneth into Hiddekel properly ſo called (that is, into Tigris) aboue Seleucia, where it ſheweth a paſſage vp Tigris into Aſſyria: where, becauſe at length it is called Hiddekel, or Tigris, hauing before no knowne proper name, the Text in this place calleth it Hiddekel from the beginning. The fourth Perath or Euphrates, ſo called per excellentiam, being the body of the Riuer Euphrates, which runneth through Babylon and Otris. But, be it a Riuer or Riuers, that come out of Eden, ſeeing that Tigris and Euphrates are noted in the Text, there can be no doubt, but that Paradiſe was not farre from theſe Riuers: for that Perath in Moſes is Euphrates, there can be no queſtion; and (indeede) as plaine it is that Hiddekel is Tigris. For Hiddekel goeth (ſaith Moſes) Eaſtwards towards Aſſur, as we finde, that Tigris is the Riuer of Aſſyria propriè dicta, whoſe chiefe Citie was Niniue, as in Geneſis the tenth it is written: That out of that Land (to wit) Babylonia, Nimrod went into Aſſur, and builded Niniue, which was the chiefe Citie of Aſſyria.

And as for the kinde of ſpeech here vſed in the Text, ſpeaking of foure heads; though the heads of Riuers be (properly) their Fountaynes, yet here are they to be vnderſtood, to be ſpoken of the beginning of their diuiſion from the firſt ſtreame. Caput aquæ (ſaith VLPIANVS) illud eſt, vnde aqua naſcitur; ſi ex fonte naſcatur fons; ſi ex flumine, vel ex lacu prima initia, &c. If the beginning of the water be out of a Fountayne, then is the Fountayne taken for the head: if out of a Lake, then the Lake; and if from a maine Riuer any branch be ſeparate and diuided, then where that branch doth firſt bound it ſelfe with new bankes, there is that part of the Riuer, where the branch forſaketh the mayne ſtreame, called the head of the Riuer.

§. XII.

Of the ſtrange fertilitie and happineſſe of the Babylonian ſoile, as it is certayne that Eden was ſuch.

IT may alſo be demanded, whether this Region of Eden, by vs deſcribed, be of ſuch fertilitie and beautie, as Eden the ſeate of Paradiſe was: which if it be denyed, then muſt we alſo conſider, that there was no part of the earth, that retayned that fertilitie and pleaſure, that it had before the curſe: neither can we aſcribe the ſame fruitfulneſſe to any part of the earth, nor the ſame vertue to any plant thereon growing, that they had before before the floud; and therefore this Region of Eden may be now no such flourishing Countrie, as it was when it was first created in his perfection. Yet this I finde written of it: First in Herodotus, who was an eye-witnesse, and speaketh of the very place it selfe, for the Ile of Eden is but twelue miles or thereabout from Ninive, and so from Mosul. Ex Euphrate exiens in Tigrim, alterum flumen, iuxta quod Vrbs Ninus sita erat. Hac regio, omnium quas nos vidimus, optima est, &c. Where Euphrates runneth out into Tigris, not farre from the place where Ninus is seated, This Region, of all that we haue seene, is most excellent; and he addeth afterward: Cereris autem fructu procreando adeò ferax est, vt nunquàm non ferè ducenta reddat, &c. (that is) It is so fruitfull in bringing forth Corne, that it yeeldeth two hundred fold: The leaues of Wheate and Barley being almost foure fingers broade: As for the height of Millet and Sesame, they are euen in length like vnto trees, which although I know to be true, yet I forbeare to speake hereof, well knowing, that those things which are reported of this fruitfulnesse, will seeme very incredible to those, which neuer were in the Countrie of Babylon. They haue commonly in all the Countrie Palme-trees growing of their owne accord, the most of them bearing fruit, out of which they make both meates, and wine, and honny, ordering them as the Fig-trees. Thus farre Herodotus. Herod. Clia. l. 1.

To this Palme-tree so much admired in the East India, Strabo and Niger adde a fourth excellencie, which is, that it yeeldeth bread; Ex quibus panem, & mel, & vinum, & acetum conficiunt; Of which these people make bread, wine, honny, and vineger. But Antonius the Eremite findeth a fift commoditie, not inferior to any of those foure, which is, that from this selfe-same Tree there is drawne a kind of fine flaxe, of which people make their garments, and with which in East India they prepare the cordage for their ships; and that this is true, Athanasius in the life of Antonius the Eremite, confesseth, saying: That he receiued a garment made thereof from the Eremite himselfe, which he brought with him out of this Region. So therefore those Trees, which the East Indies so highly esteeme and so much admire (as indeede the Earth yeeldeth no plant comparable to this) those Trees (I say) are in this vpper Babylon, or Region of Eden, as common as any Trees of the field. Sunt etiam (saith STRABO) passim per omnem regionem Palmæ sua sponte nascentes; There are of Palmes ouer all the whole Region, growing of their owne accord. Of this place Quintus Curtius maketh this report: Euntibus à parte læua Arabiæ odorum fertilitate nobilis, regio campestris interest inter Tigrim & Euphratem, iacens tam vbere & pingui solo, vt à pastu repelli pecora dicantur, ne satietas perimat; (that is) As you trauaile on the left hand of Arabia (famous for plentie of sweet odors) there lyeth a Champaine Countrie placed betweene Tigris and Euphrates, and so fruitfull and fat a soile, that they are said to driue their Cattell from the pasture, lest they should perish by satietie. Bis in anno segetes Babylonij secant; The Babylonians cut their Corne twice a yeere (saith Niger.) And as Countries generally are more fruitfull to the Southward, then in the Northern parts: so we may iudge the excellencie of this by that report which Strabo maketh of the South part of Armenia, which is the North border of Eden, or a part thereof; his wordes be these in the Latine: Tota enim hæc regio frugibus & arboribus abundat mansuetis, itemq; semper virentibus; This Region aboundeth with pleasant fruits, and trees, alwaies greene: which witnesseth a perpetuall Spring, not found elsewhere but in the Indies only, by reason of the Sunnes neighbourhood, the life and stirrer vp of nature in a perpetuall actiuitie. In briefe, so great is the fertilitie of the ground, that the people are constrayned twice to mow downe their Corne-fields, and a third time to eate them vp with sheep: which husbandrie the Spaniards wanting in the Valley of Mexico, for the first fortie yeeres, could not make our kind of Wheat beare seede, but it grew vp as high as the trees, and was fruitlesse. Besides, those fields are altogether without weedes (saith Pliny) who addeth this singularitie to that soile, That the second yeere the very stubble (or rather falling downe of the seedes againe) yeeldeth them a haruest of Corne without any further labour: his wordes are these: Vbertatis tantæ sunt, vt sequenti anno sponte restibilis fiat seges. Plin. Nat. hist. l. 18. c. 17.

§. XIII.

§. XIII.

Of the Riuer Pison, and the land of Hauilah.

AFter the discouerie of Eden, and the testimonies of the fertilitie thereof, it resteth to proue that Pison and Gehon are branches of Tigris, and Euphrates. For that the knowledge and certaintie of these two Riuers should trouble so many wise men, it is strange to me, seeing necessitie it selfe (Tigris and Euphrates being knowne) findeth them out: for Euphrates or Tigris, or both be that riuer or riuers of Eden, which water Paradise, which riuer or riuers Moses witnesseth afterward, diuided into foure heads, whereof the one is called Pison, the other Gehon, &c. Could there be a stranger fancie in the world, then when we finde both these (namely) Tigris and Euphrates in Assyria and Mesopotamia, to seeke the other two in India and Ægypt, making the one Ganges, and the other Nilus? Two Riuers as farre distant, as any of fame knowne or discouered in the world: the Scriptures making it so plaine, that these Riuers were diuided into foure branches, and with the Scriptures, Nature, Reason and Experience bearing witnesse. There is no errour, which hath not some slipperie and bad foundation, or some apparance of probabilitie, resembling truth, which when men (who studie to be singular) finde out, (straining reason according to their fancies) they then publish to the world matter of contention, and jangling: not doubting but in the variable deformitie of mens mindes, to find some partakers or sectatours, the better by their helpe to nurse and cherish such weake babes, as their owne inuentions haue begotten.

But this mistaking (and first for the riuer of Pison) seemeth to haue growne out of the not-distinguishing of that Region in India, called Hauilah, from Hauilah, which adioyneth to Babylonia, afterward knowne by the name of Susiana. For Hauilah vpon Tigris tooke name from Hauilah the sonne of Cush; and Hauilah in India, from Hauilah the sonne of Ioctan, the one remembred by Moses in the description of Paradise, the other where Moses setteth downe the generations of Noah, and his sonnes after the floud. For the sonnes of Cush were Seba, Hauilah, Sabtah, and Raamah, and the sonnes of Ioctan were Ophir, and Hauilah, &c. of which latter (to wit) of Ophir and Hauilah the sonnes of Ioctan, that Iland of Ophir, (whence Salomon had gold) and Hauilah adioyning had their names. Now because Ganges is a great and a famous Riuer of the East India, and Hauilah a Countrey of the same, and is situated vpon Ganges, hence it came that Ganges was taken for Pison, which Riuer is said by Moses to water the land of Hauilah. Or perhaps it was supposed that those foure Riuers, named by Moses, must of necessitie be foure of the greatest in the world; whence (supposing that Ganges was the next great and famous riuer after Tigris & Euphrates) they chose out this Riuer to make one of the foure. And yet certainely there is another Riuer, whom in these respects they should rather haue chosen then Ganges; for the Riuer Indus on this side India, for beautie, for neerenesse, & for abilitie, giueth no way place to Ganges, but exceedeth it in all. And how can any reasonable man conceiue, that Ganges can be one of the foure heads, seeing Indus commeth betweene it and Tigris? and betweene Tigris and Indus is all that large Empire of Persia, consisting of many Kingdomes. And againe, farther toward the East, and beyond Indus, are all those ample Dominions of India intra Gangem, which lie betweene those two proud Riuers of Indus and Ganges, now called the Kingdome of Mogor. So as if Indus bee not accounted for any of the foure, because it is remoued from Tigris by all the breadth of Persia, then how much lesse Ganges, which falleth into the Ocean, little lesse then fortie degrees to the Eastward of Indus? Surely whosoeuer readeth the Storie of Alexander, shall finde, that there is no riuer in Asia, that can exceede Indus. For Hydaspis was of that breadth and depth, as Alexander thereon in great Gallies transported himselfe, and the greatest part of his armie, and in sayling down that branch of Indus, found it so large and deepe, and by reason thereof so great a billow, as it endangered his his whole Fleete, which was ready to bee ſwallowed vp therein: Hydaſpis (as aforeſaid) being but one of many branches of Indus, comparable to it, and as great as it, hauing beſides this, the Riuers of Coas, of Suaſtus, Aceſines, Adris, (otherwiſe Hirotis, Hiſpalis, and Zaradrus, all which make but one Indus, and by it are ſwallowed vp with all their children and companions, which being all incorporate and made one ſtreame, it croſſeth athwart Aſia, and then at Cambaia viſiteth the Ocean Sea.

Gen.2.15. But becauſe Piſon, which compaſſeth Hauilah, as alſo Gehon, which watereth Cuſh, muſt ſome-where be ioyned with the reſt in one body, or at leaſt be found to proceed out of the ſame Countrey of Eden, out of which the other two heads doe proceede, out of doubt they cannot either the one or the other, bee Ganges, or Nilus: for Nilus riſeth in the vttermoſt of the South, and runneth Northward into the Mediterran Sea; and the Riuer Ganges riſeth out of the mountaine Imaus, or (as others will haue it) Caucaſus, which diuides the Northerne Scythia from India, and runneth from North to South into the Indian Ocean. And as for Perath and Hiddekel (that is, Euphrates and Tigris) the one of them is begotten in Armenia, neere Georgiana or Iberia, the other not farre off in the ſame Armenia, by the Gordiaan mountaines, ſo as Ganges, who onely trauaileth in her owne India, and Nilus through Æthiopia and Ægypt, neuer ſaw the land of Eden, or ioyned themſelues in one Channell, either with themſelues, or with either of the other; and therefore could not at any time from thence bee ſeparated, or diuided into foure heads or branches, according to Moſes.

Therefore the Riuer Piſon, which enricheth Hauilah, is the ſame which by ioyning it ſelfe with Tigris, was therefore called Piſi-tigris, or Piſo-tigris, of Piſon and Gen.2.v.12. Tigris, which Riuer watereth that Hauilah, which Hauilah the ſonne of Cuſh gaue name vnto, and not Hauilah of India, ſo called of Hauilah the ſonne of Ioctan, who inhabited with his brother Ophir in the Eaſt. And this Hauilah of the Cuſhites hath alſo Gold, Bdellium, and the Onyx ſtone. This Bdellium is a tree, of the bigneſſe of an Oliue, whereof Arabia hath great plenty, which yeeldeth a certaine gumme, ſweete to ſmell to, but bitter in taſte, called alſo Bdellium. The Hebrewes take the Load-ſtone for Bdellium. Beroaldus affirmeth, that Bdela in Hebrew ſignifieth Pearle: ſo doth Eugubinus; and Hierome calls it Oleaſter: be it what it will, a tree bearing gumme, or Pearle: Hauilah, or Suſiana hath plenty of both. Now this Countrey of Suſiana or Hauilah ſtretcheth it ſelfe toward the North, as farre as the Altars of Hercules, and from thence imbraceth all that Tract of land Southward, as farre as the Perſian Gulfe, on the Eaſt ſide thereof: from which Eaſt ſide had the Shebans (which traded with the Citie of Tyre, according to Ezekiel) their great plenty of gold, which Strabo alſo witneſſeth, as was ſhewed before.

Steuch. Hopk. de Par. The Greekes had a conceit, that Piſon was Danubius: the Rabbines take it for Nilus. Aben-ezra (ſayth Hopkins) out of Rabbi Saadia tranſlateth Piſon into Nilus: But Nilus findeth the ſame impoſſibility that Ganges doth: and Danubius hath the Sea of Helleſpont and all Aſia the leſſe, betweene it and Tigris. Now Piſon, which runneth through Hauilah or Suſiana, doth to this day retaine ſome ſigne of this name; for where it and Tigris embrace each other vnder the Citie of Apamia, there doe they agree of a ioynt and compounded name, and are called Piſo-tigris. And it is ſtrange vnto me, that from ſo great antiquitie there ſhould bee found remaining any reſembling ſound of the firſt name: for Babylon it ſelfe, which dwelleth ſo neere Poſt. Coſmog. Theuet. Coſmog. theſe riuers, is by ſome writers knowne by the name of Bandas, as, by Poſtellus, by Caſtaldus, of Baldach: by Barius, of Bagdad; and of Boughedor, by Andrew Theuet; and Aſiæ tab.4. yet all thoſe that haue lately ſeene it, call it Bagdet. To this riuer of Piſon, Ptolomie indeed with many others giue the name of Baſilius, or Regius; and Gehon they terme Mahar-ſares and Marſias, and Baarſares. So is Euphrates, neere the Spring and fountaine, by Strabo and Plinie called Pixirates: by Iunius, Puckperah, out of the Hebrew, Plin. li. 6. c. 24. (that is) The profuſion, or comming forth of Euphrates: where it breaketh through the mountaine Taurus, it takes the name of Omyra. Plutarch calls it Medus and Zaranda: the da: the Hebrewes Parath, (ſayth Ar. Montanus:) Pagninus, Perath: Ioſephus, Phorah; Euſebius, Zozimus: Ammianus, Chalymicus: Giſtilanus, and Colinutius terme it Cobar: which Ezechiel calleth Chebar; but this is but a branch of Euphrates. The Aſſyrians know it by the name of Armalchar, or Nahor Malcha: but now commonly it is called Frat.

The ſame confuſion of names hath Tigris, as Diglito, and Diglath, Seilax, and Sollax: of the Hebrewes it was called Hiddikel: now of the inhabitants Tegil.

But Mercer vpon Geneſis conceiueth rightly of theſe riuers: for Euphrates and Tigris (ſayth he) ſtreame into foure branches, two of which keepe their ancient names, and the other two are called Piſon and Gehon. The reaſon, why theſe two riuers ioyned in one (below Apamia) loſe their names, and are called Piſi-tigris, and the memorie of Euphrates extinguiſhed, is, becauſe the beſt part of Euphrates running through the channell of Gehon, ſinketh into the Lakes of Chaldæa, not farre from Vr, the Citie of Abraham, and fall not intirely into the Perſian Sea, as Tigris accompanied with Piſon doth.

This errour that Piſon was Ganges, was firſt broched by Ioſephus, (whoſe fieldes, though they be fertile, yet are they exceeding full of weedes) and other men (who take his authoritie to be ſufficient in matter of deſcription, whereupon depended no other important conſequence) were not curious in the examination thereof. For Epiphanius, Auguſtine, and Hierome, take this for currant; whereof it followed, that as Piſon was tranſported into the Eaſt India, to find out Hauilah: ſo was Gehon drawne into Africa, to compaſſe Æthiopia. But if Hauilah, whereof Moſes ſpeaketh in the deſcription of Paradiſe, be found to be a Region, adioining to Babylon on the one ſide, and Cuſh (which is falſly interpreted Æthiopia) faſtened to it on the other ſide, wee ſhall not neede then to worke wonders (that is) to impoſe vpon men the tranſportation of riuers, from one end of the world to the other, which (among other vſes) were made to tranſport men. Now it was in the valley of Shinar, where Cuſh the ſonne of Ham firſt ſate downe with his ſonnes Shebah, Hauilah, Sabtah, Raamah, Nimrod, &c. and of Hauilah, the ſonne of Cuſh, did that Region take name, which Piſon compaſſeth; and the land (called Cuſh) which Gehon watereth, tooke name of Cuſh himſelfe. For as the ſonnes of Ioctan, Ophir and Hauilah, ſeated themſelues as neere together as they could in India, ſo did the ſonnes of Cuſh in Shinar or Babylonia, where Nimrod built Babel: for Hauilah or Chauilah was firſt Chuſea of Cuſh; then Chuſa, Suſa, and Suſiana.

From this Hauilah vnto the Deſarts of Sur, did the Iſraelites and Amalechites poſſeſſe all the interiacent Countries: for Saul ſmote the Amalechites from Hauilah to Sur: which Sur, the Chaldean Paraphraſt conuerteth Hagra, and Hagra bordereth the red Sea; but this was not meant from Sur vpon the red Sea, to Hauilah in the Eaſt India, for Saul was no ſuch trauailer or Conquerour, and therefore Hauilah muſt be found neerer home, where the ſonnes of Iſmael inhabited, and which Countrie Saul waſted: for Amalek and the Amalechites poſſeſt that necke of Countrie, between the Perſian Sea, and the red Sea; Hauilah being the extreme of the one towardes the Eaſt, and Sur of the other, towards Egypt and the Weſt, leauing that great body of Arabia fœlix towards the South, and they ſpred themſelues with the Midianites and Edumeans, from the Eaſt part, or backe ſide of the Holie Land, to the bankes of Euphrates, compriſing the beſt parts of Arabia Petræa, and Deſerta.

§. XIIII.

Of the Riuer Gehon and the Land of Cush: and of the ill translating of the Æthiopia for Cush, 2. CHRON. 21. 16.

NOw, as Hauilah in the East India drew Pison so farre out of his way thither, so I say did Cush (being by the Seuentie translated Æthiopia) force Gehon into Africa. For Cush being taken for Æthiopia by the Greekes, whom the Latines followed, Gehon consequently was esteemed for Nilus. But Æthiopians are, as much, as blacke or burnt faces, whose proper Countrie is called Thebaides, lying to the Southward of all Ægypt. And although there be many other Regions of Æthiopians, and far South in Africa, yet those of Thebaides are those so often remembred in the Ægyptian stories, and out of which Nation they had many times their Kings of Ægypt: all which Æthiopians are very neere, or else directly vnder the Equinoctiall line, which is very farre from that land inhabited by the Chusites; who are neither blacke of colour, nor in any sort neighbouring Torrida Zona. But this Translation of the Septuagint, Pererius doth qualifie in this manner: There are (saith he) two Æthiopia's, the East, and the West: and this diuision he findeth in Strabo, out of Homer. Now because there is no colour to make Chush Æthiopia in Africa, Pererius will make Chush and the Land of the Chusites (which is Arabia Petræa, and a part of Arabia the Happy, with the Region of Madian) to be the East Æthiopia.

See more of this point, c. 7. § 10.

Now if it be granted, that Cush and the Land of the Chusites, be that Tract from Sur to Hauilah, according to the Scriptures: Habitauit ISMAEL ab Hauilah vsq; Sur, quæ respicit Ægyptum introeuntibus Assyrios; ISMAEL dwelt from Hauilah vnto Sur, that is towards Ægypt, as thou goest toward Assyria; The same sufficeth to proue that Gehon cannot be Nilus, but a Riuer which watereth Cush, and not Æthiopia. But this place of Scripture, Habitauit ISMAEL, &c. hath this sense: Ismael dwelt from Hauilah, which is the way of Assyria, or the Countrie bordering Assyria; and Sur, which lyeth toward Ægypt, which is as much to say, as, The issues of Ismael (whereof there were twelue Princes) whom God had promised to make a great people, inhabited all those Regions betweene the border of Ægypt and Assyria. And that they were (according to the word of God) so increased and multiplyed, it well appeared, when Zerah the Chusite, which others call Tharantha, brought an Armie of ten hundred thousand against Asa King of Iuda. Which Armie came not out of Æthiopia beyond Ægypt; for that had beene a strange progresse for such a multitude, as ten hundred thousand, hauing so mightie a King as the King of Ægypt, betweene Palæstina and Æthiopia. But these were the Chusites, Amalechites, Madianites, Ismaelites, and Arabians. For it is written, that after Asa (strengthened by God) had defeated this world of an Armie, he in following his victorie tooke some of the Cities of King Zerah round about, as Gerar. Now that Gerar is a Citie of the Æthiopians, it cannot be suspected: for these be the wordes of the Scripture disprouing it: And ABRAHAM departed thence toward the South Countrie, and dwelt betweene Cadesh and Sur, and soiourned in Gerar: Now Sur is that part, vpon which Moses and the Israelites first set their feete after they passed the Red Sea, where the Amalechites in Rephidim set on them, supposing that they had beene wearie, and vnable to resist. Againe, in the storie of Isaac it is written: Wherefore ISAAC went to ABIMELECH, and the Philistims vnto Gerar: and I am sure Abimelech and the Philistims were no Æthiopians. And lastly, Moses himselfe, where he describeth the bounds of Canaan, hath these words: Then the border of the Canaanites was from Sydon, as thou commest to Gerar: for Sydon was the Frontier of Canaan towards the North, and Gerar by Gazah towards the South. But indeede, howsoeuer Pererius doth with an honest excuse salue his Translation of Chus for Æthiopia, yet it appeareth plainely, that the Septuagint and Iosephus did altogether misvnderstand this place. And first, for Homers East and West Æthiopia, they they are both found elsewhere. For Plinie in his fift Booke and eighth Chapter, citeth Homer for an Authour, of these two Æthiopia's. But the East Æthiopia is that which compasseth Nilus to the South of Ægypt, and is the South border thereof; now a part of the Empire of the Abyssines, vnder Prester Iohn; And the West Æthiopia is that, which ioyneth it selfe with the Riuer Niger, which wee call Senega and Gambra: for thereabouts are these Æthiopians called Perorsi, Daratites, with diuers other names, which Plinie numbreth. But all these are in Africa, and beyond the Desarts thereof, sayth Plinie out of Homer, Agrippa, and Iuba; which Regions indeede (I meane that of Niger, and that of Prester Iohn, and the Troglodytes) lye due East and West. But as for Cush and the Region of the Ismaelites, &c. they are extended directly North from that Æthiopia, which is beyond Ægypt. Now, that Iosephus was exceeding grosse herein, it appeareth by that fiction, which hee hath of Moses when he serued Pharao, in the warres against the Æthiopians: for in that (to make Chus, Æthiopia) hee transporteth Madian by miracle ouer the Red Sea, and beyond all Ægypt, and setteth it in Æthiopia, as shall be shewed more at large in the Chapter of the Worlds Plantation. Againe, that Gehon was improperly translated Nilus, Pererius confesseth, and layeth it rather to the corruption of the Greeke Copie, than otherwise. And whereas the Septuagint haue conuerted this place of the Prophet HIEREMIE; And what hast thou now to doe in the way of Ægypt, to drinke the water of Nilus? Quid tibi vis in via Ægypti, vt bibas aquam Gehon? to this saith PERERIVS, profectò Hebraicè ibi non est vox Gehon, sed Sichor, quæ significat nigrum & turbidum; Truly (saith PERERIVS) the word Gehon in this place, is not found in the Hebrew, but Sichor, which signifieth blacke and troubled water. Plin. l. 5. c. 8. c. 2. v. 18.

Furthermore, this is a manifest and vnanswerable argument, that Chus was ill taken for Æthiopia. Moses married the Daughter of Iethro, Prince and Priest of Madian, whom both the Greeke and Latine call a Madianite, and not Æthiopissam, as (with Iosephus.) The Geneua conuerts it, though it helpe it a little with a marginall note. Now it is without dispute, that Zipporah was of the Countrie of Madian, which is that part of Arabia Petræa, bordering the Red Sea; for it is written in the second of Exodus, that MOSES fled from PHARAO into the Land of Madian, and sate downe by a Well, &c. and againe, in the third of Exodus; When MOSES kept the sheepe of IETHRO his father in law, Priest of Madian, &c. Indeed, these foure nations are euery where mixt in the Scriptures, because they dwell confusedly togther (to wit) the Madianites, the Ismaelites, the Amalekites, and the Chusites, which were all in one generall word, Arabians, and in the Scriptures sometimes called by one of those names, and sometimes by another, as in Gen. 37. v. 25. 27. & 28. that Ioseph was sold to the Ismaelites; and in the same Chapter, v. 36. it is written, that the Madianites sold Ioseph to Putiphar, Pharao's Steward. The Geneuians, in a marginall note (to auoid this confounding of the Nations) say, that Moses wrote according to their opinion, who tooke the Madianites and Ismaelites to be all one. But Moses wrote not after any mans opinion, he wrote the truth, and these were all Arabians, and so in this very place it appeareth by their merchandise, which they brought with them, when they bought Ioseph: for their Camels were loden with Spicery, and Balme, and Myrrhe, which are the Trades of Arabia fœlix: from whence chiefly, and from the East India, all the World is serued with Myrrhe and Frankincense; and their Spices they receiued from the East side of the Arabian Gulfe, as aforesaid. And in the 39. Chapter it is said: That Putiphar bought Ioseph of the Ismaelites, which the Chaldæan Paraphrast in the same place calleth Arabians. Now, to make this the more manifest, it is written in the sixt of Iudges, That when Israel had sowen, then came vp the Madianites, and the Amalekites, and they of the East, and came vpon them: they of the East, were Arabians of the Desart; so as where before in the buying of Ioseph, the Madianites and the Ismaelites were confused, here the Madianites and Amalekites are made one Nation. For in the prosecution of the Story of Gedeon, the Madianites only are named, as comprehending both Nations; and in the eight Chapter, v. 24. these Nations are all called Ismaelites, Exod. 2. 21. 3. 1. Num. 12. 1. V. 15 V. 1. Gen. 37. 25. V. 1. V. 3. C. 7.

and neyther Madianites nor Amalekites. As when Gedeon desired, that euery man would giue him the golden eare-rings, which they had taken after the victory against Zebah and Zalmunna, Kings of Arabia, amounting to 1700. shickles of gold, it is written: For they had golden eare-rings, because they were Ismaelites. And these Ismaelites were a great and valiant Nation, and euer in action of warre. Manus eius contra omnes, & manus omnium contra eum; His hand (sayth God of ISMAEL) shall bee against all men, and euery mans hand against him. Of these Ismaelites came the Mahometan Arabians, though some Writers thinke Mahomet to be of the Schenitæ. And these Ismaelites, which inhabit chiefly in Cedar, and the Desarts of Sur and Pharan (saith Iosephus) vse poyson vpon their Arrowes, as the Indians doe. Towards the South-east are the Madianites, and Chusites: and beyond them, towards the Desarts of Arabia, the Amalekites; and all are one Nation, and all Arabians.

Gen.16.12.

Lastly, the ill translation of Æthiopia for Chus, is among other places, made most apparent, in the second of Chronicles, in these wordes: So the Lord stirred vp against IEHORAM, the spirit of the Philistines, and the Arabians, which confine the Æthiopians; so Hierome reades it: the Geneua translation hath it, which were besides the Æthiopians. Now, how farre it is off betweene the Philistines, and the Negro's, or the Æthiopians, euery man that looketh in a Map may iudge. For the Philistines and Arabians doe mixe and ioyne with the Land of the Chusites, and are distant from Æthiopia about two and thirtie, or three and thirtie degrees, and therefore not their next Neighbours; but all Egypt, and the Desarts of Sur and Pharan, are betweene them. So as this place of the second of Chronicles, should haue beene translated in these words: So the Lord stirred vp against IEHORAM, the spirits of the Philistines, and the Arabians, which confine and border vpon the Chusites, who indeed are their next Neighbours. * Nulla superest dubitatio quin Æthiopia in Sacris literis sit Arabiæ propinqua; There remaineth no doubt (sayth STEVCHIVS) but Æthiopia in the Scriptures, is taken for that Countrey, which ioyneth to Arabia.

Chro.2.c.21.16.

Now may we thinke is it probable, or possible, that Moses could bee ignorant of Nilus? No, he knew it, no liuing man so well, and therefore would neuer haue named Gehon, for Nilus, or Nilus for Gehon. Surely, if Moses had meant Nilus, when he named Gehon, he would haue called the Riuer (into which he was cast vpon Reeds, and preserued by God, working compassion in the Daughter of Pharao) a Riuer of Egypt, wherein he was borne and bred, and wrought so many Miracles. Besides, the Riuer of Nilus is often named in the Scriptures, but neuer by the name of Gehon. And if Moses had told the Israelites, that Nilus had beene a Riuer of Paradise, they might iustly haue thought, that hee had derided them: for they had liued there all dayes of their liues, and found no such Paradise at all, nor any memory, or speech thereof; except wee shall beleeue the Paradise of Hesperides, where (sayth Plinie) there was nothing found in his time, but wild Oliues in stead of golden Apples. But Nilus is twice called Sichor, once in Esay, and once in the Prophet Hieremie; and yet in those places it is not said to be a Riuer of Æthiopia, but of Egypt. For in a word, the Israelites had neuer any communion or affaires with the Æthiopians, nor any intelligence, or trade, beyond Egypt, to the South; but the Enemies which they had on the South, and East-parts, were these Nations of the Chusites, Philistines, Ismaelites, Amalekites, and Madianites: who being often gouerned by many little Kings, or Reguli, were distinguished in names, according to the Fathers and Heads of those Nations; but in one generall name were all Arabians. On the North-side of Canaan, they were afflicted with the Cœlesyrians, with the Magogians, Tubalines, and others their adherents; and thirdly within themselues, the Nations, which remained of the ancient Canaanites, held the strongest Cities vpon the Sea-coast (as) Tyre, Sidon, Acon, Gaza, and many others: yea, Hierusalem it selfe was with-held from Israel (from the dayes of Moses, euen vnto the time of Dauid) by the Iebusites.

Plin.l.5.c.1.

c.2.v.18.

That which now remaineth of most difficultie is, that it doth not appeare, that any part of Gehon watereth that part of Arabia the stonie, which the Chusites inhabited ted in the times of the Kings of Israel: and in this Desart it was that Matt. Beroaldus lost himselfe in seeking out Paradise: for hee was driuen (to my vnderstanding) to create two Riuers, and call them Gehon, and Pison; to the end that the one might water Chus, and the other Hauilah, for I finde none such in rerum natura, as hee hath described: by which Riuers hee also includeth within Paradise, euen Arabia the Desart.

And as he well proued that Pison was not Ganges, nor Gehon, Nilus: so where to find them else-where it seemeth he knew not. Certainely this Riuer of Gehon, which he maketh to fall into the Mediterran at Gaza, and whose Springs hee findeth farre East in Arabia, is but imaginary: for the Current by Gaza is but a small streame, rising betweene it and the Red Sea, whose head from Gaza it selfe is little more then twentie English myles, as shall appeare hereafter. But questionlesse, hence it comes that many were mistaken. They all considered of the habitations of the Chusites, as they were planted when the state of Israel stood, and when it flourished, being then their neere Neighbours, and neuer looked backe to the first seates and plantation of CHVS. For after the Floud, CHVS and his children neuer rested, till they found the Valley of Shinar, in which, and neere which himselfe with his sonnes first inhabited. HAVILAH tooke the Riuer-side of Tigris chiefly on the East, which after his owne name he called HAVILAH, (now Susiana:) Raamah, and Sheba farther downe the Riuer, in the entrance of Arabia fælix. NIMROD seated himselfe in the best of the Valley, where he built Babel, whereof that Region had afterwards the name of Babylonia. CHVS himselfe and his brother MIZRAIM first kept vpon Gehon, which falleth into the Lakes of Chaldea, and in processe of time, and as their people increased, they drew themselues more Westerly towards the Red or Arabian Sea: from whence MIZRAIM past ouer into Ægypt, in which Tract the Chusites remained for many yeeres after. Now because there could bee no such Riuer found in Arabia the stonie, which they might entitle Gehon, they translated Chus Æthiopia, and Gehon, Nilus. And if we doe examine this mistaking by example, wee shall the better perceiue it as it was. For let vs suppose, that BRVTE, or whosoeuer else that first peopled this Iland, had arriued vpon the Riuer of Thames, and calling the Iland after his name BRITANNIA, it might be said that Thames or Tems was a riuer, that watered Britannia: and when afterwards in processe of time, the same BRVTE had also discouered and conquered Scotland, which he also entituled by the same name of Britannia, after-ages might conclude that Scotland was no part thereof, because the riuer of Tems is not found therein. Or let vs suppose that EVROPA, the daughter of the King of Tyre in Phœnicia, gaue the name to Europe, according to Herodotus, and that the first discouerers thereof arriued in the mouth of some riuer in Thrace, which then watered as much of Europe, as hee first discouered, shall wee in like sort resolue, that France, Spaine, and Italie, &c. are no parts of Europe, because that Riuer is not found in them, or any of them? In like manner was it said by Moses in his description of Gehon, that it watered the whole land of Chus; but not the whole land which the Chusites should or might in future time conquer, people, and inhabit, seeing in after-ages they became Lords of many Nations, and they might (perchance) haue beene Masters in time, (as the Saracens which came of them were) of a great part of the world. For (though the Babylonian Empire, which tooke beginning in NIMROD the sonne of CHVS, consisted at the first but of foure Cities, (to wit) Babel, Erech, Acad, and Chalne, yet wee finde, that his Successours within a few yeares after commaunded all the whole world in effect: and the fame of Babel consumed the memorie of Chusea. For of this Tower of Confusion did all that land take the name of Babylonia: and the greatnesse of that Empire founded by NIMROD a yonger sonne, obscured the name and nation of his father CVSH in those parts, vntill they crept farther off, and in places not yet entituled, and farther from the Babylonian Empire, where the Chusites retained their names, which also they fastned to the Soile and Territorie by themselues afterwards inhabited and held. And we may not thinke, that CHVS or any of his could in haſte creepe through thoſe deſart Regions, which the length of 130. yeares after the floud had (as it were) fortified with thickets, and permitted euery buſh and briar, reede and tree to ioyne themſelues (as it were) into one maine body and Forreſt. For if wee looke with iudgement and reaſon into the worlds plantation, we ſhall finde, that euery family ſeated themſelues as neere together as poſſible they could; and though neceſſitie enforced them, after they grew full of people, to ſpread themſelues, and creepe out of Shinar or Babylonia, yet did they it with this aduice, as that they might at all times reſort, and ſuccour one another by riuer, the fields being then (without all doubt) impaſſable. So NIMROD, who out of wit and ſtrength vſurped dominion ouer the reſt, ſate downe in the very confluence of all thoſe riuers, which watered Paradiſe: for thither it was to which the greateſt troupes of NOAHS children repaired; and from the ſame place whence Mankinde had his beginning, from thence had they againe their increaſe. The firſt Father of men ADAM, had therein his former habitation. The ſecond Father of Mankinde NOAH, began from thence his diſperſion.

Now as NIMROD the yongeſt, yet ſtrongeſt, made his choice of Babel (as aforeſaid) which both Tigris and Euphrates cleanſed and enriched; ſo did HAVILAH place himſelfe vpon Piſo-tigris: RAAMAH and his ſonne SHEBA farther downe vpon the ſame Riuer, on the Sea-coaſt of Arabia: CHVS himſelfe vpon Gehon, the faireſt branch of Euphrates. And when they began to ſpread themſelues farther off, yet they alwayes faſtened themſelues to the Riuers ſides: for Ninive, Charran, Reſeph, Canneh, Vr in Chaldæa, and the other firſt-peopled Cities were all founded vpon theſe Nauigable Riuers, or their branches, by which the one might giue ſuccour and aſſiſtance to the other, as is alreadie often remembred.

§. XV.

A concluſion by way of repetition of ſomething ſpoken of before.

BVT now to conclude this diſpute, it appeareth to mee by the teſtimonies of the Scriptures, that Paradiſe was a place created by God, and a part of this our Earth and habitable World, ſeated in the lower part of the Region of Eden, afterward called Aram fluuiorum, or Meſopotamia, which taketh into it alſo a portion of Shinar and Armenia: this Region ſtanding in the moſt excellent temper of all other, (to wit) 35. degrees from the Æquinoctiall, and 55. from the North-pole: in which Climate the moſt excellent Wines, Fruits, Oyle, Graine of all ſorts are to this day found in abundance. And there is nothing that better proueth the excellency of this ſayd ſoyle and temper, then the abundant growing of the Palme-trees, without the care and labour of man. For wherein ſoeuer the Earth, Nature, and the Sunne can moſt vaunt, that they haue excelled, yet ſhall this Plant be the greateſt wonder of all their workes: this Tree alone giueth vnto man whatſoeuer his life beggeth at Natures hand. And though it may bee ſaid, that theſe Trees are found both in the Eaſt and Weſt Indies, which Countries are alſo bleſſed with a perpetuall Spring and Summer, yet, lay downe by thoſe pleaſures and benefits the fearefull and dangerous Thunders and Lightnings, the horrible and frequent Earthquakes, the dangerous diſeaſes, the multitude of venimous beaſts and wormes, with other inconueniences, and then there will be found no compariſon betweene the one and the other.

What other excellencies this Garden of Paradiſe had, before God (for mans ingratitude and crueltie) curſed the Earth, we cannot iudge; but I may ſafely thinke, that by how much Adam exceeded all liuing men in perfection, by being the immediate workemanſhip of God, by ſo much did that choſen and particular Garden exceed all parts of the Vniuerſall World, in which God had planted (that is) made to grow grow the Trees of Life, of Knowledge; Plants only proper, and becomming the Paradise, and Garden of so great a Lord.

The summe of all this is, That whereas the eyes of men in this Scripture haue beene dimme-sighted (some of them finding Paradise beyond our knowne World: some, aboue the middle Region of the Ayre: some, eleuated neere the Moone: others, as farre South as the Line, or as farre North, as the Pole, &c.) I hope that the Reader will be sufficiently satisfied, that these were but like Castles in the Ayre, and in mens fancies, vainly imagined. For it was Eastward in Eden (sayth Moses) Eastward, in respect of Iudæa, that God planted this Garden, which Eden wee find in the Prophets where it was, and whereof the name (in some part) remaineth to this day. A Riuer went out of Eden to water this Garden, and from thence diuided it selfe into foure branches; and we find that both Tigris and Euphrates swimming through Eden, doe ioyne in one, and afterward taking wayes apart, doe water Chus and Hauilah, according to Moses: the true seates of Chus and his Sonnes then being in the Valley of Shinar, in which Nimrod built Babel. That Pison was Ganges, the Scripture, Reason, and experience teach the contrary: for that which was neuer ioyned, cannot bee diuided, Ganges, which inhabiteth India, cannot bee a branch of the Riuers of Eden; That Gehon was Nilus, the same distance maketh the same impossibilitie, and this Riuer is a greater stranger to Tigris and Euphrates, then Ganges is: for although there are betweene Tigris and Ganges aboue foure thousand miles, yet they both rise in the same quarter of the World; but Nilus is begotten in the Mountaines of the Moone, almost as farre off as the Cape of good hope, and falleth into the Mediterran Sea: and Euphrates distilleth out of the Mountaines of Armenia, and falleth into the Gulfe of Persia: the one riseth in the South, and trauaileth North: the other riseth in the North, and runneth South, threescore and three Degrees the one from the other. In this leafe following, I haue added a Chorographicall description of this terrestriall Paradise, that the Reader may thereby the better conceiue the preceding Discourse; and this is the reward I looke for, that my labours may but receiue an allowance suspended, vntill such time, as this description of mine be reproued by a better.

CHAP. IIII.

Of the two chiefe Trees in the Garden of Paradise.

§. I.

That the Tree of Life was a materiall Tree: and in what sense it is to be taken, that man by his eating the forbidden fruit, is made subiect to death.

FOR eating the forbidden fruit of the Tree of Knowledge was Adam driuen out of Paradise, in exilium vitæ temporalis, into the banishment of temporall life, sayth Beda. That these Trees of Life and Knowledge were materiall Trees (though Figures of the Law and of the Gospell) it is not doubted by the most religious and learned Writers: although the wits of men, which are so volatile, as nothing can fix them, and so slippery, as nothing can fasten them, haue in this also deliuered to the World an imaginarie doctrine.

The Tree of Life (say the Hebrewes) hath a plurall construction, and is to be vnderstood, Lignum vitarum, The Tree of liues, because the fruit thereof had a propertie, to preserue both the growing, sensitiue, and rationall life of man; and not only (but for Adams transgression) had prolonged his owne dayes, but also giuen a durefull continuance to all posteritie; and that, so long, as a bodie compounded of Elements could last.

Bart. sept. 2. l. 1. 174.

And although it is hard to thinke, that flesh and bloud could bee immortall, but that it must once perish and rot, by the vnchanged Law of God imposed on his creatures, Man (notwithstanding) should haue enioyed thereby a long, healthfull, and vngrieued life: after which (according to the opinion of most Diuines) hee should haue beene translated, as Enoch was. And as before the Floud, the dayes of men had the long measure of eight hundred or nine hundred yeeres; and soone after the floud, of two hundred yeeres and vpwards, euen to fiue hundred: so if Adam had not disobeyed Gods first and easie Commandement, the liues of men on Earth might haue continued double, treble, or quadruple to any of the longest times of the first age, as many learned men haue conceiued. Chrysostome, Rupertus, Tostatus, and others were of beliefe, that (but for Adams fall and transgression) Adam and his Posteritie had beene immortall. But such is the infinite wisedome of God, as he foresaw that the Earth could not haue contained Mankind; or else, that Millions of soules must haue beene vngenerated, and haue had no being, if the first number, wherewith the Earth was repleniſhed, had abode thereon for euer: and therefore that of Chrysostome must bee vnderstood of immortalitie of bodies, which should haue beene translated and glorified.

But of what kind or Species this Tree of Life was, no man hath taken on him to teach: in which repect many haue conceiued, that the same was not materiall, but a meere Allegorie, taking their strength out of Salomon, where Wisedome is compared to the Tree of Life, and from other places, where also Christ is called the Tree of Life, and out of the Apocalypsis, I will giue to him that ouercommeth, to eate of the Tree of Life, which is in the Paradise of God. But to this place Saint Augustines answere may suffice, (which is) That the one doth not exclude the other, but that, as there was a terreſtriall Paradiſe, ſo there was a celeſtiall. For although Agar and Sara were Figures of the Old, and New Teſtament, yet to thinke that they were not Women, and the Maid and Wife of Abraham, were meere fooliſhneſſe. And ſo in this place the ſenſe of the Scripture is manifeſt. For God brought out of the earth euery tree faire to ſight, and ſweet to taſte; the tree alſo of Life in the midſt of the garden: which ſheweth, that among the trees, which the Earth by Gods commandement produced, the tree of Life was one, and that the fruit thereof was alſo to be eaten. The report of this Tree was alſo brought to the ancient Poets: for as from the indigeſted matter or Chaos, Heſiodus, Homer, Ouid, and others, ſteale the inuention of the created world; ſo from the Garden of Paradiſe, they tooke the Plat-forme of the Orchard of Alcinous, and another of the Heſperides: and from the tree of Life, their Nectar and Ambroſia; for Nectar, according to Suidas, ſignifieth making yong, and Ambroſia, immortalitie; and therefore ſaid to be the meate and drinke of the gods.

§. II.

Of BECANVS his opinion, that the Tree of Knowledge was Ficus Indica.

NOw for the Tree of Knowledge of good and euill, ſome men haue preſumed farther, eſpecially Goropius Becanus, who giueth himſelfe the honor to haue found out the kinde of this Tree, which none of the Writers of former times could euer gheſſe at, whereat Goropius much marualleth. But as he had an inuentiue braine, ſo there neuer liued any man, that beleeued better thereof, and of himſelfe. Surely, howſoeuer his opinion may be valued, yet he vſurpeth the praiſe due to others, at leaſt if the inuention be at that price at which he ſetteth it. For Moſes Bar-cephas faſtened on this coniecture aboue ſixe hundred yeeres before Becanus was borne: and Bar-cephas himſelfe refereth the inuention to an antiquitie more remote, citing for his Author Philoxenus Maburgenſis, and others, whoſe very wordes Goropius vſeth, both concerning the Tree, and the reaſons wherewith he would induce other men to that beliefe. For Moſes Bar-cephas in his Treatiſe of Paradiſe (the firſt Part and fol. 49.) ſaith, That the Tree of Knowledge was Ficus Indica; The Indian Fig-tree, of which the greateſt plentie (ſaith Becanus) are found vpon the bankes of Aceſines, one of the Riuers which falleth into Inaus, where Alexander built his Fleet of Gallies in, or neere the Kingdome of Porus.

This Tree beareth a fruit of the bigneſſe of a great peaze, or (as Plinie reporteth) ſomewhat bigger, and that it is a tree, ſe ſemper ſerens; Alwayes planting it ſelfe; that it ſpreadeth it ſelfe ſo farre abroade, as that a troupe of horſemen may hide themſelues vnder it. Strabo ſaith, that it hath branches bending downewards, and leaues no leſſe then a ſhield. Ariſtobulus affirmeth, that fiftie horſemen may ſhaddow themſelues vnder one of theſe trees. Oneſicritus raiſeth this number to foure hundred. This tree (ſaith Theophraſtus) exceedeth all other in bigneſſe, which alſo Plinie and Oneſicritus confirme: to the trunke of which, theſe Authors giue ſuch a magnitude, as I ſhame to repeate. But it may be, they all ſpeake by an ill-vnderſtood report. For this Indian Fig-tree is not ſo rare a plant, as Becanus conceiueth, who becauſe he found it no where elſe, would needes draw the garden of Paradiſe to the Tree, and ſet it by the Riuer Aceſines. But many parts of the world haue them, and I my ſelfe haue ſeene twentie thouſand of them in one Valley, not farre from Paria in America. They grow in moiſt grounds, and in this manner: After they are firſt ſhot vp ſome twentie or thirtie foote in length (ſome more, ſome leſſe, according to the ſoile) they ſpread a very large top, hauing no bough nor twigge in the trunke or ſtemme: for from the vtmoſt end of the head branches there iſſueth out a gummie iuyce, which hangeth downe-ward like a cord or ſinew, and within a few Moneths reacheth the ground; ground; which it no ſooner toucheth but it taketh roote, and then being filled both from the top boughes, and from his owne proper roote, this cord maketh it ſelfe a Tree exceeding haſtily. From the vtmoſt boughes of theſe yong Trees there fall againe the like cordes, which in one yeere and leſſe (in that World of a perpetuall ſpring) become alſo trees of the bigneſſe of the nether part of a lance, and as ſtraight, as arte or nature can make any thing, caſting ſuch a ſhade, and making ſuch a kinde of groue, as no other Tree in the world can doe. Now one of theſe trees conſidered with all his yong ones, may (indeede) ſhrowd foure hundred or foure thouſand horſemen, if they pleaſe; for they couer whole Vallies of ground where theſe trees grow neere the Sea-banke, as they doe by thouſands in the inner part of Trinidado. The cordes which fall downe ouer the bankes into the Sea, ſhooting alway downeward to finde roote vnder water, are in thoſe Seas of the Indies, where Oyſters breed, intangled in their beds, ſo as by pulling vp one of theſe cordes out of the Sea, I haue ſeene fiue hundred Oyſters hanging in a heape thereon; whereof the report came, that Oyſters grew on trees in India. But that they beare any ſuch huge leaues, or any ſuch delicate fruit, I could neuer finde, and yet I haue trauailed a dozen miles together vnder them: but to returne to Goropius Becanus. This tree (ſaith he) was good for meate and pleaſing to the ſight, as the tree of Knowledge of good and euill is deſcribed to be.

Plin. l. 12. c. 5.

Secondly, this tree hauing ſo huge a trunke (as the former Authors report, and Becanus beleeueth) it was in this tree that Adam and Eue hid themſelues from the preſence of God, for no other tree (ſaith he) could contayne them. But firſt it is certayne, that this Tree hath no extraordinarie magnitude, as touching the trunke or ſtemme, for among ten thouſand of them it is hard to finde any one bigger then the reſt, and theſe are all but of a meane ſize. Secondly, the wordes of Moſes tranſlated in medio ligni, are by all the interpreters vnderſtood in the plurall number (that is) in the middeſt of the trees. But his third argument (or rather the argument of Moſes Bar-cephas, word for word) is, That when Adam and Eue found themſelues naked, Gen. 3. 7. they made them breeches of Fig-leaues; which proueth (indeede) that either the tree it ſelfe was a Fig-tree, or that a Fig-tree grew neere it: becauſe Adam being poſſeſt with ſhame, did not runne vp and downe the garden to ſeeke out leaues to couer him, but found them in the place it ſelfe; and theſe leaues of all other were moſt commodious by reaſon of their largeneſſe, which Plinie auoweth in theſe wordes; Pl. l. 12. c. 5. Latitudo foliorum peltæ effigiem Amazoniæ habet; The breadth of the leaues hath the ſhape of an Amazonian ſhield: which alſo Theophraſt confirmeth; the forme of which Targets Virgil toucheth:

Virg. AEn. l. 1. 494.

Ducit Amazonidum lunatis agmina peltis
PENTHESILÆA furens.

The Amazons with Creſcent-formed ſhield
PENTHESILÆA leades into the field.

Here Becanus deſireth to be beleeued, or rather threatneth vs all that reade him, to giue credit to this his borrowed diſcouerie, vſing this confident (or rather cholericke) ſpeech. Quis erit tam impudenter obſtinatus, ſi hæc à nobis de ficu hac ex antiquis ſcriptoribus cum MOSIS narratione comparet, vt audeat dicere aliam arborem inueniri poſſe, quæ cum illa magis quadret? Who will be ſo impudently obſtinate, if he compare theſe things which we haue reported of this Fig-tree, and out of ancient Writers deliuered, with the narration of MOSES, as to dare to auow, that any other tree can be found, which doth more properly anſwere, or agree therewith? But for my ſelfe, becauſe I neither find this tree, ſorting in body, in largeneſſe of leaues, nor in fruit to this report, I rather incline to the opinion of Philo: That the Earth neuer brought forth any of theſe trees, neither before nor after; but I leaue euery man to his owne beliefe, for the matter is of no great weight as touching his kinde: only thereby, and by the easie Commandement by God giuen to Adam, to forbeare to feede thereon, it pleased God to make tryall of his obedience: Prohibita, non propter aliud, quàm ad commendandum puræ ac simplicis Obedientiæ bonum; Being forbidden, not for any other respect, then thereby to commend the goodnesse of pure and simple Obedience. August. de Ciuit Dei, l. 13. c. 20.

§. III.

Of BECANVS his not vnwittie allegorizing of the Storie of his Ficus Indica.

BVt in this I must doe Becanus right, that he hath very wittily allegorized this Tree, allowing his supposition of the Tree it selfe to be true. The effects whereof, because his discourses are exceeding ample, I haue gathered in these few wordes. As this Tree (saith he) so did Man grow straight and vpright towards God, vntill such time as he had transgressed and broken the Commandement of his Creator; and then like vnto the boughes of this tree, he began to bend downeward, and stouped toward the earth, which all the rest of Adams posteritie after him haue done, rooting themselues therein, and fastning themselues to this corrupt world. The exceeding vmbragiousnesse of this tree, he compareth to the darke and shaddowed life of man, through which the Sunne of iustice being not able to pierce, we haue all remained in the shaddow of death, till it pleased CHRIST to climbe the tree of the Crosse for our enlightning & redemption. The little fruit which it beareth, and which is hard to finde among so many large leaues, may be compared (saith he) to the little vertue, and vnperceiued knowledge among so large vanities, which obscure and shaddow it ouer. And as this fruit is exceeding sweet, and delicate to the taste and palate: so are the delights and pleasures of the world most pleasing, while they dure. But as all those things which are most mellifluous, are soonest changed into choller and bitternesse: so are our vanities and pleasures conuerted into the bittrest sorrowes and repentances. That the leaues are so exceeding large, the fruit (for such leaues) exceeding little, in this, by comparison we behold (saith he) the many cares and great labours of worldly men, their sollicitude, their outward shewes, & publike ostentation, their apparent pride and large vanities; and if we seeke for the fruit, which ought to be their vertuous and pious actions, we finde it of the bignesse of the smallest peaze; glorie, to all the world apparent; goodnesse, to all the world inuisible. And furthermore, as the leaues, body, and boughes of this Tree, by so much exceede all other Plants, as the greatest men of power and worldly abilitie surpasse the meanest: so is the little fruit of such men, and such trees, rather fitting and becomming the vnworthyest Shrub, and humblest Bryar, or the poorest and basest Man, then such a flourishing statelinesse, and magnitude. Lastly, whereas Adam, after he had disobayed God, and beheld his owne nakednesse and shame, sought for leaues to couer himselfe withall, this may serue to put vs in minde of his and our sinnes, as often as we put on our garments, to couer and adorne our rotten and mortall bodies: to pamper and maintaine which, we vse so many vncharitable and cruell practices in this world,

§. IIII.

Of the name of the tree of Knowledge of good and euill: with some other notes touching the storie of ADAMS sinne.

NOw, as touching the sense of this tree of Knowledge of good and euill, and what operation the fruit thereof had, and as touching the propertie of the Tree it selfe, Moses Bar-cephas an ancient Syrian Doctor (translated by Masius) giueth this iudgement: That the fruit of this tree had no such vertue or qualitie, as that by the tasting thereof, there was was any such knowledge created in Adam, as if he had beene ignorant before; but as Iunius also noteth: Arbor scientiæ boni & mali (id est) experientiæ boni & mali ab euentu; The Tree of knowledge of good and euill (that is) the experience of good and euill by the euent. For thus much we may conceiue, that Adam being made (according to the Hebrew phrase) by the workemanship of Gods owne hand, in greater perfection then euer any man was produced by generation, being (as it were) the created plant, out of whose seede all men liuing haue growne vp; and hauing receiued immortalitie from the breath or spirit of God, he could not (for these respects) be ignorant, that the disobaying of Gods commandement was the fearfullest euill, and the obseruation of his Precepts the happiest good. But as men in perfect health doe (notwithstanding) conceiue, that sickenesse is grieuous, and yet in no such degree of torment, as by the suffering and experience in themselues they afterwards witnesse: so was it with Adam, who could not be ignorant of the punishments, due to neglect and disobedience; and yet felt by the proofe thereof in himselfe another terror then he had fore-thought, or could imagine. For looking into the glasse of his owne guiltie soule, he beheld therein the horror of Gods iudgements, so as he then knew, he feelingly knew, and had tryall of the late good, which could not be prized, and of the new purchased euill, which could not be expreſt. He then saw himselfe naked both in body and minde; that is, depriued of Gods grace and former felicitie: and therefore was this tree called the tree of Knowledge, & not because the fruit thereof had any such operation, by any selfe qualitie or effect: for the same phrase is vsed in many places of the Scriptures, and names are giuen to Signes and Sacraments, as to acts performed, and things done. In such sort as this tree was called the tree of Knowledge, by cause of the euent (as is aforesaid) so was the Well of contention therefore called Esek, and the Well of hatred Sitnath, because the Heardsmen of Isaac and Gerar contended for them; and the heape of stones, called the heape of witnesse, betweene Iacob and Laban, not that the stones bare witnesse, but for a memorie of the couenant. So Iacob called the house of God Bethel: and Hagar, the Well in the Desart, Viuentis, & videntis.

*Num.*20.13. *Gen.*26.20.21. *Cap.*31.48. *Cap.*28.19. *Cap.*16.14.

But Adam being both betrayed and mastered by his affections, ambitious of a farther knowledge then he had perceiued in himselfe, and looking but slightly (as all his issues doe) into the miseries and sorrowes incident, and greatly affecting the supposed glorie which he might obtaine by tasting the fruit forbidden, he was transported and blowne forward by the gentle winde of pleasing perswasions vnawares; his progression being strengthened by the subtile arguments of Satan, who laboured to poyson mankinde in the very roote, which he moystned with the liquor of the same ambition, by which himselfe perished for euer.

*Bart. sem.*2.*l.*2. But what meanes did the Deuill finde out, or what instruments did his owne subtletie present him, as fittest and aptest to worke this mischiefe by? euen the vnquiet vanitie of the woman; so as by Adams harkening to the voyce of his wife, contrarie to the expresse commandement of the liuing God, Mankind by that her incantation became the subiect of labour, sorrow, and death: the woman being giuen to man for a comforter and Companion, but not for a Counseller. But because thou hast obayed the voyce of thy wife, &c. (said God himselfe) Cursed is the earth for thy sake, in sorrow shalt thou eate of it all thy life. It is also to be noted, by whom the woman was tempted; euen by the most vgly and vnworthy of all beasts, into whom the Deuill entred and perswaded.

*Gen.*3.17.

Secondly, what was the motiue of her disobedience? euen a desire to know what was most vnfitting her knowledge, an affection which hath euer since remained in al the posteritie of her Sexe. Thirdly, what was it that moued the man to yeeld to her perswasions? euen the same cause which hath moued all men since to the like consent, namely, an vnwillingnesse to grieue her and make her sad, lest shee should pine and be ouer-come with sorrow. But if Adam in the state of perfection, and Salomon the sonne of Dauid, Gods chosen seruant, and himselfe a man endued with the greatest greatest wisedome, did both of them disobay their Creator, by the perswasion and for the loue they bare to a Woman, it is not so wonderfull as lamentable, that other men in succeeding ages haue been allured to so many inconuenient and wicked practices, by the perswasions of their wiues, or other beloued Darlings, who couer ouer and shaddow many malicious purposes with a counterfait passion of dissimulate sorrow and vnquietnesse.

CHAP. V.

Of diuers memorable things betweene the fall of ADAM, and the floud of NOAH.

§. I.

Of the cause and the reuenge of CAINS sinne: and of his going out from God.

THe same Pride and Ambition which began in Angels, and afterward possest Adam, Cain also inherited: for Cain (enuious of the acceptation of his Brothers prayer and sacrifice) slue him, making himselfe the first man-slayer, and his brother the first Martyr: the reuenge of which vnnaturall murther, although it pleased God to mitigate, when Cain cryed out that his punishment was greater then he could beare: For the same offence chiefly (wherewith the sonnes of Adam, as it were, vrged and prouoked God) he destroyed all mankinde, but Noah and his family: for it is written. The earth also was corrupt before God: of which in the same place Moses giueth a reason, for saith he, The earth was filled with crueltie: and anon after, God himselfe made the cause knowne vnto Noah, saying; An end of all flesh is come before me, for the earth is filled with crueltie through them, and behold, I will destroy them with the earth, or from the earth. Neither was this crueltie meant to haue beene in taking away the liues of men only, but in all sorts of Iniustice and Oppression. After this murther of ABEL, CAIN went out from the presence of the Lord, and dwelt in the Land of NOD, towards the East side of Eden: in which wordes, The going out of Cain from the presence of the Lord, is not to be vnderstood after the literall sense; God being wholly in all parts of the world: Totus in cœlo est, totus in terra, non alternis temporibus, sed vtrumq; simul; God (saith S. AVGVSTINE) is wholly in heauen, and wholly in earth, not by enterchanged times, but all at once; and that this is true, Dauid witnesseth: If I be in heauen (saith DAVID) thou art there; if in hell, thou art there also: but what is meant thereby? Exijt à facie Dei (saith CHRYSOSTOME) CAIN went out from the presence of the Lord (that is) he was left of God, disfauoured and bereaued of his protection.

But it ſeemeth to me, that Cain was rather a Vagabond or Wanderer in his cogitations, then any thing elſe, and that his thoughts and conſcience had no quiet or reſt, in regard of the murther committed, iuſtly fearing (by his owne words) the like violence:

Gen.4.14. And whoſoeuer findeth me (ſaith CAIN) ſhall ſlay me. Now that Nod or Naid was a Region wherein Cain inhabited, appeareth by the word (dwelt) for dwelling ſignifieth an abiding: and we call thoſe people Wanderers and Vagabonds that haue no

Gen.4.16. dwelling place. And to make this dwelling and abiding more manifeſt, Moſes teacheth in what part of the earth this his habitation was, which he affirmeth towards the Eaſt ſide of Eden. Secondly, it is ſaid by Moſes, that after Cain departed from the

17. preſence or fauour of God, he built a Citie, and called it by the name of his firſt borne, Enoch; which ſheweth that he feared to wander, and rather ſought to fortifie himſelfe againſt reuenge. Cyrillus ſaith, that Cain and Abel were figures of Chriſt, and of the Iewes; and that as Cain, after that he had ſlaine Abel vniuſtly, had thenceforth no certayne abiding in the world: ſo the Iewes, after they had crucified the Sonne of God, became Runnegates: and it is true, that the Iewes had neuer ſince any certayne Eſtate, Common-weale, or Prince of their owne vpon the earth. Now this Land of Nod, Iunius taketh to be in Arabia Deſerta, a Region of Nomades; but Arabia the Deſart is not Eaſtward, or on the Eaſt part of Eden, neither are theſe Nomades any particular People or Nation. For all theſe, in what part of the world ſoeuer, which in old time liued by paſtorage, and fed (as we call it in Ireland) vpon white meate, without tilling of the ground, are called by the Greekes, Nomades, and by the Latines, Paſtores vagi, as the Northerne Tartarians, the Getulians, and Numidians in Africa, the ancient Brittans, and the Northerne Iriſh: yea, ſuch were the inhabitants of Italie it ſelfe, till ſuch time as Italus (who gaue them that name) taught them the huſbandrie of tillage, vſed at this day. But the Region Eaſtward from Eden is that part of Aſſyria, called by Ptolemie, Calena, which alſo might be deriued of Carena, the Countrie of Cain. And that Cain inhabited in thoſe parts, it may be gathered by the

Verſ. 23. firſt poſſeſſion of his Father Adam; for thus it is written, GEN.3. Therefore the Lord God ſent him forth from the garden of Eden to till the earth whence he was taken: and in the

24. Verſe following: Thus he caſt out man, &c. and at the Eaſt ſide of the garden of Eden he ſet the Cherubins: which ſheweth that the entrie into Paradiſe was from the Eaſt, by which entrance Adam was caſt out, and therefore inhabiting on that ſide of Paradiſe which was Eaſtward, according to the Text. Cain alſo in the ſame Region ſought his dwelling place. Now, if the word Nod or Naid doe ſignifie profugus, that is, a fugitiue, we can giue no longer time to this vncertayne habitation of Cain, then till he built the Citie of Enoch, the firſt of the world, which he incloſed either for his owne defence, or (as Ioſephus writeth) to oppreſſe others thereby. So as for mine owne opinion, I am reſolued with the Septuagint, that Nod was the proper name of a Region; and for the word (vagabond) which Cain vſeth of himſelfe, it ſeemeth by the perclose of the ſame Verſe, that (vagabond) is therein vnderſtood for ſuch an one as trauaileth in feare of reuengement: for whoſoeuer findeth me (ſaith CAIN) ſhall ſlay me; or elſe (vagabond) is taken for a man without protection, and caſt out from the fauour of God.

And becauſe theſe Henochians, ſo called of the Citie Henoch, were the firſt ſocietie and ciuill aſſembly of all other, it is likely that the fame of theſe people (either for crueltie, ſtrength, or other actions) liued in the memorie of Noah and his ſonnes; ſo that that after the Floud (as there were of all ſorts of natures, ſome vertuouſly, ſome impiouſly diſpoſed, and euery actiue minde ſetting before it whom to follow or imitate) thoſe people, which delighted in crueltie and oppreſſion tooke on them their names whoſe natures they moſt liked and allowed; of whom theſe Henochians were not the leaſt. Perchance the place it ſelfe where Henoch ſtood before the Floud, and whereof the Monuments might remaine (as the pillars or the foundation of Ioppe did) gaue occaſion to the Planters of that place to cal themſelues by the ſame names: for of thoſe Henochians there were many Nations in the borders of Pontus, and Colchis in Iberia, Segdiana, and Bactria, and of the ſame name many Mountaines, as thoſe which are otherwiſe called Coraxici. And ſeeing that it is hard to find out the truth of theſe things, which the moſt aged Time hath couered ouer or defaced, we may (according to the counſaile of Plato) exceedingly reioyce, and therewith ſatisfie our ſelues, if of ſo great and almoſt worne-out antiquitie, if of the eldeſt peoples names and Nations there remaine any print or foot-ſteps to Poſteritie.

Quotidiè aliquid in hoc magno orbe mutatur, noua vrbium fundamẽta iaciuntur, noua Gentium nomina (extinctis nominibus priorib⁹) oriuntur, Seneca ad Albinum.

In * Plinie, P. Mela, Strabo, Valerius Flaccus, Lucan, Stephanus, wee finde thoſe Henochei deſcribed, though diuerſly written, as in Plinie, ſometimes Heniochi, in Mela Eniochi, in Flaccus Heniochi, in Lucan Enochij, all which inhabite vpon the Sea Euxinus, but yet none of theſe are on the Eaſt ſide of Eden, or (according to Moſes words) Eaſtward from Eden. For Moſes, in all places where he deſcribeth any Region, was ſo exceeding preciſe, as ſometime hee vſeth the word Eaſt or South without borrowing or addition, at other times with a borrowing, as Eaſtward or Southward, or towards the Eaſt or South. In the place of Geneſis the eleuenth hee writeth the word (Eaſt) ſimply and directly. And as they went from the Eaſt, they found a Plaine in the Land of Shinar, but in this of Cain he addeth the word (towards) as, in the Land of Nod towards the Eaſt ſide of Eden; which may be taken, as inclining ſome one point or two eyther to the North or to the South of the Eaſt.

* Plin. l. 6. c. 9. 11. & 16. Mel. l. 1. c. vlt. Strabo lib. 11. Val. Flacc. l. 6. Lucan. l. 3. v. 37. & v. 2.

But as we may coniecture that theſe Nations tooke name of Henoch, the Citie of Cain, or of the Region wherein it ſtood, when the ſame was repeopled after the Floud: ſo it is probable that theſe Henochij of Colchis, and other parts adioyning, were not the firſt of that name, after the ſonnes of Noah began to fill the World againe: becauſe, had this Henoch the Citie of Cain ſtood in any of theſe parts, it had then beene ſeated North, and not Eaſt or Eaſtward from Eden. But as Plinie findeth their habitation towards Pontus, ſo afterwards he goeth on Eaſtward, till hee tracke them or trace them out to their originall. For he calleth theſe of Colchis (now Mengrelia) Sanni Heniochi; Ptolomie Zani; beyond which an hundred and fiftie myle Eaſtward hee findeth another Nation of them about Iberia and Albania; and beyond theſe againe hee diſcouereth a third Nation, from whence all the reſt tooke beginning, which inhabited on the Weſt ſide of the Mountaines of Paro-paniſus, betweene them and the great Riuer of Oxus, which bordereth Bactria on the North ſide; and theſe Henochij are due Eaſt from the Region of Eden, and Eaſtward from the very Garden it ſelfe.

Plin. l. 6. c. 4. 5. Ptol. tab. Aſiæ. 3.

And although we cannot be aſſured, that theſe Henochij tooke name from the memory of the Citie of Enoch directly; yet becauſe they inhabited due Eaſt from Paradiſe, and afterwards ſpred themſelues Weſtward (as all Noahs ſonnes did that came into Shinar) the coniecture is farre more probable, then that of Annius the Fryer, who ſets Henoch in Phœnicia, quite contrary to Moſes word: Phœnicia from all parts of Eden being directly Weſt.

And beſides theſe ſeueral Nations of the Henochij, Stephanus findeth a Region called Henochia, and the ſame alſo in the Eaſt, with diuers Mountaines about Bactria and Segdiana of the ſame name. Onely the Grecians (according to their fabulous inuentions of all things elſe) out of the word (Heniothi) which ſignifieth Carts or Coachmen, make theſe Nations to haue ſprung from the Waggoners of Caſtor and Pollux (to wit) AMPHITES and Telchius, who attended them in the enterprize of Iaſon into Colchos. And though I doe not deny, but that Iaſon with other Greekes ranged the Coaſts

§. III.

Of MOSES his omitting sundry things concerning CAINS Generation.

BVT of the remembrance and testimonies of the name of the Citie of Henoch in prophane Story, thus much may suffice; Now it followeth to answere some few obiections against certaine particulars in the fourth and fifth Chapter of Genesis: against which for the first it is demanded, how it was possible for Cain (hauing no other assistance then his sonne Henoch) to performe such a worke as the building of a Citie, seeing there is thereto required so many hands, and so great a masse of all sorts of Materials? To which it is answered, that we are first to consider, That of Cain (because he was the Parent of an impious race) MOSES vseth no ample declaration; and so it best agreeth with his diuine reason, seeing that he containeth the whole Story of the first race, which wasted by the least account, 1656. yeeres, in fiue short Chapters. Yet thus much may euery man borrow of his owne weakest reason, That seeing it pleased God to bestow on the first generations of mens liues so long a measure, as 800. and 900. yeeres, that in such a space Cain had not want of leasure and meanes to build many such Cities as Henoch, be the capacitie answering to what other of the World soeuer: for in what age of Cains life he built it, the Scriptures are silent: as of whose times, and the times of his issues Moses had the least care. And as it was sayd of Cain, that he built a Citie: so was it sayd of Noah, that his three sonnes peopled all the World; but in both, the processe of time required to bee vnderstood: which aduice seeing Moses vseth where the space lesse requireth it, as knowing that hee writ the Scriptures to reasonable men, wee may easily vnderstand, that such was his meaning also in all reports of like nature. For in making but a difference betweene the birth of Abel, and oblation of Cain, he spake it in this sort, Fuit autem post dies multos or à fine dierum (that is) in processe of time, it came to passe that CAIN brought an Oblation. And therefore it is in like sort to bee vnderstood of Cain, that many yeeres fore-gone, and when his people were increased, he built the Citie of Enoch or Henoch.

And where it is written, as of Cain, that he built Enoch, so of Salomon, that hee built the Temple of Hierusalem; yet it is well knowne of Salomon, that hee employed in that worke, 150000. Labourers: for this phrase or speech is common with our selues to say, The King inuaded; when hee caused an inuasion to bee made: and hee built, when he commanded such a building. And therefore seeing wee find, that Moses had no regard to the ages, to the birth, or to the death of any of Cains issues, it is not to be maruailed at, why he also passeth ouer in a word the building of Enoch, without addition of any circumstance: for of Cain, Moses writeth in this manner: CAIN also knew his wife, who conceiued and bare HENOCH, and hee built a Citie, and called the name of the Citie after the name of his sonne HENOCH. And to HENOCH was borne IRAD, and IRAD begat MEHVIAEL, and MEHVIAEL begat METHVSAEL, and METHVSAEL LAMECH.

ſes walked in, and finiſhed it with care, paſſing ouer the Reprobate Generation (as aforeſayd. Of the Line of Adam by Cain, Moſes remembreth but eight Generations, reckoning Adam for one, and of the Line of Adam by Seth ten, counting Adam alſo therein, as followeth:

1. ADAM.

2. Cain.	2. Seth.
3. Henoch.	3. Enoſh.
4. Irad.	4. Cainan.
5. Mahuiael.	5. Mahaleel.
6. Mathuſael.	6. Iarad.
7. Lamech, who by Ada had	7. Henoch.
8. Iubal and Tubal, and by Silla	8. Mathuſalem.
Tubalcain, and Noema.	9. Lamech, and 10. Noah.

Theſe be the Generations of Adam by Cain, which the Scriptures mention: but Ioſephus giueth vnto Lamech threeſcore and ſeuenteene Sonnes and Daughters, by his two wiues Ada, and Silla: and to theſe three ſonnes of Lamech, Moſes aſcribeth the inuention of Paſtorage, of Muſicke, and the working in Metall; for it ſeemeth that Iubal firſt gathered together, and made familiar thoſe beaſts which formerly were vntamed, and brought them into Heards and Droues: Tubal inuented Muſicke, and Tubalcain the working in Braſſe and Iron: the one being addicted to Huſbandry, the other was Mechanicall, the third giuen to idleneſſe and pleaſure. In whom began theſe three meaner degrees of Sheep-heards, Handy-crafts-men, and Muſicians. And in the iſſues of Seth began the Seruices of God, Diuinitie, Prophecie, and Aſtronomie: the children of the one beheld the Heauens, the other the Earth. Gen. 4. 20. 21. 22

§. IIII.

Of the diuerſities in the Ages of the Patriarchs when they begat their children.

A Second ſcruple hath beene made, How it came to paſſe that the Patriarchs begat their children at ſo diuers Ages, as Cainan or Cenan at ſeuentie yeeres, Mahaleel and Enoch at threeſcore and fiue yeeres, whereas Iared begat not any of his vntill hee was 162. yeeres olde: Mathuſalem begat at 187. Lamech at 182. and Noah at 500. yeeres. Now this difference hath bin the more enforced, becauſe it cannot be coniectured, that eyther Iared, Mathuſalem, or Lamech abſtained from marriage out of the Religion of abſtinence, ſeeing that Enoch, who was tranſlated by God for his ſingular ſanctities, begat children before he was threeſcore and ten yeeres olde.

The apparent difference hereof ariſeth in this, that Moſes did not number the generations before the Floud preciſely, according to the firſt begotten and eldeſt ſonnes of the Patriarchs, but he drew downe the Line of Noah from Seth, and afterward from Noah to Abraham, by their true Anceſtors, were they elder or yonger as hee found them: for it is likely that Henoch was not the eldeſt of Iarad, nor Lamech the firſt borne of Mathuſalem, nor Noah of Lamech; neither is there any thing knowne to the contrarie, but that Noah might haue had many ſonnes before Shem, Ham, and Iaphet, though theſe three were only named, and ſuruiuing, and which by God were reſerued to bee the Fathers of Mankind after the Floud; and therefore when we find Mahaleel to bee begotten by Kenan at threeſcore and ten yeeres who was the firſt ſonne of Kenan, and then reckon that Mathuſalem begat Lamech in the 187. yeere of his life, the difference ſeemeth ſtrange, where Lamech is taken for the eldeſt. But Moſes reiecteth all the other ſonnes of Mathuſalem but Lamech only, becauſe he was the Father of Noah as aforeſaid.

foresaid. Of this Saint Augustine hath somewhat else in his 20. and 21. Chapters De Ciuitate Dei.

But as Moses counted the Generations of the first age, and so to Abraham, and the children of the promise after him, so doth S. Matthew recite the Genealogie of Christ, not by the eldest sonnes, but from those whom God had chosen and blessed, without respect of the first-borne, who haue hereby the prerogatiue in Estates, worldly and transitorie only; and therefore the Euangelist nameth Isaac, and not Ismael, though Ismael were first in time: so doth he take Iacob the yonger, and not Esau the elder; neyther is Christ deriued from any of the three eldest Patriarchs, Reuben, Simeon, or Leui, but from Iuda a fourth brother, and so from Dauid a yonger sonne of Iessai; and lastly we find, that the Kingdome it selfe of Iuda was not giuen to the Heire in nature, but to the Heire of grace, namely Salomon.

§. V.

Of the long liues of the Patriarchs: and some of late memorie.

THE third Obiection is, that the great difference of yeeres betweene those of the first Age, whereof some of them had well-neere seene a thousand yeeres, makes it disputable, whether the account of times were of the same measure as in after-ages, seeing, that soone after the Floud, men liued not a third part of that time, and in succeeding ages and to this day not the tenth.

They that haue hereon resolued that those yeeres were but Lunarie yeeres, (to wit) of a Moneth or thereabouts, or Egyptian yeeres, are easily confuted. For whereas Seth begat Enosh in the yeere of his life 105. if those yeeres bee taken but for Moneths, then had Seth liued but eight yeeres and one Moneth when hee begat Enosh: and if the time of Enosh haue the same allowance, when he begat Kenan, then could Enosh at that time haue beene but sixe yeeres and fortie eight weekes old; and so it may be gathered of the rest; excepting only Adam, who was created perfect in his kind, as were the Trees in their kinde, bearing fruit and seed. But this were too ridiculous to imagine. For to giue an abilitie of Generation at 6. 7. or 8. yeeres, agreeth with the short liues of the Pigmies, and not with the constitutions of our first Fathers, who being descended from Adam, the workemanship of Gods hands, and begotten and borne in the strong youth of the World, had length of daies and ability of body agreeable. Againe, if we allow this idle conceit of the Lunarie yeeres, then there would follow this extremitie, that those which liued longest, and vpwards of nine hundred yeeres, had by that account but the time of fourescore and tenne and odde yeeres, which were not only lesse by farre then the Patriarchs liued after the Floud, but short of many mens liues in this decrepit age of the World, wherein many exceed fourescore, and some hundred yeeres. Further (if need bee) to disprooue this reckoning, whereas it is written, *Gen.*25. That Abraham dyed in a good Age, an old man, and of great yeeres: all which (if the former account were of Lunarie yeeres) makes but seuentoene and an halfe of our yeeres.

*Solin. Poli. Hist. cap.*3. *Macrob. Satur. lib.*1. *cap.*3. *Plin. l.*7. *c.*48.

And if we seeke for a cause of this long life in Nature, then is it reasonable, that the first man, created in highest perfection, should also beget children of equall strength or little differing: for of the first and purest seed there must of necessitie spring vp the fairest and fruitfullest Plants. Secondly, the Earth it selfe was then much lesse corrupt, which yeelded her increase, and brought forth fruit and food for man, without any such mixture of harmefull qualitie, as since that time the Curse of God for the crueltie of mans heart brought on it and Mankind: Neither had the Waters of the Floud infused such an impuritie, as thereby the naturall and powerfull operation of all Plants, Herbes, and Fruits vpon the Earth receiued a qualification and harmefull change. And as all things vnder the Sunne haue one time of strength, and another other of weakneſſe, a youth and beautie, and then age and deformitie: ſo Time it ſelfe (vnder the deathfull ſhade of whoſe wings all things decay and wither) hath waſted and worne out that liuely vertue of Nature in Man, and Beaſts, and Plants; yea the Heauens themſelues being of a moſt pure and clenſed matter, ſhall waxe old as a garment; and then much more the power generatiue in inferiour Creatures, who by the ordinance of God receiue operatiue vertue from the ſuperiour. *Pſal.*102.v.26.

But beſides the olde age of the World, how farre doth our education and ſimplicitie of liuing differ from that old time? the tender bringing vp of children, firſt fed and nouriſhed with the milke of a ſtrange Dugge; an vnnaturall curioſitie hauing taught all women (but the begger) to find out Nurſes, which neceſſitie only ought to commend vnto them: The haſtie marriages in tender yeeres, wherein, Nature being but yet greene and growing, we rent from her and replant her branches, while her ſelfe hath not yet any root ſufficient to maintaine her owne top; and ſuch halfe-ripe ſeeds (for the moſt part) in their growing vp wither in the bud, and waxe olde euen in their infancie. But aboue all things the exceeding luxurioufneſſe of this glutonous Age, wherein we preſſe Nature with ouer-waightie burdens, and finding her ſtrength defectiue, we take the worke out of her hands, and commit it to the artificiall helpe of ſtrong Waters, hot Spices, and prouoking Sawces; of which Lucan hath theſe elegant Verſes:

Luxuries, nunquam paruo contenta paratu:
Et quæſitorum terra pelagoq́; ciborum
Ambitioſa fames, & lautæ gloria menſæ,
Diſcite quàm paruo liceat producere vitam:
Et quantum Natura petat.
Non auro myrrhâq́; bibunt: ſed gurgite puro
Vita redit: ſatis eſt populis fluuiuſq́; Cereſq́;.

O waſtfull Riot, neuer well content

Of Cates by Land and Sea farre fetcht and ſent:
Vaine glorie of a Table ſumptuous,
Learne with how little life may be preſerued.
In Gold and Myrrhe they need not to carrouſe,
But with the Brooke the peoples thirſt is ſerued:
Who fed with Bread and Water are not ſterued.

The Ægyptians affirme, that the longeſt time of mans life is a hundred yeeres, becauſe the heart in a perfect bodie waxeth and groweth to ſtrength fiftie yeeres, and afterwards by the ſame degree decaieth and withereth. Epigenes findeth in his Philoſophie, that the life of man may reach to the period of an hundred and twenty yeeres, and Beroſus to a hundred and ſeuenteene yeeres. Theſe opinions Plinie repeateth and reproueth, producing many Examples to the contrary. In the laſt taxation, number and reuiew of the eighth Region of Italie, there were found in the Roll (ſayth Plinie) foure and fiftie perſons of an hundred yeeres of age: ſeuen and fiftie of an hundred and ten: two, of an hundred and fiue and twentie: foure, of an hundred and thirtie: as many that were hundred and fiue and thirtie, or hundred and ſeuen and thirtie yeeres old: and laſt of all three men of an hundred and fortie: and this ſearch was made in the times of Veſpaſian the Father and the Sonne. Pier.Hierog.l.2. Plin.l.7.c.29.

The ſimple dyet and temperate life of the Eſſeans gaue them long account of many yeeres: ſo did it to the Secretaries of Ægyptian Ceremonies, to the Perſians Magicians and Indian Brachmans. The Greekes affirme out of Homer, that Neſtor liued three Ages, and Tireſias ſixe, Sybilla three hundred yeeres, Endymion of the leſſe Aſia little Ioſeph.antiq.l.13 cap.8. Plin.l.7.c.48.

little lesse: Also Masanissa of Numidia liued very long, and Dando of Illyria. Among the Kings of Arcadia many liued three hundred yeeres (sayth Ephorus.) Hellanicus affirmeth of the Epeians, that some of them liue full two hundred yeere: and so doth Diodorus Siculus of the Ægyptians; and that these reports are not fabulous; Iosephus bringeth many witnesses with himselfe, as Marethon, Berosius, Mochus, Estius, Hieronymus Ægyptius, Hecataeus, Ephorus, and others. And Anthonie Fume an Historian of good reputation reporteth, that in the yeere 1570. there was an Indian presented to Solyman, Generall of the Turkes Armie, who had out-liued three hundred yeeres. I my selfe knew the old Countesse of Desmond of Inchiquin in Munster, who liued in the yeere 1589. and many yeeres since, who was married in Edward the Fourths time, and held her Ioynture from all the Earles of Desmond since then; and that this is true, all the Noblemen and Gentlemen of Munster can witnesse. Strozzius Cigogna, out of Torquemada Maffaus, and the like Authours, telleth of some that haue not only farre exceeded the terme prescribed by Epigenes; but beene repayred from the withered estate of decrepit age to fresh youth. But for length of life, if we note but the difference betweene the abilitie of men in those dayes wherein Galen the Phisician liued, it may easily proue vnto vs what reeds weare in respect of those Cedars of the first age. For Galen did ordinarily let bloud sixe pound weight, whereas wee (for the most part) stop at sixe Ounces. But to conclude this part, there are three things (not counting Constellations) which are the naturall causes of a long and healthfull life; (to wit) strong Parents, a pure and thin Ayre, and temperate vse of dyet, pleasure, and rest: for those which are built of rotten timber, or mouldring stone, cannot stand long vpright; on Ayre wee feed alwayes and in euery instant, and on meates but at times: and yet the heauy load of abundance, wherewith we oppresse and ouercharge Nature, maketh her to sinke vnawares in the midway; and therefore with a good constitution, a pure Ayre, and a temperate vse of those things which Nature wanteth, are the only friends and companions of a long life.

§. VI.

Of the Patriarchs deliuering their knowledge by Tradition: and that ENOCH writ before the Floud.

A Fourth scruple hath beene made, How the certaine knowledge of the Creation came to Moses, seeing there was no Storie thereof written, and if any such had beene, yet it is conceiued, that all memorie of Antiquitie perished in the Vniuersall Floud.

But if we consider the curiositie and policie of elder ages, we shall find, that knowledge was the greatest treasure that men sought for, and which they also couered and hid from the vulgar sort, as Iewels of inestimable price, fearing the irreuerent construction of the ignorant and irreligious: so as whatsoeuer was attained vnto concerning God, and his working in nature, the same was not left to publike dispute, but deliuered ouer by heart and tradition from wise men to a posteritie equally zealous;

Dion. Arcop. Ex animo in animum sine literis, medio intercedente verbo: From minde to minde without Letters, by way of tradition or word of mouth. And it was thought by Esdras Origen,

Fol. 18. and Hilarius, (as Mirandula conceiueth) that Moses did not onely vpon the Mount receiue the Law from God, but withall, secretiorem & veram legis enarrationem; a more secret and true explanation of the Law; which (saith he, out of the same Authours,) hee deliuered by mouth to Iosuah, and Iosuah to the Elders: For to teach these mysteries, which hee called secretiora, to the rude multitude, were no other quàm dare sanctum canibus, & inter Porcos spargere Margaritas, then to giue holy things to Dogges, and to cast Pearles before Swine. In succeeding times this vnderstanding and wisedome began to bee written in Ciphers, and Characters, and Letters bearing the forme of beasts, birds, birds, and other creatures; and to be taught onely to such as serued in their Temples, and to their Kings and Priests. Of the first the Cabala of the Iewes was an imitation: the inuention of the other is ascribed to Zoroaster, Mercurius, Cadmus, and others; but falsely.

This Cabala importeth a Law, receiued by tradition and vnwritten. Cabala in Hebrew is receptio in Latine, and a receiuing in English. And this custome was also held by the Druids & Bards of our ancient Brittaines, and of later times by the Irish Chroniclers called Rymers. If then such as would seeme wisest in the vse of reason, will not acknowledge, that the storie of the Creation or beginning of all things was written by inspiration, the holy Ghost guiding the hand of Moses; yet it is manifest, that the knowledge thereof might by tradition (then vsed) be deliuered vnto him by a more certayne presumption, then any or all the testimonies which prophane antiquitie had preserued and left to their successors: which their wise men (as they terme them) did lay vp and defend from the iniurie of the time and other hazzards. For, leauing to remember that Adam instructed Seth, and Seth his children and successors, which cannot be doubted of, it is manifest, that Methusalem liued together with Adam himselfe two hundred sortie and three yeeres, and Noah with Methusalem no lesse then fiue hundred yeeres: and before Noah dyed, Abraham was fiftie and eight yeeres old; from whence this knowledge by an easie and ordinarie way might come to Israel, and so to Moses.

Cabala est scientia Theologiæ non reuelata, P. M. 82. Mirand. 110. fol

But besides this tradition, it is questionlesse, that the vse of letters was found out in the very infancie of the world, proued by those prophecies written on pillars of stone and bricke by Enoch: of which Iosephus affirmeth, that one of them remayned euen in his time (meaning belike some ruine or foundation thereof) which pillars by others are ascribed to Seth. But of these prophecies of Enoch Saint Iude testifieth; and some part of his Bookes (which contayned the course of the Starres, their names and motions) were afterward found in Arabia fœlix, in the Dominion of the Queene of Saba (saith Origen) of which Tertullian affirmeth that he had seene and read some whole pages. It is not therefore strange, that Moses came to the knowledge of the Creation, and storie of the first Age, seeing he might receiue it both by tradition and letters, had not the spirit of God instructed and inspired him as it did: which also his many and strange miracles (performed before he wrote the Scriptures) make more manifest.

Ios. l. 1.

Iud. Ep. v. 14.

Origen. Homil. 1 in Num.

Now for the Bookes of Enoch, how soeuer some men make question of them, sure I am that Tertullian, Origen, Augustine, Beda, Procopius, Gazeus, (with others) cite them in their writings: although Medina, for an argument to proue them vnwritten traditions, alleageth that Pope Gelasius among other the Apocryphall Scriptures (which he reiecteth) named not these of Enoch; but that whatsoeuer was remembred out of them, the same was deliuered by Tradition from the Iewes. But I rather thinke with Pererius, that such a Booke there was, and that the same was corrupted after the death of the Apostles, and many things added thereunto by Heretikes, who tooke occasion vpon the antiquitie thereof, and out of that place of Michael contending with the Deuill about the body of Moses, to frame and adde thereunto many inuentions of their owne. One of the greatest arguments against these Bookes, is, that neither Philo, nor Iosephus (the most diligent searchers of Antiquitie) make mention thereof. But against it I will set this opinion of Saint AVGVSTINE, Scripsisse quidem nonnulla diuina ENOCH illum septimum ab ADAM negare non possumus: That ENOCH the seuenth from ADAM did write diuers diuine things we cannot denie. Now his writings which came afterwards to light, were suspected because of the antiquitie, and of fables of Giants, supposed to be begotten of Angels, and others; and by so much the more, because no such Booke was found amongst those Canonicall Scriptures, kept by the diligence of the Hebrew Priests in Armario Iudaico (saith Tertullian) who yet affirmeth that this Booke might be preserued by Noah. Surely, that Enoch wrote the prophecies remembred by Iude, no man can denie;

Orig. Homil. 28. in Num. & Comment. in Euang. Ioan. Gelas. dist. 15.

Tertul. de habit. mulierum.

denie; how they were deliuered to posteritie I know not; whether by the Iewes Cabala, or by what other meanes, the same is but mans coniecture. And (certainely) by the knowledge ascribed to Noah of the motions of the Heauens, and of the Natures Hebr.11.5. and coniunctions of the Starres; and afterwards to some of his sonnes, to Zoroaster, and then to Abraham, it is very probable that Noah had seene and might preserue this booke. For it is not likely, that so exquisite knowledge therein (as these men had) was suddenly inuented and found out, but left by Seth to Enoch, and by Enoch to Noah, as hath beene said before. And therefore if letters and arts were knowne from the time of Seth to Enoch, and that Noah liued with Methusalem, who liued with Adam, and Abraham liued with Noah, it is not strange (I say) to conceiue how Moses came to the knowledge of the first Age, be it by letters, or by Cabala and Tradition, had the vndoubted word of God neede of any other proofe then selfe-authoritie.

Of the men of renowme before the flood.

NOw let vs consider the relation of Moses, who nameth seuen descents of Cains children, and of Adam by Seth ten: Seth being giuen by God in stead of Abel; and of Seth was Enosh begotten, in whose time men began to professe Religion, and to offer sacrifice in publike. For although Adam instructed his children in the knowledge of God their Creator, as appeared by the sacrifice offered by Cain and Abel; yet it seemeth that after the birth of Enosh men began publikely to call on the name of the Lord, that is, they serued and praised God by Communion and in publike manner, or calling vpon the name of the Lord, and thereby were the sonnes of God or the godly distinguished from the wicked. From the birth of Enosh the sonne of Seth, to the time of Henoch the sonne of Iared, there is nothing remembred by Moses, but their owne births, the births of their sonnes, the length of their liues, and deaths. But of Henoch
Gen.5.24. it is written, That he walked with God, and he was no more seene: for God tooke him away. By that, that he walked with God, was meant, that he was a iust and vpright man, and that he feared, loued, and obayed God. For the same phrase Moses vseth of Noah.
6.9. NOAH was a iust and vpright man in his time, and NOAH walked with God. The Seuentie conuert it, ENOCH placuit Deo; HENOCH pleased God. And although Aben-Ezra and others vnderstand this place, (tulit eum Deus:) scilicet, mortuus est; God tooke him away (that is) he dyed, which (indeede) agreeth both with the phrase of the Scripture, and with our manner of speech to this day, to say, God tooke him away, when he dyed; yet the difference which Moses maketh betweene the pietie of Henoch and the rest of the Patriarchs, and by omitting the word (death) which he vseth to all else, makes it manifest, that Henoch was not dissolued as the rest. For to all the rest of the Patriarchs, Moses vseth these wordes, And he dyed; but of Henoch he spake otherwise, saying only, he was missing, or he was not seene. Et non inueniebatur (saith the Epistle to the Hebrewes) quia Deus eum transtulit; And he was not found, for the Lord tooke him away. In the same place it is expresly added, that he saw not death.

But whether this taking away of Enoch were not with the same kind of changing, 1.Cor.15.51. which S. Paul promiseth, when he saith, that when the end shall come, we shall not all die, but all shall be changed, I leaue it to the learned Diuines.

After Henoch, Moses passeth ouer to Methusalem and Lamech, remembring (as of the rest) the times of their birth and death: sauing that Lamech prophecied of his
Gen.5.29. sonne Noah, saying, This same shall comfort vs concerning our worke, and sorrow of our hands, as touching the earth which the Lord hath cursed. Of Noah, Moses writeth more amply, then of any of the rest of Adams children by Seth, being the last of the ten Gen.6.9. generations of the first Age, whom God (with his familie) preserued, because he was an vpright man in his time, and feared God.

But

But of the warre, peace, gouernement, and policie of these strong and mightie men, so able both in body and wit, there is no memorie remayning: whose stories if they had beene preserued, and what else was then performed in that newnesse of the world, there could nothing of more delight haue beene left to posteritie. For the exceeding long liues of men (who to their strength of body and naturall wits had the experience added of 800. and 900. yeeres) how much of necessitie must the same adde of wisedome and vndertakings? Likely it is, that their works excelled all whatsoeuer can be told of after-times, especially in respect of this old age of the world, when we no sooner begin to know, but we begin to die; according to HIPPOCRATES: Vita brevis, ars longa, tempus praeceps, (which is) Life is short, Arte is long, and Time is headlong. And that those people of the first age performed many things worthy admiration, it may be gathered out of these words of MOSES: These were mightie men, which in old time were men of renowne. But these men of renowne (whom the Scripture afterwards calleth Giants, both for strength of body and crueltie of minde) trusted so much to their owne abilities, as they forgat altogether the pietie of Seth, and the wayes wherein Henoch walked: for all the imaginations of their hearts were euill, only euill, and continually euill. And this wickednesse was not only found in the issues of Cain, but it was then vniuersall, when the children and sonnes of God (or of the godly) were corrupted and misled by their idolatrous Wiues, the Daughters of Cain, or of those other men, louing themselues and the world only.

Aphor. 1. Gen. 5. 4. Vers. 5.

That these sonnes of God were Angels, which being taken with the beautie of women, accompanied them and begat Giants, some of the Fathers supposed, namely, Lactantius and Eusebius, misled by Iosephus: of whom I cannot doubt, but that they afterward changed their former opinions. And of this mistaking many Writers haue taken great aduantage, and haue troubled themselues with large answeres and very needlesse: the question being vncapable of dispute, especially since S. Chrysostome and S. Augustine haue answered it largely long agoe. For, that good and godly men were honored with the title of Gods children, it doth euery where appeare in the Scripture; and on the contrary, to thinke that Angels, who (as Christ witnesseth) behold the face of God, (that is) alwayes attend his Commandements, should after a separation from the rest which fell with Lucifer, forsake the glorious presence of their Creator, and become Incubi, or Succubi, contrarie both to Nature and Grace, were more then madnesse to imagine.

Gen. 5. v. 24.

§. VIII.

That the Giants by MOSES so called, were indeede men of huge bodies: as also diuers in later times.

OF these Giants which Moses calleth mightie men, Goropius Becanus an Antuerpian (who thought his owne wit more Giganticall then the bodies of Nimrod or Hercules) hath written a large discourse, intituled Gigantomachia, and strained his braines to proue, that there were neuer any such men: his reasons (whosoeuer desires to lose time) he may finde them in the Treatises beforenamed. It is true that Cyrillus reproues the Grecian Poets for their monstrous fictions: who affirme shamelesly, That the Giants haue in elder times not only cast vp Mountaynes vpon Mountaynes, but remoued Islands out of the Sea, with like fooleries. And for that inuention of casting vp Hils, and making warre with the Gods, no doubt but that the same was borrowed out of the storie of Nimrod, as before remembred; and euen out of this Scripture, That the Sonnes of God saw the Daughters of Men, of whom the first Giants were begotten, was that conceit taken of Orpheus and Hesiodus, That Giants were the sonnes of the Heauen and the Earth; meaning by the Heauens the sonnes of God, and by the

the Earth the Daughters of men: which verses of Orpheus are by Iohn Ceſſam (who hath written a wittie diſcourſe of this ſubiect) thus changed into Latine:

Nomine cæleſtes illos dixêre Gigantes
Orti quòd terrâ fuerint & ſanguine cæli.

From the Earth, and from thy bloud, ô heauen, they came,
Whom thereupon the Gods did Giants name.

But what will not Opiniators and ſelfe-beleeuing men diſpute of, and make doubt of, if they cannot conceiue that there were in the firſt Age ſuch kind of men; and of which there haue beene in all times ſince? Seeing the Scriptures auow the one manifeſtly, and common experience the other?

And for that ſuperlatiue ſtrayning of wordes, and the meaning of them, that the name of Giants was giuen to Oppreſſors and Tyrants, and not to ſtrength of body and eminent ſtature: ſuch men might with better reaſon call them Oppreſſors, becauſe they were Giants, and therefore had abilitie to oppreſſe, then ſay, That they were called Giants onely, becauſe Oppreſſors. For firſt, Moſes himſelfe calleth them mightie men; which ſheweth a ſtrength ſurpaſſing others: and afterwards, men of renowne, (that is) of great vndertaking and aduenterous action. And if the ſame ſtature of body, and abilitie had not beene found among diuers Nations after the generall floud, then might this place of Moſes haue more willingly harkened to a diſpute, and yeelded to interpretation.

But beſides all theſe famous Giants found in prophane Hiſtories (which I will reſerue to accompanie the Giants of Albion, in the ſtorie of Britanie) the Scriptures doe cleerely and without all allegoricall conſtruction auow, That, beſides Nimrod, there were found of theſe Giants in the time of Abraham, of Moſes, of Ioſua, and of Dauid; namely, the Rephaims in Aſteroth; the Zuzæi or Zanzummims in Ham, and the Emims, which dwelt anciently in the Land of Moab: whom Moſes (for ſtature) compareth with the Anakims, which dwelt in Hebron; for they alſo were taken for Giants as the Anakims: Likewiſe, where Moſes ſpeaketh of the Land of Ammon, he vſeth theſe words: That alſo was taken for a land of Giants, for Giants dwelt therein afore-times: and, whom the Ammonites call Zamzummims: a people that was great, and many, and tall as the Anakims. And theſe Giants called Rephaims in Aſteroth and Karnaim, and the Zuzæi or Zanzummims, Chedorlaomer King of Elam ouer-threw, aſſiſted by other Kings his aſſociates. Alſo the Prophet Amos found among the Ammonites men of Giantlike ſtature, whom he compareth to the Cedar, and whoſe ſtrength to the Okes; and the Prophet BARVCH, Theſe were the Giants famous from the beginning, that were of ſo great ſtature, and ſo expert in warre. Particularly it is written of Og, King of Baſan, that his bed of yron was nine cubits long, and foure cubits broad: for onely Og King of Baſan remayned of the remnants of the Giants, who commanded the Kingdome of Baſan, foure hundred yeeres after the Expedition of Chedorlaomer. Moreouer, thoſe Diſcouerers and Searchers of the Land of promiſe (ſent by Moſes from Cadesbarne in Paran) made report at their returne of the great ſtature of thoſe people in generall, and eſpecially of the ſonnes of Anak, in theſe wordes: All the people which we ſaw in it are men of great ſtature: for there we ſaw Giants, the ſonnes of ANAK, which come of the Giants, ſo that we ſeemed in our ſights like Graſſe-hoppers, and ſo we were in their ſight, (that is) the Searchers found in their owne iudgements a marualous difference between the Anakims and themſelues: inſomuch that the Iſraelites were ſo ſtricken with feare, as they rather ſought and deſired to returne againe into Ægypt, and were more willing to endure their former ſlauerie, then to fall by the ſtrokes of thoſe fearefull Nations. Furthermore, the Scriptures put vs out of doubt, that Goliah the Philiſtine of Gath, was a Giant of ſixe cubits and a ſpan long: the Armor which he wore waighed fiue thouſand ſhickles of braſſe: the ſhaft of his ſpeare

Gen.14.5. Num.15.34. Deut.2.v.21.20 Verſ.21. Amos c.1. Bar.3.v.26. Deut.3.v.11. Num.13.v.34. Cap.14.4. 1.Sam.17.4.

was like a Weauers beame, and his ſpeare head waighed ſixe hundred ſhickles of yron. Alſo in Samuel there is mention of another Goliah, ſurnamed Getheus, becauſe he was of Gath: and of three other Giants; of which the firſt was ſlaine by Iehonathan, Dauids Nephew, who had twelue fingers, and as many toes: a man of great ſtature, and his fingers were by ſixes, euen foure and twentie. 2.*Sam.*21.*v.*19. 1.*Chron.*20.21.

Alſo that Sampſon was of ſurpaſſing ſtrength, no man doubteth, who tore a Lyon as it had beene a Kid, and after ſlue thirtie of the Philiſtines, and (after that) a thouſand more of them with a Iaw-bone of an Aſſe: And laſtly, he tooke the gates of Azzah, and the two Poſts, and lifted them away with the barres, and put them vpon his ſhoulders, and carryed them to the top of the Mountayne before Ebron. *Iud.*14.6. 14.19. 16.3.

If then it be approued by euery iudgement, that both Nature and the Heauens waxe old, and that the great age of Time hath (with it ſelfe) infeebled and almoſt worne out the vertue of all things, then I ſay, That as in all other kindes the Earth (before that Sinne had increaſed the curſe and corruption) brought forth her yong ones more ſtrong and beautifull, then it did in after-ages: ſo alſo thoſe Giants, thoſe mightie men, and men of renowne as farre exceeded the proportion, nature, and ſtrength of thoſe Giants, remembred by Moſes of his owne time, and after him their ſucceſſors, as the ordinarie proportion of all men in generall, ſoone after the floud and in times farre off, exceeded the bulkes and bodies of men which are now borne in the withered quarter and Winter of the world: If therefore Giants were common in the third and fourth age, much more in the firſt flouriſhing youth and newneſſe of the world.

But the wickedneſſe (eſpecially in crueltie and oppreſſion) of theſe men was ſuch, as God therefore by the floud gaue end to all fleſh, but to the iuſt Noah and his family. And God repented him that he had made man, which S. Auguſtine thus expoundeth: Neq; enim ſicut hominem, ita Deum facti ſui pœnitet, cuius eſt de omnibus omninò rebus tam fixa ſententia, quàm certa præſcientia. Sed ſi non vtatur Scriptura talibus verbis, non ſe quodammodo familiarius inſinuabit omni generi hominum, quibus vult eſſe conſultum: vt & perterreat ſuperbientes, & excitet negligentes, & exerceat quærentes, & alat intelligentes; God (ſaith he) doth not repent him of any thing which he hath done: (as men vſe to doe) but if the Scripture did not vſe thoſe wordes or the like, it ſhould not (in a ſort) inſinuate it ſelfe familiarly to all ſorts of men, for whom it would prouide: that it might terrifie the proud, ſtirre vp the negligent, exerciſe the ſearchers of truth, and nouriſh thoſe that vnderſtand. Gen.6.6. CHAP.

CHAP. VI.

Of idolatrous corruptions, quickly rising, and hardly at length vanishing in the world: and of the Reliques of Truth touching these ancient times, obscurely appearing in Fables and old Legends.

§. I.

That in old corruptions we may finde some signes of more ancient truth.

HERE before wee proceede any further, the occasion offereth it selfe for vs to consider, how the Greekes and other more ancient Nations, by fabulous inuentions, and by breaking into parts the Storie of the Creation, and by deliuering it ouer in a mystical sense, wrapping it vp mixed with other their owne trumperie, haue sought to obscure the truth thereof; and haue hoped, that after-ages, being thereby brought into many doubts, might receiue those inter-mixt discourses of God and Nature, for the inuentions of Poets and Philosophers, and not as any thing borrowed or stolne out of the bookes of God. But as a skilfull and learned Chymist can aswell by separation of visible elements draw helpfull medicines out of poyson, as poyson out of the most healthfull herbs and plants (all things hauing in themselues both life and death) so, contrarie to the purposes and hopes of the Heathen, may those which seeke after God and Truth finde out euery-where, and in all the ancient Poets and Philosophers, the Storie of the first Age, with all the workes and maruailes thereof, amply and liuely expreſt.

§. II.

That the corruptions themselues were very ancient: as in the family of NOAH, and in the old Ægyptians.

BVt this defection and falling away from God, which was first found in Angels, and afterwards in Men (the one hauing erred but once, the other euer) as concerning mankinde it tooke such effect, that thereby (the liberall grace of God being with-drawne) all the posteritie of our first Parents were afterwards borne and bred in a world, suffering a perpetuall Eclipse of spirituall light. Hence it was that it produced plants of such imperfection and harmefull qualitie, as the waters of the generall floud could not so wash out or depure, but that the same defection hath had continuance in the very generation and nature of mankinde. Yea, euen among the few sonnes of Noah, there were found strong effects of the former poyson. For as the children of Sem did inherit the vertues of Seth, Enoch, and Noah; so the sonnes of Cham did possesse the vices of the sonnes of Cain, and of those wicked Giants of the first Age. Whence the Chaldeans began soone after the floud to ascribe diuine power and honor to the Creature, ture, which was only due to the Creatour. First, they worshipped the Sunne, and then the fire. So the Ægyptians and Phœnicians did not only learne to leaue the true God, but created twelue seuerall gods, and diuine powers, whom they worshipped; and vnto whom they built Altars and Temples. For Herodotus sayth, Duodecim Deorum nomina primos Ægyptios in vsu habuisse, atq; Græcos ab illis cepisse mutuatos, eosq; prius aras, & imagines, & templa Dijs sibi erexisse; The Ægyptians (sayth he) first deuised the names of the twelue Gods, which the Greekes receiued from them, who first erected vnto themselues Altars, Images, and Temples for the Gods. Herod. in Euterpe.

§. III.

That in processe of time these lesser errours drew on greater: as appeareth in the grosse Superstitions of the Ægyptians.

BVT as men once fallen away from vndoubted truth, doe then after wander for euermore in vices vnknowne, and daily trauaile towardes their eternall perdition: so did these grosse and blind Idolaters euery Age after other descend lower and lower, and shrinke and slide downwards from the knowledge of one true and very GOD; and did not thereby erre in worshipping mortall men only, but they gaue diuine reuerence, and had the same respect to Beasts, Birds, Fishes, Fowles, Winds, Earth, Water, Ayre, Fire, to the Morning, to the Euening, to Plants, Trees and Rootes, to Passions and and Affections of the Minde, to Paleneſſe, Sickneſſe, Sorrowes, yea to the most vnworthy and baseſt of all these. Which barbarous blasphemie, Rhodius Anaxandrides derideth in this manner. Nat. Com. l. 1. c. 7

Bouem colis, ego Deis macto bouem.
Tu maximum Anguillam Deum putas: ego

I sacrifice to God the Beese, which you adore.
I broyle the Ægyptian Eeles, which you (as God) implore:
You feare to eate the flesh of Swine, I find it sweet.
You worship Dogges, to beate them I thinke meet,
When they my store deuoure.

And in this manner IVVENAL.

The Ægyptians thinke it sinne to root vp, or to bite
Their Leekes or Onyons, which they serue with holy rite:
O happy Nations, which of their owne sowing
Haue store of gods in euery Garden growing!

§. IIII.

That from the reliques of ancient Records among the Ægyptians and others the first Idols and Fables were inuented: and that the first IVPITER was CAIN, VVLCAN, TVBALCAIN, &c.

BVT in so great a confusion of vanities, were among the Heathens themselues there is no agreement or certaintie, it were hard to finde out from what example the beginnings of these inuentions were borrowed, or after what ancient patterne they erected their building, were it not certaine, that the Ægyptians had knowledge of the first Age, and of whatsoeuer was done therein, partly from some inscriptions vpon stone or metall remaining after the Floud, and partly from Mizraim the sonne of Cham, who had learnt the same of Cham, and Cham of his Father Noah. For all that the Ægyptians write of their ancient Kings, and date of times cannot be fained. And though other Nations after them had by imitation their Iupiters also, their Saturnes, Vulcans, and Mercuries with the rest, which S. Augustine out of Varro, Eusebius out of many prophane Historians; Cicero, Diodorus Siculus, Arnobius, and many more haue obserued, to wit, the Phœnicians, Phrygians, Cretians, Greekes, and other Nations; yet was Cain the sonne of Adam (as some very learned men conceiue) called and reputed for the first and ancient Iupiter; and Adam for the first Saturne: for Iupiter was sayd to haue inuented the founding of Cities; and the first Citie of the World was built by Cain, which he called Enoch, of whom were the Henochij before remembred. And so much may be gathered out of Plato in Protagoras, which also Higinus in his 275. Chapter confirmeth. For besides that, many Cities were founded by diuers men; Tamen primam latissimam à primo & antiquissimo IOVÆ adificatam: yet the first and largest was built by the first and most ancient IVPITER, seated in the East parts, or in India, according to that of MOSES: And CAIN dwelt towards the East side of Eden, &c. where also the Henochij were found after the Floud. And therefore was Iupiter by the Athenians called Polieus, a Founder of Cities, and Herceios, an Incloser or strengthener of Cities; (say Phornutus and Pausanias) and that to Iupiter Herceios there were in very many places Altars & Temples erected. And that there were Cities built before the Floud, Plato also witnesseth, as may be gathered in this his affirming, that soone after Mankind began to increase, they built many Cities; which as his meaning hee deliuereth in plaine termes, in his third Booke of Lawes: for he saith, that Cities were built an exceeding space of time before the destruction by the great Floud.

This first Iupiter of the Ethnickes was then the same Cain, the sonne of Adam, who marrying his owne Sister (as also Iupiter is sayd to haue done) inhabited the East, where Stephanus de vrbibus placeth the Citie Henochia. And besides this Citie of Henoch, Philo Iudæus conceiueth that Cain built sixe others, as Maich, Iared, Tebe, Iesca, Selet and Gebat: but where Philo had this I know not. Now as Cain was the first Iupiter, and from whom also the Ethnickes had the inuention of Sacrifice: so were Iubal, Tubal and Tubalcain (Inuentors of Pastorage, Smiths-craft, and Musick) the same, which were called by the ancient prophane Writers, Mercurius, Vulcan and Apollo; and as there is a likelihood of name betweene Tubalcain and Vulcan: so doth Augustine expound the name of Noema or Naamath, the Sister of Tubalcain, to signifie Venusta, or beautifull Voluptas, or pleasure; as the wife of Vulcan is sayd to be Venus, the Ladie of pleasure and beautie. And as Adam was the ancient and first Saturne, Cain the eldest Iupiter, Eua, Rhea, and Noema or Naamah the first Venus: so did the Fable of the diuiding of the World betweene the three Brethren the Sonnes of Saturne arise, from the true Storie of the diuiding of the Earth betweene the three Brethren the Sonnes of Noah: so also was the Fiction of those Golden Apples kept by a Dragon taken from the Serpent, which tempted Euah: so was Paradise it selfe transported out of Asia into Africa, and made the Garden of the Hesperides: the prophecies, that Chriſt ſhould breake the Serpents head, and conquer the power of Hell, occaſioned the Fables of Hercules killing the Serpent of Heſperides, and deſcending into Hell, and captiuating Cerberus: ſo out of the taking vp of Henoch by God, was borrowed the conuerſion of their Heroes (the Inuentors of Religion, and ſuch Arts as the life of man had profit by) into Starres and Heauenly Signes, and (withall) that leauing of the World, and aſcenſion of Aſtræa; of which Ouid:

Aſtræa laſt of heauenly Wights the Earth did leaue.

For although thereby the Ethnickes would vnderſtand Iuſtice it ſelfe to haue failed, as it is a vertue abſtract, and may bee conſidered without a perſon; yet as it is vſual among the ancient Potes to deſcribe Vertues and Vices by the perſons of Men and Women, as Deſire by Cupid, Valour by Mars, Beautie or Luſt by Venus, ſo doe they alſo the perſons of Men by like Vertues and Vices, and therfore by Iuſtice and Aſtræa, Enoch: the Iuſtice and pietie of Enoch being in the ſame manner expreſt, as that of Noah was by Moſes, for Noah was ſayd to be a iuſt man; And NOAH walked with God. And of Enoch it is written, that he walked with God, and hee was no more ſeene: for God tooke him away. Nat. Com. l. 2 c. 2 V. 1. Gen. 7. Gen. 5. 22. 24.

From this Storie alſo of the firſt Age, and from that part where Moſes remembreth the Giants begotten by the Sonnes of good men vpon the Daughters of the wicked (whom Moſes calleth mightie men, and men of renowne) did they ſteale thoſe wondrous great acts of their ancient Kings, and powerfull Giants; and againe their warre vndertaken againſt the gods, from the building of the Towre of Babel by the Giant Nimord, as S. Auguſtine termeth him. Which warre of their Giants Cornelius Seuerus thus deſcriberh: L. de Ciuit. Dei.

Tentauêre (nefas) olim detrudere mundo Sydera, captiuiq; Iouis transferre Gigantes
Imperium, & victo leges imponere cælo.

The Giants did aduance their wicked hand
Againſt the Starres, to thruſt them headlong downe,
And robbing Iove of his Imperiall Crowne,
On conquered Heauens to lay their proud command.

Whereby was meant that Nimrod purpoſed to raiſe the building of Babel to that height, as God neither by drawing waters from the deepe, nor by any coniunction of the Starres, ſhould bury them vnder the moyſture of a ſecond Floud, but that by this building (if they had beene herein victorious) they would haue giuen the Law to Heauen it ſelfe. Alſo the making of Leagues, Peace and Couenants among Heathen Nations and Kings, confirmed by Sacrifice, whereof Virgil both in the eight and twelfth of his Æneides hath a touch, was as it ſeemeth borrowed from Moſes, Exod. 24. Who when he read the Booke of the Couenant, ſprinkled the people with bloud.

We find alſo many remembrances of Seth, the paternall Anceſter of Henoch and Noah: for Amenophis, the ſame King of Ægypt, which raigned at ſuch time as Moſes carried thence the children of Iſrael, (as of late ſome learned men miſtaking his time ſuppoſed) called his Sonne and Succeſſour Setho, of Seth, and of the ſame Seth (as many men of good iudgement haue granted) were the Princes of Thrace called Seuthes, whereof there were many very famous. But herein was the memorie of Seth moſt manifeſtly preſerued, that the Ægyptians worſhipped Seth, as their moſt ancient parent, and of the firſt tradition: in honour of whome they called a principall Prouince Sethetica. Wee alſo finde in Bithynia the Citie of Sethia, and others of the ſame name elſewhere. And ſure from the Ægyptians did the Gracians borrow Ioſeph. l. 1 contra Appian. Plut. in Iſide. Strab. l. 17.

this kind of Theologie, though they scorned to acknowledge any antiquitie preceding their owne; and that they might not seeme to learne elsewhere, they gaue the same names to their owne Idols which the Ægyptians did to theirs.

§. V.

Of the three chiefest IVPITERS; and the strange Storie of the third.

BVT of all those Armies of Iupiters remembred by the Ancients, Cicero maketh but three, because those were of most fame: which other Writers haue also done, who sought out, and laboured in their originals.

The first was Iupiter, the sonne of Æther and Dies, so called, because the one had reference to his celestiall conditions (for æther is as much as shining or pure fire) the other discouered his naturall vertues, which dayes and times make more perfect, and are the witnesses of mens actions.

The second was said to bee the sonne of Cœlum or Heauen, for the same former respect; and this Iupiter was an Arcadian, and King of Athens.

The third of whom all the Grecian Fables were deuised, was of Creet (now Candie) the sonne of Saturne and Ops. The name deriued from the Latine is taken of Iuuans Pater, from the Greeke Word Zeus, it signifieth life, but somewhat strained. Boccas in his Genealogie of the gods conceiueth, that his name was borrowed from Iupiter the Planet; but whether that Starre had such a name, before the same was giuen to men, I know not. Iupiter is hot and moist, temperate, modest, honest, aduenturous, liberall, mercifull, louing, and faithfull, (that is) giuing these inclinations. And therefore those ancient Kings beautified with these conditions, might be called there after Iupiter; but howsoeuer they were, or were not with those vertues enriched, yet, by imitation, all kings in the eldest times assumed those Titles and Sirnames: great Princes affecting as high Titles of honor and reputation in the World, (howsoeuer deserued) as the worthiest, that euer were, acquired by their well deseruings. Ioues omnes Reges vocârunt antiqui, The Ancients called all Kings IVPITERS, as TZETZES in his Varia historia confirmeth: Reges olim IOVES vocârunt omnes: In olde times all Nations called their Kings IVPITERS. But where this last and most remembred IVPITER was borne it is vncertaine. Some there are that make him of Creet: others, that hee was but sent thither by his Mother Ops or Opis, to bee fostered and hidden from the furie of Titan his Vncle: because it was conditioned betweene Saturne and Titan, that Saturne being a yonger brother, and raigning (for his owne life) by Titans permission, hee should put to death all his male children, lest the Titans might be interrupted by any of them in their succession; which agreement because Saturne performed in his first borne, it is fained that Saturne deuoured his owne children. Hereof Lycophron, thus turned into Latine:

Nat. Com. l. 1. c. 7

Haud sit pinguior,
Crudis sepulchrum quòd sit ipse filijs.

Saturne to be the fatter is not knowne,
By being the graue and buriall of his owne.

This composition betweene Titan and Saturne, Sybilla also witnesseth in these;

Conceptis verbis; TITAN iurare coegit
SATVRNVM, de se natum ne nutriat vllum,
Quo possint regnare senis post fata Nepotes.

Things thus agreed: Titan made Saturne sweare
No Sonne to nourish; which by raigning might Vsurpe the right of Titans lawfull Heire.

But

But Opis the mother of Iupiter, being deliuered at once both of Iupiter and Iuno, conueied Iupiter (first called Lysanias) into Crete, as shee did afterwards his two brothers, Neptune and Pluto: where hee was brought vp in Gnossus, the chiefe Citie of that Iland, by Cresta the King, or by the Curetes, a people and Nation thereof. Euseb. in Temp.

Other challenge him to be of Thebes, and a Thebane: others call him an Arcadian: others make him of Messena. The like contention is found among the Greekes touching his education and first fostering. Some affirme, that he was fed by Hony-bees: in recompence whereof he changed their blacke coats and skins into yellow; a reward well fitting such a God: others, that he was nourished by Beares: others, by Goats: and of all these the idle Greekes haue many prettie Tales. But in the end when Titan had knowledge, that Saturne had broken his faith, he set on him, and tooke him and his wife Prisoners, whom Iupiter againe rescued and deliuered.

But lastly, the Father and the Sonne equally ambitious; the one doubted the other. Saturne being the lesse powerfull fled into Italie, and left his Kingdomes in Greece to his sonne. And although this Prince at the first purchased great honour, and for his many vertues the name of Iupiter was giuen him; yet, after he was once settled and became potent, he gaue himselfe ouer wholly to palliardize and adultery, without all respect of honour, Law, or Religion. And it is reported by such, as doe ascribe the actions of many to one Iupiter, that not therewith satisfied; hee was afterwards knowne to offend in the sinne of Sodome with Ganimedes and others; and did not onely begin with incest, marrying his owne sister Iuno, but he rauished, betrayed, stole away, and tooke by strong hand all the beautifull women borne in his time, within the limits of his owne Kingdomes, or bordering them. Among whom these hereafter written were of greatest fame, Niobe, Laodemia, and Alcmena the wife of Amphitryon, by whom he had Pelasgus, Sarpedon, Argius, and Hercules: by Taygete he had Taygetus; of whom the Mountaine Taygetus tooke name, with another sonne called Saon, of whom Sauona: by Antiope he had Amphion and Zetus: by Leda Castor and Pollux, Helen and Clytemnestra: by Danaë Perseus: by Iordana Deucalion: by Charme (the daughter of Eubulus) Britomartis, by Protogenia hee had Athlius the Father of Endymion; and by Io (the Daughter of Inachus) Epaphus, the Founder of Memphis in Ægypt: which Epaphus married Libya, of whom that Countrey tooke name, for so the Greekes afterward called Africa. Hee rauished Ægina the Daughter of Æsopus, and carryed her into the Iland Oenopia or Oenotria, afterward called Ægina, on whom he begat Æacus: by Torrhebia hee had Archesilaus and Carbius: by Ora Colaxes: he had also Dardanus by Electra, who built Dardanium, afterward Ilum and Troy. Hee begat the Brothers Talici, on Thalia, and on Garamantis Hiarbas. Hee had besides these (if they belye not their chiefe God) Phileus and Pilumnus, inuentors of Bakers Craft; and I know not how many more; but I know well that hee could not be Father to all these, who were borne in Ages so farre differing. And of these his seuerall rauishments, betrayings, stealing away of mens Wiues, Daughters and Sonnes, buying of Virgins, and the like, came in all those ancient Fables of his transformations into showres of Gold, Eagles, Buls, Birds, and Beasts; and of him, and by him (in effect) all that rabble of Grecian Forgeries. And yet did not the Greekes and Romanes feare to entitle this Monster, Optimus Maximus, though Cicero in his second Booke de natura Deorum affirme, that he deserued nothing lesse, and in his Oration pro domo sua, reprocheth Clodius for his Incest, by the name of Iupiter. His buriall was in Crete (saith Lucian) Cretenses non solùm natum apud se & sepultum IOVEM testantur, sed etiam sepulchrum eius ostendunt; The Cretians or Candians doe not onely auow that IVPITER was borne and buried among them, but they shew his graue and sepulchre: which Epiphanius also confirmeth, for in his time there remained the Monuments of his Tombe in the Mountaine Iasius. This Callimachus in his Hymnes also witnesseth, but as offended thereat, sayth thus; Luc. in Sacrif.

The Cretians euer Lyars were, they care not what they say:
For they a Tombe haue built for thee, O King, that liu'st alway.

Diod. l. 2. c. 5.

Diodorus Siculus tels by way of report from the Libyan Fables, confirmed (as hee saith) by some Greeke Writers, that the originall of these gods was from the Westerne parts of Africk. For there among the Atlantidæ raigned one Vranus (which signifieth Heauen) called so for his great skil in Astrologie, and for his knowledge, and benefits to the people, honoured by them as a God after his death. He had by many Wiues 45. Sons; but by his principall Wife Titea, hee had 17. Sons and two Daughters, all which were called after their Mothers name the Titanes. Of Titea, likewise it is said, that she for her goodnesse was canonized as a Goddesse, being dead, and called the Earth, as her Husband was stiled Heauen. But of al the children of Titea, her Daughter Basilea (which name sounding as Queene in English, she is by the Latine Translator of Diodorus called Regina) excelling the rest as far in vertue as in yeeres, was by generall consent of her Brethren, and of the people, appointed to rule as Queene after her Fathers death, being as yet a Virgin. Shee tooke to Husband her Brother Hyperion, to whom shee bare a Sonne and a Daughter, called Sunne and Moone. The beautie and towardlinesse of these children moued her Brethren to enuie, and bred in them a feare of being excluded from the Succession: wherefore they tooke the Boy and drowned him in the Riuer Eridanus, now called Poe. The losse of this childe caused his Sister to breake her owne necke; and the losse of both her Children made the Mother to play many mad prankes, dancing with Cymbals, after a wild fashion, in sight of all the people, before whom shee is said to haue vanished away. Ere shee dyed, her Sonne (as the Fable hath it) signified vnto her in a Dreame, that he and his Sister by the prouidence of God should become immortall, that also the Sunne and Moone should bee called by their names, and that their death should bee reuenged vpon the Murderers. According to which it is said, that the people did so call those two Planets, and withall held her selfe as a Goddesse, and termed her the great Mother, which name they had formerly giuen to her, for her motherly care in cherishing her Brethren whilest they were young. Hyperion and his Race being extinguished, the other Sonnes of Vranus diuided the Kingdome. Of these Atlas and Saturne were chiefe. Atlas raigned ouer the Countries lying about the Mountaines, which afterward bare his name; a iust and wise Prince, deeply skilfull in Astrologie, and for inuention of the Sphere, sayd to haue supported Heauen. Hee had many Sonnes; but the principall of them called Hesperus, being of his Fathers qualities and studies, was sayd to haue beene carried away by the Winde, from the top of an high Hill in the midst of his Contemplations, and his name in honour of him, imposed by the people vpon the Morning Starre. The seuen Daughters of Atlas were also sayd to haue beene excellent Ladies, who accompanying such as came to be deified, or registred among the Worthies, brought forth Children, answerable in qualitie to those that begat them. Of these it is held, that the seuen Starres called Pleiades tooke name. Saturne the Brother of Atlas raigned in Sicilia, part of Africk and Italie. Iupiter, another of the Sonnes of Vranus, raigned in Crete; who had tenne Sonnes which he called Curetes; he called that Iland after his Wiues name Idea; in which Ile he dyed, and was buried. But this Iupiter must not haue beene that great one, but Vncle to the Great Iupiter, if these Fables of the Libyans were true. Saturne (as these Libyans tell the Tale) was a great Tyrant, and fortified strong places, the better to keepe his people in subiection. His Sister Rhea was married to Hammon, who raigned in some part of Africk. Hammon louing others as well as his Wife, or better, got a Daughter, called Minerua, neere to the Riuer Triton, who thereupon was called Tritonia. Hee also begat on Amalthea a Sonne called Bacchus, whom he caused secretly for feare of his life to be brought vp at Nysa, an Iland in the Riuer Triton, vnder the tuition of his Daughter Minerua, and certaine Nymphes. To Amalthea he gaue in reward a goodly Countrie, that lay on the Sea-coast, bending in forme of a horne, whence grew the Tale of Amaltheas plentifull Horne, famous among the Poets. When Rhea heard these newes, she fled from her Husband to her Brother Saturne, who not onely entertained her as a Sister, but tooke her to wife, and at her instigation made warre vpon

Hammon,

Hammon, vanquished him by assistance of the Titanes, and made him flee into Crete. The Curetes, Iupiters children before mentioned, held the Iland at that time; which was new named Crete by Hammon, after the name of Creta the Kings Daughter, whom he tooke to wife, and had with her (women as may seeme being very gracious in those times) the Kingdome. Bacchus was growne a proper yong man, had found out the making of wine, the arte of planting trees, and many things else commodious for mankinde, before the flight of his Mother in law. Now therefore hearing report of all that had hapned, and that Saturne was comming against him with the Titanes; he leuyed an Armie, to which the Amazons liuing not farre from Nysa, added great forces, in loue of Minerua, who was entred into their profession. So Bacchus leading the men, and Minerua the women, they set forward against Saturne, met him, ouerthrew him, and taking many of the Titanes prisoners, returned to Nysa; where pardoning the prisoners, that promised to become his true followers, he prepared for a second Expedition. In the second Expedition he behaued himselfe so well, that he wan the loue of all the people by whom he passed; insomuch that partly for good affection to him, partly in hatred of Saturnes rigorous gouernement, he was greatly strengthened, and the Enemie as much infeebled by daily reuolts. Comming to the Citie of Hammon, he wan a battaile of Saturne, before the very walls. After which Saturne with his wife Rhea fled by night, setting the Towne on fire to despight Bacchus. But they were caught in their flight, pardoned by Bacchus, and kindly entreated. Saturne had a yong sonne by Rhea, called Iupiter. This child Bacchus tooke with him in a great Expedition that he made into the East countries; and comming into Ægypt, he left this Iupiter, being then a Boy, Gouernour of the Countrie; but appointed vnto him as an Ouer-seer, one Olympus, of whom Iupiter grew to be called Olympius. Whilest Bacchus trauayled through all Nations, as far as into India, doing good in all places, and teaching many things profitable to the life of man; the Titanes had found out his Father Hammon in Crete, and began to warre vpon him. But Bacchus returned out of India, with whom Iupiter from Ægypt, and his sister Minerua, together with the rest that afterwards were held as gods, ioyning all their forces, went into Crete, ouerthrew the Titanes, chased them, tooke, and slue them, and freed the world of them all. After all this, when Hammon and Bacchus were dead, they were deified; and the great Iupiter the sonne of Saturne succeeding them, reigned Lord alone ouer all the world, hauing none of the Titanes left aliue, nor any other to disturbe him. Betweene this tale of the Libyan Gods, and the Ægyptian fables of Osiris, there is a rude resemblance, that may cause them both to be taken for the crooked Images of some one true historie. For the expeditions of Osiris, and of Bacchus; the warres of the Giants in the one storie, of the Titanes in the other; the Kingdome of Ægypt giuen by Hercules Lybicus to Orus, by Bacchus to Iupiter, the Rattles of Isis, and the Cymbals of Basilea, with many pettie circumstances, neerely enough resemble each other, howsoeuer not alike fitted to the right persons. Sanchoniato (as Eusebius cites him) would haue all these to be Phœnicians, and is earnest in saying, That it is a true storie, and no Allegorie. Yet he makes it seeme the more allegoricall, by giuing to Vranus or Heauen for Daughters, Fate and Beautie, and the like, with addition of much fabulous matter, omitted by Diodorus, though Diodorus haue enough. To the Genealogie he addes Elius or the Sunne, as Father of Vranus, and among the children of Vranus, Iapetus, Betilus, and Dagon (whom Diodorus doth not mention by their names) giuing withall to Vranus the proper name of Terrenus or Indigena, and of Illus to Saturne, but omitting Iupiter of Crete. The Pedigree of them is this:

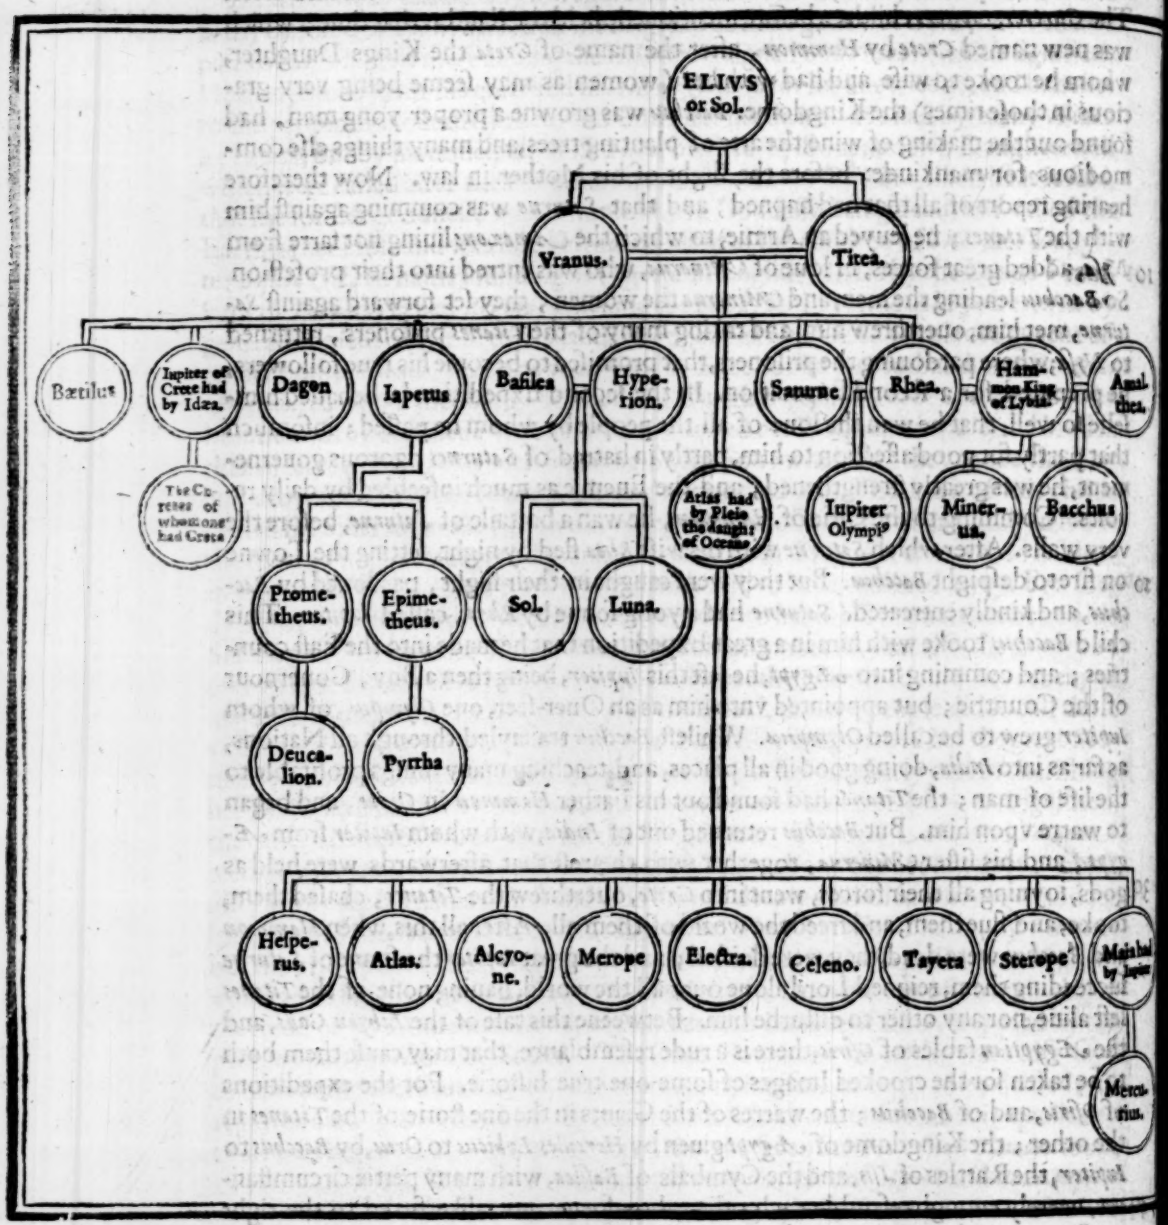
§. VI.



§. VI.

Of CHAM, and other wicked ones, whereof some gat, some affected the name of Gods.

OF Iupiter Belus, the sonne of Saturnus Babylonicus, otherwise Nimrod, it seemeth that Cicero had not heard, (at least by that name) who was more ancient than any of the former three by him remembred: for long after these times were the Greekes but Saluages, if they seeke no farther off for their Gods.

But the Ægyptians, euen after the floud, began (somewhat before this Chaldean Iupiter) to intitle Cham, the parent of their owne Mizraim, Iupiter Chammon, or Hammon. For the Etymologie of this word (Hammon) which the Greekes deduce ab arenis; from the sands, is ridiculous (saith Peucer;) neither yet is his owne much better, better, who brings it from Hammath, which ſignifieth heate: becauſe the ſaid Temple of Iupiter Hammon was ſeated in Libya, where the ayre is exceeding hot and ſcortching. And as for the antiquitie of the latter Iupiter (among the Greekes and Romans the moſt renowned) it is certaine that he was borne not long before the warre of Troy, as by many of his ſonnes is made manifeſt; namely, Caſtor, Pollux, Hercules, Sarpedon, and others, which liued in that age of Priamus, vnder whom, and with whom Troy was deſtroyed.

Now ſeeing that mortall men, and the moſt wicked, were eſteemed immortall among the Heathen; it was not to be wondred at, that Alexander Macedon, Tyberius, Nero, Caligula, and others, ſought to be numbred among them, who were as deformed monſters as the reſt: For by what reaſon could the ſame Deitie be denyed vnto Laurentia and Flora, which was giuen to Venus? ſeeing they were as notorious and famous Harlots as ſhee was.

§. VII.

That the wiſer of the ancient Heathen had farre better opinions of God.

BVt that euer Pythagoras, or Plato, or Orpheus, with many other ancient and excellently learned, beleeued in any of theſe fooleries, it cannot be ſuſpected, though ſome of them (ouer-buſily) haue mixed their owne inuentions with the Scriptures: for, in puniſhment for their fictions, did Pythagoras hang both Homer and Heſiodus in hell, where he fayned that they were perpetually ſtung and pinched with Serpents. Yet it cannot be doubted, but that Homer had read ouer all the bookes of Moſes, as by places ſtolne thence, almoſt word for word, may appeare; of which Iuſtine Martyr remembreth many in that Treatiſe conuerted by Mirandula. As for Plato, though he diſſembled in ſome things, for feare of the Inquiſition of the Areopagites, yet S. Auguſtine hath alreadie anſwered for him (as before remembred) Et mirificè ijs delectatus eſt, quæ de vno Deo tradita fuerant; And he was greatly delighted in the doctrine of one God, ſaith Iuſtine Martyr. Now howſoeuer Lactantius pleaſed to reprehend Plato, becauſe (ſaith he) Plato ſought knowledge from the Ægyptians, and the Chaldæans, neglecting the Iewes, and the bookes of Moſes: Euſebius, Cyrillus, and Origen, finde reaſon to beleeue the contrarie, thinking that from thence he tooke the grounds of all by him written of God, or ſauouring of Diuinitie: and the ſame opinion had S. Ambroſe of Pythagoras.

But whether it were out of the ſame vanitie, which poſſeſt all thoſe learned Philoſophers and Poets, that Plato alſo publiſhed (not vnder the right Authors names) thoſe things which he had read in the Scriptures; or fearing the ſeueritie of the Areopagites, and the example of his Maſter Socrates, by them put to death by poyſon, I cannot iudge. Iuſtine Martyr (as it ſeemeth) aſcribeth it wholly to Platoes feare, whoſe wordes among many other of the ſame effect, are theſe: PLATO MOSIS mentionem facere, ob id, quod vnum ſolum a Deum docuerat, ſibi apud Athenienſes tutum non putauit, veritus Areopagum; PLATO fearing the Areopagites thought it not ſafe for him among the Athenians to make mention of MOSES, that he taught that there is but one God. But for that Diuinitie which he hath written in TIMÆO; id ipſum de Deo diſſeruit quod & MOSES; He diſcourſed and taught the ſame of God (ſaith IVSTINE MARTYR) which MOSES did. For where it pleaſed God by his Angell to anſwer MOSES, Ego ſum exiſtens (which is) I am; and, exiſtens miſit me ad vos; I am hath ſent me vnto you, herein did Plato (ſaith Iuſtine Martyr) no otherwiſe differ then that Moſes vſed the word (qui) and Plato the word quod: MOSES enim qui exiſtit (inquit) PLATO quod exiſtit; For MOSES ſaith, He who is; PLATO, That which is. Now of Gods incomprehenſible nature, and of the difficultie either to conceiue, or expreſſe the ſame, he Areopagus, or domus ſeu mons Martis, Mars his hill: a houſe wherein capitall matters were tryed: ſo called at firſt: becauſe Mars therein firſt pleaded his cauſe for the murder of Hallirrothos. Pauſan. in Attic. Nat. Com. l.2. c.7 Iuſt. Mart. adm. Gent. fol.8. 14. vt ſup. Exod.3.14.

In Timæo. he giueth this testimonie: Genitorem Vniuersitatis tam difficile est inuenire, quàm inuentum impossibile digne profari; It is as hard to finde out the Creator of the Vniuersall, as it is impossible, if he were found, to speake of him worthily. And what can be more agreeable De Legib. 1. 10. to the Maiestie of Gods nature, then this propertie by Plato acknowledged? Deus bonus, & quidem, Deus causa bonorum: malorum autem omnium non causa; God is absolutely good, and so (assuredly) the cause of all that is good: but of any thing that is euill he is no cause at all: and againe, Charitas Dei fuit causa factionis mundi, & originis omnium rerum; The loue of God was the cause of the worlds creating, and the originall of all things. APVLEIVS the Platonist: Summus Deus infinitus est, non solum loci exclusione, sed etiam naturæ dignitate: Et nihil est Deo similius & gratius, quàm vir animo perfecto bonus; The most high God is also an infinite God, not only by exclusion of place, but by the dignitie of nature: neither is there any thing more like or more acceptable to God then a man of a perfect heart. Laertius. THALES affirmed, that God comprehended all things, and that God was of all things the most ancient: Quia nunquam esse cœpit; Because he neuer had any beginning. ZENO, that God beheld euen the thoughts of men. Athenodorus, that therefore all men ought to be carefull in the actions of their life, because God was euery-where present, and beheld all done. But what can be more agreeable to Moses storie of the Creation, then this opinion and description of the Worlds beginning in Euripides, Scholler of Anaxagoras?

Cælum terraq; vnius formæ fuit:
Sed cum fuissent abiuncta amplexu mutuo,
Emersit omnis in lucem res progenita,
Arbores, aues, feræ, quasq; affert mare,
Genusq; mortalium.

Heauen and Earth one forme did beare:
But when disioyned once they were
From mutuall embraces,
All things to light appeared then,
Of trees, birds, beasts, fishes, and men
The still-remayning races.

And as in Pythagoras, in Socrates, and in Plato: so we finde the same excellent vnderstanding in Orpheus, who euery-where expressed the infinite and sole power of one God, though he vse the name of IVPITER, thereby to auoid the enuie and danger of the time; but that he could attribute those things to the sonnes of men, and mortall creatures, which he doth to this IVPITER, there is no man who hath euer heard of God, that can imagine.

Nomina Deorum (saith MIRANDVLA) quos ORPHEVS canit, non decipientium dæmonum, à quibus malum & non bonum prouenit; sed naturalium virtutum diuinarumq; sunt nomina; The names of those Gods whom ORPHEVS doth sing, are not of deceiuing Deuils, from whom euill comes, and not goodnesse; but they are the names of naturall and diuine vertues. Yea, that he yet reacheth higher, and speaketh of God himselfe, this his instruction to Musæus, and the Hymne following teach vs: Respiciens verò ad diuinum hunc sermonem et diligenter animum aduerte, intendens cor dis rationis capax conceptaculum: rectam autem ascende viam, & solum aspice mundi Regem. Vnus est ex se genitus, Autogenes. ex eo omnia nata sunt: Ipse verò in illis versatur, nec quisquam eum intueri potest mortalium, sed ipse nihilominus omnes intuetur.

Then marking this my sacred speech, but truely lend Thy heart, that's reasons sphere, and the right way ascend,
And see the worlds sole King. First, he is simply one Begotten of himselfe, from whom is borne alone

The firſt of all is GOD, and the ſame laſt is he.
GOD is the head and midſt, yea from him all things be.
GOD is the Baſe of earth, and of the ſtarred skie.
He is the male and female too, ſhall neuer die.
The ſpirit of all is GOD, the SVNNE, the MOONE, and what is higher.
The King, th'originall of all, of all the end.
For cloſe in holy breſt he all did comprehend,
Whence all to bleſſed light, his wondrous power did ſend.

Now beſides theſe former teſtimonies, that all the learned men of ancient times were not ſo ſtupid and ignorant, as the Ægyptians, Græcians, and other Nations by them infected were, I will onely repeate two or three other opinions, and leaue the Reader to thoſe large and learned Collections of Iuſtine Martyr, Clemens, Lactantius, Euſebius, Eugubinus, Peucer, Pleſſis, Daneus, and others. For Cleanthes the Stoick, being demanded of what nature God was, deſcribed him by theſe attributes and properties: Bonus, iuſtus, ſanctus, ſeipſum poſſidens, vtilis, ſpecioſus, optimus, ſeuerus, liber, ſemper commodus, tutus, glorioſus, charitas, &c. Good, iuſt, holy, poſſeſſing himſelfe, profitable, beautifull, beſt, ſeuere, free, alwayes doing good, ſafe without feare, glorious, and ſelfe-charitie. EPICHARMVS affirmed, that God who beheld all things, and pierced euery nature, was only and euerywhere powerfull: agreeing with DEMOCRITVS: Rex omnium ipſe ſolus; He is the only King of Kings: and with Pindarus the Poet, Deus vnus, Pater, creator ſummus, atq; optimus artifex, qui progreſſus ſingulis diuerſos ſecundum merita præbet; One God, the Father, the moſt high Creator, and beſt artificer, who giueth to euery thing diuers proceedings according to their deſerts. This God (ſaith ANTISTHENES) cannot be reſembled to any thing, and therefore not elſewhere knowne; Niſi in patria illa perenni, cuius imaginem nullam habes: Saue onely in that euerlaſting Countrey, whoſe image thou haſt none at all. Hereof alſo XENOPHANES COLOPHONIVS: Vnus Deus inter Deos & homines maximus, nec corpore, nec mente mortalibus ſimilis; There is one God among gods and men moſt powerfull, neither corporally, nor mentally like vnto mortals: and XENOPHON, Deus qui omnia quatit, & omnia quieſcere facit, magnus potenſq;, quod omnibus patet: qualis autem forma ſit, nemini patet, niſi ipſi ſoli, qui luce ſua omnia perluſtrat; God who ſhaketh all things, and ſetteth all things at reſt, is great and mightie, as is manifeſt to all: but of what forme he is, it is manifeſt to none, ſaue only to himſelfe, who illuminateth all things with his owne light. Finally, Plato ſaith: Totius rerum naturæ cauſa, & ratio, & origo Deus, ſummus animi genitor, æternus animantium ſoſpitator, aſſiduus mundi ſui opifex, ſine propagatione genitor, neq; loco, neq; tempore vllo comprenſus, eoq; paucis cogitabilis, nemini effabilis; God is the cauſe, ground, and originall of the whole nature of things, the moſt high Father of the ſoule, the eternall preſeruer of liuing creatures, the continuall framer of his world, a begetter without any propagation, comprehended neither in any place, nor time; therefore few can conceiue him in thought, none can expreſſe what he is.

There-

Hieron. in Com. in Dan. In princip.

Therefore was it said by S. HIEROME, Si enim cunctos Philosophorum reuoluas libros, necesse est vt in eis reperias aliquam partem vasorum Dei, vt apud PLATONEM, fabricatorem mundi, Deum: apud ZENONEM Stoicorum Principem, inferos & immortales animas, &c. If thou consider all the bookes of the Philosophers, thou canst not but finde in them some part of the Vessels of God, as in PLATO, God the Creator of the world: In ZENO Prince of the Stoicks, Hell and immortall soules, &c. And this is certayne, that if we looke into the wisedome of all Ages, we shall finde that there neuer was man of solid vnderstanding or excellent iudgement: neuer any man whose mind the arte of education hath not bended; whose eyes a foolish superstition hath not afterward blinded; whose apprehensions are sober, and by a pensiue inspection aduised; but that he hath found by an vnresistable necessitie, one true God, and euerlasting being, all for euer causing, and all for euer sustayning; which no man among the Heathen hath with more reuerence acknowledged, or more learnedly expreſt, then that Ægyptian Hermes, howsoeuer it fayled afterward in his posteritie: all being at length by deuilish policie of the Ægyptian Priests purposely obscured; who inuented new gods, and those innumerable, best sorting (as the Deuill perswaded them) with vulgar capacities, and fittest to keepe in awe and order their common people.

§. VIII.

That Heathenisme and Iudaisme, after many wounds, were at length about the same time vnder IVLIAN miraculously confounded.

BVt all these are againe vanished: for the inuentions of mortall men are no lesse mortall then themselues. The Fire, which the Chaldæans worshipped for a God, is crept into euery mans chimney, which the lacke of fuell starueth, water quencheth, and want of ayre suffocateth: Iupiter is no more vexed with Iunoes ielousies; Death hath perswaded him to chastitie, and her to patience; and that Time which hath deuoured it selfe, hath also eaten vp both the Bodies and Images of him and his: yea, their stately Temples of stone and durefull Marble. The houses and sumptuous buildings erected to Baal, can no where be found vpon the earth; nor any monument of that glorious Temple consecrated to Diana. There are none now in Phœnicia, that lament the death of Adonis; nor any in Libya, Creta, Thessalia, or elsewhere, that can aske counsaile or helpe from Iupiter. The great god Pan hath broken his Pipes, Apolloes Priests are become speechlesse; and the Trade of riddles in Oracles, with the Deuills telling mens fortunes therein, is taken vp by counterfait Ægyptians, and coozening Astrologers.

But it was long ere the Deuill gaue way to these his ouer-throwes and dishonors: for after the Temple of Apollo at Delphos (one of his chiefe Mansions) was many times robbed, burnt, and destroyed; yet by his diligence the same was often enriched, repayred, and reedified againe, till by the hand of God himselfe it receiued the last and vtter subuersion. For it was first robbed of all the Idols and Ornaments therein by the Eubœan Pyrates: Secondly, by the Phlegians vtterly sackt: Thirdly, by Pyrrhus the sonne of Achilles: Fourthly, by the Armie of Xerxes: Fiftly, by the Captaynes of the Phocenses: Sixtly, by Nero, who carryed thence fiue hundred brazen Images: all which were new made, and therein againe set vp at the common charge. But whatsoeuer was gathered betweene the time of Nero and Constantine, the Christian Armie made spoile of, defacing as much as the time permitted them; notwithstanding all this it was againe gloriously rebuilt, and so remayned till such time as Iulian the Apostata sent thither to know the successe of his Parthian enterprise, at which time it was vtterly burnt and consumed with fire from Heauen; and the image of Apollo himselfe, and all the rest of the Idols therein molten downe and lost in the earth.

The

The like ſucceſſe had the Iewes in the ſame Iulians time, when by his permiſſion they aſſembled themſelues to rebuild the Temple of Hieruſalem: for while they were buſied to lay the foundations, their buildings were ouerthrowne by an Earthquake, and many thouſands of the Iewes were ouerwhelmed with the ruines, and others ſlaine, and ſcattered by Tempeſt and Thunder: though Am. Marcellinus report it more fauourably for the Iewes, aſcribing this to the nature of that Element. For, ſaith hee, Allypius and the Ruler of the Prouince of Iudæa, being by Iulian buſied in the reedifying of this Temple, flaming Bals of fire iſſuing neere the foundation, and oft conſuming the Workemen, made the enterprize fruſtrate. Am. Marc. l. 23. cap. 1.

Of the laſt refuges of the Deuill to maintaine his Kingdome.

NOw the Deuill, becauſe hee cannot play vpon the open Stage of this World (as in thoſe dayes) and being ſtill as induſtrious as euer, findes it more for his aduantage to creepe into the mindes of men; and inhabiting in the Temples of their hearts, workes them to a more effectuall adoration of himſelfe then euer. For whereas hee firſt taught them to ſacrifice to Monſters, to dead ſtones cut into faces of Beaſts, Birds, and other mixt Natures; hee now ſets before them the high and ſhining Idoll of glorie, the All-commanding Image of bright Gold. He tels them that Truth is the Goddeſſe of dangers and opreſſions: that chaſtitie is the enemie of Nature; and laſtly, that as all vertue (in generall) is without taſte: ſo pleaſure ſatisfieth and delighteth euery ſenſe: for true wiſedome (ſayth hee) is exerciſed in nothing elſe, then in the obtaining of power to oppreſſe, and of riches to maintaine plentifully our worldly delights. And if this Arch-politician finde in his pupils any remorſe, any feare or feeling of Gods future Iudgement, hee perſwades them that God hath ſo great need of mens ſoules, that he will accept them at any time, and vpon any conditions: interrupting by his vigilant endeuours all offer of timefull returne towardes God, by laying thoſe great blockes of rugged pouertie, and deſpiſed contempt in the narrow paſſage leading to his diuine preſence. But as the minde of man hath two Ports, the one alwayes frequented by the entrance of manifold vanities; the other deſolate and ouer-growne with graſſe, by which enter our charitable thoughts and diuine contemplations: ſo hath that of death a double and twofold opening: worldly miſerie paſſing by the one, worldly proſperitie by the other: at the entrance of the one wee find our ſufferings and patience to attend vs: (all which haue gone before vs to prepare our ioyes) at the other our cruelties, couetouſneſſe, licentiouſneſſe, iniuſtice, and oppreſſions (the Harbingers of moſt fearefull and terrible ſorrow) ſtaying for vs. And as the Deuill our moſt induſtrious enemie was euer moſt diligent: ſo is he now more laborious then euer: the long day of Mankind drawing faſt towards an euening, and the Worlds Tragedie and time neere at an end.

CHAP. VII.

Of NOAHS Floud.

§. I.

Of Gods fore-warning: and some humane testimonies: and some doubting touching the truth of NOAHS Floud.

Ioseph. l. 1. c. 4.

OF this destruction it pleased God to giue warning vnto Noah: who (saith Iosephus) fearing to perish among the rest, Secedens cum suis in aliam regionem migrauit: He departed with his children, and trauailed into another Region. And of these Giants from whom Noah withdrew himselfe, Berosus writeth in this manner; That they exceeded in all sorts of inhumane and vnnaturall wickednesse, and that they were contemptores & religionis & Deorum, contemners of religion and of the Gods: among which mightie men (sayth Berosus) vnus erat qui Deorum venerantior, & prudentior cunctis, &c. huic nomen erat NOAH, There was one more wise and reuerencing the Gods then the rest, whose name was NOAH: who with his three sonnes Sem, Iaphetus and Cham, and with their Wiues, and the Wife of Noah, (namely Titea the great, Pandora, Noela, and Noegla) preserued themselues in the Arke. This Arke God commanded Noah to prepare:

Gen. 6. 14. V. 13.

And God sayd vnto NOAH, Make thee an Arke of Pine-trees: thou shalt make Cabines in the Arke, and shalt pitch it within, and without with Pitch. For God made Noah to know that an end of all flesh was at hand, and that the graues of the rebellious and cruell Generations were alreadie fashioned in the Cloudes, which soone after should swallow vp and couer all liuing creatures, which breathed in the Ayre: Noah and his Family excepted.

But this vniuersall graue of waters, and generall Deluge hath not beene receiued by all: for diuine testimonies doe not perswade all naturall men to those things, to which their owne reason cannot reach: Dum obuoluta in obscuro veritas latet: whilest the truth lieth wrapped vp in obscuritie. Many there are who haue disputed against the vniuersalitie of this ouerflowing, and haue iudged that this Floud of Noah fell but on some particular places and Kingdomes: moued so to thinke, because in elder ages there haue beene many other Flouds (as they suppose) of that nature. Hereof Nicholaus Damascenus writeth in this manner; as his words are cited by IOSEPHVS:

Lact. in Præf. de falsa relig.

Ioseph. ant. l. 1 c. 4. Euseb. de præp. l. 9. cap. 4.

Est super Minyadam excelsus mons in Armenia, qui Baris appellatur, in quo multos confugientes sermo est diluuij tempore liberatos, & quendam simul in Arca deuectum in huius vertice hæsisse, lignorumq; relliquias multo tempore conseruatas, qui fortasse is fuit, de quo etiam MOSES Iudæorum Legislator scribit: thus farre this Authour. There is (sayth hee) aboue Minyada (or the Countrey of Minya) an exceeding high Mountaine in Armenia, called Baris: on which it is reported, that many hauing fled thither, were saued in the time of the Deluge: and that one was carried in an Arke, and rested vpon the top of the Mountaine, whereon there remained a long time after certaine pieces thereof; and this might be the same, of which MOSES the Law-giuer of the Iewes maketh mention. And of this opinion were the Thalmudists (sayth Annius) that many Giants saued themselues vpon Mount Sion.

But Berosus (who after Moses was one of the most ancient, howsoeuer hee haue beene since deformed and corrupted) doth in the substance of all agree with Moses as touching the generall Floud, taking from thence the beginning of his Historie in these

these words: Ante aquarum cladem famosam, qua vniuersus periit Orbis, &c. Before that famous destruction of Waters, by which the World Vniuersall perished: witnessing withall, that Noah with his Wife Titea, and his three Sonnes with their Wiues (in all eight persons) were onely saued.

§. II.

Of the Floud in the time of OGYGES: and that this was not NOAHS Floud.

BVT from the vanitie of the Greekes, the Corrupters of all truth, (sayth Lactantius) who without all ground of certaintie vaunt their Antiquitie, came the errour first of all: who therein flattering themselues also, sought to perswade the World, that there was no Floud preceded the Floud of Ogyges, King of the Thebans in Bœotia, or rather of Attica; and therefore sayth Rhodoginus; OGYGVM id appellant Poëtæ, tanquàm peruetus dixeris, ab OGYGE vetustissimo: The Poets gaue the name of OGYGIA to things exceeding ancient, as of OGYGES the most ancient. Rho.l.15.c.33.

But let Ogyges be as ancient as those men can make him, yet it is manifest, that hee liued but in Iacobs time (though Eusebius makes him later, and in Moses time) and was borne 67. yeeres after him. There is also an opinion, that Ogyges was Cadmus (and then was he farre later) as Rhodoginus in the ninth Booke of his Antiquities remembreth: Sunt tamen qui in Ægypto regnâsse autument hunc: vnde sit CADMVS qui in Graciam profectus Thebas condidit, à boue iugulato sic nuncupatas; quoniam Syrorum lingua bos dicitur Thebe. There are (sayth he) who thinke that this OGYGES did raigne in Ægypt, whereby he should be CADMVS, who trauailing into Greece built Thebes, so named of a Beefe slaine: because in the Syrian Language, a Beefe is called Thebe. Euseb. de præp. Euang. l.10.c.3. Ca.22.

But this Floud of Ogyges fell in the yeere of the World 3440. according to Eusebius, who followed the account of the Septuagint: and the Floud of Noah in the yeere 2242. after the same account; and so there came 1200. yeeres betweene these Flouds, wanting but two, though heerein Eusebius was much mistaken, and corrected this opinion in his Chronologie. Now although the verie yeere and time of this ouerflowing in Achaia, or rather Attica, be not precisely set downe, but that there is a great difference among Writers, yet whosoeuer makes it most ancient, finds aboue 500. yeeres difference betweene that and the generall Floud.

For Paulus Orosius affirmes, that this tempest fell vpon the Athenians, but 1040. yeeres before Rome built. Bucholzerus sayth it was 1043. elder then Rome; which was founded (according to the same Bucholzerus) in the Worlds yeere 3219. though after the account which I follow (and whereof I will giue my reasons in the Story of Abraham) it was built in the Worlds yeere 3280. Now the generall Floud preceded the building of Rome (sayth Bucholzerus) 1563. yeeres: and the Floud of Ogyges (as before) 1043. Hence it followeth by easie calculation, that (if he place Ogyges in his true age) the difference betweene these two Flouds must bee 520. yeeres, to which we (allowing 60. more) find 580. And that this of Ogyges was not the same of Noah (except we call Noah, Ogyges priscus, as some doe) it appeares by this, that the Floud of Ogyges then King of Attica or Ogygia, did not extend it selfe any further then the bankes of Archi-pelago, or the Ægæan Sea. For whereas Mela, Plinie, and Solinus witnesse, that the Citie of Ioppe in Iudæa was founded before the Floud; and that (notwithstanding the waight of Waters) there remained on certaine Altars of stone the Title of the King, and of his Brother PHINEVS, with many of the grounds of their Religion: sure, it is no where found among prophane Historians nor in the Scriptures, that euer the Floud of Ogyges spred it selfe ouer any part of Syria, much lesse ouer all the Earth. But that it drowned both the Regions of Attica about Athens, and that of Achaia in Peloponnesus, it is very probable. For it seemeth Lib.1.c.7. Xenophon. Anianus. Mela.lib.3. Plin.lib.5. Sol.c.ap.47. Ioppe oppidum antiquissimum orbe toto, vtpotè ante inundationem terrarum conditum. Solin. ibid.

meth that at that time it was, when Helice and Bura were ſwallowed vp (Cities ſeated on the North part of Peloponneſus) of which Ouid:

Bura and Helice on Achaian ground
Are ſought in vaine, but vnder Sea are found.

Nat.Com.l.1.c.6

Of this Floud of Ogyges was inuented the Fable of Apollo and Diana. For Latona the Daughter of Cœus, the Son of Titan, being beloued and forced by IVPITER, and by him gotten with childe, IVNO thereat enraged, permitted her (as they ſay) no part of the Earth to bee deliuerd on; and withall cauſed the monſtrous Serpent Python to follow and affright her, whereſoeuer ſhee trauailed, till at length arriuing at the Ile of Ortygia ſhe was there receiued: in which ſhe was deliuered, firſt of Diana, and then of APOLLO, being Twins; whereof BARLAAM makes this expoſition: That at ſuch time as the Deluge (which happened in Ogyges his Raigne) ceaſed, out of the abundant moiſture of the Earth (heat by putrefaction being thereto mixed) there were exhaled ſuch thicke miſts and fogges, that in Attica, and along the Coaſts of the Ægean Sea, neyther the beames of the Sunne by day, nor of the Moone by night could pierce the Ayre, or be perceiued by the inhabitants: ſo as when at length (the Earth being dryed, and theſe vapours diſſipated) the Ayre began to be cleere, and the people of Ortygia eſpied the light of the Moone ſomewhat before day, and in the ſame morning the Sunne alſo appeared: fabulouſly (becauſe DIANA repreſented the Moone, and APOLLO the Sunne) they were reported to bee borne in the Ile of Ortygia, thereof afterwardes called Delos: which ſignifieth manifeſtation.

And ſurely it is not improbable, that the Floud of Ogyges, being ſo great, as Hiſtories haue reported it, was accompanied with much alteration of the Ayre ſenſibly diſcerned in thoſe parts, and ſome vnuſuall face of the Skies. Varro in his Bookes, De gente populi Romani (as he is cited by Saint AVGVSTINE) reporteth out of CASTOR, that ſo great a Miracle happened in the Starre of Venus, as neuer was ſeene before, nor in after-times: For the colour, the greatneſſe, the figure, and the courſe of it, were changed. This fell out as ADRASTVS CYZICENVS, and Dion Neapolites, famous Mathematicians affirmed in the time of Ogyges.

Now concerning the courſe of that or any other Planet, I doe not remember, that I haue any where read, of ſo good Aſtrologers flouriſhing among the Greekes, or elſe where in thoſe dayes as were likely to make any calculation of the reuolutions of the Planets ſo exact, that it ſhould need no reformation. Of the colour and magnitude. I ſee no reaſon why the difference found in the Starre of Venus ſhould bee held miraculous; conſidering that leſſer miſts and fogges, than thoſe which couered Greece with ſo long darkneſſe, doe familiarly preſent our ſenſes with as great alterations in the Sunne and Moone. That the figure ſhould varie, queſtionleſſe it was very ſtrange: Yet I cannot hold it any prodigie: for it ſtands well with good reaſon, that the ſide of Venus which the Sunne beholds, being enlightned by him, the oppoſite halfe ſhould remaine ſhadowed; whereby that Planet would, vnto our eyes, deſcrying onely that part whereon the light falleth, appeare to bee horned, as the Moone doth ſeeme; if diſtance (as in other things) did not hinder the apprehenſion of our ſenſes.

GALILÆVS, a worthy Aſtrologer now liuing, who by the helpe of perſpective Glaſſes hath found in the Starres many things vnknowne to the Ancients, affirmeth ſo much to haue beene diſcouered in Venus by his late obſeruations. Whether ſome waterie diſpoſition of the Ayre might preſent as much to them that liued with Ogyges, as Galilæus hath ſeene through his Inſtrument; I cannot tell: ſure I am, that the diſcoherie of a truth formerly vnknowne, doth rather conuince man of ignorance, then nature of errour. One thing herein is worthy to be noted, that this great, but particular Floud of Ogyges, was (as appeareth by this of Saint AVGVSTINE) accompanied with such vnusuall (and therefore the more dreadfull, though naturall) signes testifying the concurrence of causes with effects in that inundation; whereas the Floud of Noah which was generall and altogether miraculous, may seeme to haue had no other token, or forethewing, then the long preaching of Noah himselfe, which was not regarded: for they were eating and drinking, when the Floud came sodainly, and tooke them all away. Luke 17. v. 27.

§. III.

Of DEVCALIONS Floud: and that this was not NOAHS Floud: nor the Vmbri in Italie a remnant of any vniuersall Floud.

A Second Floud of great fame, and of which the time is more certaine, was that of Deucalion in Thessalia, of which Saint Augustine out of Varro: His temporibus (vt VARRO scribit) regnante Athenien sibus CRANAO, successore CECROPIS (vt autem nostri, EVSEBIVS & HIERONYMVS) adhuc eodem CECROPE permanente, diluuium fuit, quod appellatum est DEVCALIONIS: (that is) In these times (as VARRO reporteth) CRANAVS the successour of CECROPS gouerning the Athenians, or (as our EVSEBIVS and HIEROME say) CECROPS yet liuing, that Floud (called DEVCALIONS) happened.

And in the beginning of the eleuenth Chapter of the same eighteenth Booke, hee vseth these words: Eduxit ergo MOSES ex Ægypto populum Dei nouissimo tempore CECROPIS Athenien sium Regis, cum apud Assyrios regnaret ASCATADES, apud Sicyonios MARATHVS, apud Argiuos TRIOPAS: MOSES led the People of God out Ægypt about the latter times of CECROPS King of the Athenians, ASCATADES raigning ouer the Assyrians, ouer the Sicyonians MARATHVS, and ouer the Argiues TRIOPAS: so as leauing the curiositie of a few yeeres, more or lesse, it appeareth, that this Floud of Deucalion was eyther at the egression of the children of Israel out of Ægypt, or neere it: and then after Noah 753. yeeres, according to Functius, who makes Cecrops to liue in the yeere of the World 2409. or if we follow MERCATOR, then 739. yeeres after Noah, and in the yeere of the World 2395. But if Deucalion were borne in the age of the World 2356. according to Codoman; then giuing vnto Deucalion fortie yeeres of age when this Floud happened; it falleth within one yeere of Mercators account. But Deucalion by all approoued Historians is said to haue beene 82. yeeres olde at that time. Now Clemens Alexandrinus dates the time of this Floud of Deucalion, and the conflagration and burning in Phaetons time, by the Raigne of Crotopus King of the Argiues; but Crotopus liued King of the Argiues sixe yeeres after Israel departed Ægypt, which makes twentie yeeres difference, according to Functius, who will haue this Floud and burning to haue fallen fourteene yeeres before Moses left Ægypt: for he gaue of the Worlds yeeres to the Floud and burning the yeere 2440. and to Moses his egression the yeere 2454. And yet Cedrenus thinkes that Moses was more ancient, and liued with Inachus; but that cannot bee true: for then had the Floud of Deucalion, and the burning of Phaëton, preceded the Floud of Ogyges, which is denied by all: for that of Thessalie (called Deucalions) followed that of Attica (called Ogygia) at least 250. yeeres or thereabouts. Eusebius in his Chronologie makes it 230. and so doth P. Orosius: Eusebius about the 50. yeere of Moses life, and Cyrillus about the 67. and both after Noahs Floud 770. yeeres: for these bee Clemens Alexandrinus his words: Fuit autem in Græcia tempore quidem PHORONEI, qui fuit post INACHVM, inundatio quæ fuit tempore OGYGIS, There happened in Greece in the time of PHORONEVS, who liued after INACHVS, the Floud of OGYGES. Now if the Floud of OGYGES in Attica were 1020. or 1016. yeeres before the first Olympiad, according cording to Eusebius and Orosius; (as before) then is it manifest, that taking 763. out of this number of 1020. it fals out that Ogyges Floud happened before the Hebrewes left Ægypt 250. yeeres, or 260. yeeres, according to the difference betweene the opinions of Eusebius and Orosius. And for my selfe (who rather follow those Chronologers, which giue 60. yeeres more to Abraham after the Floud, then the rest) I reckon the times which come betweene these Flouds in this sort. The generall Floud was in the yeere of the World 1656. Iacob was borne in the yeere of the World 2169 so as from the beginning of the Floud to IACOBS birth, there were consumed 513. yeeres. Ogyges Floud happened 100. yeeres after IACOB was borne; and therefore after the generall Floud 613. yeeres. Now Deucalion was borne in the yeere of the World 2356. and had liued 82. yeeres, when his Kingdome of Thessalie was ouerwhelmed; (which added to 2356. make 2438.) his Floud was after Noahs Floud ended 782. yeeres. And hereto Annius his Xenophon agreeth, who makes 700. yeeres betweene the generall Floud and Deucalions birth; to which adde 82. yeeres of his Age (as before) and then the Floud of Thessalie followed the generall 782. yeeres. The words of that Xenophon are these: Ab inundatione terrarum ad ortum DEVCALIONIS, secundo anno Spheri, septingenti supputantur anni, qui natus anno duos & octoginta Thessaliam vidit inundatam, From the drowning of the World to the birth of DEVCALION, in the second yeere of Spherus, are numbred 700. yeeres, and when DEVCALION was 82. yeeres old, he saw Thessalia drowned. This Floud happened in the Winter time about Parnassus: witnesse Aristotle in the first of his Meteors. And Varro (whom Saint Augustine so often citeth for his excellent learning, especially in Antiquities) findeth this Floud of Deucalion to haue happened in the time of Cranaus, who succeeded Cecrops: Orosius thinkes it somewhat later, Amphitryon raigning in Athens, the third from Cecrops. Only this of Deucalion was very great, and reached not only ouer Thessalie it selfe, and the Regions adioyning Westward; but it couered the greatest part of Italie: and eyther the same, or some other particular Floud then happening oppresst Ægypt, sayth Eusebius. And therefore did the Greekes eyther thinke it, or faine it to be vniuersall; and Deucalion, then King, sauing himselfe and some others on the Mountaine of Thessalie (of all other the highest, sayth Solinus) was by reason thereof (as Strabo witnesseth) sayd to be the preseruer of Mankind. That this Floud couered a great part of Italie, Plinie and Solinus make it probable: who affirme that the people then inhabiting Italie were therefore called Ὄμβριοι: quia ab imbribus diluuij superfuissent; and therefore also were they esteemed the most ancient Nation, as Strabo confirmeth in his first Booke, and Trezenius in his second: which Vmbri these Authours make the Parents of the Sabines, and the Sabines to bee the Parents of the Samnites, Piceni, Lucani, Brutij, and all others inhabiting anciently the bankes of the Mediterrane Sea. But that these Vmbri were not the Inhabiters of Italie before the Floud of Noah, and so tooke name by sauing themselues vpon the Appenine Mountaines, the Scriptures teach vs: shewing who, and who only then were preserued, which is sufficient. Report hath aduentured further, telling vs that the first people which after the generall Floud inhabited Italie, were the Camesenes; (so named from Camese, whom CATO in originibus, another of Annius his Authours names for a consort of Ianus) which people liued altogether a sauage life; till such time as Saturne arriuing on those Coasts, deuised Lawes to gouerne them by: the memorie of whose acts in that Region Diodor and Thallus among the Greekes, Nepos Cassius and Varro among the Latines haue preserued; and of whom Virgil:

Then came th' Auſonian bands, and the Sicanian tribes.

Of theſe Sicani (which left Spaine and ſate downe in Italie) Thucydides and Plinie giue teſtimonie: who were againe expelled by the Ligij, ſaith Thucydides. After all theſe plantations and replantations came the Vmbri, deſcended of the Gaules (ſaith Annius) not of thoſe Gaules of France, but of thoſe of Scythia, who commanded a great part of Italie, euen all Hetruria and Campania, as Herodotus, Plinie, and Dionyſius haue aſſured vs; and therefore this floud of Deucalion was long after that of Noah. For all thoſe Nations were planted in Italie, and diſpoſſeſt of Italie againe, before the Vmbri were euer heard of, or had being. So that Kingdome was firſt called Camaſene, then Latium or Saturnia, then Auſonia, then Sicania; before the Vmbri (in whoſe time Deucalions floud happened) poſſeſt the ſame, about 306. yeeres before the war of Troy: Lycaon then gouerning Arcadia; who being the Father of two and twentie Sonnes, the yongeſt called Oenotrius inuaded Italie, who gaue it the name of Oenotria. This name it held vntill Italus of the ſame Nation changed it into Italie, after his owne name, about 250. yeeres before the fall of Troy. After theſe came the Pelaſgi, of whom Plinie in his third Booke and fift Chapter; and Strabo in his fift; Thucydides in his ſixth ſpeakes at large: and after them the Lydi vnder Tyrrhenus their Captayne, that gaue name to the Tyrrheni; who caſting thence the Vmbri, tooke from them three hundred Caſtles, and built therein twelue Cities; to which (after they had poſſeſt and paſt ouer the Appenine Mountaynes) they added diuers others, whereof Telſina (afterward Bononia) was one.

§ IIII.

Of ſome other records teſtifying the vniuerſall floud: and of two ancient deluges in Ægypt: and of ſome elſewhere.

SAint AVGVSTINE out of Varro affirmeth, that the Greekes and Latines made not any mention of the vniuerſall floud, becauſe they had nothing of antiquitie foregoing that of Ogyges; and therefore (according to Rhodoginus before remembred) were all things among the Greekes (which antiquitie had worne out of knowledge) called Ogygia, which we in Engliſh commonly call (worme-eaten) or of defaced date. But as all the parts of the earth were ſucceſſiuely planted and peopled; and as all Nations had their proper times, and not their beginning at once and at the inſtant: ſo did euery familie which afterward became a great People, with whom the knowledge of diuine uine letters was not receiued, finde no parent of more antiquitie, then such as they had themselues, nor allow of any before their owne; and as the Graecians, so did others vaunt themselues to be Indigenæ, and growing out of the earth, or inuent some other prophane or ridiculous beginning. But the Chaldæans had certayne knowledge of Noahs floud, as Berosus witnesseth; and Nicolaus Damascenus maketh particular mention thereof (as is aforesaid) though he also affirme by heare-say, that some Giants saued themselues vpon the Mountaynes Baris in Armenia, but speaketh not thereof as from any authoritie approued: vsing the word fermo est; That such a speech there was. And Eusebius remembreth a place out of the ancient Historian Abydenus: who writeth that Sisithrus, to preserue himselfe from a floud foretold him by Saturnus, fled to the hils of Armenia by ship, ad Armeniam nauigio confugiebat: who the third day (after the waters were fallen) sent forth birds, that finding no land to rest on, returned againe; which he also did a second time, but at the third returne the birds feet were couered with mudde and slime. To this effect are Eusebius words out of Abydenus, which may seeme a true description (though in other termes) of Noahs floud.

Euſ. de præp. Euang. l. 9. c. 4.

Cyrillus also affirmeth, that Alex. Polyhistor maketh mention of this generall floud. And Plato in Timæo produceth an Ægyptian Priest, who recounted to Solon out of the holy Bookes of Ægypt, the storie of the floud vniuersall, which (saith he) happened long before the Grecian inundations. Fryer Annius his Xenophon remembreth a third floud, which also Diodorus Siculus confirmeth, somewhat more ancient then that of Ogyges in Attica. For he named the generall floud for the first, which happened (saith he) vnder the old OGYGES, Sub prisco Ogyge, which was Noah; he calleth the second Niliaca: Hercules and Prometheus then liuing, 44. yeeres before that of Attica, in the 34. yeere of Belochus King of the Assyrians, though I doe not beleeue him as touching the time. But this floud couered a great part of the nether Ægypt, especially all that Region subiect to Prometheus; and hereof came the fable of the Vulture on Prometheus his liuer, afterward slaine by Hercules of Ægypt: which fiction Diod. Siculus deliuereth in these wordes: Fluuium propter cursus velocitatem, profunditatemq; aquarum Aquilam tunc appellatum, HERCVLEM cum consilij magnitudine, tum virtute, volunt è vestigio compressisse, & aquarum impetum ad priorem cursum conuertisse: Vnde & Græci quidam Poetæ rem gestam in fabulam vertentes, HERCVLEM tradunt Aquilam PROMETHEI jecur depascentem occidisse; This floud (meaning of Nilus) for the swiftnesse of his course, as also for the depth, was in those dayes called the Eagle: but HERCVLES by his great iudgement and vertue did againe compresse and straighten this Riuer, so farre extended and ouer-spred, turning it into the old channels: Whence certayne Greeke Poets (conuerting this labour and worke of HERCVLES into a fable) deuised that HERCVLES slue the Eagle, which fed on PROMETHEVS liuer; meaning that he deliuered Prometheus of that sorrow and torment, which for the losse of his People and Countrie (by the waters destroyed and couered ouer) he suffered.

Diod l. 1.

Nat. Com. l. 4. c. 18

A fourth floud chanced about Pharus in Ægypt, where Alexander Macedon built Alexandria, as Annius conceiueth out of his Xenophon, who in this briefe sort writeth of all these inundations: Inundationes plures fuere: prima nouimestris inundatio terrarum sub prisco OGYGE: secunda Niliaca, &c. There were many inundations (saith this same Xenophon) the first which was vniuersall of nine Moneths, and this happened vnder the first OGYGES: the second was Niliaca, and of one Moneths continuance in the time of Hercules and Prometheus Ægyptians: a third of two Moneths vnder Ogyges Atticus: the fourth of three Moneths in Thessalia vnder Deucalion: and a fift of the like continuance (called Pharonica) vnder Proteus of Ægypt, about the time of Helens rape. Diodorus in his fift Booke and eleuenth Chapter, taking the Samothraces for his Authors, remembreth a floud in Asia the lesse and elsewhere, of no lesse destruction then any of the other particular inundations, saying, that the same happened before that of Deucalion: the Sea of Pontus and Hellespont breaking in ouer the land.

Xenop. de æquin. Comm. per Annium, fol. 37.

But

But there haue beene many flouds in diuers times, and ages, not inferior to any of these two last remembred, Niliaca and Pharonica in Ægypt: as in the yeere of our Redemption 590. when in October of the same yeere, Gregorie then being Bishop of Rome, there happened a maruailous ouerflowing in Italie, and especially in the Venetian Territorie, and in Lyguria, accompanied with a most fearefull storme of thunder and lightning: after which followed the great plague at Rome, by reason of the many dead Serpents cast vp and left vpon the Land, after the waters decreased and returned. And in the yeere 1446. there perished 10000. people, by the breaking in of the Sea at Dordroch in Holland: of which kinde I take that floud to be of Achaia or Attica. Before that and in the yeere 1238. Trithemius speaketh of an earthquake which swallowed many thousands: and after that of a floud in Friseland, in which there perished 100000. persons. Strozius Sigog. in his Magia omnifaria, telleth of an inundation in Italie, in the time of Pope Damasus, in which also many Cities of Sicil were swallowed: another in the Papacie of Alexander the sixth: also in the yeere 1515. Maximilian being Emperor. He also remembreth a perilous ouer-flowing in Polonia, about Cracouia, by which many people perished. Likewise Viginier a French Historian speaketh of a great floud in the South part of Languedoe, which fell in the yeere of our Lord 1557. with so dreadfull a tempest, as all the people attended therein the very end of the world, and iudgement day; saying, That by the violent descent of the waters from the Mountaynes, about Nismes there were remooued diuers old heapes and mountures of ground, and many other places torne vp and rent: by which accident there was found both coyne of siluer and gold, diuers peeces of plate, and vessels of other metall, supposed to be hidden at such time as the Goths inuaded that Prouince, in the yeere 1156.

§. V.

That the floud of NOAH was supernaturall, though some say it might haue beene foreseene by the Starres.

NOw howsoeuer all these flouds and many other, which haue couered at seuerall times seuerall Regions, not only in these parts of the world, but in America also, (as I haue learned of some ancient Southsayers among them) may be ascribed to natural causes and accidents; yet that vniuersall floud (in the time of Noah) was powred ouer the whole face of the earth by a power aboue nature, and by the especiall commandement of God himselfe, who at that time gaue strength of influence to the Starres, and abundance to the Fountaynes of the deepe: whereby the irruption of waters was made more forcible, then any abilitie of nature could effect, or any second causes by whatsoeuer vnion could performe, without receiuing from the Fountayne of all power, strength, and faculties supernaturall. Henricus Mechlinensis, a Scholler of Albertus Magnus, in his Commentaries vpon the great coniunctions of Albu Masar obserueth, that before the floud of Noah, the like coniunction of Iupiter and Saturne, happened in the last degree of Cancer, against that constellation since called the Ship of Argos; by which the floud of Noah might be foretold, because Cancer is both a waterie signe, and the house of the Moone, which is the Ladie of the Sea, and of moysture, according to the rules of Astronomie, and common experience. And this opinion Petrus de Aliaco vpon Genesis confirmeth, affirming that although Noah did well know this floud by diuine reuelation, yet (this coniunction being notorious) he could not be ignorant of the second causes thereof: for those were not only signes, but also working causes, by strength receiued from the first cause, which is God himselfe: and further that by * Cataractæ cæli (Englished the windores of heauen)

Also de Concordia Theolog. & Astrolog.

Gen. 7. 11.

* The word ῥηγμὶς properly signifieth any place of stoppage, against which the force of the water being naturally carryed downewards, dasheth and breaketh; of ἀράσσω allido or frango. Hence, because windores doe not only open but also shut, the word hath beene expounded (Windores) for barres or floud-gates.

heauen) Moses meant this great and waterie coniunction; the word (Catarractæ) signifying flowing downe or comming downe. Now (saith P. de Aliaco) it pleased God to ordaine by the course of the Heauens such a constellation, by which all men might behold therein their destruction towards, and thereby forsake those wicked wayes wherein they walked, and call vnto God for mercy.

Of this iudgement was Gul. Parisiensis, who vnderstood that the wordes Catarractæ cæli, or windores of heauen, were to be taken for the former coniunction, or for these waterie signes, Cancer, Pisces, Pleiades, Hyades, and Orion, and of the Planets, Mars, Venus, and the Moone: which are the forcible causes of the greatest inundations. His owne words are these: Nondum intelligo Prophetam Hebræorum catarractas cæli vocâsse, nisi partes illas cæli, quæ generatiuæ sunt pluuiarum & inundationum aquarum, quales sunt signa aquatica, vt Cancer, &c. as aforesaid. As yet (saith he) I perceiue not what the Prophet of the Hebrewes meaneth by those wordes (Catarractæ cæli, or windores of Heauen) vnlesse he thereby vnderstand those celestiall powers, by whose influences are engendred the rayne, and inundations of waters, such as are the waterie signes of Cancer, &c.

But in a word, as it might please God, that in the course of his vnsearchable wisedome this coniunction should at such time be: so did he (as aforesaid) adde vigour and facultie, and gaue to euery operation increase of vertues, violent eruptions to Springs and Fountaynes, commanding them to cast out the whole treasure and heape of their waters; taking retention from the cloudes, and condensing ayre into water by the ministerie of his Angels, or howsoeuer else best pleased his Al-powerfulnesse.

§. VI.

That there was no neede of any new Creation of matter to make the vniuersall floud: and what are Catarractæ Cæli, GEN. 7. VERS. 11.

NOw if it be obiected, that God doth not create any thing of new; (for God resteth the seuenth day: (that is) he did not then after create any new species) which granted, it may seeme that then all the earth and aire had not waters sufficient to couer the habitable world fifteen cubits aboue the highest Mountaynes. Of this proposition, whether God hath so restrayned himselfe or no, I will not dispute; but for the consequent (which is) that the world had want of water to ouer-couer the highest mountaynes, I take that conceit to be vnlearned and foolish; for it is written, that the fountaynes of the great deep were broken vp (that is) the waters forsook the very bowels of the earth; and all whatsoeuer was dispersed therein pierced and brake through the face thereof. Then let vs consider, that the Earth had aboue one and twentie thousand miles: the Drameter of the Earth according to that circle seuen thousand mile, and then from the Superficies to the Center some three thousand fiue hundred miles: Take then the highest Mountayne of the world, Caucasus, Taurus, Olympus, or Atlas, the Mountaynes of Armenia or Scythia, or that (of all other the highest) in Tenuerif, and I doe not finde, that he that looketh highest stretcheth aboue thirtie miles vpright. It is not then impossible, answering reason with reason, that all those waters mixed within the earth three thousand fiue hundred miles deepe, should not well helpe to couer the space of thirtie miles in height, this thirty miles vpright being found in the depths of the earth one hundred and sixteene times: for the Fountaynes of the great Deepe were broken vp, and the waters drawne out of the bowels of the earth. Secondly, if we consider what proportion the earth beareth to the extension of the ayre ouer and aboue it, wee shall find the difference exceeding great. If then it pleased ſed God to condenſe but ſo much of this ayre as euery-where compaſſeth and embraceth the earth, which condenſation is a conuerſion of ayre into water, a change familiar in thoſe elements, it will not ſeeme ſtrange to men of iudgement, yea but of ordinarie vnderſtanding, that the Earth (God ſo pleaſing) was couered ouer with waters without any new Creation.

Laſtly, for the opinions of Gulielmus Pariſienſis, and Aliacenſis, to which I may adde Beroſus and others, That ſuch a coniunction there was, foreſhewing that deſtruction by waters which followed; and that by the word Catarractæ cæli, or Windores of heauen, was meant this coniunction; there needes no other anſwere then that obſeruation of Ludouicus Viues, who affirmeth that by the graueſt Aſtrologian it was obſerued, that in the yeere 1524. there ſhould happen the like coniunction, as at Noahs floud, then which (ſaith he) there was neuer a more fayre, drie, and ſeaſonable yeere: the like deſtruction was prophecied of the yeere 1588. But Picus Earle of Mirandula proueth that there could not be any ſuch coniunction at that time.

To conclude, I finde no other myſterie in the word Catarractæ cæli, then that the cloudes were meant thereby: Moſes vſing the word Windores of Heauen (if that be the ſenſe of the word) to expreſſe the violence of the raynes, and powring downe of waters. For whoſoeuer hath ſeene thoſe fallings of water, which ſometimes happen in the Indies, which are called the Spowts (where cloudes doe not breake into drops, but fall with a reſiſtleſſe violence in one body) may properly vſe that manner of ſpeech which Moſes did; That the windores or floud-gates of heauen opened: (which is) That waters fell, contrarie to cuſtome, and that order which we call naturall. God then looſened the power retentiue in the vppermoſt ayre, and the waters fell in abundance: Behold (ſaith IOB) he which holdeth the waters, and they drie vp, or better in Latine, Et omnia ſiccantur; And all things are dryed vp; but when he ſendeth them out, they deſtroy the earth: and in the 26. Chapter: He bindeth the waters in the cloudes; but theſe bonds God looſed at that time of the generall floud, and called vp the waters which ſlept in the great deepe: and theſe ioyning together couered the earth, till they had performed the worke of his will: which done, he then commanded them to returne into their darke and vaſt Caues, and the reſt (by a winde) rarified againe into ayre, formerly condenſed into drops. Iob.12.v.15. Gen.8.1.

§. VII.

Of ſome remaynder of the memorie of NOAH among the Heathen.

NOAH commanded by God, before the fall of thoſe waters, entred the Arke which he had built, with his owne Wife, and his Sonnes, and his ſonnes wiues, taking with them of euery Creature, which tooke life by generation, ſeuen of the cleane, and of the vncleane, two. Noah, according to Philo, ſignifieth quietneſſe: after others, and according to the prophecie of his Father Lamech, ceſſation; to whom after-times gaue many names anſwering his antiquitie, zeale, vertue, and other qualities: as, The firſt Ogyges, becauſe in the time of the Grecian Ogyges there was alſo a great floud of Achaia: Saturne they called him, becauſe he was the Father of Nations: Others gaue him the name of Prometheus, who was ſaid to ſteale away Iupiters fire; fire in that place being taken and vnderſtood for the knowledge of God and heauenly things. Others thinke that he was ſo called for his excellent wiſedome and foreſight. He had alſo the name of Ianus, (id eſt) vinoſus, becauſe Iain ſignifieth wine in the Hebrew. And ſo Tertullian finds him written in libris ritualibus; In the bookes of ceremonies, preceding both Saturne, Vranus, and Ione: which three enioyed an elder time then all the other ancienteſt fayned gods. And this name Iain is taken from the Hebrew and Syrian, and not from the Latine: for it was in vſe before there was any Latine Nation, or any Kingdome by that name knowne. Of the antiquitie of Ianus, Fabius Pictor giueth this testimonie: IANI aetate nulla erat Monarchia, quia mortalibus pectoribus nondum haserat vlla regnandi cupiditas, &c. Vinum & far primus populus docuit IANVS ad sacrificia: primus enim aras & Pomœria & sacra docuit; In the time of IANVS (saith he) there was no Monarchie: for the desire of rule had not then folded it selfe about the hearts of men. IANVS first taught the people to sacrifice Wine and Meale: hee first set vp Altars, instituted Gardens and solitarie Groues, wherein they vsed to pray; with other holy rites and ceremonies. A greater testimonie then this there cannot be found among the Heathen, which in all agreeth so well with the Scriptures. For first, whilest Noah flourished, there was not any King or Monarch: Nimrod being the first that tooke on him soueraigne authoritie. Secondly, Noah after the floud was the first that planted the Vine, and became a Husbandman; and therefore offered the first fruits of both (to wit) Wine and Meale. Thirdly, he was the first that raysed an Altar, and offered sacrifice to God, a thankes-giuing for his mercifull goodnesse towards him. Noah was also signified in the name of Bifrons (which was giuen to Ianus) because he beheld the times both before and after the floud, Quia præterita nouerit, & futura prospexerit, saith ARNOBIVS; Because he knew what was past, and prouided for what was to come. He was also in the person of Ianus shaddowed by the name of Chaos, and semen orbis; The seede of the world; because as out of that confused heape was drawne all the kindes of Beasts and Plants: so from Noah came all mankinde: whereof Ouid in the person of Ianus:

He was also intituled Cœlum and Sol, Heauen and the Sunne, for his excellent knowledge in Astronomie: Vertumnus, Bacchus, and Liber Pater; not that latter, which Diod. Siculus, and Alex. Aphrodiseus so call, because he was the restorer of the Greekes to their former libertie, but in respect of the floud. For the Greekes called Liber γῆν, and his Nurses Hyades, of rayne, because Noah entred the Arke, when the Sunne ioyned with the Starres Hyades, a constellation in the brow or necke of Taurus, and euer after a monument of Noahs floud. He was also by others surnamed Triton, a Marine God, the Sonne of Neptune: because he liued in safetie on the waters. So was he knowne by the name of DIONYSVS, quasi διανοσων, mentem pungens; Bitebraine, or wit-stinger, though Diodorus conceiue otherwise, and deriue that name à patre & loco; Of his Father, and the place of his birth (to wit) of Ioue, and Nisa a Towne of Arabia fœlix, saith Suidas out of Orpheus. He had also the by-name of Taurus, or Taurophagus; because he first yoked Oxen and tilled the ground, according to that of MOSES: And NOAH became an husbandman. Now howsoeuer the Grecians vaunt of their Theban Bacchus (otherwise Dionysus) it is certayne that the name was borrowed, and the inuention stollen from Noah. But this name of Bacchus, more anciently Boacus, was taken (saith Gul. Stuckius, and out of him Danæus) from Nouchus, (N) being changed into (B); and it is the more probable, because it cannot be doubted but that Noah was the first planter of the Vine after the floud: and of Noah (the first and ancient Bacchus) were all those fables deuised, of which Diodorus complayneth in his fourth Booke, and fifth Chapter. This first Bacchus (to wit) Noah, was surnamed Nysius, of the Mountayne Nysa in India, where the Grecian Bacchus neuer came, whatsoeuer themselues faine of his enterprises; and these Mountaynes of Nysa ioyne with those of Paropanisus, and those other Easterne Mountaynes, on which the Arke of Noah rested after the floud.

Furthermore, to the end that the memorie of this second parent of mankinde might might the better bee preſerued, there were founded by his iſſues many great Cities which bare his name; with many riuers and mountaines: which oftentimes forgat that it was done in his regard, becauſe the many names giuen him brought the ſame confuſion to places as to himſelfe. Notwithſtanding all which, we find the Citie of Noah vpon the bankes of the red Sea and elſewhere: the Riuer of Noas in Thrace, which Strabo calleth Noarus; Ptolomie Danius, diuiding Illyria from Panonia. Thus much for the name. Plin. l. 6. Steph. de Vrb. Herod. l. 4. Strabo l. 7.

§. VIII.

Of ſundrie particulars touching the Arke: as the place where it was made, the matter, faſhion and name.

NOw in what part of the world Noah built the Arke, it doth not appeare in the Scriptures, neither doe I finde any approued Authour that hath written thereof: onely Goropius Becanus in his Indo-Scythia conceiueth, that Noah built his Arke neere the mountaines of Caucaſus, becauſe on thoſe hils are found the goodlieſt Cedars: for when Alex. Macedon made the warre among a people, called Nyſæi, inhabiting the other ſide of Caucaſus, hee found all their burials and Sepulchers wrought ouer with Cedar. To this place (ſaith Becanus) Noah repaired, both to ſeparate himſelfe from the reprobate Giants, who rebelled againſt God and Nature, as alſo becauſe he would not be interrupted in the building of the Arke; to which alſo hee addeth the conueniencie of riuers, to tranſport the Timber which he vſed, without troubling any other carriages.

Onely this wee are ſure of, that the Arke was built in ſome part of the Eaſterne world; and to my vnderſtanding, not farre from the place where it reſted after the floud. For Noah did not vſe any maſt or ſaile (as in other ſhips) and therefore did the Arke no otherwiſe moue then the Hulke or body of a ſhip doth in a calme Sea. Alſo becauſe it is not probable, that during theſe continuall and downe-right raines there were any windes at all, therefore was the Arke little moued from the place where it was faſhioned and ſet together. For it is written: God made a winde to paſſe vpon the earth, and the waters ceaſed, and therefore it may be gathered, that during the fall of the waters, there was not any ſtorme or forcible winde at all, which could driue the Arke any great diſtance from the place where it was firſt by the waters lifted vp. This is alſo the more probable, if that ancient opinion bee true, as it is very likely, that the Arke had fundum planum, a flat bottome, and not raiſed in forme of a ſhip with a ſharpneſſe forward, to cut the waues for the better ſpeede. Gene. 8. 1.

This kind of Veſſell the Hebrewes call Thebet, and the Greekes Larnax, for ſo they termed Deucalions ſhip: and ſome ſay, that the hill Parnaſſus, to which in eight dayes he arriued, was firſt called Larnaſſus, and by the change of (L) into (P) Parnaſſus; but Pauſanias thinkes that it tooke name of a Sonne of the Nymphe Cleodoræ, called Parnaſſus, the inuentour of Auguration. Steph. de Vrb. fol. 227.

Peucerus findes the word (Parnaſſus) to haue no affinitie with the Greeke, but thinkes it deriued from the Hebrew word Nahas, which ſignifieth Auguration and Diuination: or from Har or Parai, as in his Chapter of Oracles in the leafe before cited. De Oracul. fol. 94.

Ioſephus cals the Arke Machina, by the generall name of a huge Frame: and Epiphanius out of the Hebrew Aron; but herein lieth the difference betweene Aron and Theuet, That Aron ſignifieth properly the Arke of the Sanctuarie, but Thebet ſuch a Veſſell, as ſwimmeth, and beareth it ſelfe vpon the waters. Epi. l. in Ancor.

Laſtly, this Arke of Noah differed from the faſhion of a ſhip in this, that it had a couer and roofe, with a creſt in the middeſt thereof, and the ſides declining like the roofe of an houſe; to the end, both to caſt off the waters, and that thereunder Noah himselfe and his children might shelter, and separate themselues from the noysomnesse of the many beasts, which filled the other roomes and parts of the Arke.

Gen. 6. 4.

Of what wood the Arke was built it is vncertaine. The Hebrew word Gopher once and in this place onely vsed is diuersly vnderstood; and though the matter bee of little importance, yet this difference there is, That the Geneua Translation cals it Pinetree, the Rabbine Cedar, the Seuentie, square timber, the Latine smooth timber. Others will haue it Cypres trees, as dedicated to the dead, becausse Cypres is worne at funerals. But out of doubt, if the word Gopher signifie any speciall kind of timber, Noah obayed the voyce of God therein; if not, hee was not then curious as touching the kinde or nature of the wood, hauing the promise of God, and his grace and mercie for his defence. For with Noah God promised to establish his couenant.

V. 18.

Plin. l. 16. c. 40. Plinie affirmeth that in Ægypt it was the vse to build ships of Cedar, which the wormes eate not; and hee auoweth that hee saw in Vtica, in the Temple of Apollo Cedar beames, laid in the time of the foundation of the Citie, and that they were still sound in his time, which was about 1188. yeares after: prouing thereby, that this kinde of wood was not subiect to putrifying or moulding in a very long time. But in that it is easie to cut, light to carie, and of a sweete sauour, lasting also better then any other wood, and becausse neere the place where the Arke rested, there are found great store of these Cedar trees, as also in all the mountaines of the East, besides those of Libanus, it is probable enough that the Arke might be of that wood: which hath besides the other commodities the greatest length of Timber, and therefore fittest to build ships withall. Pererius conceiueth that the Arke had diuers sorts of timber, and that the bottome had of one sort, the decke and partition of another; all which may be true or false, if Gopher may be taken for timber in generall. True it is, that Cedar will serue for all parts of a ship, aswell for the body, as for masts and yards. But Noah had most respect to the direction receiued from God: to the length, breadth, and height, and to the partitions of the Arke; and to pitch it, and to diuide it into Cabines, thereby to seuer the cleane beasts from the vncleane, and to preserue their seuerall sorts of foode; and that it might bee capable of all kinde of liuing creatures, according to the numbers by God appointed. All which when Noah had gathered together, he cast his confidence wholly on God, who by his Angels steered this ship without a rudder, and directed it without the helpe of a Compasse or the North starre. The pitch which Noah vsed, is by some supposed to haue beene a kinde of Bitumen, whereof there is great quantitie about the Valley of Sodome and Gomorra, now the dead Sea or Asphaltes: and in the Region of Babylon, and in the West India, and herein it exceedeth other pitch, that it melts not with the Sunne, but by the fire onely, after the manner of hard waxe.

Pererius.

That the Arke was of sufficient capacitie.

THe Arke according to Gods commaundement had of length three hundred cubites, fiftie of breadth, and thirtie deepe or high: by which proportion it had sixe parts of length to one of breadth, and ten times in length to one of depth; of which S. AVGVSTINE: Proculdubio figura est peregrinantis in hoc seculo Ciuitatis Dei, (hoc est) Ecclesiæ, quæ sit salua per lignum, in quo pependit Mediator Dei & hominum, homo Christus Iesus: nam & mensura ipsa longitudinis, altitudinis, latitudinisq; eius significat corpus humanum, in cuius veritate ad homines prænunciatus est venturus, & venit, &c. Without doubt (saith he) it is a figure of the Citie of God, trauailing in this world as a stranger (that is) of the Church, saued by the tree whereupon the Mediatour betweene God and Man, the man Iesus Christ did hang: for euen the very measure of the length, heighth, and breadth, answereth the shape of mans body, in the truth whereof the comming of Christ was foretold and performed.

De Ciuitat. Dei. l. 15. c. 26.

By

By what kinde of Cubite the Arke was meaſured, it hath beene a diſputed queſtion among the Fathers, and others; and the differences are in effect theſe: The firſt kinde of cubit (called the Common) containeth one foot and a halfe, meaſured from the ſharpe of the elbow to the point of the middle finger. The ſecond (the palme cubit) which taketh one handfull more then the common. The third is called Regius Cubitus, or the Perſian Cubit, which exceedeth the common cubit three inches. The fourth is the ſacred cubit, which containeth the common or vulgar cubit double, wanting but a quarter or fourth part. Laſtly, there is a fift cubit, called Geometricall, which containeth ſixe common cubits. But of all theſe ſortes, which were commonly meaſured by the vulgar cubit, the alteration and diminution of mens ſtatures hath made the difference. For as there is now a leſſe proportion of bodies: ſo is the common cubit, from the ſharpe of the elbow to the point of the middle finger, of leſſe length then it was in elder times.

S. Auguſtine conſidering the many ſortes of beaſts and birds which the Arke held, with their food and water, was ſometimes of opinion, that the Arke had proportion after the Geometricall cubit, which containeth almoſt ſixe of the Common. For meaſuring the Arke by the vulgar cubit, it did not exceede the capacitie of that veſſel built by Hiero of Syracuſe, or the ſhip of Ptolomie Philo-pater. But S. Auguſtine (who at the firſt was led by Origen) changed his iudgement as touching the Geometricall cubit; and found vpon better conſideration, that there needed not ſo huge a bodie to præſerue all ſortes of creatures by God appointed to bee reſerued. For it was not needfull to take any kindes of fiſhes into the Arke, becauſe they were kept liuing (ſaith S. Auguſtine) in their owne element. Nòn fuit neceſſe conſeruare in Arca quæ poſſent in aquis viuere; nòn ſolùm merſa ſicut piſces, verùm ſuper-natantia, ſicut multæ alites. It was not needfull to conſerue thoſe creatures in the Arke, which could liue in the waters; and not only fiſhes which can liue vnder water, but alſo thoſe fowls which ſit and ſwim on them: and againe, Terra, nòn aqua, maledicta, quia Adam nòn huius, ſed illius fructum vetitum comedit. It was the earth, and not the waters, which God curſed: for of the forbidden fruit of the earth and not of the Sea, did Adam eat; ſo as S. Auguſtine gathereth hereupon, (as afore-ſaid) that ſo huge a Frame needed not.

And if wee looke with the eyes of iudgement hereunto, wee ſhall finde nothing monſtrous therein; although the imaginations of men, who (for the moſt part) haue more of miſchiefe and of ignorance, then of any reuerend reaſon, finde many impoſſibilities in this worke of God. But it is manifeſt, and vndoubtedly true, that many of the Species, which now ſeeme differing and of ſeuerall kindes, were not then in rerum natura. For thoſe beaſts which are of mixt natures; either they were not in that age, or elſe it was not needfull to præſerue them: ſeeing they might bee generated againe by others, as the Mules, the Hyæna's and the like: the one begotten by Aſſes and Mares, the other by Foxes and Wolues. And whereas by diſcouering of ſtrange landes, wherein there are found diuers beaſtes and birdes differing in colour or ſtature from thoſe of theſe Northerne parts, it may be ſuppoſed by a ſuperficiall conſideration, that all thoſe which weare red and pyed skinnes, or feathers, are differing from thoſe that are leſſe painted, and were plaine ruſſet or blacke: they are much miſtaken that ſo thinke. And for my owne opinion I finde no difference, but onely in magnitude, betweene the Cat of Europe, and the Ounce of India; and euen thoſe dogges which are become wilde in Hiſpagniola, with which the Spaniards vſed to deuoure the naked Indians, are now changed to Wolues, and begin to deſtroy the breed of their Cattle, and doe alſo oftentimes teare aſunder their owne Children. The common Crowe and Rooke of India is full of red feathers in the drown'd and low Iſlands of Caribana; and the Blacke-Bird and Thruſh hath his feathers mixt with blacke and carnation: in the North parts of Virginia. The dog-fiſh of England is the Sharke of the South Ocean: For if colour or magnitude made a difference of Species, then were the Negro's, which wee call the blacke-mores, non animalia rationalia, not men, but ſome kinde of ſtrange beaſtes: and ſo the Giants of the South America should be of another kinde, then the people of this part of the World. Wee also see it daily that the natures of fruites are changed by transplantation, some to better, some to worse, especially with the change of Clymate. Crabs may bee made good fruit by often grafting, and the best Mellons will change in a yeere or two to common Cowcummers by being set in a barren soyle: Therefore taking the kindes precisely of all creatures, as they were by God created, or out of the earth by his ordinance produced: The Arke, after the measure of the common Cubit was sufficiently capacious to containe of all, according to the number by God appointed: For if we adde but halfe a foot of measure to the Common Cubit, which had a foot and a halfe of Giantly stature (and lesse allowance wee cannot giue to the difference betweene them and vs) then did the Arke containe 600. foot in length, and 100. foot in breadth, and 60. foot deepe.

But first of all to make it manifest, that the Geometricall Cubit is not vsed in the Scripture, the stature of the Giants therein named may suffice. For if the bed of Og King of Basan had beene nine Geometricall Cubites long, it had taken 54. Cubites of the common, which make 80. foot: and Goliah, who had the length of 6. Cubites and a handfull, which makes nine foote and a handfull, (a proportion credible) if these Cubites had beene Geometricall, then had beene 54. foot in heighth and vpwardes, which were monstrous and most incredible: for (according to this proportion) had the head of Goliah beene nine foot long, and farre waightier and bigger then all Dauids body, who caried it away.

Deut. 3. 11.
1. Sam. 17. 4.

Againe, if the Geometricall Cubit had been vsed for a measure in the Scripture as many Commenters haue obserued, then had the Altar (appointed to containe fiue Cubites of length, fiue of breadth, and three of heighth) haue reached the length of 27. foot vpright, and so must their Priestes haue ascended by steps or ladders to haue performed their sacrifices thereon, which was contrarie to Gods Commandement giuen in these wordes: Thou shalt not goe vp with steppes vnto mine altar, that thy shame bee not discouered thereon; and therefore was the Altar but three Common Cubites high which make foure foot, that their Priests standing thereby might execute their office: Wherefore I may conclude, that the Cubit mentioned in the Scriptures was not the Geometricall, but the ordinarie Cubit of one foot and a halfe, according to the measure of Giantly stature; which measure (doubtlesse) might giue much the more capacitie to the Arke, although it be also probable, that as the men were, so were the horses whereon they rode, and all other creatures of a correspondent size. And yet (as I take it) though by this meanes there were not any whit the more roome in the Arke, it were not hard to conceiue, how all the distinct Species of Animals, whose liues cannot bee preserued in the waters, might according to their present quantities bee contained in a vessell of those dimensions which the Arke had; allowing to the Cubit one foot and a halfe of our now vsuall measure: whence it followeth of necessitie, that those large bodies which were in the daies of Noah might haue roome sufficient in the Arke, which was measured by a Cubit of length proportionable.

Exod. 20. 26.

How the appointed number of creatures to be saued, (that is) seuen of the cleane, two of the vncleane (with necessarie foode) might haue place in the Arke, Buteo hath very learnedly declared: the briefe summe of whose discourse to that purpose is this. The length of the Arke was three hundred cubits, which multiplyed by the breadth, namely fiftie cubits, and the product by the heighth of thirtie cubits, sheweth the whole concauitie to haue beene 450000. Now whereas the posts, walles, and other partitions of lodgings may seeme to haue taken vp a great part of the hollow: the heighth of the roofe which (the perpendicular being one cubit) contained 7500. cubicall cubes, was a sufficient recompence: If therefore in a ship of such greatnesse wee seeke roome for 89. distinct Species of beasts, or (left any should be omitted) for 100. seuerall kinds, we shall easily finde place both for them, and for the birds, which in bignesse are no way answerable to them, and for meate to sustaine them all. For there are three sortes

ſorts of beaſts, whoſe bodies are of a quantitie beſt knowne; the Beefe, the Sheepe; and the Wolfe: to which the reſt may be reduced, by ſaying, (according to Ariſtotle) that one Elephant is anſwerable to foure Beeues, one Lyon to two Wolues, and ſo of the reſt. Of beaſts, ſome feede on vegetables, others on fleſh. There are one and thirtie kinds of the greater ſort, feeding on vegetables: of which number, onely three are cleane, according to the law of Moſes, whereof ſeuen of a kinde entred into the Arke, namely three couples for breede, and one odde one for ſacrifice: the other eight and twentie kindes were taken by two of each kinde, ſo that in all there were in the Arke one and twentie great beaſts cleane, and ſixe and fiftie vncleane, eſtimable for largeneſſe as ninetie one Beeues; yet for a ſupplement (leſt perhaps any Species be omitted) let them be valued, as 120. Beeues. Of the leſſer ſort feeding on vegetables were in the Arke ſixe and twentie kinds, eſtimable with good allowance for ſupplie, as foureſcore Sheepe. Of thoſe which deuoure fleſh were two and thirtie kinds, anſwerable to threeſcore and foure Wolues. All theſe 280. beaſts might bee kept in one ſtorie or roome of the Arke in their ſeuerall Cabbines; their meate in a ſecond: the Birds and their prouiſion in a third, with place to ſpare for Noah and his family, and all their neceſſaries.

§. X.

That the Arke reſted vpon part of the hill Taurus (or Caucaſus) betweene the East Indies, and Scythia.

†. I.

A praterition of ſome queſtions leſſe materiall: with a note of the vſe of this queſtion, to finde out the Metropolis of Nations.

WHat time Noah tooke to build the Arke, I leaue to others to diſpute, but he receiued the Commandement from God 100. yeares before the waters fell: and had therefore choice of time and leiſure ſufficient. As for the number of deckes and partitions, which Origen deuides into foure, S. Auguſtine into three, I will not trouble the Reader with the controuerſie: or whether thoſe creatures which ſometimes reſt on the land, other times in the waters, as the Crocodiles (now called Alegartos) the Sea-cowes or Sea-horſes, were kept in the Arke, or no, I thinke it a needleſſe curioſitie; and yet to this ſaith Pererius, and others before him, that a fiſh-poole might bee made aſwell within the Arke, as in Hiero his ſhip of Syracuſe. Laſtly, to conſider or labour to diſproue the foolerie of the Hebrewes, who ſuppoſe that the Arke was lightened by a Carbuncle, or had windores of Chriſtall to receiue in light, and keepe out water, were but to reuiue the buried vanities of former times. But that which I ſeeke moſt to ſatisfie my ſelfe and others in, is in what part of the world the Arke reſted after the floud: becauſe the true vnderſtanding of ſome of theſe places (as the ſeate of the terreſtriall Paradiſe, and the reſting of the Arke) doe onely and truely teach the worlds Plantation, and the beginning of Nations, before and after the floud; and all ſtorie, as well generall as particular, thereby may be the better vnderſtood.

†. II.

A propoſall of the common opinion, that the Arke reſted vpon ſome of the hils of Armenia.

AND firſt, for the true place where the Arke reſted after the floud, and from what part of the world the children of Noah trauailed to their firſt ſettlement and plantation, I am resolued (without any presumption) that therein the most writers were vtterly mistaken. And I am not led so to thinke out of my humour or newnesse of opinion, or singularitie; but doe herein ground my selfe on the originall and first truth, which is the word of God, and after that vpon reason, and the most probable circumstances thereon depending. For whereas it is written, that the Arke staied vpon one of the mountaines of Ararat, which the Chaldæan Paraphrast hath conuerted Kardu, meaning the hils Gordæi or Gordiæi in Armenia the greater: (as the wordes Gordæi and Kardu, seeme to bee one and the same) of which opinion also the most of our Interpreters are; I finde neither Scripture nor reason which teacheth any such thing: (to wit) that it rested on that part of Ararat, which is in the greater Armenia. Nicolaus Damascenus cals this mountaine of Ararat, Baris, being the same which the Chaldæan nameth Kardu, to which mountaine the Fryer Annius (citing this place out of Iosephus) makes him finde another adioyning, called Ocila, and to say that the Arke (of which Moses the Lawgiuer of the Hebrewes wrote) did first take ground on this Ocila. But I doe not finde any such mountaine in being, as this Ocila; neither is there any mention of it in the place of Iosephus. Strabo remembreth a Promontorie in Arabia fœlix, of that name, and Plinie findes a Mart-towne so called in the same, which Ptolomie cals Ocilis, Pinetus Acyla, and Niger Zidon. But this Ocila of Damascenus, or rather of Annius, seemeth to bee one and a part of the Armenian mountaines. Berosus calleth those mountaines of Armenia Cordiæi, and Curtius Cordæi: Ptolomie Gordæi and Gordiæi: of which the Countrie next adioyning is by this Nicolaus Damascenus called Ninyada, perhaps (as Becanus coniectures) for Milyada or rather Minni: which word is vsed for Armenia Minor. And the very word of Armenia seemes to be compounded of this word Minni, and Aram: as if we should say Minni of Syria; for that Armenia also was a part of Syria, Plinie witnesseth. Epiphanius placeth the Cardyes about these mountaines, whom others call Gordieni or Gordeni. The mountaines are seated apart from all other to the North of that Ledge of mountaines called Taurus, or Niphates in the plaines of Armenia the great, neere the Lake Thospitis: whence the Riuer of Tigris floweth in 75. degrees of longitude, and 41. and 42. degrees of latitude. One of the mountaines Gordiæi (that which surmounteth the rest) Epiphanius cals Lubar, which in the Armenian signifieth a place of descent: but this out of Iosephus; which name (saith Iunius) was of the euent, because of Noahs comming downe with his children. But this also I take to bee a supposed euent; seeing any hill, from whence on euery side we must descend, may thus bee called: as Iunius corrects the place in Iosephus λούβαρις (Kubaris.) That the place is thus to be read, he coniectureth, because Iosep. l. 1. c. 4. sayes, the place is called ἀποβατήριον (as it were the descent or comming downe) and Epiphan. l. 1. cont. Hæres. cals it λόβαρ: which word in the Armenian and Ægyptian tongue signifieth descent, of Lubar, which is to descend; whence also Lubra is a Synagogue, because it was commonly built on some high place: whereof also the Latine Delubrum may seeme to be deriued; and Act. 6. 9. they that belonged to the Synagogue of the Ægyptians are called Libertini, for Lubra tenu. Yet this opinion hath beene embraced from age to age: receiuing a habit of strength by time, and allowance without any farther examination; although the name of Lubar might otherwise rightly be giuen, especially to that mountaine, by reason that the passage was more faire, vp and downe vnto it, then to any of the rest adioyning.

The first argument against the common opinion. They that came to build Babel, would haue come sooner, had they come from so neere a place as Armenia.

BVt there are many arguments to perswade me, that the Arke of Noah did not rest it selfe in any part of Armenia, and that the mountaines Ararat was not Baris, nor any one of the Gordiæan mountaines.

For

For firſt, it is agreed by all which follow Beroſus, that it was in the 130. yeare, or in the yeare 131. after the floud, when Nimrod came into the valley of Shinar, which Valley was afterward called Babylonia, Chuſh, and Chaldæa. If then the Arke had firſt found land in Armenia, it is very vnprobable, that the children of Noah which came into that valley could haue ſpent ſo many yeares in ſo ſhort a paſſage: ſeeing the Region of Meſopotamia was onely interiacent, which might by eaſie iourneies haue beene paſt ouer in twentie dayes; and to haſten and helpe which paſſage the nauigable riuer of Tigris offered it ſelfe, which is euery where tranſpaſſable by boates of great burden: ſo as where the Deſart on the one ſide reſiſted their expedition, the riuer on the contrarie ſide ſerued to aduance it; the riuer riſing out of the ſame Ledge of mountaines, or at the foote of them, where the Arke of Noah was firſt ſuppoſed to ſettle it ſelfe; Then, if the Nations which followed Nimrod ſtill doubted the ſurpriſe of a ſecond floud (according to the opinions of the ancient Hebrewes) it ſoundeth ill to the eare of reaſon, that they would haue ſpent many yeeres in that low and ouerflowne Valley of Meſopotamia, ſo called of the many Riuers which imbroyder or compaſſe it: for the effects witneſſed their affections, and the workes, which they vndertooke, their vnbeliefe; being no ſooner arriued in Shinar, but they began to prouide themſelues of a defence (by erecting Babel) againſt any future or feared inundation. Now at Babel it was that Nimrod began his Kingdome, the firſt knowne Citie of the world founded after the floud, about 131. yeares, or (as others ſuppoſe) ten yeeres later: though (for my ſelfe) I rather thinke, that they vndertooke that worke in two reſpects; firſt, to make themſelues famous, To get vs a name (ſaith the Text:) Secondly, thereby to vſurpe dominion ouer the reſt.

The ſecond argument, That the Eaſterne people were moſt ancient in populoſitie, and in all humane glorie.

For a ſecond Argument: The ciuilitie, magnificence and multitude of people (wherein the East parts of the world firſt abounded) hath more waight then any thing which hath beene, or can be ſaid for Armenia, and for Noahs taking land there. And that this is true, the vſe of Printing and Artillerie (among many other things which the Eaſt had) may eaſily perſwade vs, that thoſe Sunne-riſing Nations were the moſt ancient. The certaintie of this report, that the Eaſt Indians (time out of minde) haue had Gunnes and Ordnance of batterie, confirmed by the Portugals and others, makes vs now to vnderſtand, That the place of Philoſtratus in vita Apollonij Tianei l. 2. c. 14. is no fable, though expreſt in fabulous wordes: when he ſaith, that the wiſe men, which dwell betweene Hyphaſis and Ganges, vſe not themſelues to goe forth into battaile: but that they driue away their enemies with thunder and lightning ſent from Iupiter. By which meanes there it is ſaid, that Hercules Ægyptius and Bacchus, ioyning their forces were defeated there; and that this Hercules there caſt away his golden ſhield. For the inuention of letters was ignorantly aſcribed to Cadmus, becauſe he brought them firſt into Greece: of which the people (then rude and ſauage) had reaſon to giue him the honour, from whom they receiued the benefit. But it is true, that letters are no leſſe ancient then Seth or Henoch were: for they are ſaid to haue written on pillars of ſtone (as before remembred) long before the floud. But from the Eaſterne world it was that Iohn Cuthenberg a Germane, brought the deuice of Printing: by whom Conradus being inſtructed, brought the practice thereof to Rome: and after that Nicholaus Gerſon a Frenchman, bettered both the letters and inuention. And notwithſtanding that this myſterie was then ſuppoſed to bee but newly borne, the Chinaos had letters long before either the Ægyptians or Phœnicians; and alſo the Art of Printing, when as the Greekes had neither any ciuill knowledge, or any letters among them.

And

And that this is true, both the Portugals and Spaniards haue witnesſed, who about an hundred yeares ſince diſcouered thoſe Kingdomes, and doe now enioy their rich trades therein: for the Chinaos account all other Nations but Saluages, in reſpect of themſelues.

And to adde ſtrength to this argument, the conqueſt and ſtorie of Alex. Macedon may iuſtly bee called to witneſſe, who found more Cities and ſumptuoſitie in that little Kingdome of Porus, which lay ſide by ſide to the Eaſt India, then in all his other trauailes and vndertakings. For in Alexanders time learning and greatneſſe had not trauailed ſo farre to the Weſt as Rome: Alexander eſteeming of Italie but as a barbarous Countrie, and of Rome as of a Village. But it was Babylon that ſtood in his eye, and the fame of the Eaſt pierced his eares. And if wee looke as farre as the Sunriſing, and heare Paulus Venetus what he reporteth of the vttermoſt Angle and Iſland thereof, we ſhall finde that thoſe Nations haue ſent out, and not receiued, lent knowledge, and not borrowed it from the Weſt. For the farther Eaſt (to this day) the more ciuill, the farther Weſt the more ſaluage. And of the Iſle of Iapan (now Zipingari) Venetus maketh this report: Incolæ religioni, literis, & ſapientiæ ſunt addictiſſimi, & veritatis indagatores acerrimi; nihil illis frequentius oratione, quam (more noſtro) ſacris in delubris exercent: vnum cognoſcunt Principem, vnum Deum adorant, The Ilanders are exceedingly addicted to religion, letters, and Philoſophie, and moſt diligent ſearchers out of truth: there is nothing among them more frequent then prayer, which they vſe in their Churches, after the manner of Chriſtians. They acknowledge one King; and worſhip one God. The antiquitie, magnificence, ciuilitie, riches, ſumptuous buildings, and policie in gouernement, is reported to be ſuch by thoſe who haue beene employed into thoſe parts, as it ſeemeth to exceede (in thoſe formerly named, and diuers other particulars) all other Kingdomes of the world.

†. V.

The third argument, From the wonderfull reſiſtance which SEMIRAMIS found in the East Indies.

BVt for a third argument, and alſo of a treble ſtrength to the reſt, I lay the inuaſion of Semiramis before the indifferent and aduiſed Reader: who may conſider in what age ſhee liued, and how ſoone after the worlds new birth ſhee gathered her Armie (as Diodorus Siculus out of Cteſias reporteth) of more then three Millions to inuade India, to which hee adioyned alſo 500000. Horſe, and 100000. Waggons: whereof if we beleeue but a third part, it ſhall ſuffice to proue that India was the firſt planted and peopled Countrie after the floud. Now as touching the time wherein ſhee liued: All Hiſtorians conſent, that ſhee was the wife of Ninus; and the moſt approued Writers agree, that Ninus was the Sonne of Belus, and Belus of Nimrod, that Nimrod was the Sonne of Cuſh, Cuſh of Cham, and Cham of Noah. And at ſuch time as Nimrod came to Shinar, hee was then a great Nation, as by the building of the Citie and Tower of Babel may appeare; and being then ſo multiplied and increaſed, the two deſcents caſt betweene Nimrod and Semiramis, brought foorth in that time thoſe multitudes, whereof her Armie was compoſed. Let vs then ſee with whome ſhee encountred in that warre with this her powerfull Armie: euen with a multitude, rather exceeding, then equalling her owne, conducted by Staurobates King of India beyond Indus; of whoſe multitudes this is the witneſſe of Diod. Siculus. STAVROBATES, auitis maioribus quàm quæ erant SEMIRAMIDIS copijs. STAVROBATES gathering together greater troupes then thoſe of SEMIRAMIS. If then theſe numbers of Indians had beene encreaſed but by a Colonie ſent out from Shinar, (and that alſo after Babel was built, which no doubt tooke ſome time in the performance) this encreaſe in the Eaſt, and this Armie of Staurobates muſt haue been made of ſtone, or ſomwhat elſe by miracle. For as the numbers which Semiramis gathered might might eaſily grow vp in that time, from ſo great a Troupe as Nimrod brought with him into Babylonia (as ſhall be demonſtrated hereafter in the Storie of Iſrael) ſo could not any ſuch time, by any multiplication naturall, produce ſo many bodies of men, as were in the Indian Army victorious ouer Semiramis, if the Colonies ſent thither had beene ſo late as Babel ouerturned, and the confuſion of Languages. For if we allow 65. yeeres time after the Floud, before Nimrod was borne: of which, 30. yeeres to Cuſh ere he begat Seba, after whom hee had Hauilah, Sabtah, Raamah, and Sabtecha: and then 30. yeeres to Raamah, ere hee begat Sheba and Dedan, both which were borne before Nimrod: and fiue yeeres to his fiue elder brothers, which make 65. and then twice 30. yeeres for two Generations more, as for Nimrod, Sheba and Dedan with others, to beget their ſonnes; and that a third Generation might grow vp, which makes in all 125. yeeres, there will then remaine ſixe yeeres to haue beene ſpent in trauailing from the Eaſt, ere they arriued in Shinar in the yeere after the Floud 131. And ſo the followers of Nimrod might bee of ſufficient multitude. But as for thoſe which make him to haue arriued at Shinaar in the yeere 101.: and the confuſion to haue beene at Pelegs birth, theſe men doe all by miracle: they beget whole Nations without the helpe of time, and build Nimrods Towre in the Ayre; and not on thoſe low and mariſh grounds (which require ſound foundations) in the Plaines of Shinaar. For except that huge Towre were built in a day, there could be no confuſion in that yeere 101. or at Pelegs birth. And therefore it is farre more probable, that Nimrod vſurped Regall authoritie in the 131. yeere after the Floud, (according to Beroſus) and that the worke of Babel laſted fortie yeeres (according to GLYCAS) Hominibus in ea perficienda totis 40. annis incaſſum laborantibus: Men labouring in vaine 40. yeeres to finiſh it. By which account it fals out, that it was 170. yeeres after the Floud, ere a Colonie was ſent into Eaſt India; which granted (the one being the maine bodie, and the other but a Troupe taken thence) it can hardly bee beleeued, that Stayrobates could haue exceeded Semiramis in numbers: who being then Empreſſe of all that part of the world, gathered the moſt of Nations into one bodie.

The fourth Argument from diuers conſiderations in the perſon of NOAH.

FOurthly, it is no way probable, that Noah, who knew the world before the floud, and had liued therein the long time of 600. yeeres, was all that ſpace 130. yeeres after the floud, without any certaine habitation: No, it will fall out, and better agree with reaſon, that Nimrod was but the conducter of thoſe people, by Noah deſtined and appointed to fill and inhabite that middle part of the earth and the Weſterne world; (which trauailes Noah put ouer to yong and able bodies) and that Noah himſelfe then couered with many yeeres, planted himſelfe in the ſame place which God had aſſigned him: which was where he firſt came downe out of the Arke from the waters: For it is written, that after Noah came downe out of the Arke he planted a Vineyard, and became a Huſbandman: whoſe buſineſſe was to dreſſe and manure the earth; and not to range ouer ſo many parts of the world, as from Armenia into Arabia fœlix, where he ſhould (if the tradition be ſound) haue left certaine Colonies: thence into Africa towards Triton; then into Spaine, where they ſay he ſettled other companies, & built Cities after the names of Noela and Noegla his ſons wiues: from thence into Italie, where they ſay hee found his ſonne Cham the Saturne of Ægypt, who had corrupted the people and ſubiects of Gomer in his abſence: with whom Noah (as they make the ſtorie) had patience for three yeeres; but then finding no amendment, they ſay he baniſht him out of Italie. Theſe be but the fancies of Beroſus Annianus, a plaine imitation of the Græcian fables. For let euery reaſonable man conceiue conceiue, what it was to trauaile farre in such a forrest as the World was, when after so great a rotting of the earth by the floud, the same lay waste and ouer-growne for 130. or 140. yeeres, and wherein there could hardly be found either path or passage through which men were able to creepe for woods, bushes and bryars that in those yeeres were growne vp.

And there are so many reasons, prouing that Noah neuer came into the valley of Shinaar, as we need not suspect his passage into Italie or Spaine: For Noah, who was Father of al those Nations, a man reuerenced both for his authoritie, knowledge, experience and pietie, would neuer haue permitted his children and issues to haue vndertaken that vnbeleeuing presumptuous worke of Babel. Rather by his presence and preualent perswasions he would haue bound their hands from so vaine labours, and by the authoritie which he receiued euen from God himselfe, hee would haue held them in that awfull subiection, as whatsoeuer they had vainely conceiued or feared, yet they durst not haue disobeyed the personall commandement of him, who in the beginning had a kinde of Regall authoritie ouer his children and people. Certainely, Noah knew right well, that the former destruction of mankinde was by themselues purchased through crueltie and disobedience; and that to distrust God, and to raise vp building against his Almightie power, was as much as in them lay, a prouocation of God to lay on them the same, if not a more sharpe affliction. Wherefore, there is no probabilitie, that euer he came so farre West as Babylonia; but rather, that hee sent those numbers which came into Shinaar (being the greatest troupe, because they had the greatest part of the world to plant) vnder Nimrod, or those vpon whom he vsurped. Nauclerus and Cœlestinus take the testimonie of Methodius Bishop of Tyre for currant, that there were three Leaders of the people after their encrease (to wit) Nimrod, Suphene, and Ioctan: of which Nimrod commaunded the issues of Cham, Ioctan of Sem, and Suphene of Iaphet. This opinion I cannot iudge of, although I will not doubt, but that so great a worke as the worlds plantation, could not bee effected without order and conduction.

Of the Sonnes of Sem: Ioctan, Hauilah, and Ophir, are especially noted to haue dwelt in the East India. The rest of Sems issues had also the Regions of Persia and the other adioyning to Indus, and held also a part of Chaldea for a time: for Abraham inhabited Vr, till he was thence called by God; and whether they were of the Sonnes of Ioctan, or of all the rest a certaine number (Cham and his issue onely excepted) that Noah kept with himselfe, it cannot be knowne. Of which plantation I shal speake at large in the Chapter following.

Now another reason which moues me to beleeue, that Noah stayed in the East far away from all those that came into Shinar, is, that Moses doth not in any word make mention of Noah in all the storie of the Hebrewes, or among any of those Nations which contended with them. And Noah, being the Father of all mankinde, and the chosen seruant of God, was too principall a person, to bee either forgotten or neglected, had he not (in respect of his age and wearisome experience of the world) withdrawne himselfe, and rested apart with his best beloued, giuing himselfe to the seruice and contemplation of God and heauenly things, after hee had directed his children to their destined portions. For hee landed in a warme and fertile soile, where hee planted his Vineyard, and dreft the earth; after which, and his thankes-giuing to God by sacrifice, he is not remembred in the Scriptures, because hee was so farre away from those Nations of which Moses wrote: which were the Hebrewes chiefly, and their enemies and borderers.

†. VII.

Of the ſenſeleſſe opinion of ANNIVS the Commentor vpon BEROSVS: who finds diuers places where the Arke reſted; as the Caſpian and Gordiaan hils which are three hundred miles aſunder; and alſo ſome place of Scythia.

IT remaineth now that we examine the Arguments and authorities of Frier Annius, who in his Commentaries vpon Beroſus and others, laboureth maruailouſly to proue, that the Arke of Noah reſted vpon the Armenian mountaines called Caſpij; which mountaines ſeparate Armenia from the vpper Media, and doe equally belong to both. And becauſe all his Authours ſpeake of the mountaines Gordiæi, hee hath no other ſhift to vnite theſe opinions, but by vniting thoſe farre-diſtant mountaines together. To effect which, he hath found no other inuention, then to charge thoſe men with errour, which haue carefully ouerſeene, printed, and publiſhed Ptolomies Geographie, in which they are altogether diſſeuered. For that laſt edition of Mercators, ſets theſe hils fiue degrees (which makes three hundred Engliſh miles) aſunder. And certainly, if we looke into thoſe more ancient copies of Villanouanus and others, we ſhall finde nothing in them to helpe Annius withall: for in thoſe the mountaines Caſpij ſtand ſeuen degrees to the Eaſt of the Gordiæi, which make 420. miles. And for thoſe Authours by whoſe authoritie Annius ſtrengtheneth himſelfe, Diodorus whom hee ſo much followeth, giueth this iudgement vpon them in the like diſpute. Aberrârunt verò omnes, non negligentiâ, ſed regnorum ſitus ignorantia, They haue all erred (ſaith he) not through negligence, but through ignorance of the ſituation of Kingdomes. But for an induction, to proue that the Arke of Noah ſtood on the mountaines of Armenia, he beginneth with the antiquitie of the Scythians: and to proue the ſame hee citeth Marcus Portius Cato, who auoweth that 250. yeares before Ninus, the earth was ouerflowne with waters, & in Scythia Saga renatum mortale genus, and that in Scythia Saga the ſtocke of mortall men was renewed. The ſame Authour alſo teacheth that the Vmbri before remembred (who were ſo called, becauſe ſaued from Deucalions floud) were the Sonnes of the Galli, a Nation of the Scythians. Ex hijs veniſſe IANVM cum DYRIM & Gallis progenitoribus Vmbrorum, From theſe Scythians, he ſaith, that IANVS came with DYRIM and with the Galli the progenitours of the Vmbri; And againe, Equidem principatus originis ſemper Scythis tribuitur, Certainely, the Prime antiquitie of off-ſpring is alway giuen to the Scythians. And herein truly I agree with Annius, that thoſe Regions called Scythia, and now Tartaria, and by ſome Writers Sarmatia Aſiatica, were among the firſt peopled: and they held the greateſt part of Aſia vnder tribute till Ninus time. Alſo Plinie calleth the Vmbri which long ſince inhabited Italie, Gens antiquiſſima, a moſt ancient Nation, who deſcended of theſe Scythians. Now that which Annius laboureth, is to proue that theſe ancient Scythians (meaning the Nephewes of Noah) did firſt inhabite that Region of the mountaines, on which the Arke reſted; and confeſſing that this great ſhip was grounded in Armenia, he faineth a nation of Scythians called Araxea, taking name of the mountaine Ararat, neere the Riuer of Araxes. And becauſe his Authour Cato helpeth him in part (to wit, That in Scythia mankinde was reſtored after the great floud, 250. yeares before Ninus) and in part vtterly deſtroyeth his conceit of Armenia, by adding the word Saga, as in Scythia Saga renatum mortale genus, in Scythia Saga mankinde was reſtored, hee therefore in the Proœme of his Commentarie vpon Beroſus, leaueth out the addition of Saga altogether in the repetition of Cato his wordes, and writes homines in Scythia ſaluatos. For Scythia Saga or Saca, is vndoubtedly vnder the mountaines of Paropaniſus, on which, or neere which it is moſt probable that the Arke firſt tooke ground; and from thoſe Eaſt parts (according to Moſes) came all thoſe companies which erected the Tower of Babel in Shinaar or Babylonia.

But now the beſt authoritie which Annius hath, is out of Diodorus: where he hath read, read, that the Scythians were originally Armenians, taking name à Scytha Rege eorum, from Scytha their King. But (in a word) we may see his vanitie, or rather (indeede) his falshood in citing this place. For Diodorus a most approued and diligent Authour beginneth in that place with these words: Fabulantur Scythæ, The Scythians fable: and his Interpreter in the table of that worke giueth this title to that very Chapter. Scytharum origo & successus, fabula, The originall and successe of the Scythians, a fable. And (indeede) there needes no great disproofe hereof, since Ptolomie doeth directly delineate Scythia Saga, or Sacæ, and sets them in 130. degrees of longitude: and the Persians (saith Herodotus) call all the Scythians, Sacæ, which Plinie confirmeth: for in respect that these Sacæ (saith Plinie) are the next Scythians to the Persians, therefore they giue all the rest that name. Now that any Nation in Armenia can neighbour the Persians, there is no man beleeueth. But this supposed Scythia Araxea in Armenia lyeth in 78. degrees of longitude (that is) 42. degrees distant from the Sacæ; and the Countrie about Araxes, Ptolomie calleth Colthene and Soducene and Sacapene, without any mention of Scythia at all: and yet all those which are or were reputed Scythians, either within Imaus or without, to the number of 100. seuerall Nations are by Ptolomie precisely set downe.

L. 6. c. 17.

Tab. Asia. 7. & 8

But to come to those later Authours, whereof some haue written, others haue seene a great part of those North-east Regions, and searched their antiquities with great diligence: First, Marius Niger boundeth Scythia within Imaus, in this manner: (for Scythia without these mountaines is also beyond our purpose.) Scythia intra Imaum montem ea est, quæ proprio vocabulo Gassaria hoc tempore dicitur: ab Occasu Sarmatia Asiatica: ab Oriente Imao monte: à Septentrione terra incognita: à Meridie Saccis, Sogdianis, Margianis, vsq; ostia Oxi amnis in Hyrcanum mare exeuntis; & parte ipsius maris hinc vsq; ad Rha fluminis ostia terminatur: Scythia within the mountaine Imaus is that part of the world, which in their owne speech is at this time called Gassaria; and the same is bounded on the West side by Sarmatia Asiatica, (or of Asia) on the East by the Imaan mountaines: on the North by vnknowne lands: on the South by the Sacæ (which are the Sacæ) the Sogdiani, and the Margiani, to the mouth of Oxus, falling into the Hyrcan Sea, and by a part of the same Sea as farre as the mouth of Rha.

Rha now Wolga.

Com. 2. Asiæ. fol. 472.

Now if Niger sets all Sarmatia Asiatica, to the West of Scythia, then Sarmatia (quæ magna sanè regio est, & quæ innumeras nationes complectitur, Which is a great Region, comprehending innumerable Nations, (saith Niger) much of it being betweene Scythia and Armenia, doth sufficiently warrant vs, that Armenia can bee no part of Scythia; and to make it more plaine, he disseuereth Sarmatia it selfe from any part of Armenia, by the Regions of Colchis, Iberia, Albania, which he leaueth on the right hand of Sarmatia, and yet makes Sarmatia but the West bound of Scythia.

And for Paulus Venetus, he hath not a word of Armenia among the Tartarian, or Scythian Nations; neither doth his fellow Frier Iohn Plancarpio (cited by Vincentius in his description of Scythia) make any mention of Armenia; neither doth Haytonus an Armenian borne, of the bloud of those Kings, (though afterward a Monke) euer acknowledge himselfe for a Tartarian, or of the Scythian races descended: though he write that storie at large, gathered by Nicholaus Salcuni, and (by the commandement of Pope Clement the fifth) in the yeare 1307. published.

Neither doth Mathias a Michou (a Canon of Craconia in Polonia) a Sarmatian borne, and that trauailed a great part of Sarmatia Asiatica, finde Armenia any way within the compasse of Tartaria, Scythia, or Sarmatia; and yet no man (whose trauailes are extant) hath obserued so much of those Regions as he hath done: prouing and disprouing many things, heretofore subiect to dispute. And among others hee burieth that ancient and receiued opinion, That out of the mountaines Riphæi, and Hyperborei in Scythia, spring the Riuers of Tanais or Don, Volga or Edel; prouing by vnanswerable experience, that there are no such mountaines in rerum natura; and (indeede) the heads and fountaines of those famous Riuers, are now by the trade of Muscouia knowne to euery Merchant, and that they arise out of Lakes, low, wooddie, and marish grounds. The Riuer of Tanois or Don, ariseth to the South of the Citie Tulla, some twentie English miles, out of a Lake called Iwanowesero in the great wood Okenitzkilies or Iepiphanolies. Volga, which Ptolomie cals Rha, and the Tartars call Edel, riseth out of a Lake called Fronow, in the great Wood Vodkonzki: from which Lake the two other famous Riuers flow of Borysthenes (now Neyper) and Dsuina or Diuidna. And this learned Polonian doth in this sort bound the European Sarmatia. In Sarmatia of Europe are the Regions of Russians, Lithuanians, Muscouians, and those adioyning, bounded on the West by the Riuer of Vissa, the name perchance misprinted Vissa for Vistula, a Riuer which parts Germanie and Sarmatia: and for the East border hee nameth Tanais or Don. Sarmatia Asiatica hee cutteth from Europe by the same Riuer of Tanais, and the Caspian Sea, to with-hold it from stretching farther East: this Asian Sarmatia being part of that Scythia which Ptolomie calleth Scythia intra Imaum montem: Scythia within the mountaine Imaus. And the same Mathias Michou farther affirmeth, that the Scythians (which Frier Annius would make Armenians) came not into Sarmatia Asiatica it selfe aboue three hundred and a few odde yeeres before his owne time: these be his wordes: Constat eam esse gentem nouam, & aduentitiam à partibus Orientis, (mutatis sedibus) paulò plus abhinc trecentis annis Asiæ Sarmatiam ingressam: It is manifest (sayth hee, speaking of the Scythian Nation) that this is a late planted Nation, come from the Coasts of the East: from whence they entred into Asia, and gat new seates a little more then three hundred yeeres since: For (indeed) before that time the Gothes or Pouloci inhabited Sarmatia Asiatica. And this Mathias liued in the yeere 1511. and this his Discourse of Sarmatia was printed at Augusta in the yeere 1506. as Bucholzerus in his Chronologie witnesseth. Now these Scythians (sayth hee) came from the East, for in the East it was that the Arke of Noah rested; and the Scythæ Sacæ were those people which liued at the North foot of those Mountaines of Taurus or Ararat, where they encounter or beginne to mixe themselues with the great Imaus. And were there no other testimonie then the generall description of the Earth now extant, and the witnesse of Ptolomie, it is plaine, that betweene al parts of Armenia and Scythia, there are not only those three Regions of Colchis, Iberia, and Albania, but the Caspian Sea: on the East shore of which Sea, but not on the West, or on that part which any way toucheth Armenia, there are (indeed) a Nation of Scythians (called Ariacæ) betweene Iaxartus and Iactus; but what are these Scythians to any Ariaca, or Scythia Araxea which ANNIVS placeth in Armenia, more then the Scythians of Europe?

§. VIII.

The fift argument, The Vine must grow naturally neere the place where the Arke rested.

TO this if we adde the consideration of this part of the Text, That NOAH planted a Vineyard, wee shall finde that the fruit of the Vine or Raysin did not grow naturally in that part of Armenia, where this resting of the Arke was supposed: for if the Vine was a stranger in Italie and France, and brought from other Countries thither, it is not probable that it grew naturally in Armenia, being a farre colder Countrie. For Tyrrhenus first brought Vines into France, and Saturnus into Latium: yea at such time as Brennus and the Gaules inuaded Italie, there were few or no Vines in France. For (sayth Plutarch in the life of Camillus) the Gaules remained betweene the Pyrenæi and the Alpes, neere vnto the Senones, where they continued a long time, vntill they drunke Wine, which was first brought them out of Italie; and after they tasted thereof they hasted to inhabite that Countrie, which brought forth such pleasant fruit: so as it appeared, that the Plant of the Vine was not naturall in France, but from Italie brought thither; as by Saturne from elsewhere into Italie.

Gen. 9. 20.

Seruius Æneid. Eutropius.

Now it is manifest that Noah trauailed not farre to seeke out the Vine. For the Plantation thereof is remembred, before there was any counsaile how to dispose of the World among his children: and the first thing he did was to till the ground, and to plant a Vineyard, after his Sacrifice and Thankesgiuing to God; and whersoeuer the Arke rested, there did the Vine grow naturally. From whence it doth no where appeare that hee trauailed farre: for the Scriptures teach vs, that hee was a Husbandman, and not a Wanderer.

Answere to an obiection out of the words of the Text: The Lord scattered them from thence vpon the face of the whole earth.

AND that all the children of Noah came together into Shinar, it doth not appeare, sauing that it may be inferred out of these wordes (from thence) because it is written: So the Lord scattered them from thence vpon all the earth; which hath no other sense, but that the Lord scattered them (to wit) those that built this Towre: for those were from thence dispersed into all the Regions of the North and South, and to the Westward. And by these words of Sybilla (as they are conuerted) it seemeth that all came not together into Shinaar, for they haue this limitation: Quidam eorum turrem adificarunt altissimam, quasi per eam cœlum essent ascensuri: Certaine of them built a most high Towre, as if they meant thereby to haue scaled the Heauens.

†. X.

An answere to the obiection from the name of Ararat, taken for Armenia: and the heighth of the Hils there.

BVT before I conclude this part, it is necessarie to see and consider, what part of Scripture, and what reason may be found out to make it true or probable, that the Arke of Noah was forsaken by the waters on the Mountaines of Armenia. For the Text hath only these wordes: The Arke rested on (or vpon) the Mountaines of Ararat or Armenia, saith the marginall note of the Geneua, the Chaldæan Paraphrast cals it Kardu; of which the highest hath the name of Lubar, saith Epiphanius. Now this Ararat (which the Septuagint doe not conuert at all, but keepe the same word) is taken to be a Mountaine of Armenia, because Armenia it selfe had anciently that name: so as first out of the name, and secondly out of the heighth (which they suppose exceeded all other) is the opinion taken, That the Arke first sate thereon.

Gen. 8. 14.

Epiph. l. 1. contra Hæres.

But these suppositions haue no foundation: for neyther is Ararat of Armenia alone, neyther is any part, or any of those Mountaines of equall stature to many other Mountaines of the World; and yet it doth not follow, that the Arke found the highest Mountaine of all other to rest on: for the Plaines were also vncouered, before Noah came out of the Arke. Now if there were any agreement among Writers of this Ararat, and that they did not differ altogether therein, wee might giue more credit to the conceit. For in the Bookes of the Sybils it is written, that the Mountaines of Ararat are in Phrygia, vpon which it was supposed that the Arke stayed after the Floud. And the better to particularize the place and seate of these Mountaines, and to proue them in Phrygia, and not Armenia, they are placed where the Citie of Cælenes was afterward built. Likewise in the same description she maketh mention of Marsyas, a Riuer which runneth through part of Phrygia, and afterward ioyneth it selfe with the Riuer Meander, which is farre from the Gordiæan Mountaines in Armenia. We may also find a great mistaking in IOSEPHVS, (though out of BEROSVS, who is in effect the Father of this opinion) that IOSEPHVS sets Ararat betweene ARMENIA and PARTHIA toward ADIABENE, and affirmeth affirmeth withall, that in the Pronince of Caron by others Kauros and Arnos, ſo called by reaſon that the waters haue from thence no deſcent, nor iſſue out, the people vaunt that they had in thoſe dayes reſerued ſome pieces of Noahs Arke. But Parthia toucheth no where vpon Armenia, for Armenia bordereth Adiabene, a Prouince of Aſſyria: ſo that all Media and a part of Aſſyria is betweene Parthia and Armenia. Now whereas the diſcouerie of the Mountaines Cordiæi was firſt borrowed out of Beroſus by Ioſephus; yet the Text which Ioſephus citeth out of Beroſus, differs farre from the wordes of that Beroſus, which wandreth vp and downe in theſe dayes, ſet out by Annius. For Beroſus cited by Ioſephus, hath theſe words: Fertur & nauigij huius pars in Armenia, apud montem Cordiæorum ſupereſſe, & quoſdam bitumen inde abraſum ſecum reportare, quo vice amuleti loci huius homines vti ſolent: (which is) It is reported alſo that a part of this ſhip is yet remaining in Armenia vpon the Cordiæan Mountaines; and that diuers doe ſcrape from it the Bitumen or Pitch, and carrying it with them, they vſe it inſtead of an amulet. But Annius his Edition of the Fragment of Beroſus vſeth theſe wordes: Nam eleuata ab aquis in Gordiæi montis vertice quieuit, cuius adhuc dicitur aliqua pars eſſe, & homines ex illa Bitumen tollere quo maximè vtuntur ad expiationem: For the whole Arke being lifted vp by the waters, reſted on the top of the Gordiæan Mountaines, of which it is reported that ſome parts remaine, and that men doe carry thence of the Bitumen to purge by Sacrifice therewith: ſo as in theſe two Texts (beſides the difference of words) the name is diuerſly written. The ancient Beroſus writes Cordiæi with a (C.) and the Fragment Gordiæi with a (G.) the one that the Bitumen is vſed for a preſeruatiue againſt Poyſon or Inchantment; the other in Sacrifice; And if it bee ſaid that they agree in the generall, yet it is reported by neither from any certaine knowledge, nor from any approued Authour: for one of them vſeth the word (fertur) the other (dicitur) the one, that ſo it is reported, the other, that ſo it is ſayd; and both but by heare-ſay, and therefore of no anothoritie nor credit. For common bruit is ſo infamous an Hiſtorian, as wiſe men neyther report after it, nor giue credit to any thing they receiue from it.

Furthermore, theſe Mountaines which Ptolomie cals Gordiæi, are not thoſe Mountaines which himſelfe giueth to Armenia, but hee calleth the Mountaines of Armenia Moſchici. Theſe be his owne wordes: Montes Armeniæ nominantur ij, qui Moſchici appellantur, qui protenduntur vſq; ad ſuperiacentem partem Ponti Cappadocum; & mons qui Paryardes dicitur: The Mountaines of Armenia are they which are called Moſchici, which ſtretch along to the higher part of Pontus of the Cappadocians: alſo the Hill which is called Paryardes; which Mountaines Plinie calleth Pariedri, and both which lye to the North of Gordiæi or Baris, in 43. and 44. and a halfe; and the Gordiæan Mountaines in 39. and a halfe: from the Northermoſt of which did the Georgians take their names, who were firſt Gordians and then Georgians, who amidſt all the ſtrength of the greateſt Infidels of Perſia and Turkie, doe ſtill remaine Chriſtians. Concerning the other ſuppoſitions, that the Mountaines of Gordiæi, otherwiſe Baris Kardu or Lubar, (which Ptolomie calleth Togordiaion) are the higheſt of the World, the ſame is abſolutely falſe.

Of Caucaſus, and diuers farre higher Hils then the Armenian.

FOR the beſt Coſmographers with other, that haue ſeene the Mountanes of Armenia, find them farre inferiour, and vnder-ſet to diuers other Mountaines euen in that part of the World, and elſewhere: as the Mountaine Athos betweene Macedon and Thrace, which Ptolomie cals Olympus, now called Lacas, (ſaith Caſtaldus) is farre ſurmounting any Mountaine that euer hath beene ſeene in Armenia: for it caſteth ſhade three hundred furlongs, which is ſeuen and thirtie miles and vpwardes: of which Plutarch: Athos adumbrat latera Lemniæ bouis: Athos ſhaddoweth the Cow of Lemnos.

Plut. Muſt. Coſm.

nos. Also the Mount of Olympus in Thessalie, is sayd to be of that heighth, as neither the Winds, Cloudes, or Raine ouertop it. Againe, the Mountaine of Antandrus in Mysia, not farre from Ida, whence the Riuer Scamandrus floweth, which runneth through Troy, is also of a farre more admiration then any in Armenia, and may bee seene from Constantinople. There are also in Mauritania neere the Sea, the famous Mountaines of Atlas, of which HERODOTVS: Extat in hoc mari Mons, cui nomen Atlas, ita sublimis esse dicitur, vt ad illius verticem oculi mortalium peruenire non possint: Vpon this Coast there is a Mountaine called Atlas, whose heighth is sayd to be such, as the eye of no mortall man can discerne the top thereof. And if we may beleeue Aristotle, then are all these inferiour to Caucasus, which hee maketh the most notorious both for breadth and heighth: Caucasus Mons omnium maximus, qui astiuum ad ortum sunt, acumine atq; latitudine, cuius iuga à Sole radiantur vsq; ad conticinium ab ortu: & iterum ab occasu; Caucasus (saith ARISTOTLE) is the greatest Mountain both for breadth and heighth of all those in the North-east, whose tops are lightned by the Sun-beames, vsq; ad conticinium (which is saith Macrobius) betweene the first crowing after mid-night and the breake of day: Others affirme, that the top of this Mountaine holds the Sunne-beames when it is darke in the Valley; but I cannot beleeue eyther: for the highest Mountaine of the World knowne is that of Tenerife in the Canaria: which although it hath nothing to the Westward of it for 1000. Leagues together but the Ocean Sea, yet doth it not enioy the Sunnes companie at any such late houres. Besides, these Mountaines which Aristotle calleth Caucasi, are those which separate Colchis from Iberia; though (indeed) Caucasus doth diuide both Colchis, Iberia, and Albania from Sarmatia: for he acknowledgeth that the Riuer of Phasis riseth in the same Mountaine, which himselfe calleth Caucasus, and that Phasis springeth from those Hils which sunder Colchis from Iberia, falling afterward into Euxinus: which Riuer (it is manifest) yeeldeth it selfe to the Sea, two degrees to the North of Trapezus (now Trabesunda) howsoeuer Mercator bring it from Peryardes.

Arist. Met. cor. l. 1. c. 13.

†. XII.

Of diuers incongruities, if in this Storie we should take Ararat for Armenia.

SO as it doth first appeare, that there is no certaintie what Mountaine Ararat was: for the Bookes of the Sybils set it in Phrygia: and Berosus in Armenia: and as for Berosus authoritie, those men haue great want of proofes that borrow from thence.

Secondly, that Baris was the highest Hill, and therefore most likely that the Arke grounded thereon, the assertion and supposition haue equall credit: for there are many Hils which exceed all those of Armenia; and if they did not, yet it doth not follow (as is before written) that the Arke should sit on the highest.

Thirdly, it cannot be proued that there is any such Hill in Armenia, or in rerum natura, as Baris: for Baris (sayth Hierome) signifieth high Towres: and so may all high Hils bee called indifferently; and therefore wee may better giue the name of Baris to the Hils of Caucasus (out of which Indus riseth) then to any Hils of Armenia. For those of Caucasus in the East, are vndoubtedly the highest of Asia.

Fourthly, the Authours themselues doe not agree in what Region the Mountaines Gordiei stand: for Ptolomie distinguisheth the Mountaines of Armenia from the Gordiæan, and calleth those of Armenia Moschici and Paryardes, as aforesaid. Now Paryardes is seated neere the middle of Armenia, out of which on the West-side riseth Euphrates, and out of the East-side Araxis: and the Mountaines Moschici are those Hils which disioyne Colchis, Iberia, and Albania (now the Countrie of the Georgians) from Armenia.

†. XIII.

†. XIII.

Of the contrary ſituation of Armenia to the place noted in the Text: and that it is no marualle that the ſame ledge of Hils running from Armenia to India, ſhould keepe the ſame name all along: and euen in India bee called Ararat.

LAſtly, we muſt blow vp this Mountaine Ararat it ſelfe, or elſe wee muſt digge it downe, and carry it out of Armenia; or find it elſewhere, and in a warmer Countrie, and (withall) ſet it Eaſt from Shinaar: or elſe wee ſhall wound the Truth it ſelfe with the weapons of our owne vaine imaginations.

Therefore to make the miſtaking open to euery eye, wee muſt vnderſtand, that Ararat (named by Moſes) is not any one Hill, ſo called, no more then any one Hill among thoſe Mountaines which diuide Italie from France is called the Alpes: or any one among thoſe which part France from Spaine is the Pyrenian; but as theſe being continuations of many Hils keepe one name in diuers Countries: ſo all that long ledge of Mountaines, which Plinie calleth by one name Taurus, and Ptolomie both Taurus, Niphates, Coatras, Coronus, Sariphi, vntill they encounter and croſſe the Mountaines of the great Imaus, are of one generall name, and are called the Mountaines of Ararat or Armenia, becauſe from thence or thereabout they ſeeeme to ariſe. So all theſe Mountaines of Hyrcania, Armenia, Coraxis, Caſpij Moſchici, Amazonici, Heniochi, Scythici, (thus diuerſly called by Plinie and others) Ptolomie cals by one name Caucaſus, lying betweene the Seas Caſpium and Euxinus: as all thoſe Mountaines which cut aſunder America, euen from the new Kingdome of Granado, to the ſtreight of Magellan, are by one name called Andes. And as theſe Mountaines of Ararat runne Eaſt and Weſt: ſo doe thoſe maruailous Mountaines of Imaus ſtretch themſelues North and South; and being of like extent well-neere, are called by the name of Imaus, euen as Plinie calleth theſe former hils Taurus, and Moſes the hils of Ararat. The reaſon of ſeuerall names giuen by Ptolomie was, thereby the better to diſtinguiſh the great Regions and Kingdomes, which theſe great mountaines bound and diſſeuer; as Armenia, Meſopotamia, Aſſyria, Media, Suſiana, Perſia, Parthia, Caramania, Aria, Margiana, Bactria, Sogdiana, and Paropaniſus: hauing all theſe Kingdomes either on the North or South ſide of them. For all the mountaines of Aſia (both the leſſe and the greater) haue three generall names, (to wit) Taurus, Imaus, and Caucaſus: and they receiue other titles, as they ſeuer and diuide particular places and regions. For theſe mountaines which ſunder Cilicia from the reſt of Aſia the leſſe on the North ſide, are called Taurus; and thoſe mountaines which part it from Comagena (a Prouince of Syria) are called Amanus: the mountaines called Taurus running Eaſt and Weſt, as Imaus doth North and South. Through Taurus the Riuer of Euphrates forceth her paſſage, leauing the name of Amanus to the mountaines on her Weſt banke; and on her Eaſt ſide the mountaines are ſometimes knowne by the name of Taurus, (as in Ptolomies three tables of Aſia) and ſometimes Niphates: (as in the fourth) retaining that vncertaine appellation ſo long as they bound Armenia from Meſopotamia: and after the Riuer of Tygris cutteth them aſunder, they then take the name of Niphates altogether, vntill they ſeparate Aſſyria and Media; but then they call themſelues Coatras, though betweene the vpper and nether Media, they doe not appeare, but altogether diſcontinue. For at Mazada in Media they are not found, but runne through the Eaſterne Media by pieces: in the middle of which Region they call themſelues Orontes, and towards the Eaſt part Coronus; out of the Southerne part whereof the Riuer of Bagradus riſeth, which diuideth the ancient Perſia from Caramania: and then continuing their courſe Eaſtward by the name of Coronus, they giue to the Parthians and Hyrcanians their proper Countries. This done, they change themſelues into the mountaines of Sariphi, out of which riſeth the Riuer Margus, afterward yeelding her ſelfe to Oxus: (now Abia) and drawing now neere their wayes end, they first make themselues the South border of Bactria, and are then honoured with the Title of Paropanisus; and lastly of Caucasi, euen where the famous Riuer of Indus with his principal companions Hydaspis and Zaradrus spring forth, and take beginning. And here doe these Mountaines build themselues exceeding high, to equall the strong Hils called Imaus of Scythia, which encounter each other in 35. 36. and 37. degrees of Latitude, and in 140. of Longitude: of the which the West parts are now called Delanguer, and the rest Nagracot; and these Mountaines in this place onely, are properly called Caucasi (sayth Ptolomie) that is, betweene Paroponisus and Imaus: and improperly, betweene the two Seas of Caspium and Pontus.

Of the best Vine naturally growing on the South side of the Mountaines Caucasi and toward the East Indies: and of other excellencies of the soile.

NOw in this part of the World it is, where the Mountaine and Riuer Ianus, and the Mountaine Nyseus (so called of Bacchus Niseus or Noa) are found: and on these higheſt Mountaines of that part of the World did Goropius Becanus conceiue that the Arke of Noah grounded after the Floud: of all his coniectures the most probable, and by best reason approued. In his Indoscythia hee hath many good Arguments, though mixt with other fantasticall opinions of this subiect. And as the same Becanus also noteth; that as in this part of the World are found the best Vines: so it is as true, that in the same Line, and in 34. 35. and 36. degrees of Septentrionall Latitude are the most delicate Wines of the World, namely, in Iudea, Candia, and other parts of Greece: and likewise in this Region of Margiana, and vnder these Mountaines, Strabo affirmeth, that the most excellent Vines of the World are found; the clusters of Grapes containing two Cubits of length: and it is the more probable, because this place agreeth in Climate with that part of Palestina, where the Searchers of the Land by Moses direction found bunches of equall bigneſſe at Escol.

Num. 13. 24.

The fruitfulneſſe of this place (to wit) on the South bottome of these Hils, Curtius witnesseth. For in Margiana neere the Mountaine of Meros did Alexander feast himselfe and his Armie ten dayes together, finding therein the most delicate Wine of all other.

†. XV.

The conclusion, with a briefe repeating of diuers chiefe points.

AND therefore to conclude this opinion of Ararat, it is true, that those Mountaines doe also trauerse Armenia: yea, and Armenia it selfe sometime is knowne by the name of Ararat. But as Plinie giueth to this ledge of high Hils, euen from Cilicia to Paroponisus and Caucasus, the name of Taurus: and as the Hils of France and Germanie are called the Alpes: and all betweene France and Spaine the Pyrenes: and in America the continuation of Hils for 3000. miles together, the Andes; so was Ararat the generall name which Moses gaue them; the diuersitie of appellations no otherwise growing, then by their diuiding and bordering diuers Regions and diuers Countries. For in the like case doe we call the Sea, which entreth by Gibraltar, the Mediterran and inland Sea; and yet where it washeth the Coasts of Carthage, and ouer against it, it is called Tyrrhenum: betweene Italie and Greece, Ionium: from Venice to Durazzo, Adriaticum: betweene Athens and Asia, Ægeum: betweene Sestus and Abydus, Hellespont: and afterward Pontus, Propontis, and Bosphorus. And as in these, these, so is the Ocean to the North-east part of Scotland called Deucaledonycum: and on this side, the Brittaine Sea: to the East, the Germane and Baltick, and then the Frozen.

L. 5. c. 27.

For a finall end of this question we must appeale to that Iudge which cannot erre, euen to the word of Truth, which in this place is to be taken and followed according to the plaine sense: seeing it can admit neither distinction, nor other construction then the words beare literally, because they are vsed to the very same plaine purpose of a description, and the making of a true and precise difference of places. Surely, where the sense is plaine (and being so vnderstood, it bringeth with it no subsequent inconuenience or contrarietie) we ought to be warie, how we fancie to our selues any new or strange exposition; and (withall) to resolue our selues, that euery word (as aforesaid) hath his waight in Gods Booke. And therefore we must respect and reuerence the testimonies of the Scriptures throughout, in such sort as S. Augustine hath taught vs touching the Gospell of CHRIST IESVS (which is) Nequis aliter accipiat, quod narrantibus Discipulis Christi) in Euangelio legerit, quàm si ipsam manum Dei, quam in proprio corpore gestabat, conspexerit; That no man otherwise take or vnderstand that which he readeth in the Gospell (the Disciples of Christ hauing written it) then if he had seene the very hand of the Lord, which he bare in his owne body, setting it downe.

The wordes then of Moses which end this dispute, are these: And as they went from the East, they found a Playne in the land of Shinaar, and there they abode: which proueth without controuersie, that Nimrod and all with him came from the East into Shinaar; and therefore the Arke of Noah rested and tooke land to the East-ward thereof. For wee must remember, that in all places whersoeuer Moses maketh a difference of Countries, hee alwayes precisely nameth toward what quarters of the world the same were seated: as where he teacheth the plantation of Ioctan, he nameth Sephar, a Mount in the East: where he remembreth Cains departure from the presence of God, he addeth: And CAIN dwelt in the land of Nod towards the East-side of Eden: And when he describeth the Tents and Habitations of Abraham after he departed from Sechem, he vsed these wordes: Afterwards remooving thence vnto a Mountayne Eastward from Bethel, he pitched his Tents: hauing Bethel on the West-side, and Hai on the East: and afterward in the ninth Verse of the same Chapter it is written: And ABRAHAM went forth iourneying towards the South: also when Ezechiel prophecied of Gog and Magog, he sheweth that these Nations of Togorma were of the North quarters: and of the Queene of Saba it is written, that shee came from the South to visit SALOMON: And the Magi (or wisemen) came out of the East to offer presents vnto Christ. And that all Regions, and these trauailes were precisely set downe vpon the points of the Compasse and quarters of the World, it is most manifest: for Eden was due East from Iudæa, Saba South from Hierusalem: the way from Bethel to Ægypt directly South; and the Cœlesyrians, the Tubalines and Magogians inhabited the Regions directly North from Palestina, and so of the rest. But Armenia answereth not to this description of Shinaar by Moses. For to come out of Armenia, and to arriue in that Vally of Babylonia, is not a iournying from the East, nor so neere vnto the East as the North: for Armenia is to the West of the North it selfe; and we must not say of Moses (whose hands the holy Ghost directed) that he erred toto cœlo, and that he knew not East from West. For the body of Armenia standeth in fortie three degrees Septentrionall, and the North part thereof in fortie fiue; and those Gordiæan Mountaynes, whereon it was supposed that the Arke rested, stand in fortie one. But Babylonia, and the Valley of Shinaar are situated in thirtie fiue, and for the Longitude (which maketh the difference betweene East and West) the Gordiæan Mountaynes stand in 75. degrees, and the Valley of Shinaar in 79. and 80. And therefore Armenia lyeth from Shinaar Northwest, ninetie fiue degrees from the East; and if Armenia had beene but North, yet it had differed from the East one whole quarter of the Compasse. But Gregorie and Hierome warne vs, In scripturis ne minima minima differentia omitti debet: nam singuli sermones, syllabæ, apices, & puncta in diuina Scriptura plena sunt sensibus; In the Scriptures the least difference may not be omitted: for euery speech, syllable, note, or accent, and point in diuine Scriptures are replenished with their meanings. And therefore seeing Moses teacheth vs that the children of Noah came from the East, we may not beleeue Writers (of little authoritie) who also speake by heare-say and by report, vt fertur, & vt dicitur, as Berosus and Nicolaus Damascenus, determining herein without any examination of the Text, at all-aduenture. But this is infallibly true, that Shinaar lyeth West from the place where the Arke of Noah rested after the floud; and therefore it first found ground in the East, from whence came the first knowledge of all things. The East parts were first ciuill, which had Noah himselfe for an Instructer: and directly East from Shinaar in the same degree of 35. are the greatest grapes and the best Wine. The great Armies also, which ouertopped in number those Millions of Semiramis, proue that those parts were first planted: And whereas the other opinion hath neither Scripture nor Reason sufficient: for my selfe I build on his wordes who in plaine termes hath told vs, that the Sonnes of Noah came out of the East into Shinaar, and there they abode. And therefore did the Arke rest on those Easterne Mountaynes, called by one generall name Taurus, and by Moses the Mountaynes of Ararat, and not on those Mountaynes of the Northwest, as Berosus first fained, whom most part of the Writers haue followed therein. It was, I say, in the plentifull warme East where Noah rested, where he planted the Vine, where he tilled the ground and liued thereon. Placuit vero NOACHO agriculturæ studium, in qua tractanda ipse omnium peritissimus esse dicitur: ob eamq; rem sua ipsius lingua ISH-ADAMATH (hoc est) telluris vir appellatur celebratusq; est; The studie of Husbandrie pleased NOAH (saith the excellent learned man ARIAS MONTANVS) in the knowledge and order of which it is said, that NOAH excelled all men: and therefore was he called in his owne language a man exercised in the earth. Which also sheweth that he was no Wanderer: and that he troubled not himselfe with the contentions, beginning againe in the world, and among men, but stayed in his destined places, and in that part of the world, where he was first deliuered out of the prison of the Arke, whereinto God had committed him, to preserue him and mankinde.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the first planting of Nations after the floud; and of the Sonnes of NOAH, SEM, HAM, and IAPHET, by whom the earth was repeopled.

Whether SHEM and HAM were elder then IAPHET.

OF these Sonnes of Noah, which was the eldest, there is a question made. S. Augustine esteemed Shem for the eldest, Ham for the second, and Iaphet for the yongest: and herein the opinions of Writers are diuers. August. de Ciuit. Dei, l. 16. c. 3. But this we finde euerywhere in the Scriptures, and especially in Moses, that there was neuer any respect giuen to the eldest in yeeres, but in vertue, as by the examples of Henoch, Abraham, Iacob, and Dauid, is made manifest. In a few wordes, this is the ground of the controuersie; The Latine translation, and so the Geneua, hath conuerted this Scripture of Genesis the 10. v. 21. in these wordes: Vnto SHEM also the Father of all the Sonnes of HEBER, and elder brother of IAPHET, were children borne. But Iunius agreeing with the Septuagint, placeth the same wordes in this manner: To SHEM also the Father of all the Sonnes of HEBER, and brother of IAPHET, the eldest sonne were children borne: So the transposition of the word (elder) made this difference. For if the word (elder) had followed after Iaphet, as it is in the vulgar translation placed before it, then had it beene as plaine for Iaphet, as it is by these translations for Shem. Now (the matter being otherwise indifferent) seeing Gods blessings are not tyed to first and last in bloud, but to the eldest in pietie, yet the arguments are stronger for Iaphet then for Shem. And where the Scriptures are plainely vnderstood without any danger or inconuenience, it seemeth strange why any man of iudgement should make valuation of coniecturall arguments, or mens opinions. For it appeareth that Noah in the fiue hundreth yeere of his life, begat the first of his three Sonnes, Shem, Ham, and Iaphet: and in the sixe hundreth yeere (to wit) the hundreth yeere following, came the generall floud; two yeeres after which Shem begat Arphaxad, which was in the yeere 602. of Noahs life, and in the yeere of Shems life one hundred: so as Shem was but 100. yeeres old, two yeeres after the floud: and Noah begat his first borne being 500. yeeres old; and therefore, were Shem the elder, he had then beene a hundred yeeres old at the floud, and in the sixe hundreth yeere of Noahs life, and not two yeeres after. Gen. 11. 10. Which seeing the Scripture before remembred hath denyed him, and that it is also written: Then NOAH awoke from his wine, and knew what his yonger sonne had done vnto him (to wit) HAM; of necessitie the first place doth belong to Iaphet. This yonger sonne so conuerted by the vulgar and Geneua, Iunius turnes it filius minimus; His yongest sonne; but S. Chrysostome takes it otherwise, and findes Cham to be the middle or second brother, and Iaphet the yongest sonne of all: which Cham for his disobedience and the contempt of his Father (whose nakednesse he derided) was disinherited, and lost the preeminencie of his birth, as Esau and Reuben did. Gen. 11. v. 24. Pererius conceiueth that Ham was called the yonger in respect of Shem the eldest, but In Gen. auoweth auoweth withall, that the Hebrew hath not that precise difference of yonger and yongest, because it wanteth the comparatiue degree. It is true that Shem himselfe was alwaies named in the first place, yet whereas in the first Verse of the tenth Chapter of Genesis, Shem is accounted before Iaphet: in the second Verse Moses leaueth to begin with the issue by Shem, and reciteth the children of Iaphet first. So the first place was giuen to Shem for his election and benediction, and for this waightie respect, that the Hebrew Nation, Abraham, the Prophets, Dauid, and Christ our Sauiour were descended of him. And therefore, whether we shall follow the Vulgar Pagninus, and the Geneua, who agree in this conuersion, SHEM frater IAPHET maior; or with the Septuagint, Iunius, and Tremelius, SHEM fratri IAPHET maioris; or with Pererius, SHEM frater IAPHET ille magnus: inferring that Shem was the great and famous brother of Iaphet, let the Reader iudge. But for ought that I haue seene to the contrarie, it appeareth to me that Iaphet was the eldest. For where Pererius qualifieth the strength of the former Argument, That Shems age at the time of the floud did not agree with his eldership (with a supposition that the Scriptures tooke no account of smaller numbers) I doe not finde in the Scriptures any such neglect at all: for it is written, that SHEM was an hundred yeeres old, and begat ARPHAXAD two yeeres after the floud; and againe in the 12. Verse: So SHELA liued after he begat EBAR, foure hundred and three yeeres, &c. so as the number of two yeeres, of three yeeres, of fiue yeeres, and afterward of two yeeres were alwayes precisely accounted.

Gen. 11. v. 10.

§. II.

Of diuers things that in all reason are to be presumed, touching the first planting of the World, as that all Histories must yeeld to MOSES: that the world was not planted all at once, nor without great direction: and that the knowne great Lords of the first ages were of the issue of HAM.

BVt let vs goe vnto the Worlds plantation after the floud, which being rightly vnderstood, we shall finde that many Nations haue supposed or fayned themselues those Ancestors and Fathers, which neuer saw or approched the bounds of their Countries, and of whom they are by no way or branch descended. For it is plaine in the Scriptures how the sonnes and issues of Noah were distributed, and what Regions were first planted by them, from whence by degrees the rest of the world was also peopled. And if any prophane Author may receiue allowance herein, the same must be with this caution, That they take their beginning where the Scriptures end. For so farre as the storie of Nations is therein handled, we must know that both the truth and antiquitie of the bookes of God finde no companions equall, either in age or authoritie. All record, memorie, and testimonie of antiquitie whatsoeuer, which hath come to the knowledge of men, the same hath beene borrowed thence, and therefore later then it, as all carefull obseruers of time haue noted: among which thus writeth Eusebius in the Proœme of his Chronologie: MOSES is found more ancient then all those whom the Grecians make most ancient, as HOMER, HESIOD, and the Troian warre, and farre before HERCVLES, MVSÆVS, LINVS, CHIRON, ORPHEVS, CASTOR, POLLVX, ÆSCVLAPIVS, BACCHVS, MERCVRIVS, and APOLLO, and the rest of the gods of the Nations, their Ceremonies, or holy Rites, or Prophets: and before all the deeds of IVPITER, whom the Greekes haue seated in the top and highest Turret of their Diuinitie.

Cicero de Nat. Deorum, l. 3.

For of the three Iupiters remembred by Cicero, the ancientest was the sonne of Æther, whose three sonnes begotten on Proserpina, were borne at Athens, of which Cecrops was the first King: and in the end of Cecrops time did Moses bring the children of Israel out of Ægypt: Eduxit MOSES populum Dei ex Ægypto nouissimo tempore pere CECROPIS Atheniensis Regis; MOSES brought the children of Israel out of Ægypt, in the last dayes of CECROPS King of the Athenians, saith S. Augustine: and yet was not Cecrops the Founder of the Citie it selfe, but Theseus long after him. But because the truth hereof is diuersly proued, and by many learned Authors, I will not cut asunder the purpose in hand, by alleaging many authorities in a needlesse question, but leaue it to the proper place. De Ciuit. Dei, l. 18. c. 11.

The Sonnes of IAPHET were,
- Gomer,
  - The Sonnes of GOMER were,
    - Askenaz,
    - Riphath,
    - Togorma.
- Magog,
- Madai,
- Iauan,
  - The Sonnes of IAVAN were,
    - Elisha,
    - Tarshis,
    - Kittim, and
    - Dodanim.
- Tubal,
- Meshach, and
- Tiras.

First, we are to consider that the world after the floud was not planted by imagination, neither had the children of Noah wings, to flie from Shinaar to the vttermost border of Europe, Africa, and Asia in haste, but that these children were directed by a wise Father, who knew those parts of the world before the floud, to which he disposed his children after it, and sent them not as Discouerers, or at all-aduenture, but assigned and allotted to euery Sonne and their issues, their proper parts. And not to harken to fabulous Authors, who haue no other end then to flatter Princes (as Virgil did Augustus in the fiction of Æneas) or else to glorifie their owne Nations; Let vs build herein vpon the Scriptures themselues, and after them vpon Reason and Nature. First, therefore we must call to minde and consider, what manner of face the earth euerywhere had in the 130. yeere after the great inundation, and by comparing those fruitfullest Vallies with our owne barren and cold ground, informe our selues thereby, what wonderfull Desarts, what inpassable fastnesse of woods, reeds, bryars, and rotten grasse, what Lakes and standing Pooles, and what Marishes, Fens and Bogs, all the face of the earth (excepting the Mountaynes) was pestered withall. For if in this our Climate (where the dead and destroying winter depresseth all vegetatiue and growing Nature, for one halfe of the yeere in effect) yet in twentie or thirtie yeeres these our grounds would all ouer-grow and be couered (according to the nature thereof) either with Woods or with other offensiue Thickets and Bushments: much more did all sorts of Plants, Reedes, and Trees, prosper in the most fruitfull Vallies, and in the Climate of a long and warme Summer, and hauing withall the start of 130. yeeres, to raise themselues without controlement.

This being considered, it will appeare, that all these people which came into Shinaar, and ouer whom Nimrod either by order or strength tooke the Dominion, did after the confusion of Languages, and at such time as they grew to be a mightie People, disperse themselues into the Regions adioyning to the said Vally of Shinaar, which contayned the best part of Mesopotamia, Babylonia, and Chaldæa; and from the borders thereof in time they were propagated: some of them towards the South, others towards the West and North. And although there were allotted to Shem many Regions, both East and West from Shinaar, with the Dominion of Palestina, which the Canaanites first possest; yet could he not enioy the lot of his inheritance on the suddaine, but by time and degrees. For we finde, that Abraham the true successor of Shem dwelt in Chaldæa at Vr; and from thence (called by God) he rested at Charran in Mesopotamia: from whence after the death of Thare he trauailed to Sichem in Palestina: and yet there had passed betweene Shem and Abraham (reckoning neither of themselues) seuen descents, before Abraham moued out of Chaldæa: where, and in Babylonia, all those people by Nimrod commanded, inhabited for many yeeres, and whence Nimrod went out into Assyria, and founded Niniue. Indeed deed the great Masters of Nations (as farre as we can know) were, in that Age of the issues of Ham; the blessing of God giuen by Noah to Shem and Iaphet taking lesse effect, vntill diuers yeeres were consumed; and vntill the time arriued, which by the wisedome of God was appointed. For of Chus, Mizraim, and Canaan, came the People and Princes, which held the great Kingdomes of Babylonia, Syria, and Ægypt, for many descents together.

§. III.

Of the Iles of the Gentiles in IAPHETS portion: of BEROSVS his too speedie seating GOMER the sonne of IAPHET in Italie; and another of IAPHETS sonnes TVBAL in Spaine: and of the antiquitie of Longinque Nauigation.

TO begin therefore (where Moses beginneth) with the sonnes of Iapheth, among whom the Iles of the Gentiles were diuided: which diuision, as well to Iaphets sonnes as to the rest which came into Shinaar, was (if the diuision were made at Phalegs birth) in the yeere of the World 1757. or 1758. and (by that account) in the yeere after the floud one hundred and one, of which question elsewhere.

The habitations proper to the sonnes of Iaphet were the Iles of the Gentiles, which include all Europe with all the Ilands adioyning, and compassing it about: Europe being also taken for an Iland, both in respect that the Sea Hellespont and Ægeum, Bosphorus and Euxinus cut it off from the great Continent of Asia, as also because Europe it selfe is (in effect) surrounded with water, sauing that it is fastned to Asia by the North, for it hath those Seas before named to the East, the Mediterran to the South and Southwest, the Ocean to the West, and Brittish, Germane, and Baltick Sea, with that of Glaciale to the North North-east, and North-west. Besides, it hath about it all the Cyclades or Iles lying betweene Greece and the lesser Asia, and the Iles of Rhodes, Cyprus, Creet or Candia, Sicilia, Corsica, Sardinia, Malta, the Iles of Brittanie and Zealand, with their yong-ones adiacent.

This partition and portion of Iapheth, with the part which he held in Asia, and the North, which was also very great, answereth to that blessing of God by Noah. Dilatet Deus IAPHETH; Let God spreade abroad (or increase the posteritie of) Iapheth, and let him dwell in the Tents of SHEM. For though Iunius here vseth the word (alliciat) and not dilatet: and the Geneua persuadeat; yet the Septuagint haue dilatet or amplificet; and such was the blessing giuen to our Fathers, which God promised to Abraham and his seede for euer. And the dwelling in the Tents or Tabernacles of Shem was a blessing by God to the posteritie of Iapheth: noting not onely an enlargement of Territories; but that thereby they should be made participant of Gods Church. But to come to Iaphets sonnes, of whom Gomer is the eldest. This Gomer (if we may beleeue Berosus and Annius, whose authoritie the greatest number of all our late Writers haue followed) did in the tenth yeere of Nimrods reigne depart from Babylonia, and planted Italie: which also Funcius confirmeth in these words: anno decimo NIMRODI, &c. In the tenth yeere of NIMRODS reigne, GOMERVS GALLVS planted a Colonie in that land afterward called Italie: and in the twelfth yeere of the same NIMRODS reigne TVBAL seated himselfe in Asturia in Spaine (now called Biscay) which was in the 140. and in the 142. yeeres after the floud, according to BEROSVS. But this opinion is very ridiculous. For before the confusion of tongues the children of Noah did not separate themselues, at least so many of them as came with Nimrod into Shinaar. Let vs therefore consider with reason, what time the building such a Citie and Towre required, where there was no prepared matter, nor any readie meanes to performe such a worke as Nimrod had erected (and as Funcius himselfe out of his Author Berosus witnesseth) ad altitudinem & magnitudinem montium; To the the height and magnitude of the Mountaines. Sure that both this Citie and Towre were almost builded the Scriptures witnesse: But the Lord came downe to see the Citie and Towre, which the Sonnes of men builded. Let vs then but allot a time sufficient for the making of Bricke to such a Worke, of the greatest heighth (and therefore of circuit and foundation answerable) that euer was. For where the vniuersall Floud couered the highest Mountaines fifteene Cubits; Let vs build vs a Citie and a Towre (saith NIMROD) whose top may reach vnto the Heauen: meaning, that they would rayse their Worke aboue fifteene Cubits higher then the highest Mountaine, otherwise they could not assure themselues from the feare of a second inundation: a great part whereof was finished before it fell, and before they left the Worke. They also began this building vpon a ground, the most oppressed with waters of all the World: as by the great ruine which these waters forceably ouer-bearing and ouer-flowing, made in the time of the succeeding Emperours, is made manifest, approued also by the Prophet Hieremie, speaking of Babylon in these wordes: Thou that dwellest vpon many waters. It cannot be doubted but that there needed a substantiall foundation, for so high a raised building on a marish ground: and to which, Glycas vpon Genesis giueth fortie yeeres. For it seemeth, that the Towre was neere finished when God ouerthrew it: it being afterward written, So the Lord scattered them from thence vpon all the earth, and they left to build the Citie. Out of which place it may bee gathered (because the Towre is not then named) that they very neere had performed the Worke of their supposed defence, which was the Towre: and that afterward they went on with the Citie adioyning, wherein they inhabited. It is also to bee noted, that till such time as this confusion seized them (whereupon the Towre was throwne downe) these Nations did not disperse themselues: for from thence the Lord scattered them vpon all the Earth, (that was) when they perceiued not one anothers speech. Now to thinke that this Worke in the newnesse of the World (wanting all instruments and materials) could be performed in ten yeeres; and that Tubal and Gomer in the same yeere could creepe through 3000. miles of Desart, with Women, Children, and Cattell: let those light Beleeuers, that neyther tye themselues to the Scripture, nor to reason, approoue it, for I doe not. And if the Arke of Noah was 100. yeeres in building, or but neere such a time, (and then) when the World had stood 1556. yeeres, it were more then foolishnesse and madnesse it selfe, to thinke that such a Worke as this could be performed in ten; when the World (from the Floud to the arriuall at Babel, and beginning of this building there) had but 131. yeeres, and whereof they had spent some part in trauailing from the East. Againe, if all Asia set to their helping hands in the building of the Temple of Diana, and yet they consumed in that Worke 400. yeeres (or bee it but halfe that time) and in such an Age as when the World flourished in all sorts of Artificers, and with abundant plentie of materials and carriages: This Worke of the Towre of Babel could hardly (with all the former wants supposed) bee erected in those few yeeres remembred. And for conclusion, let all men of iudgement waigh with themselues how impossible it was for a Nation or Family of men, with their Wiues and Children, and Cattell, to trauaile 3000. miles through Woods, Bogs, and Desarts, without any Guide or Conductor; and we shall find it rather a Worke of 100. yeeres then of 100. daies. For in the West Indies of which the Spaniards haue the experience, in those places where they found neither path nor Guide, they haue not entred the Countrey ten miles in tenne yeeres. And if Nimrods people spent many yeeres by the account before remembred in passing from the East-India or the higher part thereof, which standeth in 115. Degrees of Longitude, vntill they came into Shinaar which lyeth in 79. Degrees (the distance betweene those places containing 36. Degrees, which make 720. Leagues, which is 2160. miles) and did all the way keepe the Mountaines and hard ground; then the difference betweene Babylon and Biscay is much more: for the bodie of Biscay lyeth in ten Degrees, and Babylon or Shinaar, (as aforesaid) in 79. so the length of way from Shinaar to Asturia or Biscay is 69. Degrees, which make 1380. Leagues, or of miles 4140. And therefore if Nimrod tooke diuers yeeres to find Shinaar, which was but 2160. miles: or (supposing that the Arke rested in Armenia) little aboue 400. miles: there is no cause to the contrarie, but to allow as many yeeres to Gomer and Tubal to trauaile 3000. miles to Countries lesse knowne vnto them by farre; then the Land of Shinaar was to Nimrod. For Paradise was knowne to Noah before the Floud: and so was the Region of Eden by Moses afterward remembred; but what hee vnderstood of most part of the World else it is vnknowne. And therefore did Annius ill aduise himselfe to plant Gomer in Italie, and Tubal in Spaine, in the tenth and twelfth of Nimrods Raigne: Shall the earth be brought forth in one day, or shall a Nation be borne at one? But it may bee obiected, That the Sonnes of Iapheth might come by Sea, and so saue this great trauaile through Desarts by Land. But we neuer read of any Nauigation in those dayes, nor long after. Surely he that knoweth what it is to imbarke so great a people as we may iustly suppose those Conducters carried with them, will not easily beleeue, that there were any Vessels in those dayes to transport Armies, and (withall) their Cattell, by whose Milke they liued and fed their Children: for Milke and Fruit were the banquetting dishes of our Forefathers. And in the eldest times, euen the Kings and Fathers of Nations valued themselues by the Heards and numbers of their Cattel: who had flocks of Sheep, and great Droues and Heards of their owne, and their owne Sheep-heards and Heardsmen. Now if Tubal had past by Sea from any part of Palæstina, Syria, or Cilicia, he might haue made good choice within the Streights, and not haue ouergone Granado, Valentia, and other Prouinces in that Tract: past the Streights of Gibralter, disdained all Andalusia and Portugal, with all those goodly Ports and Countries; and haue sought out the yron, wooddy, and barren Countrey of the World (called Biscay) by a long and dangerous Nauigation. But before the iourney of the Argonauts there were scarce any Vessels that durst crosse the Seas in that part of the World: and yet that which Iason had (if the Tale be true) was but a Galley, and a poore one (God knowes) and perchance such as they vse this day in Ireland: which although it carried but foure and fiftie Passengers, yet was it farre greater then any of the former times: Erat enim antea parua rum nauicularum vsus: For in former times they vsed very small Vessels. I denie not but that the Tyrians gaue themselues of olde to farre-off Nauigations, whence Tibullus ascribed the inuention of Ships vnto them:

Prima ratem ventis credere docta Tyros,

Tyrus knew first how Ships might vse the wind.

And for those boates called longæ naues or Gallies, Plinie saith that Ægesias ascribeth the deuice to Paralus: and Philostephanus to Iason: Ctesias to Samyras; and Saphanus to Semiramis: Archimachus to Ægeon: to which inuention the Erythræi are said to haue added certaine numbers of Oares: and then Aminocles the Corinthian to haue increased them: the Carthaginians afterwards to haue brought them to foure Bankes: the Quinq; Remi first to haue beene vsed by Nesichthon the Salaminian, with which Vessels in those parts of the World, the Romans serued themselues in the Punick War. But these be perhaps but the partialities of Writers, or their ignorance. For there are that as constantly cast the deuising of these Gallies on Sesostris, though Semiramis vsed them in the passage of her Armie ouer Indus in Abrahams time. So it is said, that Danaus was the first that brought a Ship into Greece: and yet the Samothracians challenge the inuention; and yet Tertullian (on the contrarie) giues it to Minerua: others to Neptune; Thucydides to the Corinthians. And so ignorant were the people of those Ages, as the Ægyptians vsed to coast the Shores of the Red Sea vpon rafts, deuised by King Erythrus: and in the time of the Romans, the Britans had a kind of Boat (with which they croft the Seas) made of small twigs, and couered ouer with Leather:

And although it cannot bee denyed, when Noah by Gods inſpiration was inſtructed in ſo many particulars concerning the Arke, that then many things concerning Nauigation were firſt reuealed; yet it appeares that there was much difference betweene the Arke of Noah, and ſuch Ships as were for any long Nauigation. Yea ancient Stories ſhew, that it was long after theſe times, ere any durſt preſume vpon any long Voyages to Sea: at leaſt with multitudes of Women, and Children, and Cattell: as alſo common reaſon can tell vs, that euen now when this Arte is come to her perfection, ſuch Voiages are very troubleſome and dangerous. So as it doth appeare, that there was not in that Age of Nimrod any Ship, or vſe of Ships fit for any long Nauigation. For if Gomer and Tubal had paſſed themſelues and their people by Sea; the exerciſe of Nauigation would not haue beene dead for ſo many hundred yeeres after. Leauing therefore the fabulous to their Fables, and all men elſe to their fancies, who haue caſt Nations into Countries farre off, I know not how, I will follow herein the Relation of Moſes and the Prophets: to which Truth there is ioyned both Nature, Reaſon, Policie, and neceſſitie: and to the reſt, neither probabilitie, nor poſſibilitie.

§. IIII.

Of GOG and MAGOG, TVBAL, and MESECH, ſeated firſt about Aſia the leſſe, out of EZECHIEL CAP. 38. 39.

NOw although many learned and reuerend men haue formed (I know not whereby led) a Plantation of the World, which alſo hath beene and is receiued: yet I hope I may be excuſed, if I differ altogether from them in many particulars. Certainely, that great learned man of this latter Age, Arias Montanus was alſo in ſome things much miſtaken: and for Ioſephus, as he hath many good things, and is a Guide to many errours withall, ſo was he in this Plantation of the World very groſſe and fabulous, whereby both Euſebius, Hieroſolymitanus, Epiphanius, and others, that haue taken his teſtimonies for currant, haue beene by him farre miſled. But the better to conceiue what Regions of the World Gomer the firſt ſonne of Iaphet poſſeſt, as alſo Tubal, it is needfull to beginne with Magog: becauſe the Scriptures take moſt knowledge of Gog and Magog, which two names haue troubled many Commentators, ſaith Matth. Beroaldus, who hath laboured herein with great diligence, and whom (of all that euer I read) I find most iudicious in the examination of this plantation. He takes authoritie from the Prophet Ezechiel chiefly, who in the 38. and 39. Chapter directeth vs, what Nations the Gomerians, Tubalines, and Togormians were, together with the Magogians: of which Gog was Prince or chiefe Conductor in their attempts against Israel. For besides the portions of Europe, and the North-east parts of the greater Asia, which Iapheths issues possest, all Asia the lesse was peopled by them. And that those of the issue of Iapheth (whom Ezechiel speakes of) were seated hereabout, it may best appeare, if wee consider the circumstances of the place, and the dependencie vpon the former prophecie in the 37. Chapter. For in that 37. Chapter, Ezechiel prophecieth of the vniting of the two Kingdomes of Israel and Iuda, after their deliuerie from captiuitie.

By which prophecie of Ezechiel, it appeareth, that God purposed to gather together his people, to giue life to dead bones, and to rule them by one Prince. For to that purpose it is written; And DAVID my seruant shall bee King ouer them, and they shall haue one sheepe-heard, (that is) they shall bee vnited as they were in Dauids time. Heereupon in the 38. Chapter Ezechiel prophecieth against those Nations, which should seeke to impeach this Vnion, and disturbe the people of Israel, whom God purposed to receiue to grace, and promised to restore. And so in the same Chapter are those Nations coupled together, which infested the Israelites after their returne, and sought to subiect them: all which were the subiects or Allies of Gog, Prince of the Magogians, or Cœlesyrians, next bordering Palestina, or the holy Land, followed also by the rest of the Nations of Asia the lesse, which lay North from Iudæa. The words of Ezechiel are these: Sonne of man, set thy face against GOG, and against the land of MAGOG, the chiefe Princes of MESECH (or MOSOCH) and TVBAL: and afterward; Behold, I come against the chiefe Prince of MESHECH and TVBAL: and in the sixth Verse; GOMER and all his bands, and the house of TOGORMA of the North quarters. Herein Ezechiel hauing first deliuered the purpose of his Prophecie, teacheth what Nations they were, that should in vaine assaile Israel. He ioyneth them together vnder their Prince Gog, and sheweth that their habitations were on the North quarters of Iuda, and how seated and ioyned together. Gog signifieth in the Hebrew (sayth Saint Hierome) tectum or couering of a house: and Pintus vpon Ezechiel affirmeth, that by Gog is meant Antichrist: for (sayth hee) Antichristus erit Diaboli tegumentum sub specie humana: That Antichrist shall be the couering of the Deuill vnder humane forme. Hee addeth that Magog is as much to say as Gog: the letter (M) being an Hebrew Preposition, and importeth as much as of or from: so he taketh Magog for those people which follow Antichrist. So farre Pintus; at least in this not amisse, that he expoundeth Magog not for any one person, but for a Nation, with which agreeth this obseruation of Beroaldus. Magog (sayth he) in Hebrew is written Ham-Magog, which sheweth Magog to bee a Region or Nation: for the letter (He) which is vsed but for an Emphasis (which the Hebrewes call Heliaedia) is neuer added to proper names of men, but often to place. So as Gog was Prince of that Nation (called eyther Magog, or according to others, the people of Gog) also Prince of Meshech, (or Mosoch) and of Tubal: as by the first Verse of the 39. Chapter is made manifest: Behold, I come against thee GOG the chiefe Prince of MESHECH and TVBAL. This must needes bee meant by the Successours of Seleucus Nicanor, who did not (as other conquering Nations) seeke to make the Iewes their Tributaries onely, but endeuoured by all meanes, and by all kind of violence to extinguish the Religion it selfe (which the Hebrews profest) and the acknowledging of one true God: and to force them to worship and serue the mortall and rotten gods of the Heathen; of which nothing remained but the very name, and dead Images. S. Ambrose and Isidore take Gog for the Nation of the Goths: belike because they inuaded Europe, and sacked Rome, and many other places and Cities thereabout. Hermolaus Barbarus out of Pomp. Mela deriues the Turkes from the Scythians, esteemed Magogians of Gog. Many take Gog for the proper name of a Man: other of a Region: others for a Nation inhabi-inhabiting a Region, as Iunius, who saies that Gog is the name of a Nation, denominated from him whom the Greeke Stories call Gyges: who in former time hauing slaine Candaules the Lydian, gaue his owne name to that Nation, thence after called Gygades: and thereof also the Gygean Lake; which Lake Strabo also findeth in Lydia, (of which Gyges was King) fortie Furlongs from Sardis. Plinie calleth it Gygeum stagnum. Herodotus and Nicander set it about the Riuers of Hyllus, and Mæander; but the difference is not great. Marius Niger maketh mention of this Gyges King of Lydia: who after he had subdued the Countrie about the Riuer Rhodius which runneth into the Hellespont, called the Promontorie Trapese after his owne name Gyges. These opinions doe also seeme to strengthen that of Iunius. For Magog, sayth hee, is that part of Asia the lesse, which Halyattes obtained, and after him his sonne Cræsus; who (as Iunius further notes) hauing mastred all those Regions as farre South as Libanus in that border built the Citie Gigarta or Gogkarta (which in the Syrian signifieth the Citie of Gog) seated in Cælesyria, whose people were the ancient Enemies of the Iewes.

Strab. l. 13. Suid. col. 207. Iun. in Ezech. 38

Now that Magog is found in Cælesyria, Plinie affirmeth, saying; Cælesyria habet Bambycen, quæ alio nomine Hierapolis vocatur, Syris verò Magog. Cælesyria hath in it Bambyce, which by another name is called Hierapolis, but of the Syrians Magog. Hee further telleth vs that the monstrous Idoll Atergatis, called by the Greekes Derceto, was here worshipped, Lucian makes mention hereof, saying that the Citie had anciently another name, which yet hee expresseth not; forbearing perhaps the word Magog, as sounding nothing elegantly in the Greeke. But if wee may beleeue Strabo, then was Edessa in Mesopotamia the same Bambyce or Hierapolis, where the same Idoll was worshipped. Ortelius is doubtfull whether one of these Authours did not mistake the place of this Bambyce or Hierapolis. It may well enough bee that the same name and Religion was common to them both. Certaine it is, that both of them lay due North from Palestina, and were both subiect vnto the Kings of the Race of Seleucus. Now I doe not condemne the opinion of Hermolaus Barbarus following Iosephus, but grant that perhaps Magog might also bee the Father of the Scythians; notwithstanding that in this place, where Gog is made the Prince of Magog, the Nations of Cælesyria and the North parts adioyning bee meant by Magog: for by a latter Plantation from these parts they might bee propagated into Scythia. Yet it is not to bee denied, that the Scythians in olde times comming out of the Northeast wasted the better part of Asia the lesse, and possest Cælesyria, where they built both Scythopolis and Hierapolis, which the Syrians call Magog. And that to this Magog Ezechiel had reference, it is very plaine: for this Citie Hierapolis or Magog standeth due North from Iudæa, according to the wordes of Ezechiel, that from the North quarters those Nations should come. For as the Kings of the South which infested the Israelites were the Ptolomies Kings of Ægypt: so those of the North were the Kings of Asia and Syria, the Successours of Seleucus, the Successour of Alexander Macedon. Gulielmus Tyrius thinkes that this Hierapolis is that Reges, mentioned in the Storie of Tobias. Plinie takes it not onely to haue beene called Bambyce, as we haue said, but also Edessa: not that by Euphrates; but another of the same name; now the knowne name is Allepo: for so Bellonius expounds this Hierapolis, or Magog. This Citie had the title of Sacred, as the Sacred Citie, (for so the word Hierapolis signifieth) yet was it a place of most detested Idolatrie, and wherein was worshipped the Idoll of the Mermaide Atergatis, or Atargatis, according to Plinie, which the Greekes call Derceto.

Lib. 4. cap. de bello Sacro.

If then wee conferre the words of Ezechiel in the third verse of the thirtie eight Chapter, wherein hee ioyneth together Gog Mesech, and Tubal: and withall remember that Hierapolis was the Citie of Magog, which also is seated directly North from Iudæa: with whom also Ezechiel coupleth Gomer, and all his bands of the North quarters; we may (as I conceiue) safely conclude, that these Followers and Vassals of Gog (which were Northerne Nations in respect of Iudæa) were not the Gomeri- ans of France, nor the Tubalines of Spaine, but a people of the lesser Asia, and Cœlesyria: and therefore that the opinions of Berosus, Iosephus, and whosoeuer else hath followed them therein are to bee reiected. But if Iosephus referre himselfe to later times, and thinke that some Colonie of the Tubalines might from Iberia and Asia passe into Spaine (to wit, from that piece of Land betweene Colchis (or Mengrelia) and Albania: (most part possest by the Georgians) then is his iudgement of better allowance. For without any repugnancie of opinions, it may bee granted, that in processe of time these people might from their first habitation passe into the Countries neere the Euxine Sea, and from thence in after-Ages into Spaine.

Iosephus makes mention of the Iberi, saying, that they were anciently called Thobelos, as of Tubal; from whence (saith Iustine) they passed into Spaine to search out the Mines of that Region: hauing belike vnderstood that it was a Southerly Countrie and Mountainous. For it seemeth that the Tubalines called Chalybes liued altogether by the exchange of Iron, and other Metals, as Apollonius witnesseth in these following Verses, telling how the Argonautes did visit them;

Hæc gens tellurem rigido non vertit aratro,
Sed ferri venas scindit sub montibus altis:
Mercibus hæc mutat, quæ vitæ alimenta ministrant:

The Calybes plough not their barren soyle
But vndermine high Hils for Iron Veines:
Changing the purchase of their endlesse toyle
For marchandize, which their poore liues sustaines.

But it is more probable, that Spaine was first peopled by the Africans, who had euer since an affection to returne thither, and to repeople it anew. This appeared by the Carthaginians of old, who were easily drawne to passe ouer the Streights into that Countrie; and after by the Moores who held Granado, and the South parts eight hundred yeeres, till the time of Ferdinand and Isabel. And either of these opinions are more probable, then that in the twelfth yeere of Nimrods raigne, Tubal past into Spaine, and therein built S^t. Ual: a poore Towne, and a poore deuice, God knowes. Certaine it is that we must finde Mosoch or Mesech, and Tubal neighbours, and Gomer and Togarma not farre off, or else we shall wrong Ezechiel: for he called Gog the Leader or Prince of Mesech and Tubal, and maketh Gomer and Togorma their assistants. And that Mesech inhabited Asia, Functius (though he followed Berosus) confesseth, for these be his wordes: MESACVS, qui à MOSE MESECH, priscos Mesios ab Adula monte vsq; ad Ponticam regionem posuit: hæc regio postea Cappadocia dicta est, in qua vrbs Mazica, &c. hæc est terra MAGOG principalis. MESACVS, whom MOSES calleth MESECH, placed the ancient Mesians from the mount Adulas, vnto the coast of Pontus. This Region was afterward called Cappadocia, in which is the Towne Mazica, &c. this is the principall Countrie of MAGOG. And this doth Annius also auow, and yet forgets that Gog was Prince both of Mesech and Tubal: and therefore, that the one was a Nation of Spaniards, the other of Cappadocians, is very ridiculous; Spaine lying directly West, and not North from Iudea. Also Ezechiel in the 27. Chapter, where he prophecieth of the destruction of Tyre, nameth Mesech and Tubal ioyntly. And for a finall proofe, that these Nations were of a Northerne neighbour land (how farre soeuer stretched) Ezechiel in the 38. Chapter makes them all horsemen. Thou, and much people with thee, all shall ride vpon horses, euen a great multitude and a mightie. Then if any man beleeue that these troupes came out of Spaine ouer the Pyrenes, and first passed ouer a part of France, Italie, Hungarie, and Sarmatia, and imbarqued againe about the Hellespont, or else compassed all Pontus Euxinus, to come into the lesser Asia, which is halfe the length or compasse of the then knowne world, he may be called a strong beleeuer, but he shall neuer be iustified thereby. But on the contrarie it is knowne, that Seleucis was a Prouince neighbouring Paleſtina or Iudea, and that Hierapolis (or Magog) ioyned vnto it: whoſe Princes commanded all Syria, and Aſia the leſſe, (namely the Seleucidæ) and held it, till Scipio Aſiaticus ouerthrew Antiochus the Great: after which they yet poſſeſt Syria till the time of Tigranes: and whether Meſhech be in Cappadocia, or vnder Iberia, yet is it of the Tubalines, and one and the ſame Dominion.

Of Gomer the like may be ſaid. Firſt he ſeated himſelfe with Togorma, not farre from Magog and Tubal, in the borders of Syria and Cilicia. Afterward he proceeded further into Aſia the leſſe; and in long tract of time his valiant iſſue filled all Germany, reſted long in France and Brittaine, and poſſeſſed the vtmoſt borders of the earth, accompliſhing (as Melanctan well notes) the ſignification of their parents name, which is Vtmoſt bordering. But when theſe borderers wanted further place, whereinto they might exonerate their ſwelling multitudes, that were bounded in by the great Ocean, then did they returne vpon the Nations occupying the Countries, through which they had formerly paſſed, oppreſſing firſt their Neighbours, afterwards the people more remote. Hereupon it was (as the worthy reſtorer of our antiquities, M. William Cambden hath noted) that they were called Cimbri, which in their old language doth ſignifie Robbers; neceſſitie inforcing them to ſpoile their Neighbours, to whom in their originall they were as neere ioyned, as afterwards in the ſeates which they poſſeſſed. For that the warlike Nations of Germanie were in elder ages accuſtomed to be beaten by the Gaules, the authoritie of Cæſar affirming it is proofe ſufficient. But in times following they purſued richer conqueſts, and more eaſie though further diſtant, by which (to omit their other enterpriſes not here to be ſpoken of) they were drawne at length into Aſia the leſſe, and occupyed thoſe parts, which had formerly beene held by their Progenitors. I ſay not that they claymed thoſe Lands as theirs by deſcent; for likely it is, that they knew little of their owne pedigree. Neither can any man therefore denie, that they were of old ſeated in Aſia, becauſe in late ages they returned thither; vnleſſe he will thinke, that all thoſe Nations which from farre parts haue inuaded and conquered the land of Shinaar, may by that argument be proued not to haue iſſued from thence at the firſt.

Now concerning Samothes for his excellent wiſedome ſurnamed Dis, whom Annius makes the brother of Gomer and Tubal (which brother Moſes neuer heard of, who ſpake his knowledge of Iaphets ſonnes) they muſt finde him in ſome old Poet: for Functius, a great Beroſian, confeſſeth: Quis his SAMOTHES fuerit incertum eſt; Who this SAMOTHES was it is vncertayne; neither is there any proofe that he was that ſame Dis, whom Cæſar ſaith the Gaules ſuppoſe to be their Anceſter; yea, and Vignier confeſſeth with FVNCTIVS: Mais on ne ſçayt qui il eſtoit; No man knowes who he was. In chron. Cæſar Comment. Vigni. pars 1. Chron.

§. V.

Againſt the fabulous BEROSVS his fiction, That the Italian IANVS was NOAH.

BVt before I goe on with Noah his ſonnes, I thinke it neceſſarie to diſproue the fiction which Annius hath of Noah himſelfe: an inuention (indeede) very ridiculous, though warranted (as he hath wreſted) by thoſe Authors of whom himſelfe hath Commented: as the Fragment of Beroſus, Fabius, Victor, Cato, Lauinius and others. For Annius ſeekes to perſwade vs, that Noah (ſurnamed Ianus) was the ſame which founded Genoa, with other Cities in Italie, wherein he lined 92. yeeres. This to diſproue, by Moſes ſilence, is a ſufficient argument to me, if there were nothing elſe to diſproue it. For if he vouchſafed to remember the building of Babel, Erec, Achad, Chalne Ann. de Hetruſ. Picl. de aut. ſæculo. Cato de origin. Lanin. illuſt. de Gall.

Chalne and Ninive by Nimrod, Noah was a man of too great marke to be forgotten, with all the acts he did in 92. yeeres. But it were a needlesse labour for me to disproue the authoritie of that Berosus, on whom Annius groundeth, seeing so many learned Men haue so demonstratiuely proued that Fragment to be counterfeit. Besides that, Tatianus the Assyrian in his Oration against the Greekes auoweth, that the ancient and true Berosus wrote onely three Books, dedicated to Antiochus the successor of Seleucus Nicanor: but Annius hath deuised fiue Bookes, wherewith he honoreth Berosus. And whereas Berosus handled onely the estate of the Chaldeans and Assyrians, Annius hath filled this Fragment with the businesse of all the world: And if we may beleeue Eusebius better then Annius, then all the Kings of the Latines (before Æneas) consumed but 150. yeeres: whereas no man hath doubted, but that from Noah to Æneas arriuall into Italie there past 1126. (after the least rate of the Hebrew account) and (after Codoman) 1291. For Ianus (who was the first of their Kings) liued at once with Ruth, who marryed Booz, in the Worlds yeere (as some reckon) 2717. after the floud 1064. and Noah dyed 350. yeeres after the floud: and so there past betweene Ianus of Italie and Noah surnamed Ianus 704. yeeres. For Saturnus succeeded Ianus, Picus after Saturnus, Faunus after Picus, and Latinus followed Faunus: which Latinus liued at once with Tautanes the 27. King of Assyria; with Pelasgus of Peloponnesus; with Demophoon of Athens; and Sampson Iudge of Israel. Now all these fiue Kings of the Latines hauing consumed but one hundred and fiftie yeeres; and the last of them in the time of Sampson: then reckoning vpwards for one hundred and fiftie yeeres, and it reacheth Ruth, with whom Ianus liued.

True it is, that the Greekes had their Ianus; but this was not Noah: so had they Ion the sonne of Xuthus, the sonne of Deucalion, from whom they draw the Iones, who were indeede the children of Iauan, the fourth sonne of Iapheth. For the vulgar translation (where the Hebrew word is Iauan) writes Greece, and the Septuagint, Hellas, which is the same. So had they Medus the sonne of Medea, whom they make the parent of the Medes, though they were descended of a farre more ancient Father (to wit) Madai the third sonne of Iapheth.

Ezech. 27. 19. 13 & so the place of Esai 66. 19. (for Iauan) Hellada: and (for the plurall Iauanim) Hellene.

Lastly, we see by a true experience, that the Brittish language hath remayned among vs aboue 2000. yeeres, and the English speech euer since the inuasion of the Angles, and the same continuance haue all Nations obserued among themselues, though with some corruption and alteration. Therefore, it is strange if either Noah (by them called Ianus) had left in Italie his grand-child Gomer after him, or Tubal in Spaine, that no plaine resemblance of the Hebrew, Syrian, or Scythian (which no time could haue quite extinguished) should haue beene found in the languages of those Countries. For which reasons we doubt not but these personall plantations of Ianus, Gomer, Tubal, &c. in Italie, Spaine, or France, are meerely fabulous. Let the Italians therefore content themselues with the Grecian Ianus, which commanded them and planted them, and who preceded the fall of Troy but 150. yeeres (saith Eusebius) which was in the time of Latinus the fist King: which also S. Augustine and Iustine confirme: and this agreeth with reason, time, and possibilitie. And if this be not sufficient to disproue this vanitie, I may out of themselues adde thus much: That whereas some of them make Vesta (others Camasena) the wife of this Ianus, who instituted the holy Fire of the Vestal Virgins in Rome (the Latines and Romans taking from Ianus all their Idolatrous and Heathenish ceremonies) there is no man so impious, as to beleeue that Noah himselfe (who is said by Moses to haue walked with God, to be a iust man, and whom God of all mankinde made choice of) could be either ignorant of the true and only God, or so wicked and vngratefull, as that vp or deuise any Heathen saluage, or idolatrous adoration, or haue instituted any ceremonie, contrarie to that which he knew best pleasing to God himselfe.

§. VI.

§. VI.

That GOMER alſo and his ſonne TOGORMA of the poſteritie of IAPHETH were firſt ſeated about Aſia the leſſe: and that from thence they ſpred Weſtward into Europe: and Northward into Sarmatia.

TO turne now to the ſonnes of Noah, and the worlds plantation after the floud: therein I obſerue, that as both reaſon and neceſſitie taught them; ſo, when they multiplyed in great numbers, and diſperſed themſelues into the next Countries bordering to their firſt habitations, & from thence ſent forth Colonies elſewhere, it was in ſuch a manner as that they might repaire to each other, and keep intelligence by Riuer: becauſe the Land was yet Deſart and ouer-preſt with Woods, Reedes, Bogs, and rotten Mariſhes. As when Nimrod ſeated in Babylonia, Chus tooke the South part of Chaldæa, downe the Riuer of Gehon, by which he might paſſe to and fro from Babylon to his owne plantation: thoſe alſo, which were of the race of Shem, inhabiting at Vr or Orchoa neere the Lakes of Chaldæa, might by the ſame Riuer get vp to Babylon, and receiue ſuccour from thence. All which Tract of Land vpon Gehon Southward, Moſes in the deſcription of Paradiſe calleth the Land of Chuſh: becauſe the Dominion and Empire was then in the hands of Nimrod a Cuſhite, by whom the children of Shem (which came into that Valley and ſtayed not in the Eaſt) were for awhile oppreſt, till God afterward by the ſeede of Abraham made them his owne Nation and victorious. Hauilah, the brother of Nimrod, and ſonne of Cuſh, tooke both bankes of Tigris, eſpecially on the Eaſt ſide of the Riuer: by which Riuer his people might alſo paſſe to and fro to Babel.

The Imperiall ſeate of which Region of Hauilah or Suſian, was anciently called Chuſian or Chuſan, afterward Suſa. Cuſh himſelfe tooke the bankes of Gehon, and planted thoſe Countries Weſtward, and Southweſt-ward towards Arabia the Stony, and the Deſart, where Ptolemie placeth the Citie of Chuſidia, firſt Chuſia. Ptol. Aſia, tab. 4

Seba, and Sheba with the reſt that planted Arabia fœlix, had Tigris to conuey them into the Perſian Gulfe, which waſheth the bankes of Arabia fœlix on the Eaſt ſide: ſo as thoſe ſonnes of Cuſh might take Land downe the Riuer as they pleaſed. Alſo the Citie of Niniue was by Nimrod founded on the ſaid Riuer of Tigris; and from thence a Colonie paſt to Charran, ſtanding alſo vpon a nauigable branch of Euphrates. In like manner did Iapheths ſonnes ſettle themſelues together, and tooke their ſeates in Aſia the leſſe: from whence they might indifferently ſtretch themſelues Northward, and Weſtward, into the next parts of Europe, called the Iſles of the Gentiles. And it ſeemeth very agreeable to reaſon, that both Gomer, Magog, and Tubal, ſate downe firſt of all in that part of Syria, to the North of Paleſtina and Phœnicia: and from thence Gomer or his children paſt on into Aſia the leſſe, as thoſe of Magog and Tubal did; from whence the Tubalines ſpred themſelues into Iberia: and the Magogians more Northerly into Sarmatia. The firſt Gomerians, and firſt planters in Aſia the leſſe, held the Countrie of the Cymmerians (witneſſe Herodotus) the ſame Region which was afterward by the Gallo-greekes called Galatia, to whom S. Paul wrote his Epiſtle ſo intituled. This Nation of the Cymmerians (whom the inuincible Scythians afterwards diſperſed, and forced from their firſt plantations) gaue names to diuers places; as to the Mountaynes aboue Albania (called Cymmerini) and to the Citie of Cymmeris in Phrygia: alſo Boſphorus Cymmerius tooke appellation from this Nation, in the out-let whereof was alſo a Citie of that name, called Cymmerian: which Plinie ſaith (miſtaking the place) had ſometime the name of Cerberion; but Cerberion was a Towne in Campania, ſo called of the vnhealthfull waters, ſauouring of brimſtone, which Auguſtus cauſed to be cleanſed by letting in the water of the Lake Lucrinus. Lib. 4.

The

The children of Tubal ranged as farre as Iberia, to whom the Moschici were neighbours, which others write Meshech. The Prophet Ezechiel (coupling them together) calleth Gog the Prince of Meschech and Tubal. For these Meschi (which Ptolemie calleth Moschi) inhabite Syracena a Prouince of Armenia, directly South from the Mountaynes Moschici, in the Valley betweene the Mountaynes Moschici, and the Mountaynes Paryardes: out of whose North part springeth the Riuer Phasis; from the East part Araxis; and from the West Euphrates: and of this Meschech are descended also the Moscouians (saith Melanchton) and it may be, that in processe of time some of them inhabited those Regions also: For Meshech (saith Melanchton) signifieth extendens, enlarging or stretching forth. Togorma also at first did inhabite amongst his parents and kindred. The Togormians were also called Giblei, a people neighbouring the Sydonians in Gabala, a Tetrarchie of Phœnicia, the same which Plinie calleth Gaben: from whence Salomon had his most excellent Masons, which hewed stones for the Temple of Hierusalem. Thence the Togormians stretched into the lesse Armenia, whose Kings were hence called Tigranes, and their Cities Tigranokarta: of which Cities Tigranes subdued by Lucullus the Roman, built one. Hierosolymitanus hath planted the Togormians in Barbarie: forgetting the prophecie of Ezechiel against the Tyrians. They of the house of TOGORMA, brought to thy Fayres horses, and horse-men, and mules, which could not well be driuen ouer the whole length of the Mediterran Sea, but from the neighbour Countries by land. But Iosephus takes them for the parents of the Phrygians; which I doe not denie, but they might be in the ensuing ages: and so might the Tubalines be of the Spaniards; but it was from Iberia, and many hundred yeeres after the twelfth of Nimrods reigne. The Iewes conceiue that the Turkes came of those Togormians, because their Emperor is called Togar. The Chaldæans make them the Fathers of the Germanes. But Laonicus affirmes, that the Turkes descended of the Crim Tartar, which borders Muscouia. But for these subderiuations it were infinite to examine them. Only of the first and second plantation, and of the first Nations after the floud is the matter which I labour to discouer; and therein to open the ignorance of some, and the corruption of other fabulous Writers. And this we must Note, that those grand-children of Noah which were of a more quiet, or (perchance) of lesse vnderstanding, and had not therefore the leading of Colonies sent out, their proper habitations can be hardly knowne: onely reason hath taught vs, that they dwelt among the rest, and were couered with the fame of others, who tooke on them the Conduction and Dominion ouer the rest.

§. VII.

Of IAVAN the fourth sonne of IAPHETH: and of MESCH, of ARAM, and MESHECH of IAPHETH.

OF Iauan the fourth sonne of Iapheth came the Iones, which were afterwards called the Greekes: and so the Latine and Greeke Interpreters for Iauan write Greece, as in ESAY: Et mittam ex iis qui saluati fuerint ad gentes, in mare, in Italiam, & Græciam; And I will send those that escape of them to Nations in the Sea, in Italie and in Greece. The Geneua here vseth the word (Tarshich) for Tarsus, a Citie in Cilicia, though Tarsis in many places be taken for the Sea. The Tigurine and the Geneua vse the names Tubal and Iauan, and not Italie and Greece: keeping the same Hebrew wordes. Of these Iones were the Athenians, though themselues dreame that they were Aborigines, or men without Ancesters, and growing (as it were) out of the soile it selfe: who abounding in people sent Colonies into Asia the lesse, of whom came the Iones of those parts.

parts. Others deriue the Athenians from Ion the ſonne of Xuthus, the ſonne of Deucalion; but the antiquitie of Iauan marres the faſhion of that ſuppoſition, who ſo many yeeres preceded Xuthus, Ion, or Deucalion. Pauſanias tells vs that Xuthus ſtole out of Theſſalie with all his Fathers treaſure, and his Brothers portions, and arriuing at Athens, he was graciouſly receiued by Erictheus, who gaue him his Daughter in marriage; of whom he receiued two ſonnes, Ion, and Achæus, the ſuppoſed Anceſters of the Athenians. For Attica was called Ionia (ſaith Plutarch in the life of Theſeus) who, when he had ioyned Megara to Attica, erected a piller in that Iſthmos or Strait, which faſtneth Peloponneſus to the other part of Greece: writing on that part which looketh towards the Eaſt, theſe wordes: Hæc non ſunt Peloponneſus, aſt Ionia; Theſe Countries are not of Peloponneſus, but of Ionia: and on the other ſide which looked towards the South and into Peloponneſus, this: Theſe parts are Peloponneſus, and not Ionia. Thucyd.

Strabo out of Hecataus affirmeth, that the Iones came out of Aſia into Greece, which is contrarie to the former opinion: That the Iones of Greece tranſporting certayne companies into Aſia the leſſe, the name of Iones was thereby therein retayned. And though Strabo knew no more thereof then he learned of the Greekes themſelues, yet I finde this coniecture of Hecataus reaſonable enough. For though it were to him vnknowne, yet ſure I am that Aſia the leſſe had people before Greece had any: and that Iauan did not flie from Babylonia into Greece, but tooke Aſia the leſſe in his paſſage; and from thence paſt ouer the neereſt way, leauing his owne name to ſome Maritimate Prouince on that ſide, as he did to that part of Greece ſo called. But yet Strabo himſelfe beleeued, that Ionia tooke the name from Ion the ſonne of Xuthus: for ſo much he had learned from themſelues; which was alſo the opinion of Pauſanias. True it is, that the Greekes in after-times caſt themſelues into that part of Aſia the leſſe, oppoſite vnto them, which they held for diuers yeeres. And howſoeuer the Greekes vaunt themſelues to be the Fathers of Nations, and the moſt ancient; yet all approued Hiſtorians (not their owne) deride and diſproue their pride, and vanitie therein. For this diſpute of Antiquitie (among prophane Writers) reſted betweene the Scythians and the Ægyptians, as Iuſtine out of Trogus, in the warre betweene Vexoris of Ægypt, and Tanais of Scythia, witneſſeth: which preceded far the reigne of Ninus, and was long before the name of Greece was euer heard of. And it is alſo manifeſt, that in Cecrops time the Greekes were all ſaluages without law or religion, liuing like brute beaſts in all reſpects: and Cecrops (ſaith S. Auguſtine) liued together with Moſes. Lib. 18. de ciuit. Dei, c. 10.

The ſixth ſonne of Iapheth was Meſhech, whom the Septuagint cal Moſoch: (a part of thoſe Nations commanded by Gog the chiefe Prince of Meſhech and Tubal.) But this we muſt remember, that betweene Meſeth the ſonne of Aram, and Meſhech (or Moſoch) the ſonne of Iapheth, there is little difference in name, and both by diuers Interpreters diuerſly written. Montanus with the Vulgar writeth Meſch, the ſonne of Aram, Mes; the Geneua, Maſh; Iunius, Meſch. But it may be gathered out of the 120. Pſalme, that either Meſhech the ſonne of Iapheth, was the parent of thoſe people, or gaue name to that Prouince wherein Dauid hid himſelfe: or elſe (which may rather ſeeme) that it tooke name from Meſch the ſonne of Aram. For Dauid bewayling his exile (while he liued among a barbarous and irreligious People) vſeth theſe words: Woe is me that I remayne in Meſech, and dwell in the Tents of Kedar: which Iunius conuerteth thus: Hei mihi quia peregrinor tam diù: habito tanquàm Scenitæ Kedareni: The Septuagint giues it this ſenſe: Woe is me becauſe my habitation (or abode) is prolonged, who dwell with the inhabitants of Kedar; with which this of the Latine agreeth: Heu mihi, quia incolatus meus prolongatus eſt, habitaui cum habitantibus Kedar: The Chaldean otherwiſe, and in theſe wordes: O me miſerum, quia peregrinatus ſum Aſianis, habitaui cum tabernaculis Arabum; O wretch, that I am, for I haue trauailed among thoſe of Aſia: I haue dwelt in the Tabernacles of the Arabians. But howſoeuer or which ſoeuer conuerſion be taken for the beſt, yet all make mention of Kedar: which is a Prouince Pſal. 120. v. 5.

of Arabia Petræa; and the Chaldæan putteth Asia in stead of Mesech, but the Hebrew it selfe hath Mesech. And if it be to be taken for a Nation, (as it is most likely, because it answeres to Kedar, the name of a Nation) seeing Mesh the sonne of Aram, 1.*Chron.*17. is called Meshec, it is indifferent whether this Nation tooke name from Meshech or Mesh, both bordering Iudæa, and like enough to be commanded by one Prince; for so Ezechiel makes Mesech and Tubal. But as for those that take Mesech out of the word Mosoch (giuen by the Septuagint) to be the Muscouian: sure they presume much vpon the affinitie of names, as aforesaid. And sure I am that Dauid neuer trauailed so farre North; (for to him Muscouia was vtterly vnknowne) but about the border of Kedar (it may be) he was often in all the time of his persecution: the same being a Citie on the Mountaynes of Sanir or Galaad. And yet Arias Montanus makes Mosoch the father of the Muscouians: and herein also Melanchton runnes with the tyde of common opinion, and sets Mesech in Muscouia, though with some better aduice of iudgement; as, first seated in Cappadocia, and from thence trauailing Northward: expounding the places of the 120.Psalme, (Hei mihi quòd exulo in Mesech) to signifie, Gentis eius feritatem insignem esse; That the feritie of that Nation exceeded: which fierceneſſe or brutalitie of the Muscouians, Dauid neuer proued, or (perchance) neuer heard of. But the same feritie or crueltie which those Northerne Muscouians had, may aswell be ascribed to the Arabians and Kedarens. For this Countrie tooke name of Kedar the second sonne of Ismael, of whom a people of equall fierceneſſe to any of the world were begotten, both in those times and long after, euen to this day (if the Arabians, Ismaelites, and Saracens, may be accounted one people:) the same being foreshewed by the speech of the Angell to Hagar, *Gen.*16. *v.*12. And he shall be a wild man: his hand shall be against euery man, and euery mans hand against him. Now Arabia the Desart (saith Plinie) confronteth the Arabians Cochlei on the East, and the Cedræi Southward, both which ioyne together vpon the Nabathai. So it appeareth (as before) that Mesech, Tubal, Gomer, Togorma, and Magog, neighboured Canaan and Israel, and that Kedar also did ioyne to Mesech: all which were Regions of Syria, or of Asia the lesse, commanded by the Successors of Seleucus, enemies of the reestablishment of Israel and Iuda. But (as I haue alreadie said) it might well be, that long after the first plantation the issue of Mesech (or Mosoch) might passe into Cappadocia, and thence into Hyrcania, and giue names, both to Mazega in the one, and to the Mountaynes Moschici in the other, and from thence might send people more Northerly into Muscouia, and so all opinions saued. But all saluage Nations ouer-growne and vncultiuated, doe (for the most part) shew a late plantation, euen as Ciuilitie, Letters, and magnificent Buildings, witnesse antiquitie.

Gen.25.v.13.

Tiras, the seuenth sonne of Iapheth, which Montanus reckons among the sonnes of Gomer, was the Father of the Thracians, as all Authors (worthie the examination) affirme. Iosephus was the first that determined hereof: and because the Scriptures are altogether silent, what part of the world Tiras peopled, the coniectures are indifferent, and giue no ground at all of dispute. It followeth now to speake of the sonnes of Gomer, which were three:

Montan. in Chr.

Ascanez, Riphath,
and Togorma.

§. VIII.

§. VIII.

of ASCANEZ and RIPHATH, the two elder Sonnes of GOMER.

ASCANEZ was the Father of those which the Greekes call Regini, (sayth Iosephus) but he giues no reason why.

Eusebius makes Ascanez the Father of the Goths. The Iewes in their Thargum make him the root of the Germane Nation, but their exposi-
10 tions are commonly very idle. Plinie findeth Ascania in Phrygia, neere the Riuers of Hylas and Cios: Melanchton being of the same opinion, that the Tuiscones were descended of the Ascanez, (for Tuiscones, sayth hee, is as much to say, as of the Ascanez, præposito articulo die ASCANEZ) and that the word signifieth a Religious Keeper of fire: it being an ancient superstition to pray at the fire of Sacrifices, as afterwards at the Tombes of Martyrs. Not farre from Phrygia was the Lake Ascania, knowne by that name in the Romanes time. And among the Kings which came to the succour of Troy, was Ascanius (Deo similis, sayth Homer) like vnto God: because he was beautifull and strong: for in the same manner doth Virgil grace Æneas, Os humerosq; Deo similis, in face and bodie like one of the Gods. Virgil also remembreth such 20 a Riuer together with the Hils Gargara: as, Illas ducit amor trans Gargara, transq; sonantem ASCANIVM, Appetite leades them both ouer the Mountaines Gargara, and the roring ASCANIVS. But this Plinie maketh more plaine in the description of Phrygia. For he placeth the Citie of Brillion vpon the Riuer Ascanius, which is adioyning to Milia. and is neere the border of the Troian Empire: and the Lake Ascanez he directs vs to find by the description of Prusia, founded by Hannibal at the foot of Olympus, which lyeth farre within the Countries of Bithynia: and then from Prusia to Nicea are accounted fiue and twentie miles, in which way this Lake lyeth, euen betweene Prusia and Nicea. And so Iunius (as I conceiue him) takes them of Ascanez, to bee the inhabitants of Pontus, and Bithynia, and those North parts of Asia. Stephanus de Vrbibus
30 makes it a Citie of Troâs, built by Ascanius the sonne of Æneas: saying, that there was another of that name in Mysia. Of Ascania a Lake of Bithynia, Ptolomie witnesseth: and Strabo giueth Ascania both a Lake, a Riuer, and a Towne in Mysia, neere vnto Cio; which also agreeth with Plinie. For Plinie findeth Prusia (before spoken of) neere Cio, and calleth the Iflands before Troy Ascanes.

Now, whether these places tooke name of Ascanez the sonne of Gomer, or of Ascanius the sonne of Æneas, it might be questioned: sure it is, that Ascanius which brought succour to the Troians, could not take his name from Æneas sonne, who was then eyther exceeding yong, or rather vnborne: and it seemeth that the Countries whence those succours came, were not out of any part of Phrygia or Mysia, but 40 farther off, and from the North parts of all Asia the lesse, which by Hieremie is called Ascanez, by the figure Synechdoche, as Iunius thinketh. Out of those testimonies therefore which deceiue not, we may confidently determine. For of the Prophet Hieremie we shall learne of what Nation the Ascenez were, whose wordes are these: Set vp a Standard in the Land, blow the Trumpet among the Nation against her, call vp the Kings of Ararat, Minni, and Ascanez against her, &c. meaning against the Babylonians. Ararat was Armenia the greater, as most Interpreters consent, so called of the Mountaines of Ararat which runne through it: Minni the lesser Armenia: Armenia being compounded of Aram and Minni. For Minni was the ancient name: (sayth Iunius and others before him) and Aram anciently taken for Syria, which con-
50 tained all that Tract from Euphrates to the Sea-coasts of Phœnicia and Palastina; and therefore Mesopotamia being in elder times but a Prouince of Syria, the Scriptures difference it in the Storie of Iacob and Esau, and call it Aram-padam. Then if these two Nations were of the Armenians, and Ascanez ioyned with them (who altogether vnited vnder Cyrus and Darius, came to the spoile of the Babylonian Empire) we shall erre much much to call Askenaz Germanie or Almaine, for wee heare of no Swart Ruttiers at that siege. But the Askenaz were of those Nations which were either subiect or allied to the Medes: of which, if any of them came afterward into Phrygia, I know not: for the dispersion of Nations was in aftertimes without account. But for the opinion of Eusebius, who makes them to be Goths; or that of Iosephus, who cals them Rhegini; or of the Iewes, who will haue them to be Almaines; when they confirme it either by Scriptures or Reason, I will thinke as they doe.

Of Riphath the second sonne of Gomer there is mention in the first of Chronicles. Beroaldus and Pererius thinke that hee wandered farre off from the rest of his Brothers, and therefore no memorie of his plantation. But I see nothing to the contrarie, but that he might seate himselfe with the rest of his Family: for there wanted no roome or soile in those dayes for all the sonnes and Grand-children of Noah. Therefore I take it to bee well vnderstood, that the Riphei were of Riphath, which the Greekes afterwards (according to Iosephus) called the Paphlagones: and Riphei (sayth Melanchton) signifieth Giants. These people were very famous in the North parts, and in Sarmatia: the most of number and power among them, Sarmatarum gens maxima Heneti, The greatest number of the Sarmatians were the Heneti; who spake the ancient Polac: which being first called Riphei (for the loue of some of their Leaders or Kings) changed their names and became Heneti, (a custome exceeding common in those times) and dwelt first in Paphlagonia, as Homer witnesseth, and so doth Apollonius in his Argonauticks: Now, when these Riphei (afterward Heneti) sought new Regions, they came along the shores of Euxinus, and filled the North part of Europe, contayning Russia, Lituania, and Polonia. From thence they croft thwart the Land, and peopled Illyria, desirous (sayth Melanchton) of a warmer soile of fruit and Wine. These Heneti or Veneti, whom Melanchton taketh to be one people, filled al that Land betweene the Baltick and Adriaticke Sea; and to this day the name of the Gulfe Venedicus is found in Russia. This Nation, after they were possest of Lituania and Polonia, disturbed the plantation of the Boij and Hermondurij. Therefore, it seemeth to mee, that of Riphath came the Riphei, afterward Heneti; and so thinketh Arias Montanus, first seated in Paphlagonia, but in course of time Lords of Sarmatia, and those other parts before remembred, chiefly betweene the Riuers of Vistula and Albis. The name (saith Melanchton) signifieth wandering or Wanderers, or Nomades: a people which liued by White-meates and fruits, as (indeed) all Nations did in the first Ages.

Melanch. in Cation.

Of the third sonne of Gomer, Togorma, I haue spoken alreadie; now therefore of Iauans children, which were foure:

Elisa,
Tharsis, Cethim, Dodanim.

Of the foure Sonnes of IAVAN: and of the double signification of Tharsis, either for a proper name or for the Sea.

OF Elisa or Elipha, came the Æoles: and of this Elisa all the Greekes were called Hellenes, sayth Montanus. Melanchton makes Elisa the Father of the Æoles in Asia side: others of Elis in Peloponnesus, or of both. And seeing the Greekes were descended in generall of Iauan, it is probable that the Æoles and the Elei, tooke name of Elisa, his eldest Sonne. Ezechiel in the 27. speaking of Tyre, nameth the Isles of Elisa. Hyacynthus

V. 7.

& purpura de insulis Elisa facta sunt operimentum tuum: Blue Silke and Purple, brought from the Isles of Elisa, was thy couering: The Chaldæans for Elisa write Italia: but the Vulgar, the Tigurine, the Geneua, and Iunius, keepe the word Elisa: and so I thinke they might doe with reason. For there was not found any such Purple Dye in Italie in those dayes nor since, that I can read of: but those Isles of Elisa, were by a better coniecture the Isles of Greece; and the best Purple was found afterward at Tyre it selfe and before that, among the Cyclades, and on the Coast of Getulia.

Tharsis, the second Sonne of Iauan, inhabited Cilicia, of which Tharsis is the Metropolis. Montanus for Tharsis in Cilicia, vnderstands Carthage in Africa; but (reseruing the respect due to so learned a man) he was much mistaken in that coniecture. The Chaldæan Paraphrast puts Carthage for Tharsis, but it hath no authoritie, nor warrant of reason therein. So likewise, where it is written, that the Ships of Salomon went euery three yeeres to Tharsis, and brought thence Gold, Siluer, Elephants teeth, &c. the Chaldæan Paraphrast translates Tharsis (Africa.) But Salomons Ships were prepared in the Red Sea at Esion Gaber, in the Bay of Elana, neere vnto Madian, where Iethro (Moses Father in Law) inhabited; a Prouince of Arabia Petræa, Idumæa, or of the Chusites; and they sayled to the higher part of the East India. For it had beene a strange Nauigation to haue spent three yeers in the passage betweene Iudea and Carthage, or any other part of Africa, which might haue beene sayled in six or ten daies. And if so great riches might haue beene found within the bounds of the Mediterran Sea, all other neighbouring Princes would soone haue entertained that Trade also. But this enterprize of Salomon is in this sort written of in the first of Kings: Also King SALOMON made a Nauie of Ships in Esion Gaber, which is beside Elath and the brinke of the Red Sea in the Land of Edom: and HYRAM sent with the Nauie his seruants, that were Mariners, and had knowledge of the Sea, with the seruants of SALOMON: and they came to Ophir, and fet from thence 420. Talents of Gold, &c. But as the Nations about Pontus thought no Sea in the World like vnto their owne, and doubted whether there were any other Sea but that only: (whereof it came, that Pontus was a word vsed for the Sea in generall) so, because the Israelites and the Phœnicians knew no other Sea then that of the Mediterran in the beginning; and that the people of Tharsis had the greatest Ships, and were the first Nauigators in those parts with such Vessels, they were therefore called men of the Sea: and the word Tharsis vsed often for the Sea. And whereas it is said that the Ships of Salomon went euery three yeeres to Tharsis, that phrase is not strange at all; for we vse it ordinarily where soeuer wee nauigate, (namely) that the Kings Ships are gone to the Sea, or that they are set out euery yeere, or euery three yeere to the Sea, and therefore Tharsis was not therein named, eyther for Carthage, Africa, or India, but vsed for the Sea it selfe. But in this place Tharsis is truly taken for Tharsis, the chiefe Citie in Cilicia, founded by Tharsis the second sonne of Iauan, or by his Successours in memorie of their first parent. To this Citie arriued Alex. Macedon, before he gaue the first ouerthrow to Darius, and casting himselfe into the Riuer to bathe and wash his bodie, he fell into an extreme Feuer, and great danger of death: and in this Citie of Tharsis was Saint Paul borne. Now this agreeth with the reason and nature of a Plantation. For (Gomer and his other sonnes inhabiting Asia the lesse, and that part of Syria adioyning) Iauan, who was to passe ouer the Sea into Greece, tooke the edge of the same Coast, and first planted the Iones on that shore: gaue the Islands betweene Asia the lesse and Greece, to Elisa, and left Tharsis vpon the Sea-side in Cilicia; of whom that Citie tooke name.

The third sonne of Iauan was Cethim, of whom were the Romans and Italians, saith Berosaldus, but I allow better of Melanchtons opinion, who makes Cethim the Father of the Macedonians. Cethim is a voice plurall (saith he) and signifieth percussores, though in that respect it may be meant by either. But it seemeth more probable, that the place of Esai. 23. (according to Melanchton) had relation to Alexander and the Macedonians: Hæc calamitas ab ESAI prædicta est, qui capite vicessimo tertio inquit, venturos esse euersores Tyri ex terra Cittim, This calamitie (sayth MELANCHTON) was foreshewed by ESAI the Prophet, who in the three and twentieth Chapter pronounced, that the Destroyers of Tyre were to come out of Cittim. And although the children of Israel esteemed all men Islanders, which came vnto them by Sea, and separate from that Continent; (and so also Cittim might be taken for Italie, saith Beroaldus) yet wee must take the first performance of the former Propheſie, which tooke effect with the destruction of the Tyrians by Alexander, who after seuen Moneths siege entred that proud Citie, and cut in pieces 7000. principall Citizens; strangled 2000. and changed the freedome of 13000. others into bondage and slauerie. Now, that Macedon was taken for Cethim, it appeareth plainly in the first of the Maccabees, in these wordes. After that ALEXANDER the Macedonian, the Sonne of PHILIP, went forth of the Land of Cethim, and slew DARIVS King of the Persians and Medes, IOSEPHVS sets Cethim in the Isle of Cyprus, in which (sayth hee) there remaineth the Citie Citium, the Countrey of Zeno the Philosopher (witnesse Laertius) which Citie Pintus vpon Ezechiel affirmeth, that it stood in Saint Hieromes time. So it may be that all the Islands in ancient times by the Hebrewes were called the Islands of Cethim: and in that sense might Cyprus bee so called also; and yet because Tharsis was the very next Port to Cyprus, and directly ouer against it, it is also very probable, that Cethim dwelt by his brother Tharsis: and finding that Island too streight for his people after they were increased, and that the rest of the Coasts, both on Asia side and Greece, were inhabited by his Father and Brothers, he sent Colonies ouer the Ægæan Sea, and inhabited Macedonia.

Dodanim the fourth sonne of Iauan, and the youngest Brother (by the most opinions) sate downe at Rhodes, as neere Cethim, Tharsis, and Elisa, as he could. For Dodanim and Rhodanim are vsed indifferently by many Translators: the Hebrew (D) and the Hebrew (R) are so like, as the one may easily bee taken for the other, as all Hebricians affirme. There is also found in Epirus the Citie of Dodona, in the Prouince of Molossia. And as Cethim, when he wanted soile in Cyprus: so Dodanim (seated in a farre lesse Island) did of necessitie send his people farther off; and keeping alongst the Coast, and finding Peloponnesus in the possession of Elisa, hee passed a little farther on the Westward, and planted in Epirus. And though the Citie of Dodona was not then built, or (perchance) not so ancient as Dodanim himselfe, yet his Posteritie might giue it that name in memorie of their first parent, as it happened all the World ouer. For names were giuen to Cities, Mountaines, Riuers, and Prouinces, after the names of Noahs children, and grand-children; not in all places by themselues, but by their successours many yeeres after: euery of their Families being desirous to retaine among them by those memories, out of what branch themselues were taken, and grafted elsewhere. And becausse great Kingdomes were often by new Conquerers newly named, and the greatest Cities often fired and demolished: therefore those that hoped better to perpetuate their memories, gaue their owne names, or the names of their Ancestors, to Mountaines and Riuers, as to things (after their iudgements) freest from any alteration.

Thus then did Iauan settle himselfe and his children, in the edge and frontier of Asia the lesse, towards the Sea-shore: and afterward in Greece, and the Islands, and neighbour Prouinces thereof, as Iapheth their Father had done in the body of the lesser Asia, together with Iauans brethren, Gomer, Magog, Madai, Tubal, Meschech, and the rest round about him. And in like sort did Chush (the sonne of Cham) people Babylonia, Chaldæa, and the borders thereof towards the West and Southwest: and the sonnes of Chush (all but Nimrod, who held Babylonia it selfe) trauailed Southward in Arabia fœlix, and Southwestward into Arabia petræa: the rest of his children holding the Regions adioyning to Nimrod. Mizraim the brother of Chush in like manner tooke the way of Ægypt: and his brother Canaan the Region of Palestina adioyning. The Sonnes of Canaan had their portions in Canaan, of whom all those Nations came, which were afterward the Enemies both to the Hebrewes, and to those of the sonnes of Shem, which spred themselues towards the West, and the borders of the Mediterran Sea: of which I shall speake hereafter. But first of the sonnes of Cham or Ham, which were foure:

Mizraim, Phut, and

§. X.

That the seate of CHVSH the eldest sonne of HAM, was in Arabia, not in Æthiopia: and of strange Fables, and ill Translations of Scripture, grounded vpon the mistaking of this point.

†. I.

Of IOSEPHVS his Tale of an Æthiopesse wife to MOSES, grounded on the mistaking of the seate of CVSH.

THat Ham was the Father of the Egyptians, it is made manifest in many Scriptures, as in the 105. Psalme verse 51. Then ISRAEL came to Egypt, and IACOB was a stranger in the land of HAM: and in the 78. Psalme, Hee slew all the first-borne in Egypt, euen the beginning of their strength, in the Tabernacles of HAM. There is also found a great Citie in Thebaida, called Cheramis: (as it were the Citie of Ham) of which name Herodotus also discouers an Iland in the same Region. But because Chush is the elder sonne of Ham, it agreeth with order to speake first of him. Now though I haue already in the description of Paradise handled this question, and (I hope) prooued that Chush could not be Æthiopia: yet seeing it commeth now to his turne to speake for himselfe, I will adde some farther proofe to the former. For the manifestation hereof sets many things straight, which had otherwise very crooked constructions, and senseleſſe Interpretations. Surely, howsoeuer the Septuagint and Iosephus haue herein failed, yet it is manifest that Chush could not be Æthiopia, but Arabia: (to wit) both that Arabia called Petræa, and a part of Arabia the Happie and the Desart: which Regions Chush and the Chusites presently planted, after they left Babylonia to Nimrod, wherein they first sate downe altogether. And there is nothing which so well cleereth this Controuersie, as the true interpretation of the place, Num. 12. v. 1. where Moses his Wife is called a Chusite; together with some places which speake of Nabuchodonosors Conquests. For whereas Iosephus and the Septuagint in the place, Num. 12. v. 1. as also elsewhere, vnderstand Chush for Æthiopia, we must giue credit to Moses himselfe herein; and then it will appeare that Iosephus was grosly mistaken, or vainely led by his owne inuention. For Iosephus presuming that Chush was Æthiopia, and therefore that the Wife of Moses (which in Scripture, Num. 12. verse 1. is called a woman of Cush) was a woman of the land of Æthiopia, faineth that Tharbis the Daughter of the King of Æthiopia, fell in loue with the person and fame of Moses, while he besieged Saba her Fathers Citie; and to the end, to obtaine Moses for her Husband, shee practised to betray both her Parents, Countrie, and friends, with the Citie it selfe, and to deliuer it into Moses hands. The Tale (if it bee worth the reciting) lyeth thus in Iosephus. After hee had described the strength of the Æthiopian Citie Meroe, which he saith at length Cambyses called so from the name of his Sister, (the olde name being Saba) he goeth on in these wordes: Hic cùm MOSES de- sidere exercitum otiosum ægrè ferret, hoste non audente manus conserere, tale quiddam accidit. Erat Æthiopum Regi filia, nomine THARBIS, &c. which Tale hath this sense in English: When MOSES was grieued that his Armie lay idle, because the Enemie besieged, durst not sally and come to handy strokes, there happened this accident in the meane while. The Æthiopian King had a Daughter called THARBIS, who at some assaults giuen beheld the person of MOSES, and withall admired his valour. And knowing that MOSES had not only vp-held and restored the falling estate of the Egyptians, but had also brought the conquering Æthiopians to the very brinke of subuersion: these things working in her thoughts, together with her owne affection, which daily increased, shee made meanes to send vnto him by one of her trustiest seruants to offer her selfe vnto him, and become his Wife; Which MOSES on this condition entertained, that shee should first deliuer the Citie into his possession: whereunto shee condescending, and MOSES hauing taken oath to performe this contract, both the one and the other were instantly performed.

†. II.

A dispute against the Tale of IOSEPHVS.

THis Tale (whereof Moses hath not a word) hath Iosephus fashioned, and therein also vtterly mistaken himselfe, in naming a Citie of Arabia for a Citie of Æthiopia: as he names Æthiopia it selfe to haue beene the Countrie of Moses his Wife, when (indeed) it was Arabia. For Saba is not in Æthiopia, but in Arabia, as both Strabo and all other Geographers, ancient and moderne teach vs, saying that the Sabæans are Arabians and not Æthiopians; except Iosephus can perswade vs, that the Queene of Saba which came from the South to heare the wisedome of Salomon, were a Negro, or Blacke-Moore. And though Damianus à Goes speake of certaine Letters to the King of Portugall from Prester Iohn, of the Abissines: wherein that Æthiopian King would perswade the Portugals that hee was descended of the Queene of Saba, and of Salomon; yet it doth no where appeare in the Scriptures, that Salomon had any Sonne by that great Princesse: which had it beene true, it is likely that when Sishac King of Egypt inuaded Roboam, and sackt Hierusalem, his Brother (the Sonne of Saba and Salomon) who ioyned vpon Egypt, would both haue impeached that enterprize, as also giuen aide and succour to Roboam against Ieroboam, who drew from him tenne of the twelue Tribes to his owne obedience. Neyther is it any thing against our opinion of Moses his Wife, to haue beene an Arabian, that the Scriptures teach vs, that Moses married the daughter of Iethro Priest of Midian or Madian: which standing on the North Coast of the Red Sea, ouer against the bodie of Egypt, and neere Esion Gaber, where Salomon prouided his Fleet for India, in the Region of Edom, may well bee reckoned as a part of Arabia, as the Red Sea is called Sinus Arabicus. For Edumæa ioyneth to the Tribe of Iuda by the North, to Arabia Petræa by the East, to the Mediterran by the West, and to the Red Sea by the South-east. And if wee marke the way which Moses tooke when he left Egypt, and conducted Israel thence, it will appeare that hee was no stranger in Arabia: in the border whereof, and in Arabia it selfe, hee had formerly liued fortie yeeres; where it seemeth, that besides his carefull bringing vp in Egypt, hee was instructed by Iethro in the Egyptians learning. For Iosephus confesseth, and Saint Stephen confirmeth, that he was learned in all the wisedome of the Egyptians. But on the other side this Text v.15. makes much against Iosephus, where it is written in Exodus the second, Therefore MOSES fled from PHARAO, and dwelt in the Land of Madian or Midian, and not in Æthiopia. And in the third Chapter it is as plaine as wordes can expresse, in what Region Madian was, where it is written, When MOSES kept the sheepe of IETHRO his Father in Law, Priest of Madian, and draue the Flocke to the Desart, and came to the Mountaine of GOD in Horeb. Now that Mount Horeb is not in Æthiopia, euery Infant knoweth. And if wee may beleeue Moses himselfe, then was not the Wife of

Moses

Moſes purchaſed in that manner which Ioſephus reporteth (which was for betraying her Countrie and Friends) neither had ſhee the name of Tharbis, but of Sippora, or Zippora: neither was ſhee a Negra, but a Madianitiſh. And as God worketh the greateſt things by the ſimpleſt meanes: ſo it pleaſed him from a Sepherd to call Moſes, and after him Dauid, and by them to deliuer his people firſt and laſt. For Moſes ſitting by a Well (as diſconſolate and a ſtranger) defended the daughters of Reguel from the other ſhepherds, and drew them Water to water their ſheepe: vpon which occaſion (by God ordayned) he was entertayned by Iethro, whoſe Daughter he marryed: and not for any betraying of Townes or Countries. Exod.2.

From hence alſo came Iethro to Moſes at Rephidim, not farre from Idumæa, and finding the inſupportable gouernement of ſuch a multitude, he aduiſed him to diſtribute this waightie charge, and to make Gouernours and Iudges of euery Tribe and Familie. And if Iethro had beene an Æthiopian, it had beene a farre progreſſe for him to haue paſſed through all Egypt with the Wife and Children of Moſes, and to haue found Moſes in the border of Idumæa: the Egyptians hating Moſes and all that fauoured him. But the paſſing of Moſes through Arabia Petræa (which ioyneth to Madian) proueth that Moſes was well acquainted in thoſe parts: in which the ſecond time he wandred fortie yeeres, and did by theſe late trauailes of his, ſeeke to inſtruct the children of Iſrael in the knowledge of one true God, before he brought them to the Land of plentie and reſt. For he found them nouriſhed vp with the milke of Idolatrie, and obſtinate in the Religion of the Heathen, and finding that thoſe ſtiffe plants could not be bowed or declined, either by perſwaſion or by miracle, he ware them out in the Deſarts, as God directed, and grafted their branches anew, that from thoſe he might receiue fruit, agreeable to his owne deſire, and Gods Commandements.

Laſtly, this opinion of Ioſephus is condemned by Auguſtinus Chriſamenſis, where alſo he reprehendeth Apollinaris, who auowed that Moſes had marryed both Tharbis and Sephora: His owne wordes haue this beginning: Mentitur etiam APOLLINARIS duas vxores habuiſſe MOSEN, &c. APOLLINARIS alſo lyeth in affirming that MOSES had two wiues: and who doth not perceiue theſe things fayned by them? for it is manifeſt that the wife of MOSES was ZEPHORA, Daughter to the Prieſt or Preſident of Madian: and that Madian cannot be taken for Æthiopia beyond Egypt; being the ſame that ioyneth to Arabia: ſo farre Chriſamenſis. Sixt. Senenſ. Bibl.

†. III.

Chuſh ill expounded for Æthiopia, EZECH. 29. 10.

NOw as Chuſh is by the Septuagint conuerted Æthiopia, and the wife of Moſes there ore called Æthiopiſſa: ſo in the conqueſt of Nabuchodonoſor is Æthiopia written for Arabia. For by the wordes of Ezechiel it is manifeſt that Nabuchodonoſor was neuer in Æthiopia. Behold (ſaith Ezechiel, ſpeaking of the perſon of this great Aſſyrian) I come vpon thee and vpon thy Riuers, and I will make the Land of Egypt vtterly waſte and deſolate, from the Towre of Seueneh, euen to the borders of the Black-moores: which laſt wordes ſhould haue beene thus conuerted: From the Towre of Seueneh to the borders of the Chuſites or Arabians: betweene which two is ſituated all Egypt. For to ſay, from the borders of Seueneh to the Æthiopians, hath no ſenſe at all. Seueneh it ſelfe being the border of Egypt, confronting and ioyning to Æthiopia, or the Land of the black-Moores. So as if Nabuchodonoſors conqueſt had beene but between Seueneh and the border of Æthiopia, it were as much to ſay, and did expreſſe no other victorie then the conqueſt of all that Land and Countrie, lying between Middleſex and Buckingham, where both the Countries ioyne together; or all the North parts of England, betweene Barwick and Scotland: for this hath the ſame ſenſe with the former, if any man ſought to expreſſe by theſe two bounds, the Conqueſt of Ezech.29.10.

England.

England: Barwick being the North border of England, as Seueneh or Syene is the South bound of Ægypt, seated in Thebaida which toucheth Æthiopia. But by the wordes of Ezechiel it appeareth, that Nabuchodonosor neuer entred into any part of Æthiopia, although the Septuagint, the Vulgar, the Geneua, and all other (in effect) haue written Æthiopia for Chusb.

†. IIII.

Another place of EZECHIEL, cap. 30. vers. 9. in like manner mistaken.

AND as the former, so is this place of Ezechiel mistaken, by being in this sort conuerted: In die illa egredientur nuncij à facie mea in triremibus ad conterendam Æthiopiæ confidentiam: Which place is thus turned in English by the Geneuans: In that day shall there Messengers goe forth from me in ships to make the careless Moores afraid. Now the Latine for (ships) hath the Greeke word Trieres for Triremes which are Gallyes of three bankes, and not ships. But that in this place the Translation should haue beene (as in the former) amended by vsing the word Chusb, or Arabia for Æthiopia or the blacke Moores, euery man may see which meanely vnderstandeth the Geographie of the World, knowing, that to passe out of Ægypt into Æthiopia there neede no Galleys nor ships, no more then to passe out of Northampton into Leicestershire: Æthiopia being the conterminate Region with Ægypt, and not diuided so much as by a Riuer. Therefore in this place of Ezechiel it was meant, that from Ægypt Nabuchodonosor should send Galleyes alongst the coast of the Red Sea, by which an Armie might be transported into Arabia the Happy and the Stony (sparing the long wearisome march ouer all Ægypt, and the Desarts of Pharan) which Armie might thereby surprise them vnawares in their securitie and confidence. For when Nabuchodonosor was at Seueneh within a mile of Æthiopia, he needed neither Galley nor Ship to passe into it: being all one large and firme Land with Ægypt, and no otherwise parted from it, then one In-land shire is parted from another; and if he had a fancie to haue rowed vp the Riuer but for pleasure, he could not haue done it: for the fall of Nilus (tumbling ouer high and steepie Mountaynes) called Cataduрæ Nili, were at hand.

Lastly, as I haue alreadie obserued, the sonnes of euery father seated themselues as neere together as possibly they could, Gomer and his sonnes in Asia the lesse; Iauan and his sonnes in Greece, and the Ilands adioyning; Shem in Persia and Eastward. So the Sonnes and Grand-children of Chusb from the Riuer of Gehon (their Fathers first seat) inhabited vpon the same, or vpon some other contiguat vnto it, as Nimrod and Hauilah on the one side, and Saba, Sheba, and Sabtecha (with the rest) did on the other side. And to conclude in a word, the Hebrewes had neuer any acquaintance or fellowship, any warre, treatie of peace, or other intelligence with the Æthiopian blacke Moores, as is alreadie remembred in the Chapter of Paradise.

†. V.

A place, ESAY 18. v. 1. in like manner corrupted, by taking Chusb for Æthiopia.

AND as in these places before remembred, so in diuers other is the word Æthiopia put for Arabia or Chusb, which puts the storie (where it is so vnderstood) quite out of square; one Kingdome thereby being taken for another. For what sense hath this part of Scripture Esay 18. Væ terræ Cymbalorum alarum quæ est trans flumina Æthiopiæ, or according to the Septuagint in these wordes: Væ terræ nauium alarum quæ est trans fluuios Æthiopiæ? Woe to the land shaddowing with wings, which is beyond the Riuers of Æthiopia, sending Ambassadors by sea, euen in vessels of reeds vpon the waters. Væ terræ vmbroſæ oræ; Woe to the Land of the ſhadie coaſt, ſaith Iunius. The former Tranſlators vnderſtand it in this ſenſe. That the waters are ſhaddowed with the ſailes, which are ſignificatiuely called the wings of the ſhips, the other, that the Coaſt of the Sea was ſhaddowed by the height of the Land.

But to the purpoſe: That this Land here ſpoken of by the Prophet Eſay, is Egypt, no Interpreter hath doubted. For they were the Egyptians that ſent this meſſage to the Iſraelites, which Eſay repeateth, and by the former tranſlation euery man may ſee the tranſpoſition of Kingdomes: for hereby Egypt is tranſported vnto the other ſide of Æthiopia, and Æthiopia ſet next vnto Iudæa, when it is the Land of Chuſh and Arabia indeed that lyeth betweene Iudæa and Egypt, and not Æthiopia, which is ſeated vnder the Equinoctiall line. And of this Beroaldus asketh a materiall queſtion, (to wit) what Region that ſhould be, of which the Prophet ſpeaketh, and placeth it beyond the Riuers of ÆTHIOPIA: Nam de ignota aqi regione dici nequit; For it cannot be ſaid that he treateth of an vnknowne Region. Now if Æthiopia it ſelfe be vnder the Equinoctiall line, with whom the Iewes had neuer any acquaintance, why ſhould any man dreame that they had knowledge of Nations farre beyond it againe, and beyond the Riuers of Æthiopia? except we ſhall impiouſly thinke that the Prophet ſpake he knew not what, or vſed an impertinent diſcourſe of thoſe Nations, which were not diſcouered in 2000. yeeres after, inhabiting as farre South as the Cape of good Hope, commonly knowne by the name of Bona eſperanza.

†. VI.

That vpon the like miſtaking, both TERRHAKA in the ſtorie of SENACHERIB, and ZERA in the ſtorie of ASA are vnaduiſedly made Æthiopians.

AND by this tranſlation is the ſtorie of Senacherib vtterly miſtaken in the cauſe of his retrait. For Senacherib was firſt repulſed at Peluſium, at the very entrance of Egypt from Iudæa: when hauing certayne knowledge that Thirrhaca, (which all the Interpreters call King of Æthiopia) was on the way to ſet on him, he began to with-draw himſelfe: and fearing to leaue his Armie in two parts, he ſent threatning Meſſengers to Ezechia King of Iuda, perſwading him to ſubmit himſelfe: the Tenor whereof is ſet downe in the ſecond of Kings in theſe wordes: Haue any of the gods of the Nations deliuered his Land out of the hands of the King of Aſſur? Where is the god of Hamah? &c. By which proud Ambaſſage, if he had obtayned entrance into Hieruſalem, he then meant to haue vnited that great Armie before Hieruſalem, commanded by Rabſekeh, with the other which lay before Peluſium, a great Citie vpon the branch of Nilus next Arabia. For Senacherib had alreadie maſtered the moſt part of all thoſe Cities in Iudæa and Beniamin with a third Armie, (which himſelfe commanded) being then at the ſiege of Lebna. But vpon the rumor of that Arabian Armie led by their King Thirrhakeh (whom Ioſephus calls Tharſices) Rabſakeh haſted from the ſiege of Hieruſalem, and found Senacherib departed from Lachis & ſet downe before Lebna, which was afterwards called Eleuthoropolis, as ſome haue ſuppoſed. But while he had ill ſucceſſe at Peluſium and feared Thirrhakeh, God himſelfe whom he leaſt feared, ſtrooke his Armie before Hieruſalem by the Angell of his power, ſo as 185000. were found dead in the place, as in the life of Ezechias is hereafter more largely written. And that this Armie of Tirrakeh was from Arabia, Ioſephus himſelfe makes it plaine. For he confeſſeth in the tenth Booke the firſt Chapter of the Iewes Antiquities, that it was come to Senacheribs knowledge, that the Armie which was afoote (both to releeue the Ægyptians and the Iewes) marched towards him by the way of the Deſart: Now the Deſart which lay indifferent betweene Hieruſalem and Peluſium, was that of Pharan or Sur, which alſo toucheth on the three Arabiaes, to wit, the Stonie, of which it is a part: the Deſart, and the Happy; and by no other way indeede deede could the Arabians come on to succour either Pelusium or Hierusalem. But, that there is any Desart betweene Pelusium and the South part of Egypt, hath neuer yet beene heard of, or described by any Cosmographer or Historian. So then this Scripture of the second of Kings, Verse the ninth, hath the same mistaking as the rest. For here the word (Chush) is also translated Æthiopia; and in this sense haue all the Interpreters, (but Iunius) expressed the beginning of the ninth Verse: He heard also men say of THIRRHAKEH King of Æthiopia, &c. whereas it should haue beene thus conuerted with IVNIVS: Audiens autem de THIRRHAKEH Rege Chusi; Hee heard also of THIRRHAKEH King of the Chusites. For they were the Chusites and Arabians, whose Houses and Cities were next the fire, and vpon whom the very smoke of Iuda flaming was blowne, being their neerest Neighbours: and so were not the Æthiopian blacke-Moores vnder the Equinoctiall, whom neither warre nor peace (which discouereth all Regions) euer found out, saith Plinie. For this King was no more King of Æthiopia then Zerah was, who inuaded Asa King of Iuda, with an Armie of a Million and three thousand Charriots. Indeed, how such an Armie and those Charriots should passe through all Egypt, (the Kings of Egypt being mightie Kings) let all men that know how these Regions are seated, and how farre distant, iudge. For Princes doe not easily permit Armies of a Million to runne through them; neither was there euer any such strength of Black-Moores heard of in that part of the World, or elsewhere. Neither are these Æthiopians such trauailers or Conquerors; and yet is this King Zerah also called King of Æthiopia. But the word Chush being first so conuerted for Æthiopia, the rest of the Interpreters (not looking into the seates of Kingdomes, or the possibilities of attempts, or inuasions) followed one another in the former mistakings.

A farther exposition of the place, ESAY 18. 1.

CONcerning these wordes in that eighteenth Chapter of ESAY, Nauium alarum; Winged ships, (so the Septuagint turne it) or Cymbalo alarum (according to the Latine) sayles whistling in the windes, or terræ vmbrosæ oræ (after IVNIVS) the Land of a shaddowed coast, or the Land shaddowing with wings, as our English Geneua hath it. The two first interpretations of the Septuagint and S. Hierome haue one sense in effect. For the sailes are commonly called the wings of a ship; and we vse to say ordinarily when our ships saile slowly, that shee wanteth wings: (that is) when her sailes are either worne or too narrow; and we also vse the same phrase of the winde whistling in the sailes. And it may be that the Egyptians employed so many of those small ships, as their sailes were said to giue a shaddow ouer the Red Sea. But to make both interpretations good, Pintus (vpon Esay) affirmeth, that the word (Sabal) doth signifie both to shaddow and to gingle (which is) to make a kinde of Cymbaline sound: so as the meaning of this place (saith Pintus) is this: Woe to thee, O Egypt, which doest promise to others safegard, vnder the shaddow of thy wings, which (indeede) seemeth to agree with the argument of the eighteenth Chapter of Esay: and this phrase is often elsewhere vsed, as in the sixteenth Psalme: Sub vmbra alarum tuarum protege me; Defend me vnder the shaddow of thy wings. The Boates of reede spoken of are of two kindes; either of basket-willow couered with hides (as anciently in Brittaine) or a Tree made hollow in the bottome, and built vpon both sides with Canes. Of the one sort I haue seene in Ireland, of the other in the Indies.

Of the plantation and antiquities of Egypt.

†. I.

That MIZRAIM the chiefe planter of Egypt, and the reſt of the ſonnes of HAM, were ſeated in order, one by another.

THe ſecond ſonne of Ham was Mizraim, who (according to the place of a ſecond brother) was ſent ſomewhat farther off to inhabite. For Chuſh firſt poſſeſt Chaldæa on the Weſt ſide of Gehon chiefly: and from thence, as he increaſed in people, ſo he entred Arabia, and by time came to the border of the Red Sea, and to the South-eaſt-ſide of Iudæa. Mizraim his brother (with Phut) paſt ouer into Africa. Mizraim held Egypt: and Phut (as a third brother) was thruſt farther off into Mauritania. Canaan tooke the Sea-coaſt, and held the ſide of Paleſtina: and theſe foure brothers poſſeſt all that Tract of Land, from Gehon in Chaldæa, as farre to the Weſt as the Mediterrane Sea: comprehending all Arabia Deſerta, and Petræa, all Canaan which embraceth Galilæa, Samaria, and Iudæa; with the two Egypts, whereof the nether is bounded by Memphis on the South, and by the Mediterrane Sea on the North: and Thebaida (called the vpper Egypt) ſtretcheth it ſelfe toward the South as farre as Syene, the border of the Æthiopians or black-Moores. All the reſt of the coaſt of Africa Weſtward Phut peopled; which brothers had not any other Nation or Familie that dwelt betweene them. And in the ſame manner did all their ſonnes againe, and all the ſonnes of the reſt of Noahs children, ſort themſelues.

†. II.

Of the time about which the name of Egypt began to be knowne: and of the Egyptians Lunarie yeeres, which made their antiquities ſeeme the more fabulous.

THis flouriſhing Kingdome poſſeſt by Mizraim, changed her ancient name, and became Egypt, at ſuch time as Ægyptus (otherwiſe Rameſſes, as ſome thinke) the ſonne of Belus, chaſed thence his elder brother Danaus, ſhifting him into that part of Greece now called Morea, by whom the Argiues were made Danai, abandoning their proper names: which happened 877. yeeres after the floud, in the time of Ioſua, as S. Auguſtine coniectureth out of Euſebius. But in Homers Odyſſes it appeareth that the Egyptians were ſo called at the time of the Troian Warre. And before this, Egypt was knowne by diuers other names, as Oceana, Aria, Oſiriana, &c. And Manethon (whom Ioſephus citeth in his firſt booke againſt Appion) numbreth all the Kings of Egypt after Moſes departure, who conſumed 393. yeeres. By which other men coniecture, that the Egyptians tooke on them that name 330. yeeres after Ioſua, and about 1000. yeeres after the floud. But where Ioſephus in the ſame booke taketh Iſrael to be thoſe Hycſos, which he alſo calleth Paſtores or Shepherds, which are ſaid to haue reigned in Egypt 511. yeeres: whom alſo he calleth his Anceſters, (meaning the Anceſters of the Iewes) in this I am ſure he was groſly deceiued, or that he vainely boaſted: for the Iſraelites had no ſuch Dominion as Manethon fayneth: nor abode in Egypt ſo long a time by many yeeres.

Of the Egyptian Antiquities there are many fancies in Trogus, Herodotus, Plato, Diod. Siculus, Mela, and others. For they affirme (ſaith Pomp. Mela) that there had reigned in Egypt 330. Kings before Amaſis, who was contemporarie with Cyrus; and and that they had memorie and ſtorie of 13000. yeeres; and that the Starres had foure times changed their courſe, and the Sunne twice ſet in the Eaſt. Theſe Riddles are alſo rife among the Athenians and Arcadians, who dare affirme, that they are more ancient then Iupiter and the Moone, whereof Ouid:

De Faſt. l. 1.

Ante Iovem genitum terras habuiſſe feruntur
Arcades: & Lvna gens prior illa fuit.

The Arcadians the earth inhabited
Ere yet the Moone did ſhine, or Iove was bred.

But for thoſe 13000. yeeres it may well be true: ſeeing it is certayne that the Ægyptians reckon their yeeres by Moneths, which makes after that account not aboue 1000. or 1100. yeeres, whether we take their Moneths or Lunarie yeeres to haue beene of the firſt kinde of 27. dayes and eight houres; or otherwiſe 29. dayes and twelue houres; or after any other of thoſe fiue diuerſities of their Lunarie yeeres.

†. III.

Of certayne vaine aſſertions of the Antiquitie of the Ægyptians.

Gerardvs Mercator in his Chronologie, reaſoneth for the Ægyptians Antiquitie in this manner: That the ſixteenth Dynaſtie (where Euſebius begins to reckon the Ægyptians times) had beginning with the generall floud: and that therefore the firſt of the other fifteene reached the Creation, or ſoone after it. To which coniecture of Mercator, Pererius maketh this anſwere. That therein Mercator was firſt deceiued, becauſe he taketh it for granted, that the beginning of the ſixteenth Dynaſtie was at once with the generall floud: which Euſebius maketh 292. yeeres after, and in the time of Abraham. Secondly, Mercator maketh the beginning of the ſhepherds Dynaſtie (being in number the 17.) in the time of their firſt King, Saltis, to haue beene in the yeere of the World 1846. which Euſebius findeth in the Worlds age 2140. For the 16. Dynaſtie was begunne but in the 292. yeere after the floud, as they account, and continued 190. yeeres. Thirdly, whereas Mercator maketh euery Dynaſtie to endure 115. yeeres, Euſebius reckoneth many of them at leſſe then 100. yeeres: for the 28. had but ſixe yeeres; the 29. but 20. and the 30. but 18. yeeres.

Now Annius in his Supplement of Manethon affirmeth, That all theſe 15. Dynaſties laſted but 162. yeeres: and that the firſt of the 15. beganne but in the 131. yeere after the floud: ſo as where Mercator makes all the 15. to precede the floud, and the 16. to haue beene then in being at the time of the floud, Annius makes them all after it. But the contrarietie of falſhood cannot be hidden, though diſguiſed. For Annius had forgotten his former Opinion and Aſſertion, that it was in the 131. yeere that Nimrod with the ſonnes of Noah came into the Valley of Shinaar: ſo he forgets the time which was conſumed in the building of Babel: and that before the confuſion of Speech there was no diſperſion, nor farre-off plantation at all. And though he haſtily conueyed Gomer into Italie, and Tubal into Spaine, in the 101 yeere of Nimrods reigne: (which was ten yeeres after his arriuall into Babylonia) yet herein he is more vnaduiſed. For he makes Ægypt poſſeſt, and a gouernement eſtabliſhed in the very firſt yeere of the arriuall of Nimrod into Shinaar, before all partition, or any expedition farre off or neere in queſtion: for from thence (that is, from Babel) did the Lord ſcatter them vpon all the earth.

†. IIII.

†. IIII.

Against PERERIVS: that it is not vnlikely, but that Ægypt was peopled within 200. yeeres after the Creation; at least, that both it, and the most parts of the World were peopled before the Flood.

BVT whereas Pererius seeketh to ouerthrow this Antiquitie of the Ægyptians touching their Dynasties, (which Eusebius doth not altogether destroy, but lessen) I doe not find any great strength in this opinion of Pererius; (to wit) that it was eyther vnlikely or impossible that Ægypt should be peopled within 100. or 200. yeeres after Adam, in the first Age. And whereas he supposeth that it was not inhabited at all before the generall Floud, I doe verily beleeue the contrarie: and that not only of Ægypt, but the better part of all the World was then peopled: Pererius his words are these: Quomodò enim primos mundi ducentos, vel etiam centum annos ADAMI proles adeò multiplicari potuit, vt ad Ægyptum vsq; habitandum & complendum propagata sit, &c. For how could the children of ADAM bee so multiplied in the first two hundred, or in the first hundred yeeres of the World, and so propagated as to inhabite and fill Ægypt? for allowing this (saith Pererius) wee must also confesse, that there were then both the Assyrians, and other Nations.

Now seeing that the Scriptures are silent herein, and that it is no point of our saluing beleefe, it is lawfull for euery man to bee guided in this and the like questions by the best reason, circumstance, and likelihood; and herein, as in the rest, I protest that I doe not gainsay any mans opinion out of any crossing or cauelling humour: for I thinke it the part of euery Christian, rather to reconcile differences, where there is possibilitie of vnion, then out of froward subtletie, and preiudicate resoluednesse, to maintaine factions needlesse, and dangerous contentions.

First therefore, to this opinion, that Ægypt was not planted so soone after Adam, no, not at all before the Floud, I say that there is no reason why wee should giue a lesse increase to the sonnes of Adam, then to the sonnes of Noah. For their length of life, which exceeded those which came after the floud double; & (after a few yeeres) treble, is an infallible proofe of their strength and abilitie, to beget many Children: and at that time they obserued no degrees of kindred, nor consanguinitie. And that there was a speedie increase of people, and in great numbers, it may in some sort appeare by this, that Cain, who (being fearefull that the death of Abel would haue beene reuenged on him) withdrew himselfe from the rest, which were afterward begotten, and dwelt in the Land of Nod, and there, by the helpe of his owne issues built a Citie, (called Enoch) after the name of his first borne. Now if it bee gathered that Nimrod came into the Valley of Shinaar with so many multitudes, as sufficed to build the Citie and Towre of Babel: and that to this increase there was giuen but 130. yeeres by Berosus, and after the account of the Scriptures (reckoning, as it is commonly vnderstood, by the birth of Arphaxad, Selah, Heber, and Phalegh) but one hundred and one yeere: I see no cause to doubt, but that in the infancie of the first age, when the bodies of men were most perfect, euen within 130. yeeres, the same (if not a greater) number might be increased; and so within 70. yeeres after (that is, by such time as the World had stood 200. yeeres) aswell Assyria, Syria, and Ægypt might be possest before the Floud, as they were within the same or lesse time after it. Neyther doth it agree with the circumstance or true Storie of the Babylonian and Assyrian Empire, that all those people, which were increased in the first hundred or 130. yeeres after the Floud, came into Shinaar and Babylonia. For that euer Noah himselfe came out of the East, as there is no Scripture or Authoritie to prooue it, so all probable coniecture and reason it selfe denies it. Againe, those multitudes and powerfull numbers, which Semiramis (but the third from Nimrod) found in India, considered with her owne Armie of three Millions, (and shee left not all her Kingdomes emptie) doe well prooue, that if the World had such plentie of people in so few yeeres after the Floud, it might also bee as plentifully filled in like time before it. For after their owne account Ninus gouerned Babylonia and Assyria but 292. yeeres after the Floud of Noah. And these Troupes of Semiramis were gathered out of all those Easterne Kingdomes, from Media to the Mediterran Sea; when there had now past from the Floud to the time of this her inuasion, somewhat lesse or more then 360. yeeres: for much more time the true Chronologie cannot allow; though I confesse, that in respect of the strange greatnesse of Semiramis Armie, and the incredible multitudes gathered, this is as short a time as can well bee giuen. And if but the one halfe be true of that which is said, That her Armie consisted of 1300000. Footmen, and 500000. Horsemen, it must needes bee, that long before Semiramis Raigne, the greatest part of Asia (whence her huge Armie was gathered) was full of people: yea Arabia it selfe (much part whereof is barren) must long before this time of Semiramis haue beene plentifully peopled; when Ninus hauing a determination to make himselfe Master of all Nations, entred (notwithstanding) in League with the King thereof: whom therefore he eyther feared, or sought his assistance. And if Arabia were then so well repleniſhed, I see no cause but Ægypt might also be peopled. Now if we may beleeue Trogus Pompeius (Epitomiz'd by Iustine) Ægypt was a most flouriſhing and magnificent Nation before Ninus was borne. For these be his owne wordes, speaking of NINVS. Fuêre quidem temporibus antiquioribus VEXORIS Rex Ægypti, &c. But there were in times more ancient VEXORIS King of Ægypt, and TANAIS King of the Scythians: of which the one inuaded Pontus, the other Ægypt. And how full of people all that part of the World was, the Conquests of Ninus witnesse, who subdued with no small force the Armenians, the Medes, and afterwards the Bactrians; yea, all that whole bodie of Asia on this side India. For Diodorus out of Ctesias numbreth the Armie, wherewith Ninus inuaded Zoroaster, at 1700000. Footmen, and 200000. Horsemen: and the Stories generally shew, that though Zoroasters Armie was farre short of this, yet it was greater then any that those parts of the World euer since beheld. But to what end should I seeke for forraine authoritie? for no man doubteth but that Ægypt was possest by Mizraim, the sonne of Ham; and that it was an established Kingdome, filled with many Cities in Abrahams time, the Scriptures tell vs. And sure to prepare and cultiue a desolate and ouergrowne ground, to beautifie it with many Cities, Lawes, and Policies, cannot be esteemed a labour of a few dayes: and therefore it must bee inhabited in a lesse time then 200. yeeres after the Floud; and in the same time (if not in a shorter) before the Floud. For if so many Millions of men were found within 300. yeeres after the generall Floud; so as not only Babylon, and Assyria, Bactria, Armenia, Media, Arabia, Ægypt, Palæstina, yea the farre-off Lybia on the one side, and India on the other, and Scythia (inferiour to neyther) were all filled: into what small corners could then all those Nations be compreſt, which 1656. yeeres brought forth before the Floud? euen necessitie, which cannot be resisted, cast the abundance of mens bodies into all parts of the knowne World; especially, where Death forbare the Father, and made no place for the Sonne, till he had beheld liuing Nations of his owne bodie.

†. V.

Of some other reasons against the opinion of PERERIVS.

FOR what a strange increase did the long liues of the first Age make, when they continued 800. or 900. yeeres. Surely, we haue reason to doubt, that the World could not containe them, rather then that they were not spred ouer the World. For let vs now reckon the date of our liues in this Age of the World: wherein if one exceed 50. yeeres, tenne for one are cut off in that passage, and yet wee find no want of people; people; nay, wee know the multitude ſuch, as if by warres or peſtilence they were not ſometimes taken off by many thouſands, the earth with all the induſtrie of man could not giue them food. What ſtrange heapes then of ſoules had the firſt Ages, who enioyed 800. or 900. yeeres, as aforeſaid? Theſe numbers, I ſay, cannot bee counted nor conceiued. For it would come to the ſame reckoning in effect, as if all thoſe which haue beene borne in Brittaine ſince 3. or 4. hundred yeeres before the Norman Conqueſt (ſauing ſuch as by accident or by violence were cut off) were now aliue; and if to theſe there were added as many as by Polygamie might haue beene increaſed. For (to omit, that the Giants and mightie ones of the firſt Age obſerued no law of Matrimony) it is to be thought that thoſe Louers of the world and of pleaſure, when they knew the long and liberall time which Nature had giuen them, would not willingly or haſtily preſent themſelues to any danger which they could flye from or eſchew. For what humane argument hath better perſwaſion to make men careleſſe of life, and feareleſſe of death, then the little time which keepes them aſunder, and that ſhort time alſo accompanied with ſo many paines and diſeaſes, which this enuious olde Age of the World mingleth together, and ſoweth with the ſeeds of Mankind?

Now if that Beroſus or Annius may be alleaged for ſufficient Authours, whom Pererius himſelfe in this queſtion citeth, then is it by them affirmed, and by Ioſephus confirmed, that the Citie of Enoch was ſeated neere Lybanus in Syria: and it other parts of Syria were peopled in Cains time, I ſee no cauſe why Palæſtina (which is alſo a Prouince of Syria) and Ægypt (which neighboureth it) could bee left deſolate both all the life time of Cain, and all thoſe times betweene his death and the Floud, which were by eſtimation 700. or 800. yeeres. And ſure though this Fragment of Beroſus with Annius his Comment bee very ridiculous in many places (the ancient Copies being corrupted or loſt) yet all things in Beroſus are not to bee reiected. Therefore Saint Hierome for ſuch Authours giues a good rule. Bona eorum eligamus, vitemus contraria; Let vs chooſe what is good in them, and reiect the reſt. And certainly in the very beginning of the firſt Booke, Beroſus agreeth (in effect) with Moſes, touching the generall Floud: and in that firſt part Beroſus affirmeth, that thoſe mightie men and Giants which inhabited Enoch, commanded ouer all Nations, and ſubiected the vniuerſall World: and though that phraſe (of all the World) bee often vſed in the Scriptures for a part thereof; as in the ſecond of the Acts, That there were dwelling at Hieruſalem Iewes: men that feared God of euery Nation vnder Heauen: yet by wordes which follow in Beroſus, it is plaine that his words and ſenſe were the ſame: for hee addeth from the Sunnes riſing to the Sunnes ſetting, which cannot be taken for any ſmall part thereof. Againe, wee may ſafely coniecture, that Noah did not part and proportion the World among his ſonnes at aduenture, or left them as Diſcouerers, but directed them to thoſe Regions which he formerly knew had beene inhabited. And it cannot be denyed that the earth was more paſſable and eaſie to trauaile ouer before the Floud, then after it. For Pererius himſelfe confeſſeth, that Attica (by reaſon of mudde and ſlime which the water left vpon the Earth) was vninhabited 200. yeeres after Ogyges Floud, whereby wee may gather that there was no great pleaſure in paſſing into farre Countries after the generall Deluge, when the earth lay (as it were) incopſed for 100. or 130. yeeres together. And therefore was the face thereof in all coniecture more beautifull, and leſſe cumberſome to walke ouer, in the firſt Age then after the generall ouerflowing.

†. VI.

Of the words of MOSES, GEN. 10. v. vltimo, whereupon PERERIVS grounded his opinion.

LAstly, whereas Pererius drawes this Argument out of the last Verse of the tenth of Genesis, And out of these were the Nations diuided after the Floud: Quo significatur talem diuisionem non fuisse ante diluuium, By which it appeareth (sayth Pererius) that there was no such diuision before the Floud; which hee also seeketh to confirme out of the eleuenth of Genesis, because the diuision of tongues was cause of the dispersion of the people. This consequence, quo significatur, &c. seemeth to me very weake: the Text it selfe rather teaching the contrarie: for out of these (sayth MOSES) were the Nations diuided in the earth after the Floud; inferring, that before the Floud the Nations were diuided out of others, though after the Floud out of these only. But whatsoeuer sense may be gathered from this place, yet it can no way bee drawne to the times before the Floud, or to any Plantation or diuision in that Age: for if there were none else among whom the earth could bee diuided after the Floud, but Noahs Sonnes, wherein doth that necessarie diuision controule the planting of the World before it? And whereas it is alleaged that the confusion of speech was the cause of this dispersion, it is true, that it was so for that present; but if Babel had neuer beene built, nor any confusion of Languages at all, yet increase of people and time would haue enforced a farther-off and generall Plantation: as Berosus sayes well, that when Mankind were exceedingly multiplyed, Ad comparandas nouas sedes necessitas compellebat, They were driuen by necessitie to seeke new Habitations. For we find (as is before said) that within 300. yeeres after the Floud, there were gathered together into two Armies, such multitudes as the Valley about Babylon could not haue sustained those numbers with their increase for any long time: all Asia the greater and the lesser; all Scythia, Arabia, Palæstina, and Ægypt, with Greece, and the Ilands thereof; Mauritania and Lybia being also at that time fully peopled. And if we beleeue Berosus, then not only those parts of the World, but (within 140. yeeres after the Floud) Spaine, Italie and France were also planted: much more then may wee thinke, that within 1656. yeeres before the Floud, in the time of the chiefe strength of Mankind, they were repleniſhed with people. And certainly seeing all the World was ouerflowne, there were people in all the World which offended.

Lib. 3.

†. VII.

A conclusion, resoluing of that which is most likely, touching the Ægyptian Antiquities: with somewhat of PHVT (another Sonne of HAM*) which peopled Lybia.*

THerefore, for the Antiquitie of the Ægyptians, as I doe not agree with Mercator, nor iudge with the Vulgar, which giue too much credit to the Ægyptians Antiquities: so I doe not thinke the report of their Antiquities so fabulous, as either Pererius or other men conceiue it. But I rather incline to this, That Ægypt being peopled before the Floud, and 200. or 300. yeeres, more or lesse after Adam, there might remaine vnto the Sonnes of Mizraim some Monuments in Pillors or Altars of stone or metall) of their former Kings or Gouernours: which the Ægyptians hauing added to the list and Roll of their Kings after the Floud, in succeeding time (out of the vanitie of glory or by some corruption in their Priests) something beyond the truth might be inserted. And that the memorie of Antiquitie was in such sort preserued, Berosus affirmeth it of the Chaldæans, and so doth Epigenes. For they both write that the vse of Letters and the Art of Astronomie was knowne to the Babylonians 3634. yeeres before Alexanders Conquest: and this report Annius findeth to agree agree and reach to the time of Eneſh, who was borne 1034. yeeres before the Floud, and wrote of the Worlds deſtruction, both by Water and Fire; as alſo of Chriſt his comming in iudgement, as Saint Iude hath witneſſed. But leauing theſe Antiquities to other mens iudgements, and euery man to his owne reaſon, I will conclude this Plantation of Ægypt. It is agreed by all, that it was peopled by Mizraim, and that it tooke the name of Ægypt from Ægyptus the ſonne of Belus, as aforeſaid. Being diuided into two Regions, that part from Memphis or Nicopolis to the Mediterran Sea, was called the inferiour Ægypt; ſurnamed alſo Delta: becauſe the ſeuerall branches of Nilus breaking aſunder from one bodie of the Riuer, gaue it the forme of the Greeke letter Delta, which is the forme of a Triangle. That branch, which ranne toward the North-eaſt and imbraced the Sea, next vnto the Deſarts of Sur and Pharan, had on it the Citie of Peluſium, where Senacherib was repulſed: The other branch, which yeelded it ſelfe to the Salt-water towards the North-weſt, is beautified by that famous Citie of Alexandria: The vpper part of Ægypt is bounded btweene Memphis and Syene neere Æthiopia, and had the name of Thebaida, of that ancient Citie of Thebes, which (according to Homer) was adorned with 100. Gates: and therefore called Ciuitas centum portarum; and by the Greekes Dioſpolis; in the Scriptures No-hamon, which ſignifieth multitudes of Inhabitants, exceeding beliefe. Ioſephus cals Ægypt Merſin of Mizraim: and Herodotus affirmes that it had once the name of Thebais. Ioſ. l. 1. Ant. c. 7. Herod. Euterpe.

Phut the third ſonne of Ham tooke the next portion of Land to his other Mizraim, and inhabited Lybia: whoſe people were anciently called Phutei; (ſayth Ioſephus) and Plinie mentioneth the Riuer Fut in Mauritania: which Riuer from the Mountaine Atlas (knowne to the Inhabitants by the name of Dyrus) hee maketh to bee diſtant the ſpace of two hundred miles. It alſo appeareth in the thirtieth Chapter of Ezechiel, that Phut, Chuſh and Lud were contermini and Aſſociates with the Ægyptians. L. 5. c. 1.

§. XII.

Of the eleuen ſonnes of CANAAN, the fourth ſonne of HAM.

†. I.

Of the bounds of the Land of Canaan: with the names of his eleuen ſonnes.

CANAAN (the fourth ſonne of Ham) poſſeſt all that Region called by the Romanes Palæſtina; in the Scriptures Galilæa, Samaria, and Iudæa; in the latter times knowne by the name of the Holy Land and Iurie: the limits whereof are preciſely ſet downe by MOSES, Geneſis the tenth, Then the border of the Canaanites was from Zidon as thou goeſt to Gerar vntill Azzah, and as thou goeſt vnto Sodome and Gomorha, and Admah, and Zeboim, euen vnto Laſha. Now howſoeuer theſe words of the Hebrew Text (as thou goeſt) be conuerted, Moſes meaning was that Gerar was the South bound of Canaan and Zidon the North; Sodome and Gomorha the Eaſt, and the other Cities named ſtood on the Frontiers thereof. For Gerar ſtandeth in a right Line from Gaza in the way of Ægypt, the vttermoſt Territorie of Canaan Southward: and this was properly the Land of Canaan.

Now the ſonnes of Canaan which poſſeſt this Countrie, and inhabited ſome part of the borders thereof, were in number eleuen:

1. Zidon.
2. Heth or Chethus.
3. Iebusi or Iebusæus.
4. Emori or Emoreus, or Amoreus.
5. Girgeshi or Girgeseus.
6. Heui or Chiueus.
7. Arki or Harkeus.
8. Seni or Sinæus.
9. Araadi or Aruadæus.
10. Zemari or Samareus, or Tzemareus.
11. Hamathi or Hamatheus, or Chamathæus.

Of which the most renowned were the Hethites, Gergesites, Amorites, Heuites, Iebusites, and Perizzites: which Perizzites were descended of Zemari or Samareus, or from some of his.

†. II.

Of the portions of ZIDON and HETH.

ZIDON the first borne of Canaan, built the famous Citie of Zidon in Phœnicia, which afterward fell in partition to the Tribe of Asser: for Asser, Zabulon, and Nephtali had a great part of the ancient Phœnicia distributed among them; but the Asserites could neuer obtaine Zidon it selfe.

The second sonne of Canaan was Heth or Cethus: of whom came the Hethites, or Hittites, one of those seuen principall Nations (Commanders of Canaan) appointed by God to bee rooted out; namely, the Gergesites, the Amorites, the Canaanites, the Perizzites, and Heuites, and the Iebusites. The Hittites inhabited about Bersabe, and towards Hebron neere the Torrent Besor, and about Gerar, which Moses maketh the vttermost limit of Canaan, hauing the Desart of Pharan to the South: for about Bersabe (otherwise Puteus iuramenti) foure miles from Gaza dwelt Heth and his Posteritie, as farre to the Northeast as Hebron, and Mamre; and of Ephraim the Hittite did Abraham buy the field of Sarahs buriall. Of which Nation Rebecca bewailed her selfe to Isaac, saying, That shee was wearie of her life for the Daughters of HETH. The Giants Anakim were of these Hittites, a strong and fierce Nation, whose entertainment by the Kings of Israel against them the Syrians greatly feared: as in the fourth of the Kings; Israel hath hired against vs the Kings of the Hittites.

†. III.

Of the Iebusites and Amorites.

IEBVSÆVS, the third sonne of Canaan, of whom came the Iebusites, and whose principall seat was Iebus, (afterward Hierusalem) were also a valiant and stubborne Nation, and held their Citie and the Countrie neere it, till such time as Dauid by Gods assistance recouered both: yet were not the Iebusites extinguished, but were Tributaries to Salomon.

Amoreus was the fourth sonne of Canaan, of whom the Amorites tooke name, who inhabited that Land to the East of Iordan below the Sea of Galilee, hauing Arnon and the Mountaines of Galaad on the East, and Iordan on the West: of whom Og (King of Basan) and Sihon (ouerthrowne by Moses) were Princes.

The Amorites had also many other habitations dispersed within the bounds of Canaan: as behind Libanus in the edge of Cœlesyria, or Syria Libanica. They had also their their being in the Mountaynes of Iuda, and in Idumæa neere the Metropolis thereof, called Duma. And hereof it came that all the Canaanites were sometime called Amorites: as in Geneſis the fifteenth: For the wickedneſſe of the Amorites is not yet full. And that this was also a powerfull Nation, we finde in the Prophet AMOS: Yet deſtroyed I the Amorite before them, whoſe heighth was like the heighth of a Cedar, and he was ſtrong as the Okes. Deut.1. Num.13. Amos 2.

†. IIII.

Of the Gergeſites, Heuites, and Harkites.

THe fift ſonne of Canaan was Gergeſeus or Gergeſion, (otherwiſe Girgaſi) who inhabited on the East ſide of the Lake of Tiberias, or the Sea of Galilee, where Ptolemie ſets the Citie Geraſa, which Ioſephus calls Geſera in the Territorie of Decapolis. Here it was that CHRIST diſpoſſeſt the poſſeſſed with Deuills; and the Gergeſites deſired him to depart their Coaſts: becauſe their Swine filled with the euill ſpirits, drowned themſelues in the Sea of Galilee. Gergeſeus alſo built Berytus (ſometime Geris) afterward Fælix Iulia, three miles from the Riuer Adonis in Phœnicia: in which the Romanes held a Garriſon: and to which Auguſtus gaue many large priuiledges.

Heueus the ſixth ſonne; and Father of the Heuites, inhabited vnder Libanus neere Emath. Theſe Heuites, howſoeuer the Caphthorim expelled a good part of them (as in Deuteronomie the ſecond is remembred) yet many of them remayned all the warre of Ioſua, and afterward to the time of Salomon. For God was not pleaſed vtterly to roote out theſe Nations, but they were ſometimes made Tributaries to the Iſraelites, and at other times ſerued (in their falling away from the true worſhip of God) to afflict them: for as it is written, Iudges the third: They remayned to proue ISRAEL by them, whether they would obey the Commandements of God.

The ſeuenth ſonne was Araceus or Harki, who betweene the foote of Libanus and the Mediterran Sea, (ouer againſt Tripolis) built the Citie of Archas, Arce, or Arca, afterwards Arachis.

†. V.

Of SINI and ARVADI.

SINEVS the eighth ſonne, Hieroſolymitanus ſets at Caparorſa, which Ptolemie findes in Iudæa, not farre from Iebus; to the South thereof, ſaith Iunius. But it is more probable, that Sineus founded Sin, which S. Hierome calls Sim; Ptolemie, Simyra: Mela and Plinie, Simyrus: Brochard, Sycon, (called Synochis) neere Arca. Pererius thinkes that Sineus inhabited the Deſarts of Sinai or thereabout; but hereof there is no other certaintie then the report of Brochard, who tooke view of all theſe places, affirming, that Sineus built Synochis, as Zidon built Zidon. There is alſo another Nation of Cini (written with the letter C. otherwiſe Kenæi) who deſcended of Hobab the ſonne of Raguel the Madianite, who aſſiſted the Iſraelites in their conduction through the Wilderneſſe of Pharan. But theſe Cinæi were admitted among the Iſraelites, and had a portion of Land with the Nephtalims, beſide their habitations with the Amalekites: againſt theſe Cinæi, Balaam prophecied, that they ſhould be deſtroyed by the Aſſyrians. Iudg.4. Ioſua 19.33.

The ninth ſonne was Aradeus or Aruadeus, who in the Ile of Aradus built the Citie Arados: oppoſite againſt which Iland on the Maine of Phœnicia, they founded another Citie of that name, which for oppoſition was afterwards called Antaradus. To this Citie came S. Peter (ſaith Clement) and in this Ile preached the Goſpell, and founded a Church in honor of our Lady: but we finde no ſuch worke Gul.Tyr. Vitria.

of his in the Acts of the Apostles. Both these two were very famous, and places of skilfull Sea-men: whom Ezechiel remembreth in his prophecies against the Tyrians.

Cap.7. v.8. The Inhabitants of Zidon and Aruad were thy Mariners.

†. VI.

Of ZEMARI.

OF Samareus, or Zemari, the tenth sonne, there are diuers opinions. Some thinke that he first inhabited in Cœlesyria at Edessa, and founded Samaraim, which in Iosua is placed in the Tribe of Beniamin. There is also Samaraijm (of the same Orthographie) vpon the Mountaynes of Ephraim (saith Beroaldus) mentioned in the second of *Chronicles c.*13.*v.*4. which the Latine conuerteth amisse (saith he) by Semeron. The Hierosolymitan Paraphrast makes Samareus (of whom were the Perizzites) the parent of the Emissani, which Plinie calls the Hemisceni, in Cœlesyria; and it may be that it was their first habitation, and that they afterwards inhabited those other places before remembred. But that they founded Samaria, both the Hebrew Orthographie, and this place in the first of Kings (speaking of Omri) disproueth: And he bought the Mountayne Samaria or Shemeron of one SHEMER, for two talents of siluer, and built in the Mountayne: and called the name of the Citie which he built, after the name of SHEMER, Lord of the Mountayne Samaria. But of all these places I shall speake more at large in the conquest of the holy Land, by the children of Israel. Of whomsoeuer the Samaritanes were descended, sure I am, that they were euer a perfidious Nation, and base: for as long as the state of the Iewes stood vp, they alwayes called themselues Iewes: when it suffered or sanke, they then vtterly denyed to be of that Nation or Familie; for at such time as they were returned from their first captiuitie, they became a mixt Nation; partly of the Colonies of the Assyrians; and partly of the naturalls.

†. VII.

Of HAMATHI.

THe last of Canaans sonnes was Hamatheus, or (according to the Hebrew) Hamathi, of Hamath: (saith Beroaldus) of which (the aspiration taken away) the same is pronounced Emath, whereof Hamatheus was parent. Iosephus and S. Hierome confound Emath with Antioch, not that Antioch which standeth on the Riuer Orontes, on the frontier of Comagena, betweene the Mountayne Casius and the Prouince of Pieria, and Seleucis, of which S. Peter was Bishop, and in which S. Luke and Ignatius were borne: but Antioch, surnamed Epiphania, as Beroaldus supposeth, which standeth betweene Apamea and Emesa in Cassiotis. Yet, indeede, Emath cannot be taken for either: for both that Antioch vpon Orontes, and that which neighboureth Emesa, are farther off seated from Canaan, then euer any of those Nations straggled. And whereas S. Hierome setteth Emath, which he confoundeth with Epiphania, in the Tribe of Nephtali; it is manifest, that Epiphania, which standeth to the North of Emesa, hath all the Prouince of Laodicea, betweene it and any part of the Land diuided. And if Libanon it selfe were not shared among the Tribes, then could not Epiphania belong vnto them: for both the Prouinces Laodicea and Libanica, are betweene Epiphania and any part of the holy Land: and therefore Emath so taken could not be a part of Nephtali, as in the thirteenth of Iosua is directly proued. For Iosua counting the lands that remayned vnpossest, reckoneth all Mount Libanon towards the Sunne-rising, from Baalgad vnder mount Hermon, vntill we come to Hamath. And this reason (among others) is vsed, that Emath was not in Nephtalim, or any way belonging to the children of Israel: because Dauid accepted the presents of Toha King of Emath, and (therewithall) conditions of peace: which he would not haue done, if that Territorie had euer belonged to the children of Iſrael, but would haue recouered it without compoſition, and by ſtrong hand, as he did the reſt. But this Argument (as I take it) hath no great waight. For if the promiſe which God made, be conſidered, as it is written in Deuteronomie, then might Emath be comprehended, though ſeated altogether without the bounds of the Land promiſed, according to the deſcription of Moſes and Ioſua: for Emath is indeede ſituate on the other ſide of the Mountayne of Hermon, which ioyneth to Libanus: and is otherwiſe called Iturea. But whereas Hamath is named in Ioſua the 19. v. 35. and written in the Latine conuerſion Emath, therein (ſaith Beroaldus) was S. Hierome miſtaken. Emath or Iturea is that ouer the Mountaynes, and the Citie in Nephtalim ſhould be written Hamath: and ſo the Septuagint (vnderſtanding the difference) write it Ammath and not Emath, the ſame which indeede belonged to the Nephtalims, ſeated on the South ſide of Libanus, to the Eaſt of Aſſedim: which Citie S. Hierome writes Emath; Ioſephus, Hamath; others, Emathin, or Amatheos, and the people Amathein; of which (as I take it) Rabſakeh vaunteth in the ſecond of KINGS: Where is the god of Hamath? Cap. 11. v. 24. Cap. 18. & 19.

Tohu

§. XIII.

Of the ſonnes of CHVSH (excepting NIMROD*) of whom hereafter.*

The ſonnes of Chuſh were, { Seba, Hauila, Sabta, Raama, Sabteca, Nimrod. } And the ſonnes of Raama were, { Sheba, and Dedan. }

†. I.

That the moſt of the Sonnes of CHVSH were ſeated in Arabia the Happy: and of the Sabæans that robbed IOB: and of the Queene that came to SALOMON.

SEBA or Saba was the eldeſt ſonne of Chuſh, the eldeſt ſonne of Ham, to make a difference betweene Him and his Nephew Sheba, the ſonne of his brother Raama, or Regma (or Ragma after Montanus) his name is written with a ſingle (S) Samech, and Sheba the ſonne of Regma with an (S) aſperate, which is the Hebrew Schin. Seba the eldeſt ſonne of Chuſh, Regma his brother, and Sheba the ſonne of Regma poſſeſt both the ſhores of Arabia Fœlix. Saba tooke that part toward the Red Sea, as neereſt his Father Chuſh, and the Land of the Chuſites: Regma and Sheba the Eaſt coaſt of the ſame Arabia, which looketh into the Gulfe of Perſia; of which PLINIE: Sabæi Arabum populi propter thura clariſſimi ad vtrag, maria porrecti is gentibus habitant; The Sabæans people of Arabia, famous for their Frankincenſe, extending their Nations, dwell along both the Seas, (to wit) the Perſian, and the Arabian, or Red Sea. This Countrie was afterwards called Arabia, à populi mixtione, ſaith Poſtellus. To this agreeth Ptolemie, who ſetteth the Citie of Saba towards the Arabian or Red Sea, and the Citie Rhegama towards the Perſian, with whom alſo we may leaue Sabta: for ſo much Montanus gathereth out of Ptolemie, becauſe he remembreth a Nation (called Stabæi) neere the Perſian Sea; and Maſſabatha which deſcended of them. But Montanus hath ſent Regma, or (as he calls him Rahma) into Carmania, for which I ſee no reaſon. Ioſephus, who only attended his owne fancies, hath baniſhed Saba or Seba to the border of Æthiopia.

But

But Beroaldus thinkes it ſtrange, that the Sabæi, which ſtole away Iobs Cattle, ſhould runne through all Egypt, and all Arabia Petræa, and finde out Iob in Traconitis, betweene Palæſtina and Cœleſyria 1200. miles off. Now, as this coniecture was more then ridiculous, ſo doe I thinke, that neither the Sabæi on the Red Sea, nor thoſe toward the Perſian Sea, could by any meanes execute the ſtealth vpon Iob, which ſoeuer Beroaldus ſhall take for neereſt. But theſe were the Sabæi of Arabia the Deſart, where Guilandinus Melchior affirmeth out of his owne experience, that the Cittie Saba is ſeated: the ſame which Ptolomie calls Saue, now Semiſcaſac: and from this Saba in Arabia the Deſart, came thoſe Magi or Wiſemen which worſhipped Chriſt, ſaith Melchior, whoſe wordes are theſe: The Magi came neither out of Meſopotamia (as Chryſoſtome, Hierome, and Ambroſe ſuppoſed) nor out of Arabia the Happie, as many wiſe men doe beleeue, but out of Saba in Arabia the Deſart: which Citie when my ſelfe was there, was (as I iudged it) called Semiſcaſac. And to approue this opinion of Guilandinus, it appeareth that theſe Shabæi were neighbours to Iob, and lay fit to inuade and rob him. For both the other Nations (aſwell thoſe on the Perſian Sea, as thoſe on the Red Sea) are ſo diſioyned with large Deſarts, as there is no poſſibilitie for ſtrangers to paſſe them, eſpecially with any numbers of Cattle, both in reſpect of the mountaines, of the ſands, and of the extreme want of water in thoſe parts: Vbi nec homines, nec beſtiæ videntur, nec aues, imò nec arbores, nec germen aliquod, ſed non niſi montes ſaxoſi, altiſſimi, aſperrimi; Where there are found neither men, nor beaſts, no not ſo much as birds, or trees, nor any paſture or graſſe, but onely ſharpe, and high ſtonie, and craggie mountaines. Beroaldus and Pererius conceiue, that the Queene of Saba which came to viſite Salomon, was of the Sabæi on the Eaſt ſide of Arabia Fœlix; but the contrarie ſeemeth more probable, and that ſhee was Queene of Saba towardes the Red Sea: for Salomon at that time commanding all that part of Arabia Petræa, twixt Idumæa and the Red Sea, as farre downe as Midian or Madian, and Ezion Gaber: and this Queene of Saba which inhabited the Weſt part of Arabia Fœlix, being his neighbour, might without any farre trauaile enter his Territories, free from all danger of ſurpriſe by any other Prince or Nation.

But to auoid tediouſneſſe, it is manifeſt that Seba or Saba, Sabta, Raama, or Regma, with his Sonnes Sheba and Dedan, and Sabteca, were all the poſſeſſors of Arabia the Happie, and the Deſart: onely Hauilah and Nimrod dwelt together on the Eaſt ſide Chuſh, who held Arabia Petræa. Now for Sabta, there is found of his name the Cittie of Sabbatha or Sabota in the ſame Arabia: of which both Plinie and Ptolomie; who withall nameth Sabotale, within the walls whereof there were ſometimes found ſixtie Temples. Ezechiel ioyneth the Father and the Sonne together, The Merchants of Sheba and Raama were thy Merchants. And that they were the Eaſterne Arabians their merchandiſe witneſſeth, formerly repeated in the Chapter of Paradiſe. For Ioſephus his fancies, that Saba was the parent of the Æthiopians about Meroe, and Sabta of the Æthiopians Aſtabari, they bee not worthie any farther anſwere then hath already beene giuen: eſpecially ſeeing theſe Citties preſeruing the memorie of the names of Saba, and of Sabta in Arabia were yet remaining in Ptolomies time, though in ſome letters changed. As alſo in the coaſtes adioyning, the names of other of the brethren of the familie of Cuſh, with little alterations are preſerued. In Arabia the Deſart is found the Cittie Saba or Saue, (now Semiſcaſac) with the Cittie of Rhegana for Rhegma; and the Nation by Ptolomie himſelfe called Raabeni of Raamah. In Arabia the Happie is found the Cittie of Rhegama, and Rabana; which alſo keepeth the ſound of Rhegma, the Cittie of Saptha or Saptah, not far from the Eaſt coaſt of Arabia: as alſo the Metropolis and chiefe Cittie in the body of the South part of Arabia, called without difference or alteration Sabatha; and to the Weſt of Sabatha towards the Red Sea the great Cittie of Saba; and the Nation adioyning, Sabei: & to the South thereof againe toward the ſtreight entrance of the Red Sea, the Region of Sabe. To all theſe his Brothers and Nephewes which were ſeated on the Eaſt ſide of Arabia, Hauilah by the paſſage of Tigris was a neighbour, to whom he might paſſe by Boate IOSEPHVS his opinion of DEDAN, one of the issue of CHVSH to haue beene seated in the West Æthiopia, disproued out of EZECH: and HIEREMIE.

AND whereas Iosephus (whom in this S. Hierome followeth, as not curious herein) sent Dedan the sonne of Raamah into West Æthiopia, it is strange that Ezechiel should couple Sheba, Raamah, and Dedan together; Dedan in the 15. Verse, and Sheba, and Raamah in the 22. Verses to be the Merchants of Tyre, if Dedan had dwelt in West Æthiopia, which is distant from Raamah and Sheba (the habitation of his father and brother) aboue 4000. miles. Besides which the merchandise that the Dedanites brought to Tyre doth not make them naked Black-mores. For they of Dedan (saith Ezechiel) were thy Merchants in precious clothes for thy Charriots; and these Westerne Æthiopians neuer saw cloth, till the Portugals seeking those Coasts traded with them: the merchandise of the Countrie being Hides, Elephants teeth, some Gold and Amber, Giuet Cats, and Rice, but nothing at all of any manufacture: and all these they exchanged for linnen, or yron chiefly. Cap. 27.

But in those dayes the West part of Africa within the body of the land was known onely by imagination: and, being vnder the burnt Zone was held vninhabitable. And therefore that the Negros of the West Æthiopia, which inhabite about Serra Liona, or Niger, could either passe by Sea or Land to Tyre in the bottome of the Mediterran Sea, were a strange, or rather a foolish fancie. Now to put it out of dispute that Dedan also dwelt by the rest of the children of Chush, which seates they held by that name in the time of Hieremie the Prophet, let vs heare Hieremie his owne words: Fly, yee Inhabitants of Dedan, for I haue brought the destruction of ESAV vpon him. Hereby it appeareth that Dedan was a Neighbour to the Idumæans: and Idumæa is a Prouince of Arabia Petræa: and Dedan which dwelt on the North part of Arabia Fœlix, ioyned in that part to Petræa, the seat of his Grand-father Chush; which neighbourhood and fellowship of Dedan and the Idumæans, is also confirmed by Ezechiel: I will stretch out mine hand vpon Edom, and destroy Man and Beast out of it, and I will make it desolate from Teman: and they of Dedan shall fall by the sword. Ier. 49. 8. §. XIIII.

Of the issue of MIZRAIM: and of the place of HIEREMIE, Chap. 9. Vers. 7.

AFter Chush it followeth to speake of Mizraims sonnes, whose names (saith Saint Augustine) were plurall, to signifie the Nations, which came of them. Ludim, the eldest sonne of Mizraim, was the father of the Lybians in Africa: and the rest of his brothers dispersed themselues into all Regions adioyning. Among the sonnes of Shem there is also Lud; but he is differenced from Lud the sonne of Mizraim by the singular number: the sonne of Shem being written Lud, the sonne of Mizraim, Ludim: and yet these Names and Nations are often confounded, notwithstanding the apparent difference both of Names and Nations. For that Ludim the sonne of Mizraim was the parent of the Lybians in Africa, and that he was seated not farre from Mizraim his father, appeareth by the Prophet Hieremie, who ioyneth them in this sort together: Come vp ye Horses, and rage ye Charriots, and let the valiant men come forth, the Black-moores, and the Lybians which beare the shield: for those Nations assisted the Ægyptians being of one one parent descended. And in Ezechiel, Phut and Lud are ioyned together. Æthiopia (or Chush) saith Ezechiel c. 30. v. 5. And PHVT and LVD, and all the common people, and the men of the Land that are in league shall fall with them by the sword: which is as much to say, as the sonnes of Chush; (which were the Chusites) the sonnes of Mizraim, which were the Ægyptians) and the Lybians (descended of his sonne Lud) with other the inhabitants of Ægypt and Africa shall fall together. Hieronymitanus findes also in Africa a Nation of the Lydians. And I beleeue it: because Hieremie ioyneth the Lybians and Lydians together in the place before remembred. But Lybia in Africa is by the Hebrewes called Ludim (saith Arias Montanus) though 2. Chron. 12. 3. they seeme to be called Lubim or Lubai, a name somewhat neerer the word Lybies, and by which it may seeme that the truer writing is, not Libyes, but Lybies. Neither is it here to be omitted, that Pintus (vpon the thirtieth of Ezechiel) vnderstandeth that which is spoken in the third Verse of Lud, not to be meant of the Libyans at all: for he will haue this threatning to be meant against the people of Lyda, a Citie (saith he) betweene Ægypt and Palæstina, which opinion I could not mislike if the Citie of Lyda were so seated. But Lyda (which should be written Lydda with a double D, and is the same Citie which was afterward Diospolis, in which S. Peter cured Æneas of the palsey) standeth neere the Torrent Gaas, not farre from Ioppe the Port of Hierusalem. Yet it is not impossible but that this Citie might haue Lud for the Founder. For there are many Cities of one name founded in all the Regions of the World, and farre asunder; as after the names of Alexander, Seleucus, and Antiochus, many Cities called Alexandria, Seleucia, and Antiochia, so of diuers others. S. Hierome maketh Lehabim to be the Father of Libya, who was the third sonne of Mizraim: and so doth Postellus; and either opinion may be true.

The termination im in the Hebrew, is commonly a signe of the plurall number, as aim of the dual.

The rest of Mizraims sonnes haue no proper Countries giuen them in the Scriptures, sauing Casluhim and Caphtorim, of whom came the Philistims, whom the Scriptures call Peleset.

These Casluhim inhabited Cassiotis, a Region lying in the entrance of Ægypt from Palæstina, in which the Lake Sirbonis, and the Mountayne Cassius are found: not farre from whence Pompey was buried.

Caphtorim seated neere Casluhim in that Tract of Ægypt called Sethroitis, not farre from Pelusium. Strabo calls it Sethroitis; Stephanus and Plinie, Sethroites, of the Citie Sethron: which Ortelius takes to be the same which Ptolemie calls Hercules parua. Of the Casluhim and Caphtorim came the Philistims, which are called by the Septuagint Allophyli (which is) Alienigenæ, Strangers, or of a strange kindred. These Philistims inhabited the South part of the holy Land towards Ægypt, of whom Palæstina tooke name. For the Hebrewes (saith Isidore) doe not vse the letter (P) but in stead of it (ph.) Their principall Cities were Gaza, Ascalon, Azotus, Geth, and Accaron: and the people of them called Gasæi, Ascalonitæ, Azotij, Gethæi, and Accaronitæ. Isidore affirmes, that Ascalon was first called Philistim: and of that Citie the Countrie adioyning. But where Isidore had it, I know not.

The first knowne King of the Philistims was that Abimelech, who had a liking to Abrahams wife; with whom Abraham made a couenant and league. This Abimelech dwelt indeede at this time in Gerar; but it is written that he was also King of the Philistims, in these wordes: Wherefore ISAAC went to ABIMELECH King of the Philistims vnto Gerar. Now in regard that this or some ancienter Abimelech gouerned the commonwealth greatly to his glorie, the rest of his successors called themselues by the same name. The Philistims commanded that Tract of land vpon the Mediterran Sea to the Northward, from the Castle of Pilgrims (otherwise Cæsarea Palæstinæ, or Stratons Towre) which was the South-border of Phœnicia, to Gasa, or to the Riuer of Ægypt. The Anakims or strong Gyants were of these Philistims: and Goliah was of Geth one of the fiue Cities aboue named. They had sometimes fiue Kings, saith Lyranus. They mastered the Israelites at seuerall times aboue 150. yeeres, and kept them Tributaries, till they were weakened by Sampson and Samuel, but in the end this yoke was taken off by Dauid, and laid on themselues.

It is obiected, that because these Cities and the Countries adioyning, were held by the sonnes of Mizraim, therefore did the Israelites dispossesse the sonnes of Mizraim, and not of Canaan, by forcing those places.

To this saith Pererius, that although the Palæstines or Philistims held it in the time of Iosua, yet at the time of the promise it was possest by the Canaanites; as in the second of Deuteronomie. The Heuites dwelt in the Villages vnto Gaza. And what maruaile, if (the Canaanites being the greater part) the denomination were from them? For that the Philistims were of Caphtor, and so of Mizraim and not of Canaan, besides Moses the Prophet Hieremie witnesseth: The Lord will destroy the Philistims, the remnant of the issue of Caphtor: and in like manner in the ninth of Amos, the Philistims are said to be the reliques of Caphtorim; Haue not I brought vp ISRAEL out of the Land of Ægypt, and the Philistims from Caphtor, and ARAM from Kir? so I reade this place with diuers of the learned. For whereas the Vulgar hath, & Palæstines de Cappadocia, & Syros de Cyrene, this conuersion Beroaldus condemneth; where Caphtor is taken for Cappadocia, and Cyrene for Kir. For Cyrene is a Citie directly West from Ægypt, betweene Ptolemais or Barce and Apollonia: but Kir in Asia vnder the Assyrians: Iunius hath it Kir, and not Cyrene: and so hath the Geneua. But Pererius cals Caphtorim Cappadocia, according to the Vulgar translation, to which he is bound: and yet it is not altogether improbable if he meane Cappadocia in Palæstina, and not that Cappadocia by the Sea Pontus in the North of Asia the lesse. For whether they inhabited Sethreites, or Cappadocia of Palæstina, it is not certainely knowne. And sure in this manner he may expound Cappadocia to be ambiguous, as well as he doth Cyrene: taking it here not for Cyrene in Africa, but for a place in Media. For it is written in the second of Kings, that Teglatphalasser King of the Assyrians carryed away the Inhabitants of Damascus into Kir: and so Iosephus seemes to vnderstand this Kir, for Cyrene in Media, calling this Cyrene, Media superior: for it was the manner and policie of the Assyrians to transplant the people conquered by them, as they did the Samarians or Israelites, and other Nations. And hereof it came that Kir was called Syro-Media: because the Syrians by the Assyrians were therein captiued.

Of the issue of SEM.

†. I.

Of ELAM, ASSVR, ARPHAXAD, and LVD.

It remayneth lastly to speake of the Sonnes of Sem, who were these:

1. Alam, or Elam,
2. Assur,
3. Arphaxad,
4. Lud, and
5. Aram.

THe posteritie of Sem, Moses recounteth after the rest: because from them he proceedeth in order with the Genealogie and Storie of the Hebrewes: For of Sem was Abraham descended.

Of these fiue sonnes the Scriptures remember the length of the life of Arphaxad only, and only the children of him and Aram, the rest are barely spoken of by rehearsall of their names, sauing that it may be gathered, that Assur (who was supposed to found Niniueh) was also said to be the Father of the Assyrians, whose issues, and the issues of Cham, instantly contended for the Empire of the East: which sometimes the Assyrians, sometimes the Babylonians obtayned, according to the vertue of their Princes. This is the common opinion, which also teacheth vs, that all the East parts of the World were peopled by Assur, Elam, and Lud (sauing India) which I beleeue Noah himselfe first inhabited: and to whom Ophir and Hauilah the sonnes of Ioctan afterward repayred. Hij filij SEM ab Euphrate fluuio partem Asiæ vsq; ad Oceanum Indicum tenuerunt; These sonnes of SEM (saith S. HIEROME) held all those Regions from Euphrates to the Indian Ocean.

Ios. Ant. l. 1. c. 7. Of Elam came the Elamites, remembred Acts 2. vers. 9. and the Princes of Persia; which name then began to be out of vse and lost, when the Persians became Masters of Babylonia: the East Monarchie being establisshed in them. Some prophane Writers distinguish Elam from Persia, and make the Elamites a people apart. But Susa (which the Scriptures call Susan) in Elam was the Kings seate of Persia (witnesse Cap. 8. vers. 2. DANIEL:) And I saw (saith he) in a vision, and when I saw it, I was in the Palace of Susan, which is in the Prouince of Elam. This Citie is embraced by the Riuer Eulæus (according to Ptolemie) in Daniel, Vlai: and seated in the border of Susiana. Ptol. Asiæ tab. 5. Dan. 8. 2.

Ashur (as most Historians beleeue) the second sonne of Sem, was Father of the Assyrians, who disdayning the pride of Nimrod, parted from Babel, and built Ninive, of equall beautie and magnitude with Babylon, or exceeding it. But we shall in due place disproue that opinion. Euery mans hand hath beene in this Storie, and therefore I shall not neede herein to speake much: for the Assyrians so often inuaded and spoyled the Israelites, destroyed their Cities, and led them Captiues, as both in Diuine and Humane letters there is large and often mention of this Nation.

But howsoeuer Herodotus and Diodorus extend this Empire, and honor this Nation with ample Dominion; yet was not the state of the Assyrians of any such power, after such time as Sardanapalus lost the Empire. For Senacherib who was one of the powerfulleft Princes among them, had yet the Mountayne Taurus for the vtmost of his Dominion toward the North-east, and Syria bounded him toward the West, notwithstanding those vaunts of Senacherib in Esay the 37. Haue the gods of the Nations deliuered them whom my Fathers haue destroyed? as GOZAN, and HARAN, and RESEPH, and the Children of EDEN which were at Telassar. Where is the King of Hamath, and the King of Arphad, and the King of the Citie Sepharuaim, Hena and Iuah? Vers. 11. All these were indeede but pettie Kings of Cities, and small Countries; as Haran in Mesopotamia: Reseph in Palmyrena: Hamath or Emath in Iturea, vnder Libanus: the Ile of Eden: Sepher, and others of this sort. Yea, Nabuchodonosor, who was most powerfull, before the conquest of Ægypt had but Chaldæa, Mesopotamia, and Syria, with Palæstina and Phœnicia parts thereof. But in this question of Assur, I will speake my opinion freely when I come to Nimrod, whose plantation I haue omitted among the rest of the Chusites, because he establisshed the first Empire: from whom the most memorable storie of the World taketh beginning.

Of Arphaxad came the Chaldæans, saith S. Hierome, and Iosephus, but it must be those Chaldæans about Vr: for the sonnes of Cham possest the rest. It is true that he was the Father of the Hebrewes: for Arphaxad begat Shela; and Shela, Heber; of whom hereafter.

And that Lud, the fourth Sonne of Shem, gaue name to the Lydians in Asia the lesse, is the common opinion, taken from Iosephus and S. Hierome; but I see not by what reason he was moued to straggle thither from his friends.

†. II.

Of ARAM, and his Sonnes.

ARAM the fift and laſt Sonne of Shem was the parent of the Syrians: of which Damaſcus was head. Their name was changed from Aram or Aramites by Syrus (ſayth Euſebius out of Ioſephus) which Syrus liued before Moſes was borne; the ſame which others call the ſonne of Apollo. Meſopotamia alſo being but a Prouince of Syria had the name of Aram Naharaïm, which is as much to ſay, as Syria duorum fluuiorum, Syria compaſſed with two Riuers: (to wit) Tigris and Euphrates. The Scriptures call it Meſopotamia, Syria, and Padan Aram: and the Greekes Meſopotamia ſimply. Eſay 7. v. 8. Euſeb. p. 10. 6.

Ariſe and get thee to Padan Aram (ſayth Iſaac to Iacob) to the houſe of BETHVEL thy mothers father, and thence take thee a wife. Strabo alſo remembreth it by the ancient name of Aram or Aramea, as theſe his owne words conuerted witneſſe: Quos nos Syros vocamus, ipſi Syri Arameios & Arameos vocant; Thoſe which we call Syrians (ſayth hee) themſelues call Aramenians and Arameans. Gen. 28. 2. See Gen. 25. 20. Alſo Deut. 23. 4. Iudg. 3. Paral. 1. 19. Pſal. 59. Strabo l. 1.

Againſt this opinion, that Aram the ſonne of Sem was the Father and Denominator of the Syrians in generall; (and not only of thoſe in Syria, Inter-amnis, which is Meſopotamia) ſome reade, Geneſ. 22. 21. Kemuel, the Father of the Syrians: where other out of the originall read Kemuel, the ſonne of Aram. Neither is it any inconuenience for vs to vnderſtand the word (Aram) here, not for the Nation, but for the name of ſome one of note; the rather, becauſe in the Hiſtorie of Abraham and Iſaac (which was in time long before Kemuels Poſteritie could bee famous) wee find Meſopotamia called Aram; and that with an addition: ſometimes with Naharaïm, and ſometimes of Padan, to diſtinguiſh it from another Aram, which (as it ſeemes) then alſo was called Aram. For whereas Iunius thinkes in his note vpon Geneſ. 25. 20. that Padan Aram ought to bee reſtrained to ſome part of Meſopotamia, (to wit) to that part which Ptolomie cals Ancobaritis (ſo called from the Riuer Chaboras, which diuiding it runneth into Euphrates) the promiſcuous vſe of Padan Aram, and Aram Naharaïm (which latter appellation qheſtionleſſe comprehends the whole Meſopotamia) may ſeeme to refute this opinion: eſpecially ſeeing the ſignification of this appellation agreeth with the whole Region. For it ſignifieth as much as the yoke of Syria, which name agrees with this Region: becauſe the two Riuers, (as it were) yoked together goe along it. The Reliques of the name Padan appeare in the name of two Cities in Ptolomie, called Aphadana: (as Iunius hath well noted) the one vpon Chaboras, the other vpon Euphrates.

The Sonnes of Aram were, { Vz or Hus, Hul, Gether, and Meſech or Mes.

Vz or Hus inhabited about Damaſcus, and built that Citie, ſaith Ioſephus and Saint Hierome. But Toſtatus miſtaking this opinion, both in them and in Lyra, who alſo followeth Ioſephus, affirmeth that Abrahams Steward Eliezer was the Founder thereof; though it were likely that Hus the eldeſt ſonne of Aram dwelt neere vnto his father, who inhabited the bodie of Syria. For Hus was a Region of the ſame, adioyning to Arabia the Deſart, and to Batanea or Traconitis: whereof the Prophet Hieremie: Reioyce and be glad O Daughter of Edom that dwelleſt in the Land of Hus. Hus therefore is ſeated beyond Iordan, in the Eaſt Region of Traconitis, adioyning to Baſan, hauing Batanea Gaulonitis, and the Mountaine Seir to the Eaſt, Edrai to the South, Damaſcus North, and Iordan Weſt: hauing in it many Cities and people, as may alſo bee gathered out of HIEREMY: And all ſorts of people: and all the Kings of the Land of Hus. Hieron. in trad. Hebraic. Hierem. Lamt. cap. 4. ver. 21. C. 25. v. 20.

In this Region dwelt Iob, descended of Hus, the sonne of Nahor, the brother of Abraham (sayth Saint Hierome) and married Dina the Daughter of Iacob, sayth Philo.

Hul the second sonne of Aram, Saint Hierome makes the Father of the Armenians: and Gether the third sonne, parent to the Arcananians or Carians: which opinion, (because I find not where to set him) I doe not disprooue, though I see no reason why Gether should leaue the fellowship of his owne brethren, and dwell among Strangers in Asia the lesse. Iunius giues Hul (whom hee writes Chul) the Desart of Palmyrena, as farre as Euphrates, where Ptolomie setteth the Citie of Cholle.

Gether (sayth Iosephus) founded the Bactrians: but Iosephus gaue all Noahs children feathers, to carrie them farre away in all haste. For mine owne opinion I alwayes keepe the rule of Neighbour-hood, and thinke with Iunius: (to wit) That Gether seated himselfe neere his brothers, in the bodie of Syria, and in the Prouince of Cassiotis, and Seleucis, where Ptolomie placeth Gindarus, and the Nation by Plinie called Gindareni.

Iunius also giueth to Mes or Mesch the North part of Syria, betweene Cilicia and Mesopotamia, neere the Mountaine Masius. The certaintie of those Plantations can no otherwise be knowne then by this probabilitie, that Aram the father (of whom that great Region tooke name) planted his sonnes in the same Land about him: for hee wanted no scope of Territorie for himselfe and them; neyther then when the World was newly planted, nor in many hundred yeeres after: and therefore there is no reason to cast them in the Desart parts of the World, so farre asunder. And as necessitie and policie held them together for a while: so Ambition (which began together with Angels and Men) inhabiting the hearts of their children, set them asunder. For although these sonnes of Aram, and the sonnes of the rest of Noahs children, kept themselues within the bounds of some one large Kingdome; yet therein euery one also sought a Prouince apart, and to themselues; giuing to the Cities therein built their owne names, thereby to leaue their memorie to their Posteritie: the vse of Letters being then rare, and knowne to few.

In this sort did the pride of the Spaniards in America cast them into so many Prouinces: euery one emulating and disdayning the greatnesse of other, as they are thereby to this day subiect to inuasion, expulsion, and destruction: so as (Noua Hispania and Peru excepted, because those Countries are vnaccessable to Strangers) an easie force will cast them out of all the rest.

Mes the fourth sonne is made the parent of the Mœonians: of whom something hath beene spoken alreadie. Arphaxad the third sonne of Shem, begat Shelah, and Heber. Heber had two sonnes, Phaleg and Ioctan: and in Phalegs time was the Earth diuided.

Chap.8.§.7.

†. III.

Of the diuision of the Earth in the time of PHALEG, one of the sonnes of HEBER, of the issue of SEM.

THE many people which at the diuision (at Phalegs birth) were then liuing, and the through Plantation of all the East part of the World (at his death) hath made a doubt, whether the Earth were diuided at eyther. The Hebrewes (sayth Pererius out of Sedar Holam, one of their Chronicles) affirme that this partition happened at the death of Phaleg: and Phaleg was borne in the yeere after the Floud 101. and liued in all 239. yeeres, which numbers added makes 340. And therefore was it so many yeeres after the Floud, ere the children of Noah seuered themselues. But to this opinion of the Hebrewes, and the doubt they make how in so few yeeres as 101. (the time of Phalegs birth) so many people could bee increased, Pererius giues this answere, that if 70. persons of the Family of Iacob increased to 600000. fighting men in 215. yeeres, (besides women, children, and impotent persons) how much more more is it likely, that so soone after the Floud the children of Noah might in a shorter time bring forth many multitudes, hauing receiued the blessing of God, Increase and multiply, and fill the Earth? What strength this answere hath, let others iudge: for the children of Israel were 70. and had 215. yeeres time: and the sonnes of Noah were but three, and had but 101. yeeres of time, to the birth of Phalegh.

Others conceiue that Phalegh tooke that name after the diuision, in memorie thereof: as Iosephus and Saint Augustine, who reason in this manner. If the diuision were at Phaleghs death (which happened in the yeere, which is commonly held to be the 48. of Abraham, but was by more likely computation 12. yeeres before his birth) then was the diuision 38. yeeres after Ninus, who gouerned 52. yeeres: in the 43. yeere of whose raigne Abraham was borne. But when Ninus began to rule the Assyrians, 80 yeeres before this diuision (as this diuision is placed by the Hebrewes, Hierome and Chrysostome) then was the earth so peopled in all the East and Northerne parts, as greater numbers haue not beene found at any time since. For Ninus associating to himselfe Arieus King of Arabia, a people who at that time (sayth DIOD. SICVLVS) plurimum opibus atq; armis præstabant, Exceeded both in riches and bodies of men, subdued many Cities in Armenia; receiued Barzanis into grace; then inuaded Media, and crucified Pharnus the King thereof, with his Wife and seuen Children; vanquished all those Regions betweene Nilus and Tanais, the Ægyptians, Phœnicians, the Kingdomes of Syria, and all the Nations of Persia, to the Hyrcanian Sea. For the numbers which followed Ninus (alreadie remembred out of Ctesias) against Zoroaster and others: and Zoroaster on the other side, who made resistance with foure hundred thousand, prooue it sufficiently, that if the diuision had not happened before the death of Phaleg, there had needed no diuision at that time at all. For some of them were so ill satisfied with their partitions, as they sought to be Masters of all; and greater Armies were there neuer gathered then by Ninus and Semiramis: wherefore in this opinion there is little appearance of the truth.

Peter. in Gen. li. 15. c. 10.

But for that conceit that if the diuision had beene made at the birth of Phaleg, there were not then sufficient numbers borne to fill the earth: It was neuer meant that the earth could bee filled euery where at the instant, but by times and degrees: And surely whatsoeuer mens opinions haue beene herein, yet it is certaine, that the diuision of tongues and of men must goe neere together with the ceasing of the worke at Babel: and that the enterprize of Babel was left off instantly vpon the confusion of Languages, where followed the execution of the diuision; and so neyther at the birth nor death of Phaleg: for Phaleg was borne in the yeere 101. after the Floud, which was the yeere that Nimrod came into Shinaar, or 10. yeeres after hee arriued, sayth Berosus.

Now if it bee obiected that Phaleg (the Etymologie of whose name signifieth diuision) must haue liued without a name, except the name had beene giuen him at the time of this confusion and partition: to this obiection it may be answered, That the change of names vpon diuers accidents is not rare in the Scriptures: for Iacob was called Israel after he had wrestled with the Angell; Abraham was first Abram; and Edom Esau; and that Phaleg being a principall man in this diuision had his first name vpon this accident changed, it is most probable.

And lastly, whereas the Hebrewes, Saint Hierome and Chrysostome account Heber a great Prophet, if that by giuing his sonne the name of Phaleg, hee foretold the diuision which followed: to this I say, I doe not find that Heber deserued any such honour, if he had thereupon so called his sonne: for diuision and dispersion followeth increase of people of necessitie; and this Prophesie (if any such had beene) might also haue reference to the diuision, which afterwards fell among the Hebrewes themselues.

But if we giue a reasonable time to the building of the Towre and Citie of Babel, by which time many people (by reason and by demonstratiue proofe) might bee increased: and that vpon the fall thereof the confusion and diuision followed (where-vpon Phaleg tooke name) then in this opinion there is nothing either curious or monstrous.

†. IIII.

Of the sonnes of IOCTAN, the other sonne of HEBER.

The sonnes of Ioctan were:

1. Elmodad.
2. Saleph, or Selep, or Sheleph.
3. Asamath, or Chatzar.
4. Iare, or Iarahh, or Ierath.
5. Hadoram.
6. Vzal, or Vxal.
7. Dicklach, or Dicla.
8. Obal, or Ebal, or Hobal.
9. Abimael.
10. Sheba, or Seba.
11. Ophir, or Opir.
12. Hauila, or Chauila, and
13. Iobab.

ALL those sonnes of Ioctan (according to Saint Hierome) dwelled in the East parts of the World, or India, euen from the Riuer Cophe or Choas, which is one of the branches or heads of Indus.

But the certaine places of those thirteene Sonnes cannot bee gathered out of the Scriptures, the words of Moses being generall. And their dwelling was from Mesha as thou goest vnto Sephar a Mount in the East. Of all these thirteene Sonnes, there were only three memorable, (to wit) Sheba, Ophir, and Hauilah. Concerning whose names, to auoide confusion it is to bee obserued, that among the Sonnes of Chush, two of them had also the names of Seba and Hauilah. Abraham had also a third Saba or Sheba, his grand-child by his wife Ketura. But Seba the sonne of Chush, and Sheba the sonne of Rhegma his Nephew, wee haue left in Arabia Fœlix: and Hauilah the sonne of Chush vpon Tigris. Saba the grand-childe of Abraham was (as some haue thought (the Father of the Sabæans in Persia: of which Nations Dionysius de Orbis situ, maketh mention. Primùm Sabæi; post hos sunt Passagardæ; prope verò hos sunt Tasci, The first are Sabæans: after these be Passagardæ; and neere these the Tasci. And whereas it is written: But vnto the Sonnes of the Concubines which ABRAHAM had, ABRAHAM gaue gifts, and sent them away from ISAAC his sonne (while hee yet liued) Eastward to the East-Countrey: hereupon it is supposed, that this Saba the sonne of Abraham wandered into Persia: for Persia was accounted the furthermost East-Countrey in respect of Iudæa; which also Ouid setteth vnder the Sun-rising. Yet seeing the rest of Abrahams sonnes seated themselues on the borders of Iudea, I rather choose to leaue Saba the sonne of Abraham in Arabia the Desart, where Ptolomie setteth a Citie of that name.

But Saba the sonne of Ioctan, the sonne of Heber, (as I conceiue) inhabited India it selfe. For Dionysius Afer in his Periegesis, (or description of the World) which hee wrote in Greeke Verse, among the Regions of India findeth a Nation called the Sabæi. Taxilus hos inter medios habitat q; Sabæus: In the middest of these dwell the Sabæi, and the Taxili, sayth this Dionysius.

Of OPHIR one of IOCTANS ſonnes, and of Peru, and of that voyage of SALOMON.

OPHIR alſo was an Inhabitant of the Eaſt India, and (as S. Hierome vnderſtands it) in one of the Ilands plentifull of gold, which are now knowne by the name of Molucca. Ioſephus vnderſtands Ophir to be one of thoſe great head-lands in India, which by a generall name are called Cherſoneſi, or Peninſulæ: of which there are two very notorious; Callecut, and Malacca. Pererius takes it rightly for an Iland, as Saint Hierome doth, but he ſets it at the head-land of Malacca. But Ophir is found among the Moluccas farther Eaſt.

Arias Montanus out of the ſecond of Chronicles, the third Chapter and ſixt Verſe, gathers that Ophir was Peru in America, looking into the Weſt Ocean, commonly called Mare del Sur, or the South Sea; by others Mare pacificum. The wordes in the ſecond of the Chronicles are theſe: And he ouerlayed the houſe with precious ſtones for beautie; and the gold was gold of Paruaim. IVNIVS takes this gold to be the gold of Hauilah, remembred by Moſes in the deſcription of Paradiſe: And the gold of that Land is good: finding a Towne in Characene a Prouince of Suſiana called Barbatia; ſo called (as he thinkes) by corruption for Paruaim: from whence thoſe Kings ſubiected by Dauid brought this gold, with which they preſented him; and which Dauid preſerued for the enriching of the Temple.

Plin. lib. 6. c. 28.

But this fancie of Peru hath deceiued many men, before Montanus, and Pleſsis, who alſo tooke Ophir for Peru. And that this queſtion may be a ſubiect of no farther diſpute; it is very true, that there is no Region in the World of that name: ſure I am that at leaſt America hath none, no not any Citie, Village, or Mountayne ſo called. But when Francis Piſarro firſt diſcouered thoſe Lands to the South of Panama, arriuing in that Region which Atabaliba commanded (a Prince of magnificence, Riches and Dominion inferior to none) ſome of the Spaniards vtterly ignorant of that language, demanding by ſignes (as they could) the name of the Countrie, and pointing with their hand athwart a Riuer, or Torrent, or Brooke that ranne by, the Indians anſwered Peru, which was either the name of that Brooke, or of water in generall. The Spaniards thereupon conceiuing that the people had rightly vnderſtood them, ſet it downe in the Diurnall of their enterpriſe, and ſo in the firſt deſcription made, and ſent ouer to Charles the Emperor, all that Weſt part of America to the South of Panama had the name of Peru, which hath continued euer ſince as diuers Spaniards in the Indies aſſured me; which alſo Acoſta the Ieſuite in his naturall and morall Hiſtorie of the Indies confirmeth. And whereas Montanus alſo findeth, that a part of the Indies (called Iucatan) tooke that name of Ioctan, who as he ſuppoſeth nauigated from the vtmoſt Eaſt of India to America: it is moſt true, that Iucatan is nothing elſe in the language of that Countrie, but [What is that] or [What ſay you?] For when the Spaniards asked the name of that place (no man conceiuing their meaning) one of the Saluages anſwered Iucatan (which is) What aske you, or what ſay you? The like hapned touching Paria, a mountaynous Countrie on the South ſide of Trinidado and Margarita: for when the Spaniards inquiring (as all men doe) the names of thoſe new Regions which they diſcouered, pointed to the Hills afarre off, one of the people anſwered, Paria, which is as much to ſay; as high Hills or Mountaynes. For at Paria begins that maruailous ledge of Mountaynes, which from thence are continued to the Strait of Magellan: from eight degrees of North latitude to 52. of South; and ſo hath that Countrie euer ſince retayned the name of Paria.

The ſame hapned among the Engliſh, which I ſent vnder Sir Richard Greeneuile to inhabite Virginia. For when ſome of my people asked the name of that Countrie, one of the Saluages anſwered, Wingandacon, which is as much to ſay, as, You weare good clothes, or gay clothes. The ſame hapned to the Spaniard in asking the name of the Iland Trinidado: for a Spaniard demanding the name of that ſelfe place which the Sea incompaſſed, they anſwered, Caeri, which ſignifieth an Iland. And in this manner haue many places newly diſcouered beene intituled, of which Peru is one. And therefore we muſt leaue Ophir among the Moluccas, whereabout ſuch an Iland is credibly affirmed to be.

Now although there may be found gold in Arabia it ſelfe (towards Perſia) in Hauilah, now Suſiana, and all alongſt that Eaſt Indian ſhore; yet the greateſt plentie is taken vp at the Philippines, certayne Ilands planted by the Spaniards, from the Weſt India. And by the length of the paſſage which Salomons ſhips made from the Red Sea, (which was three yeeres in going and comming) it ſeemeth they went to the vttermoſt Eaſt, as the Moluccas or Philippines. Indeede theſe that now goe from Portugal, or from hence, finiſh that nauigation in two yeere, and ſometimes leſſe: and Salomons ſhips went not aboue a tenth part of this our courſe from hence. But we muſt conſider, that they euermore kept the coaſt, and crept by the ſhores, which made the way exceeding long. For before the vſe of the Compaſſe was knowne, it was impoſſible to nauigate athwart the Ocean; and therefore Salomons ſhips could not finde Peru in America. Neither was it needfull for the Spaniards themſelues (had it not beene for the plentie of gold in the Eaſt India Ilands, farre aboue the mines of any one place of America) to ſaile euery yeere from the Weſt part of America thither, and there to haue ſtrongly planted, and inhabited the richeſt of thoſe Ilands: wherein they haue built a Citie called Manilia. Salomon therefore needed not to haue gone farther off then Ophir in the Eaſt, to haue ſped worſe: neither could he nauigate from the Eaſt to the Weſt in thoſe dayes, whereas he had no coaſt to haue guided him.

Toſtatus alſo gathereth a fantaſticall opinion out of Rabanus, who makes Ophir to be a Countrie, whoſe Mountaynes of gold are kept by Griffins: which Mountaynes Solinus affirmeth to be in Scythia Aſiatica, in theſe wordes: Nam cùm auro & gemmis affluant, Griphes tenent vniuerſa, alites ferociſſima, Arimaſpi cum his dimicant, &c. For whereas theſe Countries abound in gold, and rich ſtone, the Griffins defend the one and the other: a kinde of Fowle the fierceſt of all other; with which Griffins a Nation of people called Arimaſpi make warre. Theſe Arimaſpi are ſaid to haue been men with one eye only, like vnto the Cyclopes of Sicilia: of which Cyclopes, Herodotus and Ariſteus make mention: and ſo doth Lucan in his third Booke: and Valerius Flaccus: and D. Siculus in the ſtorie of Alexander Macedon. But (for mine owne opinion) I beleeue none of them. And for theſe Arimaſpi, I take it that this name ſignifying One-eyed, was firſt giuen them by reaſon that they vſed to weare a vizzard of defence, with one ſight in the middle to ſerue both eyes; and not that they had by nature any ſuch defect. But Solinus borroweth theſe things out of Plinie, who ſpeakes of ſuch a Nation in the extreme North, at a place called Giſolitron, or the Caue of the Northeaſt winde. For the reſt, as all fables were commonly grounded vpon ſome true ſtories or other things done: ſo might theſe tales of the Griffins receiue this Morall. That if thoſe men which fight againſt ſo many dangerous paſſages for gold, or other riches of this World, had their perfect ſenſes, and were not depriued of halfe their eye-ſight (at leaſt of the eye of right reaſon and vnderſtanding) they would content themſelues with a quiet and moderate eſtate; and not ſubiect themſelues to famine, corrupt aire, violent heate, and cold, and to all ſorts of miſerable diſeaſes. And though this fable be fayned in this place, yet if ſuch a tale were told of ſome other places of the World, where wild Beaſts or Serpents defend Mountaines of gold, it might be auowed. For there are in many places of the world, eſpecially in America, many high and impaſſable Mountaynes which are very rich and full of gold, inhabited only with Tygres, Lyons, and other rauenous and cruell beaſts: into which if any man aſcend (except his ſtrength be very great) he ſhall be ſure to finde the ſame warre, which the Arimaſpi make againſt the Griffins: not that the one or other had any ſenſe of gold, gold, or ſeeke to defend that metall, but being diſquieted, or made afraide of themſelues or their yong-ones, they grow inraged and aduenturous. In like ſort it may be ſaid that the Alegartos, (which the Ægyptians call the Crocadyles) defend thoſe Pearles which lye in the Lakes of the Inland: for many times the poore Indians are eaten vp by them, when they diue for the pearle. And though the Alegartos know not the pearle, yet they finde ſauour in the fleſh and bloud of the Indians, whom they deuoure.

†. VI.

Of HAVILAH the ſonne of IOCTAN, who alſo paſſed into the Eaſt Indies: and of MESHA and SEPHER named in the bordering of the Families of IOCTAN: with a Concluſion of this diſcourſe touching the plantation of the World.

OF Hauilah the ſonne of Ioctan, there is nothing elſe to be ſaid, but that the generall opinion is, that he alſo inhabited in the Eaſt India in the Continent, from which Ophir paſt into the Ilands adioyning. And whereas Ganges is ſaid to water Hauilah, it is meant by Hauilah in the Eaſt India, which tooke name of Hauilah the ſonne of Ioctan: but Hauilah, which Piſon compaſſeth, was ſo called of Hauilah, the ſonne of Chuſh, as is formerly proued by this place of Scripture: SAVL ſmote the Amalekites from Hauilah, as thou commeſt to Shur, which is before Ægypt. But that Saul euer made Warre in the Eaſt India, no man hath ſuſpected. For an end we may conclude, that of the thirteene ſonnes of Ioctan, theſe three, Saba, Hauilah, and Ophir; though at the firſt ſeated by their brethren about the hill Maſius or Meſh, GEN. 10. 30 (to wit) betweene Cilicia and Meſopotamia; yet at length either themſelues or their iſſues remoued into Eaſt India, leauing the other Families of Ioctan, to fill the Countries of their firſt plantation, which the Scripture defines to haue beene from Meſh vnto Sephar. And although S. Hierome take Meſh to be a Region of the Eaſt India, and Sephar a Mountaine of the ſame (which Mountaine, Montanus would haue to be the Andes in America) thoſe fancies are farre beyond my vnderſtanding. For the word (Eaſt) in the Scriptures, where it hath reference to Iudæa, is neuer farther extended then into Perſia. But Meſch is that part of the Mountaynes of Maſius in the North of Meſopotamia, out of which the Riuer Chaboras ſpringeth which runneth by Charran: and in the ſame Region we alſo finde for Sephar (remembred by Moſes) Sipphara by Ptolemie, ſtanding to the Eaſt of the Mountaynes Maſius; from whence Ioctan hauing many ſonnes, ſome of them might paſſe into India, hearing of the beautie and riches thereof. But this was in proceſſe of time. 1. Sam. 15. 7.

The other faſhion of planting I vnderſtand not, being grounded but vpon mens imaginations, contrarie to reaſon and poſſibilitie. And that this Mountayne in the Eaſt was no farther off then in thoſe Regions before remembred, it appeareth by many places of the Scripture where the ſame phraſe is vſed: as in Numbers 23. BALAC the King of Moab hath brought me from Aram, out of the Mountayne of the Eaſt; which was from the Eaſt part of Meſopotamia. For Balac brought Balaam out of Meſopotamia, (witneſſe this place of DEVTERONOMIE:) Becauſe they hyred BALAAM the ſonne of BEOR, of Pethor in Aram Naharaïm, to curſe thee: for Aram Naharaïm was Syria fluuiorum, which is Meſopotamia, as aforeſaid. Verſ. 7. Cap. 23. verſ. 4.

This plantation of the World after the floud doth beſt agree (as to me it ſeemes) with all the places of Scripture compared together. And theſe be the reports of Reaſon and probable coniecture; the Guides which I haue followed herein, and which I haue choſen to goe after, making no valuation of the opinions of men, conducted by their owne fancies, be they ancient or moderne. Neither haue I any end herein, priuate, or publike, other then the diſcouerie of truth. For as the partialitie of man to himſelfe hath diſguiſed all things: ſo the factious and hireling Hiſtorians of all Ages (especially of these latter times) haue by their many Volumes of vntrue reports left Honor without a Monument, and Vertue without Memorie: and (in stead thereof) haue erected Statues and Trophies to those, whom the darkest forgetfulnesse ought to haue buryed, and couered ouer for euermore. And although the length and dissoluing Nature of Time, hath worne out or changed the Names and memorie of the Worlds first planters after the floud (I meane the greatest number and most part of them) yet all the foot-steps of Antiquitie (as appeares by that which hath beene spoken) are not quite worne out nor ouer-growne: for Babylon hath to this day the sound of Babel; Phœnicia hath Zidon, to which Citie the eldest Sonne of Canaan gaue name; so hath Cilicia Tharsis; and the Armenians, Medes, Hiberians, Cappadocians, Phrygians, the Syrians, Idumæans, Libyans, Moores, and other Nations, haue preserued from the death of forgetfulnesse some signes of their first Founders and true Parents.

CHAP. IX.

Of the beginning and establishing of Gouernement.

§. I.

Of the proceeding from the first Gouernement vnder the eldest of Families to Regall, and from Regall absolute, to Regall tempered with Lawes.

IT followeth now to entreate how the World beganne to receiue Rule and Gouernement, which (while it had scarcitie of People) vnder-went no other Dominion then Paternitie and Eldership. For the Fathers of Nations were then as Kings, and the eldest of Families as Princes. Hereof it came, that the word (Elder) was alwayes vsed both for the Magistrate, & for those of Age and Grauitie: the same bearing one signification almost in all languages. For in the eleuenth of Numbers God commanded Moses to gather together 70. of the Elders of the people, and Gouernors ouer them: the Hebrew bearing the same sense, which the Latine word Senes or Seniores doth. So it is written in SVSANNA, Then the Assembly beleeued them as those that were the Elders and Iudges of the People. And so in the words of those false Iudges and witnesses to DANIEL, Shew it vnto vs, seeing God hath giuen thee the office of an Elder. DEMOSTHENES vseth the same word for the Magistrate among the Gratians. Cicero in Cato giueth two other reasons for this appellation: Apud Lacedæmonios qui amplissimum Magistratum gerunt, vt sunt, sic etiam appellantur Senes; Among the Lacedæmonians the chiefe Magistrates, as they are, so are they called Eldermen: and againe, Ratio & prudentia nisi essent in senibus, non summum Concilium Maiores nostri appellâssent Senatum; If reason and aduisement were not in old men, our Ancestors had neuer called the highest Councell by the name of a Senate. But though these reasons may well be giuen, yet we doubt not but in this name of (Elders) for Gouernours or Counsailers of State, there is a signe that the first Gouernors were the Fathers of Families; and vnder them them the eldest Sonnes. And from thence did the French, Italian, and Spaniard take the word (Signor) and out of it (Seignourie) for Lordship and Dominion: signifying (according to Loyseau) puissance in proprietie, or proper power. The kinds of this Seignourie, Seneca makes two: the one, Potestas aut imperium; Power or command: the other, Proprietas aut dominium; Proprietie or Mastership: the correlatiue of the one is the subiect, of the other the slaue. Ad Cæsarem (saith he) potestas omnium pertinet, ad singulos proprietas; Cæsar hath power ouer all; and euery man proprietie in his owne: and againe, Cæsar omnia imperio possidet, singuli dominio; Cæsar holdeth all in his power, and euery man possesseth his owne. But as men and vice beganne abundantly to increase: so obedience, (the fruit of naturall reuerence, which but from excellent seede seldome ripeneth) being exceedingly ouershadowed with pride, and ill examples vtterly withered and fell away. And the soft weapons of paternall perswasions (after mankinde beganne to neglect and forget the originall and first giuer of life) became in all ouer-weake, either to resist the first inclination of euill, or after (when it became habituall) to constraine it. So that now, when the hearts of men were onely guided and steered by their owne fancies, and tost to and fro on the tempestuous Seas of the world, while wisedome was seuered from power, and strength from charitie: Necessitie (which bindeth euery nature but the immortall) made both the Wise and Foolish vnderstand at once, that the estate of reasonable men would become farre more miserable then that of beasts, and that a generall floud of confusion would a second time ouerflow them, did they not by a generall obedience to order and dominion preuent it. For the Mightie, who trusted in their owne strengths, found others againe (by interchange of times) more mightie then themselues: the feeble fell vnder the forcible; and the equall from equall receiued equall harmes. In so much that licentious disorder (which seemed to promise a libertie vpon the first acquaintance) proued vpon a better tryall, no lesse perilous then an vnindurable bondage.

Necessitas est firmum iudicium, & immutabilis prouidentiæ potestas.

These Arguments by Necessitie propounded, and by Reason maintained and confirmed, perswaded all Nations which the Heauens couer, to subiect themselues to a Master, and to Magistracie in some degree. Vnder which Gouernment, as the change (which brought with it lesse euill, then the former mischiefes) was generally pleasing: so time (making all men wise that obserue it) found some imperfection and corrosiue in this cure. And therefore the same Necessitie which inuented, and the same Reason which approued soueraigne power, bethought it selfe of certaine equall rules, in which Dominion (in the beginning boundlesse) might also discerne her owne limits. For before the inuention of Lawes, priuate affections in supreme Rulers made their owne fancies both their Treasurers and Hangmen: measuring by this yard, and waighing in this ballance both good and euill.

For as wisedome in Eldership preceded the rule of Kings; so the will of Kings fore-went the inuentions of Lawes. Populus nullis legibus tenebatur: arbitria principum pro legibus erant; The people were not gouerned by any other lawes then the willes of Princes: Hereof it followed, that when Kings left to bee good, neither did those mens vertues value them which were not fancied by their Kings, nor those mens vices deforme them that were. Amor interdum nimis videt, interdum nihil videt; Loue sees one while too much, another while starke nothing. Hence it came to passe, that after a few yeeres (for direction and restraint of Royall power) Lawes were established: and that gouernment which had this mixture of equalitie (holding in an euen ballance supreme power and common right) acquired the title of Regall: the other (which had it not) was knowne for Tyrannicall: the one God established in fauour of his people: the other he permitted for their affliction.

In the infancie of this Regall authoritie, Princes as they were chosen for their vertues only so did they measure their powers by a great deale of moderation. And therefore (saith Fabius Pictor) Principes, quia iusti erant, & religionibus dediti, iure habiti Dij & dicti; Princes, because they were iust and religious, were rightly accounted and called Gods. De aureo sæculo, part. 1.

And

And though (speaking humanely) the beginning of Empire may be ascribed to Reason and Necessitie; yet it was God himselfe that first kindled this light in the mindes of men, whereby they saw that they could not liue and be preserued without a Ruler and Conducter: God himselfe by his eternall prouidence hauing ordayned Kings; and the law of Nature Leaders, and Rulers ouer others. For the very Bees haue their Prince; the Deere their Leaders; and Cranes (by order imposed) watch for their owne safetie. The most High beareth rule ouer the Kingdomes of Men; and appointeth ouer it whomsoeuer he pleaseth. By me (saith Wisedome, spoken by the Sonne of God) Kings reigne; By me Princes rule, and it is God (saith DANIEL) that setteth vp Kings, and taketh away Kings: and that this power is giuen from God, CHRIST himselfe witnesseth, speaking to PILATE: Thou couldest haue no power at all against me, except it were giuen thee from aboue.

Dan.5.21. Prouerb.8.v.15. Dan.2.v.21. Joh.19.v.11.

It was therefore by a threefold Iustice that the world hath beene gouerned from the beginning, (to wit) by a Iustice naturall: by which the Parents and Elders of families gouerned their Children, and Nephewes, and Families, in which gouernment the Obedience was called naturall Pietie: Againe, by a Iustice diuine, drawne from the Lawes and Ordinances of God: and the Obedience hereunto was called Conscience: And lastly, by a Iustice ciuill, begotten by both the former: and the Obedience to this we call Dutie. That by these three those of the eldest times were commanded: and that the rule in generall was Paternall, it is most euident: for Adam being Lord ouer his owne Children, instructed them in the seruice of God his Creator; as we reade, Cain and Abel brought Oblations before God, as they had beene taught by their Parent, the Father of mankinde.

§. II.

Of the three commendable sorts of Gouernement with their opposites: and of the degrees of humane societie.

WHat other Policie was exercised, or State founded after such time as mankinde was greatly multiplyed before the floud, it cannot be certainly knowne, though it seeme by probable coniecture, that the same was not without Kings in that first age: it being possible that many Princes of the Ægyptians (remembred among their antiquities) were before the generall floud; and very likely, that the cruell Oppressions in that Age proceeded from some tyrannie in Gouernement, or from some rougher forme of Rule, then the Paternall.

Beroſus ascribeth the rule of the World in those dayes to the Gyants of Libanus, who mastred (saith he) all Nations from the Sunne-rising to the Sunne-set. But in the second Age of the World, and after such time as the rule of Eldership fayled, three seuerall sorts of Gouernement were in seuerall times established among men, according to the diuers natures of Places and People.

Beroſ. lib 1.

The first, the most ancient, most generall, and most approued, was the Gouernement of one, ruling by iust Lawes, called Monarchie: to which Tyrannie is opposed, being also a sole and absolute Rule, exercised according to the will of the Commander, without respect or obseruation of the Lawes of God, or Men. For a lawfull Prince or Magistrate (saith Aristotle) is the Keeper of Right and Equitie: and of this condition ought euery Magistrate to be, according to the rule of Gods word: Iudges and Officers shalt thou make thee in thy Cities: And these shall iudge the people with righteous iudgement.

Deut.16.v.18.

The second Gouernement is of diuers principall Persons established by order, and ruling by Lawes, called Aristocracie, or Optimatum potestas; to which Oligarchia (or the particular faction and vsurpation of a few great-ones) is opposed: as the Decemviri, or Triumviri, and the like.

The

The third is a State popular, (or Gouernment of the people) called Democratia, to which is oppoſed Ochlocratia, or the turbulent vniuſt ruling of the confuſed multitude, ſeditiouſly ſwaying the State, contrarie to their owne Lawes and Ordinances. Theſe three kinds of Gouernment are briefly expreſt by Tholoſanus; Vnius, paucorum, & multorum, Of one, of few, of many.

Now as touching the beginning and order of policie ſince the ſecond increaſe of Mankind, the ſame grew in this ſort: Firſt of all, euery Father, or eldeſt of the Family, gaue Lawes to his owne iſſues, and to the people from him and them increaſed. Theſe as they were multiplyed into many Houſholds (man by nature louing ſocietie) ioyned their Cottages together in one common Field or Village, which the Latines call Vicus; of the Greeke οἶκος, which ſignifieth a Houſe, or of the word (Via) becauſe it hath diuers wayes and paths leading to it. And as the firſt Houſe grew into a Village, ſo the Village into that which is called Pagus, (being a ſocietie of diuers Villages) ſo called of the Greeke πήγη, which ſignifieth a Fountaine: becauſe many people (hauing their habitations not farre aſunder) dranke of one Spring or Streame of water. To this word the Engliſh Hundreds, or (as ſome thinke) Shires anſwereth not vnfitly.

But as men and impietie beganne to gather ſtrength, and as emulation and pride betweene the Races of the one and the other daily increaſed: ſo both to defend themſelues from outrage, and to preſerue ſuch goods as they had gathered, they beganne to ioyne and ſet together diuers of their Villages, inuironing them firſt with bankes and ditches, and afterwards with wals: which being ſo compaſſed were then called Oppida; eyther ab opponendo ſe hoſtibus, Becauſe wals were oppoſed againſt Enemies, or ab opibus, becauſe thither they gathered their riches for ſafetie and defence: as alſo they were called Vrbes, ab orbe; becauſe when they were to build a Citie, they made a Circle with a Plough (ſayth Varro) therewith meaſuring and compaſſing the ground which they went to incloſe or fortifie. And although Vrbs and Ciuitas bee often confounded, yet the difference was anciently in this, that Vrbs ſignified no other then the very wals and buildings, and Ciuitas was taken for the Citizens, inhabiting therein: ſo called of Ciuis; and that, ab eo quòd multitudo coiuit, of comming together. But all inhabitants within theſe wals are not properly Citizens, but only ſuch as are called Free-men: who bearing proportionably the charge of the Citie, may by turnes become Officers and Magiſtrates thereof: the reſt goe vnder the name of Subiects, though Citizens by the ſame generall name of Subiects are alſo knowne. For euery Citizen is alſo a ſubiect, but not euery Subiect a Citizen: perhaps alſo ſome Citizen (as the chiefe Magiſtrate, if hee bee to bee termed one of the Citizens) is no ſubiect; but of this wee need not ſtand to inquire. The word (Magiſtrate) is taken à Magiſtro, from a Maſter, and the word (Maſter) from the Aduerbe Magis (as alſo Magiſteria, Precepts of Art) or elſe from the Greeke word (Megiſtos:) and ſo the Greekes call them Megiſtanes, whom the Latines call Magnates, or Magiſtratus.

The office and dutie of euery Magiſtrate Ariſtotle hath written in few wordes. A Magiſtrate or Prince (ſayth hee) is the keeper of right and equitie; but the ſame is beſt taught by Saint Paul, who expreſſeth both the cauſe efficient, and finall, (that is) by whom Magiſtrates and Princes are ordained, together with their duties and offices. A Magiſtrate is the Miniſter of God for thy wealth; but if thou doe euill, feare: for he beareth not the ſword for nought. For hee is the Miniſter of God, to take vengeance on him that doth euill. He alſo teacheth in the ſame place; That euery ſoule ought to bee ſubiect to the higher powers, becauſe they are by God ordained; and that whoſoeuer reſiſteth that power, reſiſteth God, the giuer and fountaine thereof: and ſhall not only be therefore ſubiect to the iudgement and condemnation of Man, but of God: For yee muſt be ſubiect (ſaith he) not becauſe of wrath only, but alſo for conſcience ſake.

V. 2.

Ibid. v. 5.

The examples are not to be numbred of Gods puniſhments vpon thoſe that haue reſiſted Authoritie, by God ordained and eſtabliſhed. Neyther ought any ſubiect therefore to resist the power of Kings, because they may be taxed with iniustice or crueltie: for it pleaseth God sometimes to punish his people by a tyrannous hand: and the Commandement of obedience is without distinction. The Prophets and Christ himselfe subiected themselues to the power of Magistracie. Christ commanded that all due to Cæsar should be giuen vnto him: and he payed Tribute for himselfe and Peter. Hieremie commanded the Israelites (euen those that were Captiues vnder Heathen Kings) to pray for them, and for the peace of Babylon. So Abraham prayed for Abimelech; and Iacob blessed the King of Ægypt: And it is acceptable in the sight of our Sauiour (sayth PAVL) that yee make Supplications and Prayers for Kings, and for all that are in authoritie: and if for such Kings as were Idolatrous, much more for Christian Kings and Magistrates. And so much did Saint Chrysostome in his Homily to the people preferre Monarchicall Gouernment, as hee rather commended the rule of Kings (though Tyrants) then that they should be wanting: Præstat Regem tyrannum habere, quàm nullum; Better a tyrannous King, then no King: to which also Tacitus subscribeth: Præstat (sayth Tacitus in the first of his Historie) sub malo Principe esse quàm nullo; It is better to haue a bad Prince then none at all. And bee they good Kings (which is generally presupposed) then is there no libertie more safe, then to serue them: Neq; enim libertas tutior vlla est (sayth CLAVDIAN) quàm Domino seruire bono: No libertie (sayth hee) more safe for vs then to be seruants to the vertuous. And certainly howsoeuer it may be disputed, yet is it safer to liue vnder one Tyrant, then vnder 100000. Tyrants: vnder a wise man that is cruell, then vnder the foolish and barbarous crueltie of the multitude. For as Agesilaus answered a Citizen of Sparta that desired an alteration of the Gouernment, That kind of rule which a man would disdaine in his owne house, were very vnfit to gouerne great Regions by.

Hierem. 29. v. 7.

Gen 20. v. 17. 27. v. 10.

Lastly, as many Fathers erected many Cottages for their many children: and as (for the reason before remembred) many Houlholds ioyned themselues together, and made Villages; many Villages made Cities: so when these Cities and Citizens ioyned together, and established Lawes by consent, associating themselues vnder one Gouernour and Gouernment, they so ioyned were called a Commonwealth: the same being sometimes gouerned by Kings; sometimes by Magistrates; sometimes by the people themselues.

§. III.

Of the good Gouernment of the first Kings.

NOw this first Age after the Floud, and after such time as the people were increased, and the Families became strong and dispersed into seuerall parts of the World, was by ancient Historians called Golden: Ambition and Couetousnesse being as then but greene, and newly growne vp, the seeds and effects wherof were as yet but potential, and in the blowth and bud. For while the Law of Nature was the rule of mans life, they then sought for no larger Territorie then themselues could compasse and manure: they erected no other magnificent buildings, then sufficient to defend them from cold and tempest: they cared for no other delicacie of fare, or curiositie of dyet, then to maintaine life: nor for any other apparell then to couer them from the cold, the Raine and the Sunne.

And sure if wee vnderstand by that Age (which was called Golden) the ancient simplicitie of our Fore-fathers, this name may then truely be cast vpon those elder times: but if it be taken otherwise, then, whether the same may bee attributed more to any one time then to another, (I meane to one limited time and none else) it may bee doubted. For good and Golden Kings make good and Golden Ages: and all times haue brought forth of both sorts. And as the infancie of Empirie, (when Princes played their Prizes, and did then only woo men to obedience) might bee called called the Golden Age: so may the beginning of all Princes times bee truely called Golden. For be it that men affect honour, it is then best purchased; or if honour affect men, it is then that good deseruings haue commonly the least impediments: and if euer Liberalitie ouerflow her bankes and bounds, the same is then best warranted both by policie and example. But Age and Time doe not only harden and shrinke the openest and most Iouiall hearts, but the experience which it bringeth with it, layeth Princes torne estates before their eyes, and (withall) perswadeth them to compassionate themselues. And although there bee no Kings vnder the Sunne whose meanes are answerable vnto other mens desires; yet such as value all things by their owne respects, doe no sooner find their appetites vnanswered, but they complaine of alteration, and account the times iniurious and yron. And as this falleth out in the Raigne of euery King, so doth it in the life of euery man, if his dayes be many: for our yonger yeeres are our Golden Age; which being eaten vp by time, we praise those seasons which our youth accompanied: and (indeed) the grieuous alterations in our selues, and the paines and diseases which neuer part from vs but at the graue, make the times seeme so differing and displeasing: especially the qualitie of mans nature being also such, as it adoreth and extolleth the passages of the former, and condemneth the present state how iust soeuer: Fit humanæ malignitatis vitio, vt semper veteri in laude, præsentia in fastidio sint; It comes to passe (sayth TACITVS) by the vice of our malignitie, that we alwayes extoll the time past, and hold the present fastidious: For it is one of the errours of wayward Age: Quod sint laudatores temporis acti; That they are praysers of fore-passed times, forgetting this aduice of SALOMON: Say not then, Why is it that the former dayes were better then these? for thou dost not inquire wisely of this thing: to which purpose SENECA; Maiores nostri querti sunt, & nos querimur, posteri querentur, euersos esse mores, regnare nequitiam, in deterius res hominum & in omne nefas labi: Our Ancesters haue complained, wee doe complaine, our children will complaine, that good manners are gone, that wickednesse doth raigne, and all things grow worse and worse, and fall into all euill. These are the vsuall discourses of Age and misfortune. But hereof what can we adde to this of ARNOBIVS? Nouares quandoq; vetus fiet, & vetus temporibus quibus cæpit noua fuit & repentina: Whatsoeuer is new, in time shall be made old: and the ancientest things when they tooke beginning were also new and sodaine. Wherefore not to stand in much admiration of these first times, which the discontentments of present times haue made Golden, this wee may set downe for certaine, That as it was the vertue of the first Kings, which (after God) gaue them Crownes: so the loue of their people thereby purchased, held the same Crownes on their heads. And as God gaue the obedience of Subiects to Princes: so (relatiuely) hee gaue the care and iustice of Kings to the Subiects; hauing respect, not only to the Kings themselues, but euen to the meanest of his Creatures: Nunquàm particulari bono seruit omne bonum; The infinite goodnesse of God doth not attend any one only: for hee that made the small and great, careth for all alike: and it is the care which Kings haue of all theirs, which makes them beloued of all theirs; and by a generall loue it is, that Princes hold a generall obedience: For Potestas humana radicatur in voluntatibus hominum: All humane power is rooted in the will or dispositions of men.

§. III I.

Of the beginning of Nobilitie: and of the vaine vaunt thereof without vertue.

AND with this Supreme Rule and Kingly authoritie beganne also other degrees and differences among Subiects. For Princes made election of others by the same Rule, by which themselues were chosen, vnto whom they gaue place, trust, and power. From which imployments and Offices sprung those Titles, and those degrees of Honour, which haue continued from Age to Age to these dayes. But this Nobilitie, or difference from the Vulgar, was not in the beginning giuen to the Succession of Bloud, but to Succession of Vertue, as hereafter may bee prooued. Though at length it was sufficient for those whose Parents were aduanced, to bee knowne for the Sonnes of such Fathers: and so there needed then no endeuour of well-doing at all, or any contention for them to excell, vpon whom glorie or worldly Nobilitie necessarily descended. Yet hereof had Nobilitie denomination in the beginning, That such as excelled others in vertue, were so called: Hinc dictus Nobilis, quasi virtute præ alijs notabilis. But after such time as the deserued Honour of the Father was giuen in reward to his Posteritie, Saint Hierome iudged of the Succession in this manner: Nihil aliud video in Nobilitate appetendum, nisi quod Nobiles quadam necessitate constringantur, ne ab antiquorum probitate degenerent; I see no other thing to bee affected in Nobilitie, then that Noblemen are by a kind of necessitie bound, not to degenerate from the vertue of their Ancestors. For if Nobilitie be Virtus & antiquæ diuitiæ; Vertue and ancient riches, then to excced in all those things which are extra hominem, as riches, power, glorie, and the like, doe no otherwise define Nobilitie, then the word (animal) alone doth define a reasonable man. Or if honour (according to L. Viues) bee a witnesse of vertue and well-doing: and Nobilitie (after Plutarch) the continuance of vertue in a Race or Linage: then are those in whom Vertue is extinguished, but like vnto painted and printed Papers, which ignorant men worship in stead of Christ, our Ladie, and other Saints: men, in whom there remaine but the dregges and vices of ancient Vertue: Flowers, and Herbes, which by change of soile and want of manuring are turned to Weeds. For what is found prayse-worthy in those waters, which had their beginning out of pure Fountaines, if in all the rest of their course they runne foule, filthie, and defiled? Ex terra fertili producitur aliquando Cicuta venenosa, & ex terra sterili pretiosum aurum; Out of fruitfull ground ariseth sometimes poysoning Henbane: and out of barren soile precious Gold. For as all things consist of matter and forme, so doth Charron (in his Chapter of Nobilitie) call the Race and Linage but the matter of Nobilitie: the forme (which giues life and perfect being) he maketh to be Vertue, and Qualitie, profitable to the Commonweale. For he is truly and entirely Noble, who maketh a singular profession of publike Vertue, seruing his Prince and Countrie, and being descended of Parents and Ancesters that haue done the like. And although that Nobilitie, which the same Authour calleth personall, (the same which our selues acquire by our Vertue and well deseruings) cannot bee ballanced with that which is both naturall by Descent, and also personall; yet if Vertue bee wanting to the naturall, then is the personall and acquired Nobilitie by many degrees to be preferred: For (sayth this Charron) this Honour (to wit) by Descent, may light vpon such a one, as in his owne nature is a true Villaine. There is also a third Nobilitie which hee calleth Nobilitie in Parchment, bought with Siluer or fauour: and these bee indeed but Honours of affection, which Kings with the change of their fancies wish they knew well how to wipe off againe. But surely, if wee had as much sense of our degenerating in worthinesse, as we haue of vanitie in deriuing our selues of such and such Parents, wee should rather know such Nobilitie (without Vertue) to bee shame and dishonour, then Nobleness, and glorie to vaunt thereof.

What

What calamitie is wanting (sayth BERNARD) to him that is borne in sinne, of a Potshare bodie and barren minde? for (according to the same Father:) Dele fucum fugacis honoris huius, & male coronatæ nitorem gloriæ, &c. Wipe away the painting of this fleeting honour, and the glittering of the ill-crowned glorie, that then thou maiest consider thy selfe nakedly: for thou camest naked out of thy Mothers wombe. Camest thou thence with thy Myter, or glissening with Iewels, or garnished with Silkes, or adorned with Feathers, or stuffed with Gold? If thou scatter and blow away all these by thy consideration as certaine morning cloudes, which doe or will soone passe ouer, thou shalt meet with a naked, and poore, and wretched, and miserable man, and blushing, because he is naked, and weeping because hee is borne, and repining because he is borne to labour, and not to honour. Bernard.l.2.de Consider.ad Eugen.Pap.

For, as touching the matter of all men, there is no difference betweene it and dust: which if thou doest not beleeue (saith Saint CHRYSOSTOME) looke into the Sepulchres and Monuments of thy Ancestors, and they shall easily perswade thee by their owne example, that thou art dust and dirt: so that if man seeme more Noble and beautifull then dust, this proceedeth not from the diuersitie of his Nature, but from the cunning of his Creatour. Chrysost.homil.2. de incomposita Dei natura. con.5.

For true Nobilitie standeth in the Trade
Of vertuous life; not in the fleshly Line:
For bloud is brute, but Gentrie is Diuine. Phaer.

And howsoeuer the custome of the World haue made it good, that Honours be cast by birth vpon vnworthy Issues: yet Salomon (as wise as any King) reprehendeth the same in his Fellow-Princes: There is an euill (sayth hee) that I haue seene vnder the Sun, as an errour that proceedeth from the face of him that ruleth. Folly is set in great excellencie. Eccles.10.

CHAP. X.

Of NIMROD, BELVS, and NINVS: and of memorable things about those times.

§. 1.

That NIMROD was the first after the Floud that raigned like Soueraigne Lord: and that his beginning seemeth to haue beene of iust authoritie.

HE first of all that raigned as Soueraigne Lord after the Floud was Nimrod, the Sonne of Cush, distinguished by Moses from the rest (according to Saint Augustine) in one of these two respects: eyther for his eminencie, and because hee was the first of fame, and that tooke on him to command others: or else in that hee was begotten by Chush, after his other children were also become Fathers; and of a later time then some of his Grand-children and Nephewes. Howsoeuer, seeing Moses in expresse wordes calleth Nimrod the Sonne of Chush, other mens coniectures to the contrarie ought to haue no respect. This Empirie of Nimrod, both the Fathers and many later Writers call tyrannicall: the same beginning in Babel, (which is) confusion.

But it seemeth to mee that Melanchton conceiued not amisse hereof: the same exposition being also made by the Authour of that worke called Onomasticum Theologicum, who affirmes that Nimrod was therefore called Amarus Dominator, A bitter or seuere Gouernour, because his forme of rule seemed at first farre more terrible then Paternall authoritie. And therefore is he in this respect also called a mightie Hunter; because he tooke and destroyed both Beasts and Theeues. But Saint Augustine vnderstands it otherwise, and conuerts the word (ante) by (contra) affirming thereon, that Nimrod was a mightie Hunter against God: Sic ergo intelligendus est Gigas ille, Venator contra Dominum; So is that Giant to be vnderstood, a Hunter against the Lord. But howsoeuer this word (a mightie Hunter) bee vnderstood; yet it rather appeareth, that as Nimrod had the command of all those, which went with him from the East into Shinaar: so, this charge was rather giuen him, then by him vsurped. For it is no where found, that Noah himselfe, or any of the Sonnes of his owne bodie came with this troupe into Babylonia: no mention at all being made of Noah (the yeeres of his life excepted) in the succeeding Storie of the Hebrewes: nor that Sem was in this disobedient Troupe, or among the builders of Babel.

The same is also confirmed by diuers ancient Historians, that Nimrod, Suphne, and Ioctan were the Captaines and Leaders of all those which came from the East. And though Sem came not himselfe so farre West as Shinaar (his lot being cast on the East parts) yet from his Sonnes Nephew Heber, the name and Nation of the Hebrewes (according to the generall opinion) tooke beginning, who inhabited the Southermost parts of Chaldaa about the Citie of Vr; from whence Abraham was by God called into Charran, and thence into Canaan.

And because those of the Race of Sem which came into Chaldea, were no partners in the vnbeleeuing worke of the Towre: therefore (as many of the Fathers coniecture) did they retaine the first and most ancient language, which the Fathers of the first Age had left to Noah; and Noah to Sem and his Issues: In familia HEBER remansit hæc lingua; In the Family of HEBER this Language remained (saith Saint Augustine out of Epiphanius;) and this Language Abraham vsed: yea it was anciently and before the Floud the generall speech: and therefore first called (saith Cœlestinus) lingua humana: the humane tongue.

Aug. de Ciuit. Dei. l. 6. c. 11.

We know that Genebrius Becanus following Theodoret, Rabbi Moses, Aegyptius, Vergara, and others, is of another opinion; but howsoeuer we determine of this point, we may with good probabilitie resolue, that none of the godly seed of Sem were the chiefe Leaders of this presumptuous multitude. And seeing it is not likely but that some one was by order appointed for this charge, we may imagine that Nimrod rather had it by iust authoritie, then by violence of vsurpation.

§. II.

That NIMROD, BELVS, and NINVS were three distinct persons.

BEROSVS, and out of him Nauclerus with others make many Nimrods. Eusebius confounds him with Belus; and so doth Saint Hierome vpon Ose: and these wordes of S. Augustine seeme to make him of the same opinion: Ibi autem NINVS regnabat, post mortem patris sui BELI, qui primus illic regnauerat 65. annos; There did NINVS raigne after the death of his Father BELVS, who first gouerned in Babylon sixtie fiue yeeres. But it could not bee vnknowne to Saint Augustine, that Nimrod was the Establisher of that Empire: Moses being plaine and direct therein. For the beginning of NIMRODS Kingdome (saith he) was Babel, Erec, Accad, and Chalne, in the Land of Shinaar. Wherefore Nimrod was the first King of Babel. And certainly it best agreeth with reason, that Ninus was the third, and not one with Nimrod, as Mercator (led by Clement) suppose: for in Ninus time the World was marueilously repleniſhed. And if S. Augustine had had vndoubtedly taken Belus for Nimrod, he would haue giuen him the name which the Scriptures giue him, rather then haue borrowed any thing out of prophane Authors. And for those wordes of S. AVGVSTINE (qui primus illic regnauerat; Who was the first that reigned there) supposed to be meant by Belus: those wordes doe not disproue that Nimrod was the Founder of the Babylonian Empire. For although Iulius Cæsar ouerthrew the libertie of the Romane Commonwealth, making himselfe a perpetuall Dictator, yet Augustus was the first established Emperor: and the first that reigned absolutely by soueraigne authoritie ouer the Romanes, as an Emperor. The like may be said of Nimrod, that he first brake the rule of Eldership and Paternitie, laying the foundation of soueraigne Rule, as Cæsar did; and yet Belus was the first, who peaceably, and with a generall allowance exercised such a power. Pererius is of opinion, that Belus and Nimrod were the same, becausse many things are said of them both agreeing in time: for it was about 200. yeeres after the floud (as they account) that Belus reigned: but such agreement of times proues it not. For so Edward the Third, and his grand-child Richard the Second, were Kings both in one yeere: the one dyed; the other in the same yeere was crowned King.

And yet the opinion (that Nimrod and Belus were one) is farre more probable then that of Mercator, who makes Ninus and Nimrod to be the same. For it is plaine that the beginning of Nimrods Kingdome was Babel, and the Townes adioyning: but the first and most famous worke of Ninus was the Citie of Ninive.

Now whereas D. Siculus affirmeth, that Ninus ouercame and suppreſt the Babylonians, the same rather proueth the contrarie, then that Ninus and Nimrod were one person. For Ninus established the seate of his Empire at Ninive in Assyria, whence the Babylonians might (perchance) in disdayne thereof fall from his obedience, whom he recouered againe by strong hand; which was easie: Babylon being not walled till Semiramis time.

——— Dicitur altam

SEMIRAMIS with walls of bricke the Citie did incloſe.

Further, where it is alleaged, that as the Scriptures call Nimrod mightie: so Iustine hath the same of Ninus, which is one of Mercators arguments; It may be answered, that such an addition might haue beene giuen to many other Kings aswell. For if we may beleeue Iustine; then were Vexoris King of Ægypt, and Tanais of Scythia mightie Kings before Ninus was borne. And if we may compare the wordes of Moses (touching Nimrod) with the vndertakings of Ninus, there will be found great difference betweene them. For whereas Mercator conceiueth, that it was too early for any that liued about the time of the confusion of languages, to haue inuaded and mastered those Cities so farre remoued from Babel, namely, Erec, Accad, and Chalne: which worke he therefore ascribeth to Ninus, as a man of the greatest vndertaking; and consequently would haue Nimrod to haue beene long after the time, in which we suppose he flourished; and both those names of Nimrod and Ninus to belong to one person, to wit, to Ninus: to these things to make some answere. First, I doe not finde that supposition true, That euer Nimrod inuaded any of these Cities; but that hee founded them and built them from the ground, being the first after the floud, that conducted the children of Noah into those parts: and therefore had nothing built or erected to his hands.

Besides, whereas these Cities in many mens opinions are found to stand farre away from Babylon, I finde no reason to bring me to that beliefe. The Citie of Accad which the Septuagint calls Archad, and Epiphanius, Arphal; Iunius takes to be Nisibis in Mesopotamia: for the Region thereabout the Cosmographers (saith he) call Accabene for Accadene, Others vnderstand Nisibis and Ninive to be one Citie: so doe doe Strabo and Stephanus confound it with Charran; but all mistaken. For Nisibis, Accad, and Charran are distinct places. Though I cannot denie Accedene to be a Region of Mesopotamia, the same which Arias Montanus out of S. Hierome cals Achad: and so doe the Hebrewes also call Nisibis, which seemeth to be the cause of this mistaking. As for the Citie of Erec, which the Septuagint call Orech; S. Augustine, Oreg; and Pagninus, Erec; this place Iunius vnderstands for Aracca in Susiana: but there is also a Citie in Comagena called Arace: and indeede likelihood of name is no certaine proofe, without the assistance of other circumstances.

Concerning the third Citie (called Chalneh) some take it for Calinisis: of which Am. Marcellinus. S. Hierome takes it for Seleucia; Hierosolymitanus for Ctesiphon: others doe thinke it to be the Agrani vpon Euphrates, destroyed and razed by the Persians. But let Moses be the Moderator and Iudge of this dispute, who teacheth vs directly, that these Cities are not seated in so diuers and distant Regions; for these be his wordes: And the beginning of his Kingdome (speaking of NIMROD) was Babel, Erech, Accad, and Chalneh, in the land of Shinaar: so as in this Valley of Shinaar, or Babylonia, or Chaldæa (being all one) we must finde them. And therefore I could (rather of the two) thinke with Viterbiensis, that these foure made but one Babylon, then that they were Cities farre remoued, and in seuerall Prouinces, did not the Prophet Amos precisely distinguish Chalne from Babylon. Goe you (saith AMOS) to Chalne, and from thence goe you to Hamath, and then to Gath of the Philistims. The Geneua translation fauouring the former opinion, to set these Cities out of Shinaar, hath a marginall note expressing that Shinaar was here named: not that all these Cities were therein seated, but to distinguish Babylon of Chaldæa, from Babylon in Ægypt; but I finde little substance in that conceit. For sure I am, that in the beginning of Nimrods Empire there was no such Babylon, nor any Citie at all to be found in Ægypt: Babylon of Ægypt being all one with the great Citie of Cairo, which was built long after, not farre from the place where stood Memphis the ancient Citie, but not so ancient as Babylon vpon Euphrates. Now that Chalne is situate in the Valley of Shinaar, it hath beene formerly proued in the Chapter of Paradise. So as for any argument that may be brought to the contrarie, from the remote situation of these three Cities from Babylon, we may continue in our opinion, That Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus, were distinct and successiue Kings.

Cap. 6. vers. 2.

§. III.

That NIMROD, not ASSVR, built Ninive: and that it is probable out of ESAY 23. 13. that ASSVR built Vr of the Chaldees.

NOw as of Nimrod: so are the opinions of Writers different touching Assur, and touching the beginning of that great state of Babylon and Assyria: a controuersie wearisomely disputed without any direct proofe, conclusion, or certaintie. But to me (of whom, where the Scriptures are silent, the voyce of Reason hath the best hearing) the interpretation of Iunius is most agreeable; who besides all necessarie consequence doth not disioyne the sense of the Scriptures therein, nor confuse the vnderstanding thereof. For in this sort he conuerteth the Hebrew Text: Erat enim principium regni eius Babel, & Erech, & Accad, & Chalneh, in terra Shinaaris; è terra hac processit in Assyriam vbi ædificauit Niniuen; (which is) For the beginning of this Kingdome was Babel, and Erech, and Accad, and Chalneh, in the land of Shinaar: and he went forth of this land into Assyria, and built Ninive. So as Iunius takes Assur in this place, not for any person, but for the Region of Assyria: the land being so called in Moses time, and before it. For certainely, the other construction, (where the word (Assur) is taken for Assur the sonne of Sem) doth not answer the order which Moses obserueth through all the Bookes of Genesis, but is quite contrarie vnto it. For in the beginning of the tenth tenth Chapter he ſetteth downe the ſonnes of Noah, in theſe wordes: Now theſe are the Generations of the ſonnes of NOAH: SEM, HAM, and IAPHETH, vnto whom ſonnes were borne after the floud: then it followeth immediately: The ſonnes of IAPHETH were GOMER, &c. ſo as Iapheth is laſt named among Noahs ſonnes, be he eldeſt or yongeſt: becauſe he was firſt to be ſpoken of: with whom (hauing laſt named him) he proceedes and ſets downe his iſſue, and then the iſſue of his ſonnes: firſt, the iſſue of Gomer, Iaphets eldeſt ſonne; and then ſpeakes of Iauan and his ſonnes: for of the reſt of that Familie hee is ſilent. Anon after hee numbreth the ſonnes of Ham, of which Cuſh was the eldeſt: and then the ſonnes of Cuſh and Mizraim; and afterward of Canaan; leauing Shem for the laſt, becauſe he would not diſioyne the Storie of the Hebrewes. But after he beginneth with Sem, he continueth from thence by Arphaxad, Shela, and Heber, vnto Abraham, and ſo to Iacob, and the Fathers of that Nation. But to haue brought in one of the ſonnes of Shem in the middle of the generations of Ham, had beene againſt order; neither would Moſes haue paſt ouer ſo ſlightly the erection of the Aſſyrian Empire, in one of the ſonnes of Shem, if he had had any ſuch meaning: it being the ſtorie of Shems ſonnes which he moſt attended. For he nameth Nimrod apart, after the reſt of the ſonnes of Cuſh, becauſe he founded the Babylonian and Aſſyrian Empire: and in the eleuenth Chapter he returnes to ſpeake of the building of Babel in particular, hauing formerly named it in the tenth Chapter, with thoſe other Cities which Nimrod founded in Shinaar. And as he did in the tenth Chapter, ſo alſo in the eleuenth he maketh no report of Shem, till ſuch time as he had finiſhed ſo much of Nimrod as he meant to touch: and then he beginneth with the iſſue of Shem, which he continueth to Abraham and Iſrael. And of Iunius opinion touching Aſſur, was Caluin: to which I conceiue that P. Comeſtor, in hiſtoria Scholaſtica, gaue an entrance, who after he had deliuered this place in ſome other ſenſe, he vſeth theſe wordes: Vel intelligendum non eſt de ASSVR filio SEM, &c. ſed ASSVR (id eſt) Regnum Aſſyriorum inde egreſſum eſt, quod tempore SARVG proaui ABRAHAMI factum eſt, (which is) Or elſe it is not to be vnderſtood of ASSVR the ſonne of SEM, &c. but ASSVR (that is, the Kingdome of the Aſſyrians) came from thence (videlicet, from Babylon) or was made out of it: which happened in the time of SARVG the great grand-father of ABRAHAM. After which he reconcileth the differences in this ſort: If you take the ancient Belus (meaning Nimrod) to be the firſt Erecter of the Aſſyrian Empire, or the firſt Founder thereof, it is true, Quantum ad initium; Reſpecting the beginning; but others conceiue that it had beginning from Ninus, which is alſo true, Quantum ad regni ampliationem; Regarding the enlargement of the Empire. To this I may adde the opinion of Epiphanius, confirmed by Cedrenus, who takes Aſſur to be the ſonne of Nimrod: and ſo doth Methodius, and Viterbienſis, S. Hierome, and Cyrillus, and now laſtly Torniellus: who ſaith he tooke vpon him that name of Aſſur after he had beaten the Aſſyrians, as Scipio did of Africanus, after his conqueſt in Africa: and that Aſſur was a common name to the Kings of Aſſyria, as it appeareth by many Scriptures, as Pſalme 81. Eſay 10. Oſe 5. &c. but to helpe the matter, he makes Nimrod of the race of Shem, and the ſonne of Irari. But Rabanus Maurus, who was Arch-Biſhop of Mentz in the yeere of Chriſt 854. an ancient and learned Writer, vnderſtands this place with Commeſtor, or Commeſtor with him, agreeing in ſubſtance with that tranſlation of Iunius: to which wordes of Moſes he giueth this ſenſe: De hac terra Aſſyriorum pullulauit imperium, qui ex nomine NINI, BELI filij, Ninum condiderunt, vrbem magnam, &c. Out of this land grew the Empire of the Aſſyrians, who built Ninus the great Citie, ſo named of NINVS the ſonne of BELVS. On the contrarie Caluin obiecteth this place of ESAY: Behold the land of the Chaldæans, this was no people, ASSVR founded it by the inhabitants of the Wilderneſſe; then which there is no one place in the Scriptures, that hath a greater diuerſitie in the tranſlation and vnderſtanding; inſomuch as Michael de Palatio vpon Eſay (though in all elſe very diligent) paſſeth it ouer. But Caluin ſeemeth hereby to inferre, that becauſe Aſſur founded the ſtate of the Chaldæans, therefore alſo Aſſur rather ther then Nimrod eſtabliſhed the Aſſyrian Empire, and built Ninive: contrarie to the former tranſlation of Iunius, and to his owne opinion. Now out of the Vulgar (called Hieromes tranſlation) it may be gathered that Aſſur both founded and ruined this Eſtate or Citie of the Chaldæans, by Eſay remembred: vnto which Citie, People, or State, he plainely telleth the Tyrians that they cannot truſt, or hope for relieſe thence. Or rather it may be taken, that the Prophet maketh this Citie of Chaldea, and that Eſtate, an example vnto thoſe Phœnicians, whom in this place he fore-telleth of their ruine: which Citie of Chaldea being of ſtrength, and carefully defended, was (notwithſtanding) by the Aſſyrians vtterly waſted and deſtroyed: whereby he giueth them knowledge, and foretelleth them, that their owne Citie of Tyre, (inuincible, as themſelues thought) ſhould alſo ſoone after be ouer-turned by the ſame Aſſyrians: as (indeede) it was by Nabuchodonoſor. And theſe be the wordes after HIEROME: Ecce terra Chaldæorum, talis populus non fuit, ASSVR fundauit eam, in captiuitatem traduxerunt robuſtos eius, ſuffoderunt domos eius, poſuerunt eam in ruinam, (which is) Behold the Land of the Chaldæans, ſuch a people there were not (or, this was no people, after the Geneua) ASSVR (or the Aſſyrians) founded it, they carried away their ſtrong men captiue, they vndermined their houſes, and ruined their Citie. The Septuagint expreſſe it but in a part of another Verſe, in theſe wordes: Et in terra Chaldæorum, & hæc deſolata eſt ab Aſſyrijs, quoniam murus eius corruit, making the ſenſe perfect by the preceding Verſe, which all together may be thus vnderſtood: If thou goe ouer to Chittim (which is Macedon or Greece) yet thou ſhalt haue no reſt (ſpeaking to the Tyrians) neither in the Land of the Chaldæans, for this is made deſolate by the Aſſyrians, becauſe their walls fell together to the ground. PAGNINVS and VATABLVS conuert it thus: Ecce terra Chaſdijm, iſte populus non erat illic olim; nam ASSVR fundauit eam nauibus, erexerunt arces illius; contriuerunt ædes eius, poſuit eam in ruinam: which may be thus Engliſhed: Behold the Land of the Chaldæans, this people was not onte therein inhabiting: for ASSVR built it a harbour for ſhips, they erected the Towers thereof, and againe brake downe the houſes thereof, and ruinated it. IVNIVS in the place of ſhips ſets the word (pro Barbaris) that is, for the Barbarians: and the Geneua, by the Barbarians. But this is vndoubted that the Prophet Eſay (as may be gathered by all the ſenſe of the Chapter) did therein aſſure the Tyrians of their future deſtruction, which (accordingly) fell on them: wherein (for the more terror) he maketh choice to note the calamities of thoſe Places, Cities, and Regions, by whoſe Trade the ſtate and greatneſſe of the Tyrians was maintayned; as by the Cilicians from Tharſis; from the Macedonians, and other Græcians vnder the name of Cittim; alſo by the Ægyptians, the Chaldæans, and the reſt. For Tyre was then the Mart Towne of the World moſt renowned. And (as it appeares in our diſcourſe of Paradiſe) not the leaſt part of her chiefe merchandize came in by the Citie Vr or Vrchoa in Chaldæa, where the body or chiefe ſtreame of Euphrates (euen that ſtreame which runneth through Babylon and Otris, which now falleth into Tigris) had his paſſage into the Perſian Gulfe: though now it be ſtopped vp. For (as we haue heretofore noted) the Arabians (that deſcended from Sheba and Raamah) dwelling on the Eaſt bankes of the Perſian Gulfe, trading with the Tyrians (as thoſe of Eden, Charran, and Chalne did) tranſported their merchandiſe by the mouth of Tigris, that is, from Teredon, and of Euphrates, that is, from Vr or Vrchoa: and then by Babylon, and thence by Riuer and ouer Land they conueyed it into Syria, and ſo to Tyre: as they doe this day to Aleppo. So then Vr of the Chaldees was a Port Towne, and one of thoſe Cities which had Intelligence, Trade, and Exchange with the Tyrians: for it ſtood by the great Lakes of Chaldea, through which that part of Euphrates ranne, which paſſage is now ſtopt vp. Eius curſum vetuſtas aboleuit (ſaith Niger.) And PLINIE, Locus vbi Euphratis oſtium fuit, flumen ſalſum; Time hath worne away the channell of Euphrates: and the place where the mouth thereof was, is a Bay of ſalt water. Theſe things being thus, certainely (not without good probabilitie) we may expound the Citie of the Chaldees, whoſe calamities Eſay here noteth for terror of the Tyrians, to be the Citie anciently called Vr; and (by Hecatæus)

Camerina:

Camerina; by Ptolemie, Vrchoa: and by the Greekes, Chaldæopolis, The Citie of Chaldæa: which the ſonnes of Shem, vntill Abrahams time, inhabited. And whereas in all the Tranſlations it is ſaid, that Aſſur both founded it and ruined it: it may be vnderſtood, that Aſſur the Founder was the ſonne of Shem; and Aſſur the deſtroyers were the Aſſyrians, by whom thoſe that inhabited Vr of Chaldæa, were at length oppreſſed and brought to ruine: which thing God fore-ſeeing commanded Abraham thence to Charran, and ſo into Canaan. And if the Hebrew word by Vatablus and Pagninus conuerted (by ſhips) doe beare that ſenſe, the ſame may be the better approued; becauſe it was a Port Towne: and the Riuer ſo farre vp as this Citie of Vr was in ancient time nauigable, as both by Plinie and Niger appeareth. And if the word (for the Barbarians) or (by the Barbarians) be alſo in the Hebrew Text, it is no leſſe manifeſt, that the moſt barbarous Arabians of the Deſart were and are the confronting, and next people of all other vnto it. For Chaldæa is now called Arachaldar, which ſignifieth deſart Lands, becauſe it ioyneth to that part of Arabia ſo called: and Cicero (calling thoſe Arabians by the name of Ituræans) addeth, that they are of all other people the moſt ſaluage; calling them, Homines omnium maximè barbaros.

So as this place of Eſay, which breedeth ſome doubt in Caluin, proueth in nothing the contrarie opinion, nor in any part weakeneth the former tranſlation of Ninus, nor the interpretation of Comeſtor and Rabanus. For though other men haue not conceiued (for any thing that I haue read) that Aſſur is in this place diuerſly taken (as for the ſonne of Sem, when he is ſpoken of as a Builder of Vr; and when as a Deſtroyer thereof, then for the Aſſyrian Nation) yet certainely the euidence of the truth, and agreement of circumſtances ſeeme to enforce it. And ſo this Founding of the Citie of the Chaldees by Aſſur (into which the moſt of the poſteritie of Sem that came into Shinaar, and were ſeparate for the Idolatrie of the Chuſites and Nimrodians, retyred themſelues) hath nothing in it to proue that the ſame Aſſur built Niniue, or that the ſame Aſſur was all one with Ninus; except wee will make Aſſur, who was the ſonne of Shem, both an Idolater, and the ſonne of Belus. For (out of doubt) Ninus was the firſt notorious Sacrificer to Idols; and the firſt that ſet vp a Statue to be honored as god. Now if Aſſur muſt be of that Race, and not of the Familie of Sem, as he muſt be if he founded Niniue, then all thoſe which ſeeke to giue him the honor thereof, doe him by a thouſand parts more iniurie, by taking from him his true Parent and Religion.

Beſides, if this ſuppoſed Aſſur whom they make the Founder of Niniue (and ſo the ſonne of Belus) were any other, and not the ſame with Ninus; then what became of him? Certainely he was very vnworthy and obſcure, and not like to be the Founder of ſuch an Empire and ſuch a Citie, if no man haue vouchſafed to leaue to poſteritie his expulſion thence, and how he loſt that Empire againe or quitted it to Ninus: whoſe acts and conqueſts are ſo largely written, and (according to my apprehenſion) farre differing from truth. It will therefore be found beſt agreeing to Scripture and to Reaſon, and beſt agreeing with the ſtorie of that age written by prophane Authors, that Nimrod founded Babel, Erech, and Accad, and Chalne, the firſt workes and beginnings of his Empire, according to Moſes, and that theſe workes being finiſhed within the Valley of Shinaar, he looked farther abroad, and ſet in hand the worke of Ninus, lying neere vnto the ſame ſtreame that Babel and Chalne did: which worke his grand-child Ninus afterward amplified and finiſhed, as Semiramis (this Ninus his wife) did Babylon. Hence it came to paſſe, that as Semiramis was counted the Foundreſſe of the Citie which ſhee only finiſhed: ſo alſo Ninus of Ninive: Quam quidem Babylonem potuit inſtaurare; She might repaire or renew Babylon, ſaith S. Auguſtine. For ſo did Nabuchodonoſor vaunt himſelfe to be the Founder of Babylon alſo, becauſe he built vp againe ſome part of the wall, ouer-borne by the furie of the Riuer: which worke of his ſtood till Alexanders time, whereupon he vaunted thus: Is not this great Babel which I haue built? Dan. 4. 27.

§. IIII.

§. IIII.

Of the acts of NIMROD and BELVS, as farre as now they are knowne.

BVt to returne to the Storie, it is plaine in Moses, that Nimrod (whom Philo interpreteth transfugium; and Iulius Africanus surnamed Saturne) was the establisher of the Babylonian Monarchie, of whom there is no other thing written, then that his Empire in the beginning consisted of those foure Cities before remembred, Babel, Erec, Accad, and Chalne: and that from hence he propagated his Empire into Assyria; and in Assyria built foure more Cities (to wit) Niniue, Rehoboth, Celah, and Resen. And seeing that he spent much time in building Babel it selfe and those adioyning, and that his trauailes were many ere he came into Shinaar: that worke of Babel (such as it was) with the other three Cities, and the large foundation of Niniue, and the other Cities of Assyria which he builded (considered with the want of materials, and with other impediments) were of greater difficultie then any thing performed by his Successors in many yeeres after: to whose vndertakings time had giuen so great an increase of people; and the examples and patternes of his beginning so great an aduancement and encouragement: in whose time (saith Glycas) all these Nations were called Meropes, à sermonis linguarum terrag, diuisione; By reason that the earth and the speech were then diuided.

Belus, or Bel, or Iupiter Belus, succeeded Nimrod, after he had reigned 114. yeeres; of whose acts and vndertakings there is little written. For it is thought that he spent much of his time in disburdening the low Lands of Babylon, and drying and making firme ground of all those great Fennes and ouer-flowne Marishes which adioyned vnto it. For any of his Warres or Conquests there is no report, other then of his begun enterprise against Sabatius King of Armenia, and those parts of Scythia which Berosus calls Scythia Saga, whose sonne and successor Barzanes became subiect and Tributarie to Ninus, that followed the warre to effect, which was by his Father Belus begunne.

§. V.

That we are not to maruaile how so many Kingdomes could be erected about these times: and of VEXORIS of Ægypt, and TANAIS of Scythia.

THat so many Kingdomes were erected in all those Easterne parts of the World so soone after Nimrod, (as by the storie of Ninus is made manifest) the causes were threefold, (namely) Oportunitie, Example, and Necessitie. For Oportunitie being a Princesse liberall and powerfull, bestoweth on her first Entertayners many times more benefits, then either Fortune can, or Wisedome ought; by whose presence alone the vnderstanding mindes of men receiue all those helps and supplyes, which they either want or wish for: so as euery Leader of a troupe (after the diuision of tongues and dispersion of People) finding these faire offers made vnto them, held the power which they possest, and gouerned by discretion all those people, whom they conducted to their destined places. For it cannot be conceiued, that when the Earth was first diuided, mankinde straggled abroade like beasts in a Desart; but that by agreement they disposed themselues, and vnder-tooke to inhabite all the knowne parts of the World, and by distinct Families and Nations: otherwise, those remote Regions from Babylon and Shinaar, which had Kings, and were peopled in Ninus time, would not haue beene possest in many hundreds of yeeres after, as then they were;

were; neyther did those that were sent, and trauailed farre off (order being the true parent of prosperous successe) vndertake so difficuld enterprizes without a Conducter or Commander. Secondly, the Example of Nimrod with whom it succeeded well, strengthened euery humour that aspired. Thirdly, Necessitie resolued all men by the arguments of common miseries, that without a Commander and Magistrate, neither could those that were laborious, and of honest dispositions, enioy the harueft of their owne Trauailes: nor those which were of little strength, secure themselues against forcible violence: nor those which sought after any proportion of greatnesse, eyther possesse the same in quiet, or rule and order their owne Ministers and Attendants.

That these causes had wrought these effects, the vndertakings and Conquests of Ninus (the sonne of Belus) made it apparent: for hee found euery where Kings and Monarches, what way soeuer his Ambition led him in the Warres.

But Nimrod (his Grand-father) had no companion King, to vs knowne, when he first tooke on him Soueraignetie and sole commandement of all those the children of Noah, which came from the East into Babylonia: though in his life time others also rayled themselues to the same estate; of which hereafter. Belus (his sonne and Successour) found Sabatius King of Armenia and Scythia, sufficiently powerfull to resist his attempts: which Sabatius I take to bee the same, which Iustine cals Tanais; and should coniecture, that Mizraim had beene his Vexoris, were it not that I vehemently suspect some errour, (as Iustine placeth him) in the time of that Vexoris, who by many circumstances seemes to me rightly accounted by the Iudicious and Learned Reineccius all one with the great Sesostris, that liued certaine Ages after Ninus. This Belus, the second King of Babylon, raigned 65. yeeres, according to the common account.

See more of this, l. 2. of this first Part. cap. 2. §. 6.

§. VI.

Of the name of BELVS, and other names affine vnto it.

WHence this second King and Successour of Nimrod had the name of Bel, or Belus, question hath beene made: for it seemeth rather a name imposed, or (of addition) giuen by Ninus, then assumed by Belus himselfe.

Cyrillus against Iulian cals the Father of Ninus Arbelus, affirming that hee was the first of all men that caused himselfe to be called a God: which were it so, then might the name of Belus bee thence deriued. But Bel, as many Learned Writers haue obserued, signifieth the Sunne in the Chaldæan Tongue; and therefore did Ninus and Semiramis giue that name to their Father, that hee might bee honoured as the Sunne, which the Babylonians worshipped as a God. And as this Title was assumed in after-times by diuers others of the Chaldæan Princes, and Babylonian Satrapæ: so was it vsed (in imitation) by the chiefe of the Carthaginians and other Nations, as some Historians haue conceiued.

To this Bel, or Belus, pertaine (as in affinitie) those voyces of Baal, Baalim, Belphegor, Beelphagor, Belsebub, and Beelsephon. Those that are learned in the Hebrew and Chaldæan conuert the word Baal by the Latine, Princeps militiæ, Chiefe in the Warre; though Daniel was so called (sayth SVIDAS) Ob honorem explicationis arcanarum rerum; In honour of his expounding secrets. Saint Hierome makes Bel, Beel, and Baal, to haue the same signification: and sayth, that the Idoll of Babylon was so called, which Ninus in memory of his father set vp to be worshipped: to which that he might adde the more honour and reuerence, he made it a Sanctuarie and refuge for all offendors. Hence (sayth Lyranus) came Idolatrie, and the first vse of Images into the World. Isidore doth interprete Bel by Vetus, old or ancient; adding, that as among the Assyrians it is taken for Saturne and the Sunne: so in the Punicke or Carthaginian Language it signifi-eth God. Glycas makes it an Assyrian name properly; and Iosephus a Tyrian. Hee also affirmeth that the Idoll which the Moabites worshipped (by them erected on the Mountaine Phegor, or Peor, and called Baal) is the same which the Latines call Priapus, the God of Gardens; which was also the opinion of Saint Hierome. But that the word Bel, or Beel, was as much to say as God, appeareth by the word Beelzebub, the Idoll of Accaron. For Bel, or Beel soundeth (God) and Sebub (Flies or Hornets:) by which name (notwithstanding) the Iewes expresse the Prince of Deuils. But the Prophet Ose teacheth vs the proper signification of this word from the voice of God himselfe; And at that day (sayth the Lord) thou shalt call mee ISHI, and shalt call mee no more BAALIM: for I will take away the name of BAALIM out of their mouthes. For although the name of Baal, or Bahal, be iustly to bee vsed towards God; yet in respect that the same was giuen to Idols, God both hated it and forbad it. And the vsing of the word Bel among the Chaldeans for the Sunne, was not because it properly signifieth the Sunne, but because the Sunne there was worshipped as a God: as also the Fire was; tanquam Solis particula. As for the wordes compounded (before remembred (as Belphegor, and Belsephon; Belsephon is expounded out of FACIVS, Dominus specula vel custodiæ, The Lord of the Watch-towre, or of the Guard: the other word noteth the Idoll, and the place wherein it was worshipped. It is also written Belpeor, or Baalpeor: and Peor (they say) is as much as Denudauit; and therefore the word ioyned expresseth a naked Image. Some there are that call this Belus, the sonne of Saturne: for it was vsed among the Ancients to name the Father Saturne, the Sonne Iupiter, and the Grand-child Hercules. SATVRNI dicuntur familiarum Nobilium, Regum qui vrbes condiderunt senissimi; primogeniti eorum IOVES & IVNONES; HERCVLES vero nepotes eorum fortissimi; The ancientest of Noble Families, and Kings which founded Cities, are called SATVRNES; their first-borne IVPITERS and IVNONES; their valiant Nephewes HERCVLES. But this Belus (sayth L. Viues) was famous by reason of his warlike sonne Ninus, who caused his Father to bee worshipped as a GOD by the name of Iupiter Babylonius, whom the Ægyptians (transported by the Dreames of their Antiquitie) make one of theirs. For Neptune (say they) vpon Libya the Daughter of Epaphus begat this Iupiter Belus, who was Father to Ægyptus. They adde, that this Belus carrying a Colonie to the Riuer of Euphrates there built a Citie, in which he ordained Priests after the Ægyptian manner. But were there any Belus the sonne of Epaphus and Isis, or of Neptune and Libya, or (with Eusebius) of Telegonus, who after the death of Apis married Isis, (Cecrops then raigning in Athens) the same was not this Babylonian Belus of whom wee speake, but rather some other Belus, of whom the Ægyptians so much vaunted.

§. VII.

Of the worshipping of Images begunne from BELVS in Babel.

AS for the Babylonian Belus, hee was the most ancient Belus, and the Inuentour of Astronomie, if Plinie say true: from whence the Ægyptians might borrow both the name and the Doctrine. Some part of the Temple, in which his Statue or Image was honoured as a God, the same Authour affirmeth that it remained in his time.

Strabo. l. 13 c. 3.

Of the Sepulchre of Belus, Strabo writeth thus. Ouer the Riuer (sayth hee) there are Gardens, where they say the ruines of BELVS his Tombe, which XERXES brake vp, are yet remaining. It was a square Pyramis made of Bricke, a furlong high, and on euery side it had a furlong in breadth. It appeares by Cyril against Iulian, that hee obtained diuine worship yet liuing: for so hee writes of him (calling him ARBELVS.) ARBELVS, vir superbus & arrogans, primus hominum dicitur à subditis Deitatis nomen accepisse: perseuerârunt igitur Assyrij, & finitimæ illis gentes sacrificantes ei.

ARBELVS,

ABELVS, a man very proud and arrogant, is accounted to be the first of all men that was euer honoured by their subiects with title of Deitie; (or with the name of God.) The Assyrians therefore and the bordering Nations haue persеuered, sacrificing to him. Euen Arius also, whom Suidas cals Thuras, who succeeded next after Ninyas, was made an Idoll-god among them, if we credit Suidas.

After Ninus (that is, after Ninyas) Thuras raigned (saith Suidas) whom they called after the name of the Planet Mars; a man of sharpe and fierce disposition, who bidding battaile to Caucasus of the Stocke of Iapheth slue him. The Assyrians worshipped him for their God, and called him Baal (that is) Mars; thus farre Suidas. Neither is it vnlikely but that many among Idolatrous Nations were Deified in their life-times, or soone after: though I denie not but that the most of their Images and Statuæ were first erected without diuine worship, only in memorie of the glorious acts of Benefactors, as Glycas rightly conceiueth; and so afterward the Deuill crept into those woodden and brazen carcasses, when Posteritie had lost the memorie of their first inuention. Hereof Isidore speaketh in this manner: Quos autem Pagani Deos asserunt homines fuerunt, & pro vniuscuiusq; vitæ meritis vel magnificentia, eos apud suos post mortem cæperunt: sed (Dæmonibus persuadentibus) quos illi pro sua memoria honorauerunt, minores Deos existimârunt: ad ista vero magis excolenda accesserunt Poetarum figmenta; They were men (sayth he) whom the Pagans affirmed to be Gods: and euery one for his merits or magnificence beganne after his death to bee honoured of his owne. But at length (the Deuils perswading) they accounted them lesser Gods, whose memories, they honoured: and the Fictions of the Poets made the opinions (concerning the honours of the dead) much more superstitious.

And that the worshipping of Images was brought in by the Pagans, and Heathen Nations, it is not Isidore alone that witnesseth; but Gregorie: Gentilitas (sayth hee) inuentrix & caput est imaginum; Gentilisme is the inuentresse and ground of Images: and Ambrose; Gentes lignum adorant, tanquam imaginem Dei; The Gentiles adore wood as it were the Image of God. Eusebius also affirmeth as much, and calleth the worshipping of Images a custome borrowed of the Heathen. The like hath Saint Augustine against ADIMANTVS. Et verentur (sayth LACTANTIVS) ne religio vana sit, si nihil videant quod adorent; They feare their Religion would bee vaine, should they not see that which they worship.

Euseb. li. 7. c. 18.
Aug. c. 15.
Lact. lib. 2. c. 2.

And (out of doubt) the Schoolemen shift this fearefull custome very strangely. For seeing the very workemanship is forbidden, how can the heart of a wise Christian satisfie it selfe with the distinction of Doulia and Hyperdoulia, which can imply nothing but some difference of worshipping of those Images after they are made? And it is of all things the most strange, why religious and learned men should straine their wits to defend the vse of those things, which the Scriptures haue not only no where warranted, but expresly in many places forbidden, and cursed the Practisers thereof. Yet this doctrine of the Deuill was so strongly and subtilly rooted, as neither the expresse Commandement of God himselfe, Thou shalt not make any grauen Image, nor all the threatnings of Moses and the Prophets after him could remoue, weed it, or by feare, or by any perswasions lead the hearts of men from it. For where shall we find words of greater weight, or of plainer instruction then these? Take therefore good heed to your selues (for yee saw no Image in the day that the Lord spake vnto you in Horeb out of the midst of the fire) that yee corrupt not your selues; and make you a grauen Image, or representation of any Figure, whether it bee the likenesse of Male or Female.

And besides the expresse Commandement, Thou shalt make thee no grauen Image, and the prohibition in many Scriptures, so it is written in the Booke of Wisedome, That the inuention of Idols was the beginning of Whoredome: and the finding of them the corruption of life: for they were not from the beginning, neyther shall they continue for euer.

And whereas the Schoolemen affirme, that the Prophets spake against the worshipping shipping of the Heathen Idols, it is manifest that Moses spake of Images of the liuing God, and not of Baal and the rest of that nature, for you saw no Image (sayth MOSES) that day that the Lord spake vnto you in Horeb. Surely it was excellently sayd of BASIL; Noli aliquam in illo formam imaginari, ne circumscribas eum mente tua: Doe not imagine any forme to be in God, lest thou limit or circumscribe him in thy minde too. Now, if the great Basil thought it a presumption vnlawfull to represent a patterne of the infinite God to our owne thoughts and mindes, how farre doe those men presume that put him vnder the greazie Pensill of a Painter, or the rustie Axe or other Instrument of a Carpenter or Caruer.

For as this dishonour to the infinite and incomprehensible God beganne in Babel: so did the Deuill transport and speed this inuention into all the Regions adioyning, and into Ægypt and Greece.

The Romanes for a while resisted the erection of these Idols and Images, refusing to set them in their Temples for 170. yeeres, obseruing therein the Law of Numa: who thought it impietie to resemble things most beautifull, by things most base. But Tarquinius Priscus afterwards preuailing, and following the vanitie of the Gracians (a Nation of all others vnder the Sunne most deluded by Satan) set vp the Images of their Gods; which (as Saint Augustine witnesseth) that Learned Varro both bewailed, and vtterly condemned: and which Seneca thus derideth; Simulachra deorum venerantur, illis supplicant, genu posito illa adorant, & cùm haec suspiciant, fabros qui illa fecere contemnunt; The Images of the Gods are worshipped, those they pray vnto with bended knees; those they adore, and while they so greatly admire them, they contemne the Handi-craftsmen that made them: which also Sedulius the Poet in this sort scoffeth at:

De ciuit. Dei. li. 4. cap. 31.

Heu miseri qui vana colunt, qui corde sinistro
Religiosa sibi sculpunt simulachra, suumq;
Factorem fugiunt, & quae fecere verentur.
Quis furor est? quae tanta animos dementia ludit?
Vt volucrem, turpemq; bouem, torumq; Draconem,
Semi-hominemq; canem supplex homo pronus adoret.

Ah wretched they that worship vanities,
And consecrate dumbe Idols in their heart,
Who their owne Maker (God on high) despise,
And feare the worke of their owne hands and art.
What furie? what great madnesse doth beguile
Mens minds? that man should vgly shapes adore,
Of Birds, or Buls, or Dragons, or the vile
Halfe-dogge-halfe-man on knees for aide implore.

And though this deuice was barbarous, and first, and many yeeres practised by Heathen Nations onely, till the Iewes were corrupted in Ægypt, yet it is not Seneca alone that laugheth to scorne the ignorant stupiditie of his Nation: but Iustin Martyr remembreth how the Sibyls inueighed against Images: and Hospinian, how Sophocles taught, that it was pernicious to the soules of men to erect and adore those Babels. Strabo and Herodotus witnesse, that the Persians did not erect or set vp any Statue of their Gods. Lycurgus neuer taught it the Lacedemonians, but thought it impietie to represent immortall natures by mortall Figures. Eusebius also witnesseth in his sixt Booke de præparatione Euangelica, that it was forbidden by a Law in Serica, or among the Brachmans in India, that Images should be worshipped. The same doe Tacitus and Crinitus report of the ancient Germans. Many other Authours might bee remembred that witnesse the disdaine which the Heathen themselues had of this childish Idolatrie: of which Hospinian hath written at large in his Tract, de origine imaginum.

imaginum. And it was truly ſaid, Omnia mala exempla bonis initijs orta ſunt, All ill examples haue ſprung from good beginnings. The Heathen at firſt made theſe Statuæ and Images, but in memorie of ſuch remarkable men, as had deſerued beſt of their Countries and Common-wealths: Effigies hominum (ſayth PLINIE) non ſolebant exprimi, niſi aliqua illuſtri cauſa perpetuitatem merentium: Men were not wont to make Pictures, but of men which merited for ſome notable cauſe to be perpetually remembred. And though of the more ancient Papiſts, ſome haue borrowed of the Gentiles (as appeareth in Lactantius) that defence for Images: That Simulachra are pro elementis literarum, vt per ea diſcerent homines Deum inuiſibilem cognoſcere: Images (ſay they, and ſo before them the Heathen ſaid) are in ſtead of Letters, whereby men might learne to know the inuiſible God: in which vnderſtanding (perhaps they no otherwiſe eſteemed them then Pictures indeed; yet as that of Baal or Bel ſet vp in memorie of Belus the Babylonian, became afterwards the moſt reuerenced Idoll of the World, by which ſo many Nations (and they which were appropriate to God himſelfe) were miſled and caſt away: ſo thoſe very ſtockes and ſtones, and painted Canuaſes (called the pictures of Chriſt, our Ladie, and others) were by thouſands of ignorant people, not onely adored, but eſteemed to haue life, motion, and vnderſtanding. On theſe ſtockes wee call (ſayth the Booke of Wiſedome) when we paſſe through the raging waues, on theſe ſtockes more rotten then the Ship that carieth vs.

This Heathen inuention of Images became ſo fruitfull in after-times, breeding an infinite multitude of gods, that they were forced to diſtinguiſh them into degrees and orders; as Dij Conſentes, ſeu maiorum gentium; ſelecti, Patritij, inſigniores, dij medij: Counſelling Gods, or Gods of the mightieſt Nobilitie, ſelect Gods, Patrian, Gods of marke, and common Gods (which the Romanes called Medioxumi) dij infimi, and terreſtriall Heroes, and multitudes of other Gods: of which Saint Auguſtine hath made large mention in his Booke de Ciuitate Dei. But (ſaith Lactantius) among all thoſe miſerable ſoules and rotten bodies, worſhipped by men more like to their Idols, did Epimenides Cretenſis (by what good Angell mooued I know not) erect in the Athenian Fields, Altars to the vnknowne God, which ſtood with the ſame title and dedication euen to the times of Saint Paul: who made them firſt know to whom thoſe Altars belonged, and opened their eyes which were capable of grace, that they might diſcerne the difference betwixt that light which lighteneth euery man, and the obſcure and ſtinking miſt wherin the Deuil had ſo many yeeres led and miſled them. And it ſufficed not that the multitude of theſe Gods was ſo great in generall, or that euerie Nation had ſome one which tooke particular and ſingular care of them; as Iupiter in Creete, Iſis in Ægypt, in Athens Minerua, in Samos Iuno, in Paphos Venus, and ſo of all other parts; but euery Citie, and almoſt euery Family had a God a-part. For as it is written in the ſecond of Kings: the men of Babel, made Succoth Benoth, and the men of Cuth made Nergal, and the men of Hamath made Aſhima, and the Auins made Nibhaz and Tarrak, and the Sepharnaims burnt their children in the fire to Adramelech. All which how plainly hath the Prophet Eſay derided? Men cut downe Trees, rinde them, burne a part of them, make readie their meate, and warme themſelues by the fire thereof, and of the reſidue he maketh a God; an Idoll, and prayeth vnto it: but God hath ſhut their eyes from ſight, and their hearts from vnderſtanding. It is therefore ſafeſt for a Chriſtian to beleeue the Commandements of God ſo direct againſt Idolatrie, to beleeue the Prophets, and to beleeue Saint Paul: who ſpeaketh thus plainely and feelingly, My beloued, flye from Idolatrie, I ſpeake as vnto them which haue vnderſtanding, iudge yee what I ſay.

§. VIII.

Of the Warres of NINVS: and lastly of his Warre against ZOROASTER.

VNTO this Belus succeeded Ninus, the first that commanded the exercise of Idolatrie, the first that iniuriously inuaded his Neighbour Princes; and the first that without shame or feare committed adulterie in publique. But as of Belus there is no certaine memorie (as touching particulars:) so of this Ninus (whose Storie is gathered out of Prophane Authours) I find nothing so warrantable, but that the same may bee disputed, and in the greatest part doubted. For although that piece of Berosus set out and commented vpon by Annius, hath many good things in it, and giueth great light (as Chytraeus noteth) to the vnderstanding of Diodorus Siculus, Dion, Halycarnassaeus, and others: yet Lodouicus Viues, B. Rhenanus, and others after them haue layed open the imperfection and defects of the Fragment; prooving directly that it cannot bee the same Berosus which liued in Alexanders time, cited by Athenaeus and Iosephus: and whose Statue the Athenians erected, sayth Plinie. Yet it is from him chiefely, that many haue gathered the succession of the Babylonian and Assyrian Princes, euen from Nimrod to the eighteenth King Ascatades, and to the times of Iosua. For of Metasthenes an Historian, of the Race of the Persian Priests, there are found but certaine Papers, or some few lines of the Chaldean and Assyrian Monarchies: but hee afterwards in the collection of the Persian Kings is not without his errours.

Ctesias of Cnidus (a Citie adioyning to Halicarnassus) who liued together with Cyrus the yonger, and with Artaxerxes Mnemon, gathered his Historie out of the Persian Records, and reacheth as farre vpwards as Ninus and Semiramis: and though in the Storie of Cyrus the yonger, Xenophon approoueth him in some things, and Athenaeus, Pausanias and Tertullian cite him; yet so base and apparent are his flatteries of the times and Princes with whom he liued, and so incredible are the numbers which he finds in the Armies of Ninus, and especially of Semiramis; as whatsoeuer his reports were, times haue consumed his workes, sauing some very few excerptions lately published.

And therefore in things vncertaine, seeing a long discourse cannot bee pleasing to men of iudgement, I will passe ouer the Acts of this third Assyrian, in as few words as I can expresse them. Saint Augustine affirmes that Ninus mastered all Asia, India excepted. Others say that he wanne it all, saue India, Bactria, and Arabia. For he made Aricus of Arabia the Companion of his Conquests, with whom hee entred into a straight league of amitie, because he commanded many people and was his Kinsman, and a Chusite, and the neerest Prince confronting Babylonia. His first enterprize was vpon Syria, which he might easily subdue; both because he inuaded it on the sodaine, and because it lay next him: and also because the Arabians and their King Aricus (which bordered Syria) assisted him in the Conquest thereof.

The King of Armenia, Barzanes, he forced to acknowledge him, and to aide him in his Warre against Zoroaster: for from Armenia hee bent himselfe that way toward the East; but that euer he commanded the lesser Asia, I doe not beleeue, for none of his Successours had any possession therein.

His third Warre was against Pharnus, King of the Medes, whom it is sayd that hee ouerthrew, and cruelly murthered with his seuen children, though others affirme that they all dyed in one battaile against him. Whether hee inuaded Zoroaster before the building or amplifying of Niniue, or after, it is vncertaine. It is said that he made two expeditions into Bactria: and that finding little or ill successe in the first, he returned, and set the worke of Niniue forward: and then a second time entred Bactria with 1700000. Foot, and 200000. Horse, and 10000. sixe hundred Chariots:

riots: being encountred by Zoroaster with 400000. But Ninus preuayling, and Zoroaster slaine, he entred farther into the Countrie, and besieged the chiefe Citie thereof, called Bactra or Bactrion (saith Stephanus:) which by a passage found, and an assault giuen by Semiramis (the wife of Menon) he entred and possest. Vpon this occasion Ninus both admiring her iudgement and valour, together with her person and externall beautie, fancied her so strongly, as (neglecting all Princely respects) he tooke her from her husband, whose eyes he threatned to thrust out if he refused to consent. He therefore yeelding to the passion of loue in Ninus, and to the passion of sorrow in himselfe, by the strong perswasions of shame and dishonor, cast himselfe head-long into the water and dyed.

CHAP. XI.

Of ZOROASTER, supposed to haue beene the chiefe Author of Magick arts: and of the diuers kindes of Magicke.

§. I.

That ZOROASTER was not CHAM, nor the first Inuenter of Astrologie, or of Magicke: and that there were diuers great Magicians of this name.

ZOROASTER King of the Bactrians, Vincentius supposeth to be Cham, the sonne of Noah: A fancie of little probabilitie. For Cham was the Paternall Ancester of Ninus, the Father of Chus, the Grand-father of Nimrod, whose sonne was Belus, the Father of Ninus. It may be that Vincentius had heard of that booke which was called Scriptura Cham, deuised by some wicked Knaue, and so intituled: of which Sixtus Senensis hath made the due mention.

It is reported by Cassianus, that Serenus Abbas gaue the inuention of Magicke to Cham, the sonne of Noah: so did Comestor in his Scholasticall Historie: which Arte (saith he) with the seuen liberall Sciences he writ in fourteene Pillers: seuen of which were made of brasse, to resist the defacing by the waters of the Floud; and seuen of brick against the iniurie of fire. There was also another deuised discourse, which went vnder the title of Prophetia Cham. Cassianus out of Serenus hath somewhat like vnto this of Comestor: These be Cassianus wordes: CHAM (filius NOAH*) qui superstitionibus istis & sacrilegis fuit artibus infectus, sciens nullum se posse super hijs memorialem librum in Arcam prorsus inferre, in qua erat cum patre iusto, &c.* CHAM (the sonne of NOAH*) who was infected with these superstitions, and sacrilegious Arts, knowing that he could not bring any booke or memoriall of that nature into the Arke, wherein he was to remayne with his godly Father, caused the Precepts and Rules thereof to be grauen in metall and hard stone.*

Cassian. in Oct. Col. cap. 21.

S. Augustine noteth that Zoroaster was said to haue laught at his birth, when all other children weepe; which presaged the great knowledge which afterward he attayned vnto: being taken for the Inuenter of naturall Magick and other Arts; for the Corrupter, Corrupter, saith Plinie and Iustine. But I doe not thinke that Zoroaster inuented the doctrine of the Horoscopes or Natiuities; or first found out the nature of herbs, stones, and mineralls, or their Sympatheticall or Antipatheticall workings; of which, I know not what King of Chaldæa is also made the Inuenter. I rather thinke that these knowledges were farre more ancient, and left by Noah to his sonnes. For Abraham who had not any acquaintance with Zoroaster, (as Iosephus reporteth) was no lesse learned herein then any other in that age, if he exceeded not all men then liuing: differing from the wisedome of after-times in this, that he knew and acknowledged the true cause, and giuer of life and vertue to nature and all naturall things; whereas others (forgetting Gods infinite, dispersed, and vniuersall power) admired the instruments, and attributed proper strength to the things themselues, (from which the effects were sensible) which belonged to that wisedome, which being one, and remayning in it selfe, can doe all things and reneweth all.

Wisd. c. 7.

Now whether this Zoroaster (ouer-throwne by Ninus) were the same which was so excellent a Naturalist, it is doubted. For Zoroaster the Magician, Ctesias calls Oxyartes, whom Plinie findes of a later time. And if Zoroaster were taken away by a Spirit (being in the midst of his Disciples) as some Authors report, then Zoroaster, slaine by Ninus, was not the Magician: which is also the opinion of Scaliger.

Scalig. in Eusseb.

Ioseph. lib. 1. Antiq. c. 4.

Againe, Iosephus and Cedrenus affirme, that Seth first found out the Planets, or wandring Starres, and other Motions of the Heauens: for if this arte had beene inuented by Zoroaster, he could not haue attayned to any such excellencie therein, in his owne life time; but being a man (as it seemeth) of singular iudgement, he might adde somewhat to this kinde of knowledge, and leaue it by writing to posteritie.

But of this Zoroaster there is much dispute: and no lesse iangling about the word and arte of Magick. Arnobius remembreth foure, to whom the name of Zoroaster, or Zoroastres was giuen: which by Hermodorus and Dinon seemeth to be but a cognomen, or name of arte, and was as much to say, as astrorum cultor. The first, Arnobius calleth the Bactrian, which may be the same that Ninus ouerthrew: the second, a Chaldæan, and the Astronomer of Ninus: the third was Zoroaster Pamphylius, who liued in the time of Cyrus, and his familiar: the fourth, Zoroaster Armenius, the Nephew of Hostianes, which followed Xerxes into Greece: betweene whom and Cyrus there past threescore and eighteene yeeres. Suidas remembreth a fift, called Persomedus sapiens: and Plato speaketh of Zoroaster the sonne of Oromasdes; which Picus Mirandula confirmeth.

Now of what Nation the first and chiefe Zoroaster was, it is doubted. Plinie and Laertius make him a Persian. Gemisthius or Pletho, Ficinus and Steuchius, make him a Chaldæan. But by those bookes of one Zoroaster, found by Picus Mirandula, it appeareth plainely, that the Author of them was a Chaldæan by Nation, though the word (Chaldæan) was as often giuen to the learned Priests peculiarly, as for any distinguishment of Nations. Porphyrius makes the Chaldæi and Magi diuers; Picus the same. But that this Zoroaster was a Chaldæan both by Nation and Profession, it appeareth by his Bookes, which (saith Picus) were written in the Chaldæan tongue; and the Comment in the same language. Now that the Magi and they were not differing, it may be iudged by the name of those bookes of Zoroaster, which in an Epistle of Mirandula to Ficinus, he saith, to be intituled, Patris EZRE ZOROASTRIS, & MELCHIOR magorum oracula.

§. II.

§. II.

Of the name of Magia: and that it was anciently farre diuers from Coniuring, and Witchcraft.

NOw for Magicke it selfe; which Arte (saith MIRANDVLA) pauci intelligunt, multi reprehendunt; Few vnderstand, and many reprehend. Et sicut Canes ignotos semper allatrant; As Dogs barke at those they know not: so they condemne and hate the things they vnderstand not: I thinke it not amisse (leauing Ninus for awhile) to speake somewhat thereof. Pic. Mir. fol. 81.

It is true that many men abhorre the very name and word (Magus) because of Simon Magus; who being indeede, not Magus, but Goës, (that is) familiar with euill spirits, vsurped that title. For Magicke, Coniuring, and Witcherie, are farre differing Arts, whereof Plinie being ignorant scoffeth thereat. For Nero (saith Plinie) who had the most excellent Magicians of the East sent him by Tyridates King of Armenia, who held that Kingdome by his grace, found the arte after long studie and labour altogether ridiculous. Plin. l. 30. hist. Nat.

Magus is a Persian word primitiuely, whereby is expresst such a one as is altogether conuersant in things diuine. And (as Plato affirmeth) the arte of Magicke is the arte of worshipping God. To which effect Apollonius in his Epistles expounding the word (μάγος) saith, that the Persians called their gods ὦδγος: whence he addeth that Magus is either ὁ τῶν ὅλων θεὸς or θεραπευτὴς θεοῦ (that is) that Magus is a name sometime of him that is a God by nature; sometimes of him that is in the seruice of God: in which latter sense it is taken, Matth. 2. v. 1. And this is the first and highest kinde: which Picolominie calleth diuine Magicke: and these did the Latines newly intitle Sapientes or Wisemen: For, the feare & worship of God is the beginning of knowledge. These Wisemen the Greekes call Philosophers; the Indians, Brachmans: which name they somewhat neerely retayne to this day, calling their Priests Bramines; among the Ægyptians they were termed Priests; with the Hebrewes they were called Cabalistes, Prophets, Scribes, and Pharisees: amongst the Babylonians they were differenced by the name of Chaldæans: and among the Persians, Magicians: of whom Arnobius (speaking of Hostanes, one of the ancient Magicians) vseth these wordes: Et verum Deum merita maiestate prosequitur, & Angelos ministros Dei, sed veri, eius venerationi nouit assistere, Idem damonas prodit terrenos, vagos, humanitatis inimicos; SOSTHENES (for so M. Fœlix calleth him, not HOSTANES) ascribeth the due maestie to the true God, and acknowledgeth that his Angels are ministers and messengers which attend the worship of the true God. He also hath deliuered that there are Deuills earthly and wandering, and enemies to mankinde. Piccol. de Defin. Prouerb. l. 7. Piccol. de Defin. Iohn Ring. Linschot. In octauio Minutij Fœlicis cum Arnobio, pa. 360.

HIS MAIESTIE also in his first Booke of Dæmonologie c. 3. acknowledgeth, that in the Persian tongue the word (Magus) imports as much as a contemplator of diuine & heauenly sciences; but vniustly so called, because the Chaldæans were ignorant of the true diuinitie. And it is also right which HIS MAIESTIE auoweth, that vnder the name of Magick al other vnlawfull arts are comprehended, and yet doth HIS MAIESTIE distinguish it from Necromancie, Witchcraft, and the rest: of all which he hath written largely and most learnedly. For the Magicke which HIS MAIESTIE condemneth, is of that kinde whereof the Deuil is a partie. Daniel in his second chapter nameth foure kindes of those Wisemen: Arioli, Magi, Malefici, and Chaldæi. Arioli the old Latine translation calleth Sophistes: Vatablus and Pagninus, Genethliacos, or Physicos, or Philosophers, or (according to the note of Vatablus) Naturalists: Nempè sunt Magi apud Barbaros, quod Philosophi apud Græcos (scilicet) diuinarum humanarumq; rerum scientiam profitentes; For the Magi are the same with the Barbarians, as the Philosophers are with the Græcians (that is) men that professe the knowledge of things both diuine and humane. The Greeke and the English call them Inchanters; Iunius, Magicians; Castalion, Coniecturers: in the Syrian they are all foure by one name called Sapientes Babylonis; The Wisemen of Babel. Dæmonolog. l. 2. cap. 1.

The

The second sort Vatablus, Pagnin, Iunius, and our English, call Astrologers; Hierome and the Septuagint, Magicians.

The third kinde are Malefici, or Venefici; in Hierome, Pagnin, and the Septuagint, Witches, or Poysoners: in Iunius, Prastigiatores, or Sorcerers, as in English.

That Witches are also rightly so called Venefici, or Poysoners; and that indeede there is a kinde of Malefici, which without any arte of Magicke or Necromancie vse the helpe of the Deuill to doe mischiefe, HIS MAIESTIE confirmeth in the first Chapter of his second Booke: speaking also in the fifth Chapter of their practice, to mixe the powder of dead bodies with other things by the Deuill prepared; and at other times to make pictures of Waxe, or Clay, or otherwise (as it were Sacramentaliter) to effect those things, which the Deuill by other meanes bringeth to passe.

The fourth, all Translators call Chaldæans: who tooke vpon them to foretell all things to come, as well naturall as humane, and their euents: and this they vaunted to performe by the influences of the Starres by them obserued, and vnderstood.

Such were, and to this day partly (if not altogether) are the corruptions, which haue made odious the very name of Magicke, hauing chiefly sought (as is the manner of all impostures) to counterfait the highest and most noble part of it, yet so as they haue also crept into the inferior degrees.

A second kinde of Magicke was that part of Astrologie, which had respect to sowing and planting, and all kindes of agriculture and husbandrie: which was a knowledge of the motions and influences of the Starres into those lower Elements.

Philo Iudæus goeth farther, affirming, that by this part of Magicke or Astrologie, together with the motions of the Starres and other heauenly bodies, Abraham found out the knowledge of the true God, while he liued in Chaldæa: Qui contemplatione creaturarum cognouit Creatorem, (saith Io. DAMASCEN.) Who knew the Creator by the contemplation of the creature. IOSEPHVS reporteth of Abraham, that he instructed the Ægyptians in Arithmeticke and Astronomie, who before ABRAHAMS comming vnto them knew none of these sciences.

De vit. sanct. Glyc. Annal. fol. 180.

And so doth Archangelus de Burgo, in defence of Mirandula against Garsias: ALEXANDER & EVPOLEMON dicunt, quod ABRAHAM sanctitate & sapientia omnium præstantissimus Chaldæos primum, deinde Phœnices, demum Ægyptios sacerdotes Astrologiam & diuina docuerit; ALEXANDER (saith he, meaning ALEXANDER POLYHISTOR) and EVPOLEMON affirme, that ABRAHAM the holyest and wisest of men, did first teach the Chaldæans, then the Phœnicians, lastly, the Ægyptian Priests, Astrologie and diuine knowledge.

The third kinde of Magicke contayneth the whole Philosophie of nature; not the brabblings of the Aristotelians, but that which bringeth to light the inmost vertues, and draweth them out of natures hidden bosome to humane vse, Virtutes in centro centri latentes; Vertues hidden in the center of the center, according to the Chymists. Of this sort were Albertus, Arnoldus de villanoua, Raymond, Bacon, and many others: and before these, in elder times, and who better vnderstood the power of nature, and how to apply things that worke to things that suffer, were Zoroaster before spoken of: Apollonius Tyaneus remembred by S. Hierome to Paulinus; in some mens opinion Numa Pompilius among the Romanes: among the Indians, Thespian: among the Ægyptians, Hermes: among the Babylonians, Budda: the Thracians had Zamolxis: the Hyperborians (as is supposed) Abbaris: and the Italians, Petrus Apponensis. The Magicke which these men profest is thus defined: Magia est connexio à viro sapiente agentium per naturam cum patientibus, sibi congruenter respondentibus, vt inde opera prodeant non sine eorum admiratione qui causam ignorant; Magicke is the connexion of naturall agents and patients, answerable each to other, wrought by a wise man to the bringing forth of such effects, as are wonderfull to those that know not their causes. In all these three kindes which other men diuide into foure, it seemeth that Zoroaster was exceedingly learned: especially in the first and highest. For in his Oracles he confesseth God to be the Creator of the Vniuersall: he beleeueth of the * Trinitie, which he could not inuestigate uestigate by any naturall knowledge: he speaketh of Angels, and of Paradise: approueth the immortalitie of the soule: teacheth Truth, Faith, Hope, and Loue, discoursing of the Abstinence and Charitie of the Magi: which Oracles of his, Psellus, Ficinus, Patritius, and others haue gathered and translated. Psell. & Ficin.

Of this Zoroaster, Eusebius in the Theologie of the Phœnicians, vsing Zoroasters owne wordes: Hæc ad verbum scribit (saith EVSEBIVS) Deus primus incorruptibilium, sempiternus, ingenitus, expers partium, sibiipsi simillimus, bonorum omnium auriga, munera non expectans, optimus, prudentissimus, pater iuris, sine doctrina iustitiam perdoctus, natura perfectus, sapiens, sacræ naturæ unicus inuentor, &c. Thus writeth ZOROASTER word for word. God the first incorruptible, euerlasting, vnbegotten, without parts, most like himselfe, the guide of all good, expecting no reward, the best, the wisest, the father of right, hauing learn'd iustice without teaching, perfect wise by nature, the onely inuenter thereof. De præp. Euang. lib. 1. cap. 7.

Sixtus Senensis speaking of the wisedome of the Chaldæans, doth distinguish those wise men into fiue orders, (to wit) Chascedim, or Chaldæans: Asaphim, or Magicians: Chartumim; (which he translates Arioli, or Sophists) Mecasphim, or Malefici, or Venefici; Witches; or Poysoners; and Gazarim Augures, or Aruspices, or Diuiners. Lib. 2. fol. 46.

Chascedim were those which had the name of Chaldæans, which were Astronomers: Hij cælorum motus diligentissimè spectârunt; These did most diligently contemplate the motions of the heauens: whom Philo in the life of Abraham describeth.

Asaphim were in the old Latine translation called Philosophers: of the Septuagint and of Hierome, Magicians: Qui de omnium tam diuinarum quàm humanarum rerum causis Philosophati sunt; Who discoursed of the causes of all things, as well diuine as humane: of whom Origen makes Balaam (the sonne of Beor) to be the first: but Laertius ascribeth the inuention of this arte to Zoroastres the Persian. Laert. l. 1.

Chartumim, or Inchanters, the Disciples (saith Saint Augustine, Plinie, and Iustine) of another Zoroastres: who corrupted the admirable wisedome of the Magi, which he receiued from his Ancesters.

Mecasphim, or Venefics, or Witches, are those of which we haue spoken alreadie out of HIS MAIESTIES booke of Dæmonologia.

Gazarim, or Aruspices (after S. Hierome) which diuine from the entrailes of beasts slaine for sacrifices: or by Gazarim others vnderstand Augures, who diuine by the flying, singing, or feeding of birds.

By this distinction we may perceiue the difference betweene those wise men which the Kings of Babylon entertayned; and that the name and profession of the Magi among the ancient Persians was most honest. For as Peucer truely obserueth, Præerant religioni Persicæ, vt in populo Dei Leuitæ, studijsq; veræ Philosophiæ dediti erant: nec quisquam Rex Persarum poterat esse, qui non antea Magorum disciplinam scientiamq; percepisset; The Magi (saith he) were the chiefe Ministers of the Persian Religion, as the Leuites among Gods people, and they were giuen to the studies of true Philosophie: neyther could any be King of the Persians, who had not first beene exercised in the mysteries and knowledge of the Magi. SIXTVS SENENSIS in defence of Origen against Polychronius and Theophilus, hath two kindes of Magicke, his owne wordes are these: Et ne quem moueant præmissa POLYCHRONIJ & THEOPHILI testimonia, sciendum est duplicem esse Magiam; alteram vbiq; ab ORIGINE damnatam, quæ per fœdera cum dæmonibus inita aut verè aut apparenter operatur; alteram ab ORIGINE laudatam, quæ ad practicen naturalis philosophiæ pertinet, docens admirabiles res operari ex applicatione mutua naturalium virtutum ad inuicem agentium ac patientium; That the testimonies of THEOPHILVS and POLYCHRONIVS (saith he) may not moue any man, it is to be vnderstood that Magicke is of two sorts, the one euerywhere condemned by ORIGEN; which worketh (whether truely or seemingly) by couenants made with Deuills; the other commended by ORIGEN; which appertayneth to the practick part of naturall Philosophie, teaching to worke admirable things by the mutuall application of naturall vertues, agent and suffering reciprocally. This partition Hierome doth embrace in the first of his Peucer. de Diuinat. in c. de mag. fol. 135. & 136. Bibl. l. 6. fol. 424.

Com-

Commentaries vpon Daniel: where considering of the difference which Daniel makes betweene these foure kindes of wise Men formerly remembred, he vseth this distinction: Quos nos hariolos; ceteri [illegible] (id est) incantatores interpretati sunt, videntur mihi esse qui verbis rem peragunt; Magi, qui de singulis philosophantur; malefici, qui sanguine vtuntur & victimis, & sæpe contingunt corpora mortuorum: porro in Chaldæis Genethliacos significari puto, quos vulgo Mathematicos vocant. Consuetudo autem communis Magos pro maleficis accipit, qui aliter habentur apud gentem suam, eo quòd sint Philosophi Chaldæorum: & ad artis huius scientiam Reges quoq; & Principes eiusdem gentis omnia faciunt; vnde & in natiuitate Domini Saluatoris ipsi primum ortum eius intellexerunt, & venientes in sanctam Bethlehem adorauerunt puerum, stella desuper ostendente; They whom we call Sorcerers, and others interpret Inchanters, seeme to me such as performe things by words; Magicians, such as handle euery thing philosophically; Witches, that vse bloud and sacrifices, and often lay hands on the body of the dead: further, among the Chaldæans I take them to be signified by the name of Coniecturers vpon natiuities, whom the vulgar call Mathematicians. But common custome takes Magicians for Witches, who are otherwise reputed in their owne Nation: for they are the Philosophers of the Chaldæans: yea Kings and Princes of that Nation doe all that they doe according to the knowledge of this arte: whence at the natiuitie of the Lord our Sauiour they first of all vnderstood his birth, and comming vnto holy Bethlehem did worship the Child: the starre from aboue shewing him vnto them. By this therefore it appeareth that there is great difference betweene the doctrine of a Magician, and the abuse of the word. For though some Writers affirme, that Magus hodie dicitur, qui ex fœdere facto vtitur diaboli opera ad rem quamcunq;; That he is called a Magician now adayes, who hauing entred league with the Deuill, vseth his helpe to any matter: yet (as our Sauiour said of Diuorce) it was not so from the beginning. For the Arte of Magicke is of the wisedome of Nature; other Artes which vnder-goe that title, were inuented by the falshood, subtletie, and enuie of the Deuill. In the latter there is no other doctrine, then the vse of certayne ceremonies, Per malam fidem; By an euill faith: in the former no other ill, then the inuestigation of those vertues and hidden properties, which God hath giuen to his Creatures, and how fitly to apply things that worke to things that suffer. And though by the Iewes, those excellent Magicians, Philosophers, and Diuines, which came to worship our Sauiour Christ, were termed Mechaschephim, or Mecasphim; yet had they no other reason, then common custome therein. Consuetudo autem communis Magos pro maleficis accipit; (saith S. HIEROME) Common custome vnderstandeth Witches vnder the name of Magicians: And antiquitie (saith Peter Martyr) by the word (Magi) vnderstood good and wise men. Quid igitur expauescis Magi nomen formidolose, nomen Euangelio gratiosum, quod non maleficum & veneficum, sed sapientem sonat & Sacerdotem? O thou fearefull one (saith FICINVS) why doubtest thou to vse the name of Magus, a name gracious in the Gospell, which doth not signifie a witch or Coniurer, but a wise man and a Priest? For what brought this slander to that studie and profession but only idle ignorance: the parent of causelesse admiration? Causa fuit innocentia quorundam operum, quæ vera opera naturalia sunt: veruntamen quia procuratione dæmonum naturas ipsas vel coniungentium, vel commiscentium, vel aliter ad operandum expedientium facta sunt, opera dæmonum credebantur ab ignorantibus hæc. De operibus huiusmodi est Magia naturalis, quam Necromantiam multi impropriè vocant; The marueilousnesse of some workes, which (indeed) are naturall, hath beene the cause of this slander: but because these workes haue beene done by procurement of Deuils, ioyning the natures together or mingling them, or howsoeuer fitting the natures to their working, they were thought the workes of the Deuils by the ignorant. Among these workes is naturall Magicke, which men call very improperly Necromancie.

Mirandula in his Apologie goeth further: For by vnderstanding (saith he) the vttermost actiuitie of naturall agents we are assisted to know the Diuinitie of Christ: for otherwise (to vse his owne wordes) ignoratis terminis potentiæ & virtutis rerum naturalium fiat nos dubitare illa eadem opera, quæ fecit Christus, posse fieri per media naturalia; The termes or limits of naturall power and vertue not vnderstood, we must needes doubt whether those very verie workes which Chriſt did may not bee done by naturall meanes: after which he goeth on in this ſort: Ideo non hæreticè, non ſuperſtitiosè dixi, ſed veriſsimè & Catholicè per talem Magiam adiuuari nos in cognoſcenda diuinitate Chriſti: Therefore I ſaid not heretically, not ſuperſtitiouſly, but moſt truly and Catholikely, that by ſuch Magicke wee are furthered in knowing the Diuinitie of Chriſt. And ſeeing the Iewes and others the enemies of Chriſtian Religion, doe impudently and impiouſly obiect, that thoſe Miracles which Chriſt wrought were not aboue Nature, but by the exquiſite knowledge thereof performed: Mirandula a man for his yeeres fuller of knowledge then any that this latter Age hath brought forth, might with good reaſon auow, that the vttermoſt of Natures workes being knowne, the workes which Chriſt did, and which (as himſelfe witneſſeth) no man could doe, doe manifeſtly teſtifie of themſelues, that they were performed by that hand which held Nature therein but as a Pencill, and by a power infinitely ſupreme and diuine; and thereby thoſe that were faithleſſe, were eyther conuerted or put to ſilence.

§. III.

That the good knowledge in the ancient Magicke is not to bee condemned: though the Deuill here as in other kinds hath ſought to obtrude euill things, vnder the name and colour of good things.

SEeing therefore it is confeſſed by all of vnderſtanding, that a Magician (according to the Perſian word) is no other then, Diuinorum cultor & interpres: A ſtudious obſeruer and expounder of diuine things: and the Art it ſelfe (I meane the Art of naturall Magicke) no other, Quàm naturalis Philoſophiæ abſoluta conſummatio; Then the abſolute perfection of naturall Philoſophie: Certainely then it proceedeth from common ignorance, and no way ſorteth with wiſe and learned men promiſcuè and without difference and diſtinction, to confound lawfull and praiſe-worthy knowledge with that impious, and (to vſe Saint Pauls words) with thoſe beggerly rudiments, which the Deuill hath ſhuffled in, and by them bewitcheth and befooleth graceleſſe men. For if we condemne naturall Magicke, or the wiſedome of Nature, becauſe the Deuill (who knoweth more then any man) doth alſo teach Witches and Poyſoners the harmefull parts of Herbes, Drugges, Minerals, and Excrements: then may wee by the ſame rule condemne the Phyſician, and the Art of healing. For the Deuill alſo in the Oracles of Amphiaraus, Amphilochus, Trophonius, and the like, taught men in Dreames what Herbes and Drugges were proper for ſuch and ſuch diſeaſes. Now no man of iudgement is ignorant, that the Deuill from the beginning hath ſought to thruſt himſelfe into the ſame imployment among the Miniſters and Seruants of God, changing himſelfe for that purpoſe into an Angell of Light. Hee hath led men to Idolatrie as a doctrine of Religion; he hath thruſt in his Prophets among thoſe of the true God; hee hath corrupted the Art of Aſtrologie, by giuing a diuine power to the Starres, teaching men to eſteeme them as Gods, and not as inſtruments. And (as Bunting obſerueth) it is true, that iudiciall Aſtrologie is corrupted with many ſuperſtitions: but the abuſe of the thing takes not away the Art; conſidering that heauenly bodies (as euen generall experience ſheweth) haue and exerciſe their operation vpon the inferiour. For the Sunne, and the Starre of Mars doe drie; the Moone doth moiſten, and gouerne the Tides of the Sea. Againe, the Planets, as they haue ſeuerall and proper names, ſo haue they ſeuerall and proper vertues: the Starres doe alſo differ in beautie and in magnitude; and to all the Starres hath God giuen alſo their proper names, which (had they not influences and vertues different) needed not: He counteth the number of the Starres, and calleth them by their names. But into the good and profitable knowledge of the celeſtiall influences, the Deuill ceaſeth not to ſhuffle in his Superſtitions: and ſo to the knowledge of the ſecret vertues of Nature hath he faſtened his doctrine of Characters, Numbers, and Incantations; and taught men to beleeue in the ſtrength of Words and Letters: (which without Faith in God are but Inke or common breath) thereby eyther to equall his owne with the All-powerfull Word of God, or to diminiſh the glorie of Gods creating Word, by whom are all things.

Moreouer, hee was neuer ignorant, that both the wiſe and the ſimple obſerue when the Sea-birds forſake the ſhores and flye into the Land, that commonly ſome great ſtorme followeth; that the high flying of the Kite and the Swallow betoken faire weather; that the crying of Crowes and bathing of Duckes foreſhew raine: for they feele the Ayre moiſtened in their Quils. And it is written in Hieremie the Prophet, Euen the Storke in the ayre knoweth her appointed times, and the Turtle, and the Crane, and the Swallow. Hereupon, this enemie of Mankind working vpon theſe as vpon the reſt of Gods creatures, long time abuſed the Heathen by teaching them to obſerue the flying of Fowles, and thereby to iudge of good or ill ſucceſſe in the Warre: and (withall) to looke into their entrailes for the ſame, as if God had written the ſecrets of vnſearchable prouidence in the liuers and bowels of birds and beaſts. Againe, becauſe it pleaſed God ſometimes by Dreames, not only to warne and teach his Prophets and Apoſtles, but Heathen Princes alſo; as Abimelech to reſtore Sara to ABRAHAM; becauſe he admoniſhed Ioſeph, and by Dreame informed Iacob, Laban, Pharao, Salomon, Paul, Ananias, the Magi of the Eaſt, and others. For as it is remembred in IOB: In Dreames and Viſions of the night when ſleepe falleth vpon men, &c. Then God openeth the eares, that he might cauſe man to returne from his enterprize: therefore, I ſay, doth the Deuill alſo practiſe his Diuinations by Dreames, or (after Pariſienſis) diuinitatis imitationes, his mocke-diuinitie. This in the end grew ſo common, as ARISTIDES compiled an Ephemerides of his owne Dreames: Mithridates of thoſe of his Concubines. Yea the Romanes finding the inconuenience hereof, becauſe all Dreames (without diſtinction of cauſes) were drawne to Diuination, forbad the ſame by a Law, as by the words of prohibition (aut narrandis ſomnijs occultam aliquam artem diuinandi) it may appeare. Likewiſe by the Law of God in Deuteronomie cap. 13. ſeducing Dreamers were ordered to be ſlaine. Yet it is to be contemned, not that Marcus Antonius was told a remedie in his Dreame for two grieuous diſeaſes that oppreſt him; nor that of Alexander Macedon for the cure of Ptolomies poyſoned wound; nor that which Saint AVGVSTINE reporteth of a Millanoiſe; whoſe ſonne (the Father dead) being demanded a debt alreadie payed, was told by his Father in a Dreame where the Acquittance lay to diſcharge it: nor that of Aſtyages of his Daughter, and many others of like nature. Of the reaſon of all which, foraſmuch as the cauſe is not in our ſelues, this place denieth diſpute.

§. IIII.

That DANIELS miſliking NABVCHODONOSORS condemning of the Magicians doth not iuſtifie all their practices.

BVT it may be obiected, that if ſuch Diuination as the Heathens commonly vſed were to be condemned in them, who tooke on them verie many and ſtrange Reuelations: how came it to paſſe that Daniel both condemned the haſtie ſentence of Nabuchodonoſor againſt the Magicians of Chaldea, and in a ſort forbad it? eſpecially conſidering that ſuch kind of people God himſelfe commanded to be ſlaine. To this diuers anſweres may be giuen. Firſt, it ſeemeth that Daniel had reſpect to thoſe Chaldeans, becauſe they acknowledged that the Dreame of the King, which himſelfe had forgotten, could not be knowne to any man by any Art eyther Naturall or Diabolicall: For there is none other (ſayd the Chaldeans) that can declare it before the King, except the Gods, whoſe whose dwelling is not with flesh: and herein they confessed the power of the Euer-liuing God.

Secondly, it may be coniectured (and that with good reason) that among so many learned men, some of them did not exercise themselues in any euill or vnlawfull Artes, but were meerely Magicians and Naturalists: and therefore when the King commanded to kill all, Daniel perswaded the contrarie, and called it a hastie iudgement, which proceeded with furie without examination. And that some of those mens studies and professions were lawfull, it may be gathered by Daniels instruction: for himselfe had beene taught by them, and was called chiefe of the Inchanters; of which some were termed Soothsayers, others Astrologians, others Chaldæans, others Magi or Wisemen: and therefore of distinct professions.

Thirdly, Daniel misliked and forbad the execution of that iudgement, because it was vniust. For howsoeuer those men might deserue punishment for the practice of vnlawfull Arts (though not vnlawfull according to the Law of that State) yet herein they were altogether guiltlesse. For it exceeded humane power to pierce the Kings thought, which the Deuill himselfe could not know. So then in Daniels dislike, and hindering of the execution of sentence of death pronounced against the Magicians, there is no absolute iustifying of their practice and profession.

§. V.

The abuse of things which may bee found in all kinds, is not to condemne the right vse of them.

NOtwithstanding this mixture euery where of good with euill, of falsehood with truth, of corruption with cleanness and purity: The good, The truth, The puritie in euery kind may well be embraced: As in the ancient worshipping of God by Sacrifice; there was no man knowing God among the Elders, that therefore forbare to offer Sacrifice to the God of all power, because the Deuill in the Image of Baal, Astaroth, Chemoth, Iupiter, Apollo, and the like was so adored.

Neyther did the abuse of Astrologie terrifie Abraham (if we may beleeue the most ancient and religious Historians) from obseruing the motions and natures of heauenly bodies; neyther can it dehort wise and learned men in these dayes from attributing those vertues, influences, and inclinations to the Starres and other lights of Heauen, which God hath giuen to those his glorious creatures. Euseb. ex Artapan. & Polybist.

The Sympatheticall and Antipatheticall working of Herbes, Plants, Stones, Minerals, with their other vtmost vertues, sometimes taught by the Deuill, and applyed by his Ministers to harmefull and vncharitable ends, can neuer terrifie the honest and learned Physician or Magician from the vsing of them to the helpe and comfort of Mankind: neyther can the illusions, whereby the Deuill betrayeth such men as are fallen from God, make other men reiect the obseruations of Dreames; so farre as with a good Faith and a Religious caution they may make vse of them.

Lastly, the prohibition to marke flying of Fowles (as signes of good or euill successe) hath no reference at all to the crying of Crowes against Raine, or to any obseruation not superstitious, and whereof a reason or cause may bee giuen. For if we confound Arts with the abuse of them, wee shall not only condemne all honest Trades and enterchange among men (for there are that deceiue in all professions) but wee shall in a short time burie in forgetfulnesse all excellent knowledge and all learning, or obscure and couer it ouer with a most scornefull and beggerly ignorance: and (as Plinie teacheth) wee should shew our selues ingratos erga eos, qui labore curaq; lucem nobis aperuerunt in hac luce: Vnthankefull we should shew our selues towards those, who with paines and care haue discouered vnto vs light in this light. Deut. 18. 20.

Indeed not only these naturall knowledges are condemned by those that are ignorant; but the Mathematickes also and Professors thereof: though those that are excellently learned iudge of it in this sort: In speculo Mathematico verum illud, quod in omni scibili quæritur, relucet; non modo remota similitudine, sed fulgida quadam propinquitate: In the Glasse of the Mathematickes that Truth doth shine, which is sought in euery kind of knowledge; not in an obscure image, but in a neere and manifest representation.

§. VI.

Of the diuers kindes of vnlawfull Magicke.

IT is true that there are many Artes, if wee may so call them, which are couered with the name of Magicke: and esteemed abusiuely to bee as branches of that Tree, on whose root they neuer grew. The first of these hath the name of Necromancie or Goetia: and of this againe there are diuers kinds. The one is an Inuocation at the Graues of the dead, to whom the Deuill himselfe giues answere in stead of those that seeme to appeare. For certaine it is, that the immortall soules of men doe not inhabit the dust and dead bodies, but they giue motion and vnderstanding to the liuing: death being nothing else but a separation of the bodie and soule: and therefore the soule is not to be found in the Graues.

A second practice of those men, who pay Tribute or are in league with Satan, is that of coniuring or of raysing vp Deuils, of whom they hope to learne what they list. These men are so distract, as they beleeue that by terrible words they make the Deuill to tremble; that being once impaled in a Circle (a Circle which cannot keepe out a Mouse) they therein (as they suppose) insconce themselues against that great Monster. Doubtlesse, they forget that the Deuill is not terrified from doing ill and all that is contrarie to God and goodnesse, no, not by the fearefull Word of the Almightie: and that he feared not to offer to sit in Gods seat, that hee made no scruple to tempt our Sauiour Christ, whom himselfe called the Sonne of God. So, forgetting these proud parts of his, an vnworthy wretch will yet resolue himselfe, that hee can draw the Deuill out of Hell, and terrifie him with a Phrase: whereas in verie truth, the obedience which Deuils seeme to vse, is but thereby to possesse themselues of the bodies and soules of those which rayse them vp; as His Maiestie in his Booke aforenamed hath excellently taught: That the Deuils obedience is only, secundum quid, scilicet ex pacto; respectiuè, that is, vpon bargaine.

Sunt in mundo genus quoddam potestatum valde diuisum, indiscretum & inconsideratum; & quod neq; verum à falso neq; possibile discernit ab impossibili. L. Viues in cap. 11. lib. 10. Aug. de Ciuit. Dei, lib. 10. Cusan. exerc. l 2.

I cannot tell what they can doe vpon those simple and ignorant Deuils, which inhabite Iamblicus imagination; but sure I am the rest are apt enough to come vncalled: and alwayes attending the cogitations of their seruants and vassals, doe no way need any such inforcement.

Or it may be that these Coniurers deale altogether with Cardans mortall Deuils, following the opinion of Rabbi Auornathan and of Porphyrius, who taught that these kind of Deuils liued not aboue a thousand yeares: which Plutarch in his Treatise de Oraculorum defectu confirmeth, making example of the great God Pan. For were it true that the Deuils were in awe of wicked men, or could bee compelled by them, then would they alwaies feare those wordes and threats, by which at other times they are willingly mastered. But the Familiar of Simon Magus when hee had lifted him vp in the Ayre, cast him headlong out of his clawes, when he was sure hee should perish with the fall. If this perhaps were done by S. Peters Prayers (of which S. Peter no where vaunteth) yet the same pranck at other times vpon his own accord the Deuill played with Theodotus: who transported (as Simon Magus was supposed to haue beene) had the same mortall fall that he had. The like successe had Budæ, a principall pillar of the Manichæan Heresie, as Socrates in his Ecclesiasticall Historie witnesseth: and for a manifest proofe hereof wee see it euery day, that the Deuill leaues all Witches and Sorcerers at the Gallowes, for whom at other times hee maketh keth himſelfe a Pegaſus, to conueigh them in haſte to places farre diſtant, or at leaſt makes them ſo thinke: For to thoſe that receiued not the truth (ſayth Saint PAVL) God ſhall ſend them ſtrong illuſions. Of theſe their ſuppoſed tranſportations (yet agreeing with their confeſſions) His Maieſtie in the ſecond Booke and the fourth Chapter of the Dæmonologie, hath confirmed by vnanſwerable reaſons, that they are meerely illuſiue. Another ſort there are who take on them to include Spirits in Glaſſes and Criſtals: of whom CVSANVS: Fatui ſunt incantores, qui in vngue & vitro volunt ſpiritum includere: quia Spiritus non clauditur corpore: They are fooliſh Inchanters which will ſhut vp their ſpirits within their nailes or in Glaſſe: for a Spirit cannot be incloſed by a body. 2 Corint. 5. 5. Exercitat. l. 2.

There is alſo another Art beſides the afore mentioned, which they call Theurgia, or white Magicke; a pretended conference with good Spirits or Angels, whom by Sacrifice and Inuocation they draw out of Heauen, and Communicate withall. But the adminiſtring Spirits of God, as they require not any kind of adoration due vnto their Creatour: ſo ſeeing they are moſt free Spirits; there is no man ſo abſurd to thinke (except the Deuill haue corrupted his vnderſtanding) that they can bee conſtrained or commanded out of Heauen by threats. Wherefore let the profeſſours thereof couer themſelues how they pleaſe by a profeſſed puritie of life, by the miniſterie of Infants, by faſting and abſtinence in generall; yet all thoſe that tamper with immaterial ſubſtances and abſtract natures, either by Sacrifice, Vow, or inforcement, are men of euill faith and in the power of Satan. For good Spirits or Angels cannot be conſtrained; and the reſt are Deuils which willingly obey.

Other ſorts there are of wicked Diuinations: as by fire, called Pyromantia: by water, called Hydromantia: by the ayre, called Mataotechnia, and the like.

The laſt, and (indeed) the worſt of all other is Faſcination or Witchcraft: the Practiſers whereof are no leſſe enuious and cruell, reuengefull and bloudie, then the Deuill himſelfe. And theſe accurſed creatures hauing ſold their ſoules to the Deuil, worke two wayes; either by the Deuill immediately, or by the art of poyſoning. The difference betweene Necromanciers and Witches, His Maieſtie hath excellently taught in a word: that the one (in a ſort) command; the other obey the Deuill.

There is another kind of pettie Witcherie (if it be not altogether deceit) which they call charming of Beaſts and Birds, of which Pythagoras was accuſed, becauſe an Eagle lighted on his ſhoulder in the Olympian fields. But if the ſame exceeded the Art of Falconrie, yet was it no more to be admired then Mahomets Doue, which he had vſed to feed with Wheate out of his eare: which Doue, when it was hungrie, lighted on Mahomets ſhoulder, and thruſt his Bill therein to find his breake-faſt: Mahomet perſwading the rude and ſimple Arabians, that it was the Holy Ghoſt that gaue him aduice. And certainely if Bankes had liued in elder times, hee would haue ſhamed all the Inchanters of the World: for whoſoeuer was moſt famous among them, could neuer maſter or inſtruct any Beaſt as he did his Horſe. Ælian. l. 6. nat. hiſtor.

For the drawing of Serpents out of their Dens, or killing of them in the holes by Inchantments (which the Marſians a people of Italie practiſed: Colubros diſrumpit Marſia cantu: Inchanting Marſia makes the Snakes to burſt.) That it hath beene vſed it appeares, Pſal. 58. 6. though I doubt not, but that many Impoſtures may bee in this kind; and euen by naturall cauſes it may be done. For there are many Fumes that will either draw them out or deſtroy them; as womens haire burnt, and the like. So many things may be laied in the entrance of their holes that will allure them: and therein I find no other Magicke or Inchantment, then to draw out a Mouſe with a piece of toſted Cheeſe. Lucil. in Satyr.

§. VII.

Of diuers wayes by which the Deuill seemeth to worke his wonders.

BVT to the end that we may not dote with the Manichees, who make two powers of gods: that we doe not giue to the Deuil any other dominion then he hath (not to speake of his abilitie, when hee is the Minister of Gods vengeance, as when Ægypt, according to Dauid, was destroyed by euill Angels) he otherwise worketh but three wayes. The first is by mouing the cogitations and affections of men: The second by the exquisite knowledge of Nature: and the third by deceit, illusion, and false semblance. And that they cannot worke what they would, G. Parisiensis giueth three causes: the first, a naturall impotencie: the second, their owne reason disswading them from daring ouermuch, or indeed (and that which is the only certaine cause) the great mercie of the Creatour, Tenens eas ligatas (sayth the same Authour) velut immanissimas belluas. Saint Augustine was of opinion that the Frogges which Pharaos Sorcerers produced were not naturall, but that the Deuill (by betraying of their senses that looked on) made them appeare to be such. For as Varius obserueth, those Frogges of the Inchanters were not found corrupted as those of Moses were, which might argue that they were not creatures indeed. Hereof sayth Saint AVGVSTINE: Nec sanè Dæmones naturas creant, sed quæ à Deo creata sunt commutant, vt videantur esse quod non sunt: The Deuils create not any natures, but so change those that are created by God, as they seeme to bee that which they be not: of which in the 83. Question he giueth the reason. Dæmon quibusdam nebulis implet omnes meatus intelligentiæ, per quos aperire lumen rationis radius mentis solet, (that is) The Deuill fils with certaine cloudes all passages of the vnderstanding, by which the beame of the mind is wont to open the light of reason.

Sinl. parisi. de vniuerso. p. 2. c. 70.

And as Tertullian in his Booke de anima rightly conceiueth, if the Deuill can possesse himselfe of the eyes of our mindes, and blind them, it is not hard for him to dazell those of the body. For (out of doubt) by the same way that God passeth out, the Deuill entreth in, beginning with the fantasie, by which he doth more easily betray the other faculties of the soule: for the fantasie is most apt to bee abused by vaine apprehensions.

Maxima vis est phantasiæ ad errores.

Aquinas on the contrarie held that those Frogges were not imaginarie, but such indeed as they seemed: not made Magicæ artis ludibrio, which indeed agreeth not with the Art, but (according to THOMAS) Per aptam & idoneam agentium & patientium applicationem: By an apt and fit applying of agents and patients. And this I take to be more probable. For Moses could not bee deceiued by that sleight of false semblance; and Saint Augustine in another case like vnto this, (to wit) of the turning of Diomedes his Companions into Birds, per actiua cum passiuis, inclineth rather to this opinion: though I am not perswaded that Saint Augustine beleeued that of Diomedes. And this opinion of Thomas, G. Parisiensis a man very learned also confirmeth. For speaking of naturall Magicke hee vseth these words: De huiusmodi autem operibus est subita generatio ranarum, & pediculorum, & vermium, aliorumq; animalium querundam: in quibus omnibus sola natura operatur, verùm adhibitis adiutorijs, quæ ipsa semina naturæ confortant & acuunt, ita vt opus generationis tantum accelerent, vt eis qui hoc nesciunt non opus naturæ videatur (quæ tardius talia efficere consueuit) sed potentia Dæmonum, &c. to which he addeth: Qui autem in hijs docti sunt talia non mirantur, sed solum Creatorem in hijs glorificant: In such workes (sayth he) the sodaine generation of Frogges, and Lice, and Wormes, and some other creatures is: in all which Nature alone worketh; but by meanes strengthning the Seeds of Nature, and quickning them; in such wise that they so hasten the worke of generation, that it seemeth to the ignorant not to bee the worke of Nature, which vsually worketh more leisurely, but they thinke it is done by the power of Deuils. But they who are learned in these Arts maruaile not at such working, but glorifie the Creatour. Now by these theſe two wayes the Deuills doe moſt frequently worke, (to wit) by knowing the vttermoſt of nature; and by illuſion: for there is no incomprehenſible or vnſearchable power, but of God only.

For ſhall we ſay, he cauſeth ſometimes thunders, lightnings, and tempeſts; and can infect the ayre, as well as moue it or compreſſe it; who knowes not that theſe things are alſo naturall? Or may it be obiected that he fore-telleth things before they happen, which exceedeth nature, and is no illuſion? it is true, that he ſometimes doth it; but how? In elder ages he ſtole his knowledge out of the predictions of the Prophets: and he fore-told the death of Saul, at ſuch time as he was in his owne poſſeſſion and power to diſpoſe of. And he that hath liued from the infancie of the world to this day, and obſerued the ſucceſſe of euery counſaile: he that by reaſon of his ſwift motions can informe himſelfe of all places, and preparations: he that is of counſaile with al thoſe that ſtudie and practiſe ſubuerſion and deſtruction: he that is Prince of the ayre, and can thence better iudge, then thoſe that inhabite the earth: if he ſhould not ſometimes, yea if he ſhould not very oftentimes gheſſe rightly of things to come (where God pleaſeth not to giue impediment) it were very ſtrange. For we ſee that wiſe and learned men doe oftentimes by comparing like cauſes conceiue rightly of like effects, before they happen: and yet where the Deuill doubteth and would willingly keepe his credit, he euermore anſwereth by Riddles, as

Which anſwere may be taken either way: either for the ouerthrow of his owne Kingdome, or of his Enemies. And thus farre we grant the Deuill may proceed in predictions, which (otherwiſe) belong to God only; as it is in ESAY: Shew the things that are to come hereafter, that we may know that yee are Gods: ſhew vs at all times and certaynely what is to come. Solius enim diuinæ intelligentiæ ac ſapientiæ eſt, occulta noſſe & reuelare; It is only proper to Gods vnderſtanding and wiſedome, to know and reueale hidden things.

§. VIII.

That none was euer rayſed from the dead by the power of the Deuill: and that it was not the true SAMVEL which appeared to SAVL.

TO conclude, it may be obiected that the Deuill hath rayſed from the dead: and that others by his power haue done the like, as in the example giuen of Samuel rayſed by the Witch of Endor: which were it true, then might it indeed be affirmed, that ſome of the Deuils acts exceed all the powers of nature, falſe ſemblance, and other illuſions. Iuſtine Martyr was ſometimes of the opinion, that it was Samuel indeede: and ſo was Ambroſe, Lyra, and Burgenſis; from which authorities thoſe men borrow ſtrength which ſo beleeue. But Martyr changed his opinion: and ſo did S. Auguſtine, who at firſt ſeemed to be indifferent: For in his queſtions vpon the Old and New Teſtament, he accounteth it deteſtable to thinke that it was Samuel which appeared: and theſe be his wordes elſewhere to the ſame effect: In requie ſunt animæ piorum à corpore ſeparatæ, impiorum autem pœnas luunt, donec iſtarum ad vitam æternam, illarum verò ad æternam mortem quæ ſecunda dicitur corpora reuiuiſcant; The ſoules of the godly ſeparated from their bodies are at reſt, but thoſe of the wicked ſuffer puniſhment, till the bodies

And (besides S. Augustine) Iustine Martyr, Hilarius, Tertullian, Athanasius, Chrysostome, and others, beleeued firmely, and taught it: that the soules of men being once separate from their bodies, did not wander on the earth at all: Credere debemus (saith CYRIL) quum à corporibus sanctorum animæ abierint, tanquam in manus charissimi patris bonitati diuinæ commendari; We must beleeue when the soules of holy men are departed from their bodies, that they be commended to the diuine Goodnesse, as into the hands of a most deare Father. If then they be in Heauen, the power of the Deuill cannot stretch so high: if in Hell, Ab inferno nulla est redemptio; From hell there is no redemption. For there are but two habitations after death: Vnum (saith AVGVSTINE) in igne æterno; alterum in regno æterno; The one in eternall fire; the other in Gods eternall Kingdome. And though it be written in Iure Pontificio, that many there are who beleeue that the dead haue againe appeared to the liuing; yet the Glosse vpon the same Text findes it ridiculous: Credunt, & malè, quia sunt Phantasmata (saith the Glosse) They beleeue, and they beleeue amisse, because they be but Phantasmes, or Apparitions. For whereas any such voice hath beene heard, saying, I am the Soule of such a one: Hæc oratio à fraude atq; deceptione diabolica est; That speech is framed by the fraud and deception of the Deuill, saith Chrysostome. Likewise of the same, saith TERTVLLIAN: Absit vt animam cuiuslibet sancti, nedum Prophetæ, à dæmonio credamus extractam; God forbid that we shoula thinke that the soule of any holy man, much lesse of a Prophet, should be drawne vp againe by a Deuill.

It is true that the Scriptures call that apparition Samuel; so doe they the woodden images Cherubins: and false brazen gods are called gods, and the like. And whereas these of the contrarie opinion build vpon that place of the 26. of Ecclesiasticus (a booke not numbred among the Canonicall Scriptures, as S. Augustine himselfe in his Treatise, if it be his, De cura pro mortuis agenda, confesseth) yet Siracides following the literall sense and phrase of the Scriptures, proueth nothing at all: For though the Deuill would willingly perswade, that the soules (yea euen of iust men) were in his power, yet so farre is it from the promises of the Scriptures, and from Gods iust and mercifull nature, and so contrarie to all diuine reason, as Saint Augustine (or whosoeuer wrote that booke before cited) might rightly terme it a detestable opinion so to thinke. For if God had so absolutely forsaken Saul, that he refused to answere him either by dreames, by Vrim, or by his Prophets: it were sottish to conceiue, that he would permit the Deuil, or a wicked Witch, to raise a Prophet from the dead in Sauls respect: it being also contrarie to his owne diuine Law to aske counsaile of the dead; as in Deuteronomie 18. and elsewhere. Therefore it was the Deuill, and not the soule of a dead body, that gaue answere and aduice.

1. Kings 17. 12. 2. Kings 4. 34. Nullus enim magus aut dæmon mortuum verè vnquam excitauit, Wier. de fascin.

But because Helias and Helizeus had raised some from the dead by the power of God; those Deuils which S. Augustine calleth Iudificatores animantium sibi subiectorum; Mockers of their owne vassals, casting before their eyes a semblance of humane bodies, and framing sounds to their eares like the voyces of men, doe also perswade their graceless and accursed attendants, that themselues both possesse, and haue power ouer the soules of men. Eludit Diabolus aciem tum spectantium, tum etiam cogitantium, saith L. VIVES; The Deuill beguileth the sense both of the beholders, and of those that so imagine. These then are the bounds of the Deuils power, whom if we will not feare, we must feare to sinne. For when he is not the instrument of Gods vengeance, he can touch no man that makes not himselfe his voluntarie vassall: Potest ad malum inuitare, non potest trahere, saith S. AVGVSTINE, he can allure, but he cannot inforce to euill. Such as thinke otherwise, may goe into the number remembred by Lucretius.

CHAP. XII.

Of the memorable buildings of NINVS, and of his wife SEMIRAMIS: and of other of her acts.

§. I.

Of the magnificent building of Ninive by NINVS: and of Babylon by SEMIRAMIS.

BVt to come backe to Ninus the amplifier and finisher of Ninive: whether he performed it before or after the ouerthrow of Zoroaster, it is vncertayne. As for the Citie it selfe, it is agreed by all prophane Writers, and confirmed by the Scriptures, that it exceeded all other in circuit, and answerable magnificence. For it had in compasse 440. stadia, or furlongs; the walls whereof were an hundred foot vpright, and had such a bredth as three Charriots might passe on the Rampire in front: these walls were garnished with 1500. Towres which gaue exceeding beautie to the rest, and a strength no lesse admirable for the nature of those times. Iustin. l. 1. Diod. l. 2. Sabel. l. 8. 1.

But this Citie (built in the Plaines of Assyria, and on the bankes of Tigris, and in the Region of Eden) was founded long before Ninus time; and (as ancient Historians report, and more lately Nauclerus) had the name of Campsor, at such time as Ninus amplified the same, and gaue it a wall, and called it after his owne name.

For these workes of Babylon and Ninive begun by Nimrod in Chaldæa, and in Assyria, Ninus and Semiramis made perfect. Ninus finished Ninive, Semiramis Babylon: wherein shee sought to exceede her husband by farre. Indeed in the first Age when Princes were moderate, they neither thought how to inuade others, nor feared to be inuaded: labouring to build Townes and Villages for the vse of themselues and their people, without either Walls or Towres; and how they might discharge the earth of Woods, Bryars, Bushments, and Waters, to make it the more habitable and fertile. But Semiramis liuing in that Age, when Ambition was in strong youth: and purposing to follow the conquest which her husband had vnder-taken, gaue that beautie and strength to Babylon which it had. Herod. l. 1. Iustin. l. 1. Diod. l. 2. & 3.

§. II.

§. II.

Of the end of NINVS: and beginning of SEMIRAMIS reigne.

THis shee did after the death of her husband Ninus: who after he had mastred Bactria, and subiected vnto his Empire all those Regions betweene it and the Mediterran Sea and Hellespont (Asia the lesse excepted) and finished the worke of Ninive, he left the World in the yeere thereof 2019. after he had reigned 52. yeeres. Plutarch reporteth that Semiramis desired her husband Ninus, that he would grant vnto her the absolute soueraigne power for one day. Diod. Siculus out of Athenæus, and others, speakes of fiue dayes. In which time (moued either with desire of rule, or licentious libertie, or with the memorie of her husband Menon, who perished for her) shee caused Ninus her husband to be slaine. But this seemeth rather a scandall cast on her by the Greekes, then that it had any truth.

Howsoeuer Ninus came to his end, Semiramis tooke on her after his death the sole rule of the Assyrian Empire: of which, Ninus was said to be the first Monarch, because he changed his seat from Babylonia in Chaldæa to Niniue in Assyria. Iustin reports, that Semiramis (the better to inuest herselfe, and in her beginning without murmure or offence to take on her so great a charge) presented herselfe to the people in the person of her sonne Ninias or Zameis, who bare her externall forme and proportion without any sensible difference.

Ælian. l. 7. ex Didone.

This report I take also to be fayned, for which many arguments might be made. But as she ruled long, so she performed all those memorable acts which are written of her by the name of Semiramis, and subscribed that letter which shee sent to the King of India (her last challenge and vndertaken conquest) by her owne name. And were it true that her sonne Ninias had such a stature at his Fathers death, as that Semiramis (who was very personable) could be taken for him; yet it is very vnlikely that she could haue held the Empire from him 42. yeeres after by any such subtiltie: (for so long shee reigned after the death of her husband:) but it may be true that Ninias or Zameis (being wholly giuen to his pleasures, as it is written of him) was well pleased with his Mothers prosperous gouernement and vnder-takings.

§. III.

Of SEMIRAMIS parentage and education, and Metamorphosis of her Mother.

SOme Writers (of which Plutarch is one) make this famous woman to haue beene of base parentage, calling her after the name of her Countrey, a Syrian. Berosus calls her after the name of her Citie wherein shee was borne, Semiramis Ascalonitis; of Ascalon, the ancient Citie and Metropolis of the Philistims. Others report her to be the daughter of Derceta, a Curtizan of Ascalon, exceeding beautifull. Others say, that this Derceta or Dercetis, the Mother of Semiramis, was sometimes a Recluse, and had profest a holy and a religious life, to whom there was a Temple dedicated, seated on the banke of a Lake adioyning to Ascalon; and afterward falling in loue with a goodly yong man, she was by him made with child, which (for feare of extreme punishment) she conuayed away, and caused the same to be hidden among the high reedes which grew on the bankes of the Lake: in which (while the child was left to the mercy of wild beasts) the same was fed by certayne birds, which vsed to feede vpon or neere those waters. But I take this tale to be like that of Lupa the Harlot that fostered Romulus. For some one or other adioyning to this Lake, had the charge and fosteridge of this child, who being perchance but some base and obscure creature, the mother might thereby thereby hope the better to couer her diſhonor and breach of vow; notwithſtanding which ſhe was caſt from the top of her Temple into the Lake adioyning, and (as the Poets haue fayned) changed by Venus into a Fiſh, all but her face, which ſtill held the ſame beautie and humane ſhape. It is thought that from this Derceta the inuention of that Idoll of the Philiſtims (called Dagon) was taken: for it is true, that Dagon had a mans face, and a fiſhes body: into whoſe Temple when the Arke of God was brought, the Idoll fell twice to the grounde: and at the ſecond fall there remayned only the Trunke of Dagon, the head being broken off: For ſo S. Hierome hath conuerted that place. Vatablus, Pagninus, and Iunius, write it by Dagon onely, which ſignifieth a fiſh, and ſo it only appeared: the head thereof by the ſecond fall being ſundred from the body.

For my ſelfe I rather thinke, that this Dagon of the Philiſtims was an Idoll repreſenting Triton, one of thoſe imaginarie Sea-gods vnder Neptune. For this Citie being maritimate (as all thoſe of the Philiſtims were, and ſo were the beſt of Phœnicia) vſed all their deuotions to Neptune, and the reſt of the pettie gods which attended him.

§. IIII.

Of her Expedition into India, and death after diſcomfiture: with a note of the improbabilitie of her vices.

BVt for her Pedigree, I leaue it to the Aſſyrian Heralds: and for her vicious life, I aſcribe the report thereof to the enuious and lying Grecians. For delicacie and eaſe doe more often accompanie licentiouſneſſe in men and women, then labour and hazzard doe. And if the one halfe be true which is reported of this Lady, then there neuer liued any Prince or Princeſſe more worthy of fame then Semiramis was, both for the workes ſhe did at Babylon and elſewhere, and for the warres ſhe made with glorious ſucceſſe: all but her laſt enterpriſe of India; from whence both Strabo and Arianus report that ſhe neuer returned: and that of all her moſt powerfull Armie there ſuruiued but only twentie perſons: the reſt being either drowned in the Riuer of Indus, dead of the famine, or ſlaine by the ſword of Staurobates. But as the multitude which went out are more then reaſon hath numbred: ſo were thoſe that returned leſſe then could haue eſcaped of ſuch an Armie, as conſiſted of foure millions & vpwards. For theſe numbers which ſhe leuied by her Lieutenant Dercetæus (ſaith Suidas) did conſiſt of Foot-men three millions; of Horſe-men one million; of Charriots armed with hookes on each ſide one hundred thouſand; of thoſe which fought vpon Camels as many; of Camels for burden two hundred thouſand; of raw Hides for all vſes three hundred thouſand; of Galleyes with brazen heads three thouſand, by which ſhee might tranſport ouer Indus at once three hundred thouſand Souldiers: which Gallies were furniſhed with Syrians, Phœnicians, Cilicians, and men of Cyprus. Theſe incredible and impoſſible numbers, which no one place of the earth was able to nouriſh (had euery man and beaſt but fed vpon graſſe) are taken from the authority of Cteſias whom Diodorus followeth. But as the one may be taxed with many friuolous reports: ſo Diodorus himſelfe hath nothing of certaynetie, but from Xerxes expedition into Greece and afterwards: whoſe Armie (though the ſame was farre inferior to that of Semiramis) yet had it weight enough to ouerlode the beliefe of any reaſonable man. For all Authors conſent, that Xerxes tranſported into Greece an Armie of 1700000. and gathered together (therein to paſſe the Helleſpont) three thouſand Gallies, as Herodotus out of the ſeuerall Prouinces whence thoſe Galleyes were taken hath collected the number.

Suid. f. 845. lit. S.

But of what multitude ſoeuer the Armie of Semiramis conſiſted: the ſame being broken and ouerthrown by Staurobates vpon the banks of Indus, canticum cantauit extremum:

tremum: shee sang her last song; and (as Antiquitie hath fayned) was changed by the gods into a Doue (the bird of Venus) whence it came that the Babylonians gaue a Doue in their ensignes.

§. V.

Of the Temple of BELVS built by SEMIRAMIS: and of the Pyramides of Ægypt.

AMong all her other memorable and more then magnificent workes (besides the wall of the Citie of Babylon) was the Temple of Bel, erected in the middle of this Citie, inuironed with a wall carryed foure-square of great heighth and beautie, hauing on each square certayne brazen gates curiously engrauen. In the Core of the square she raised a Towre of a furlong high, which is halfe a quarter of a mile; and vpon it againe (taking a Basis of a lesse circuit) she set a second Towre; and so eight in all, one aboue another: vpon the top whereof the Chaldæans Priests made the obseruation of the starres, because this Towre ouer-topped the ordinarie cloudes.

By beholding the ruines of this Towre haue many Trauailers beene deceiued; who suppose that they haue seene a part of Nimrods Towre, when it was but the foundation of this Temple of Bel: (except this of Bel were founded on that of Nimrod.) There were burnt in this Temple one hundred thousand talents of frankincense euery yeere (saith Herodotus.) This Temple did Nabuchodonosor adorne with the spoiles of Hierusalem, and of the Temple of Salomon: all which vessels and ornaments Cyrus redeliuered. This temple Xerxes euened with the soile; which Alexander is said to haue repaired by the perswasions of the Chaldæans. I denie not that it might haue been in his desire so to doe; but he enioyed but a few yeeres after Babylon taken, and therefore could not performe any such worke. The Ægyptians (saith Proclus) inhabiting a low and leuell ground, and giuen to the same superstition of the starres that the Chaldæans were, erected in imitation, and for the same seruice and vse, the Pyramides by Memphis, which were conspicua vndiq; nauigantibus, saith Plinie. Of these Pyramides, Bellonius a carefull obseruer of rarities (who being in Ægypt mounted by steps to the top of the highest) maketh this report: Le meilleur archer qui serout a sa sommite, & tirant vne fleche en l'air, a peine pouroit l'ennoyer hors de sa base qu'elle ne se tombast sur les degrez; The best archer standing on the top of one of these Pyramides, and shooting an arrow from thence into the ayre as farre as he can, with great difficultie shall be able so to force the same, but that it will fall vpon some of the degrees or steps.

THE

THE FIRST PART OF THE HISTORIE OF THE WORLD:

INTREATING OF THE TIMES FROM The birth of ABRAHAM to the destruction of the Temple of Salomon.

THE SECOND BOOKE.

CHAP. I.

Of the time of the birth of ABRAHAM: and of the vse of this question, for the ordering of the Storie of the Assyrian Empire.

§. I.

Of some of the successours of SEMIRAMIS: with a briefe transition to the question, about the time of the birth of ABRAHAM.

AFTER the death of Semiramis, Ninias or Zameis succeeded her in the Empire, on whom Berosus Annianus bestowes the conquest of Bactria, and the ouerthrow of Zoroaster; contrary to Diodorus, Iustine, Orosius, and all other approued writers. For Ninias being esteemed no man of warre at all, but altogether feminine, and subiected to ease and delicacie, there is no probabilitie in that opinion. Now because there was nothing performed by this Ninias of any moment, other then that out of iealousie he euery yeere changed his Prouinciall Gouernors, and built Colledges for the Chaldean Priests, his Astronomers: nor by Arius his successor, whom Suidas calleth Thuras; but that he reduced againe the Bactrians and Caspians, reuolted as it seemeth in Ninias his time: nor of Aralius, the successor of Arius; but that he added sumptuosity, inuented iewels of gold and stone, and some engins for the warre: I will for this present passe them ouer, and a while follow Abraham, whose wayes are warrantable, (till wee meet these Assyrians againe in this story) by whom and by whose issues we shall best giue date to the Kings of Babylon: Abraham liuing at once with Ninus, Ninias, nias, Semiramis, Arius, Aralius, and Xerxes or Balanius. For otherwise if we seeke to proue things certaine by the vncertaine, and iudge of those times, which the Scriptures set vs down without error, by the raignes of the Assyrian Princes: we shall but patch vp the story at aduenture, and leaue it in the same confusion, in which to this day it hath remained. For where the Scriptures doe not helpe vs, Mirum non est in rebus antiquis Historiam non constare, No maruaile if then in things very ancient, History want assurance.

Plut. in Theseo.

The better therefore to finde out, in what age of the World, and how long these Assyrian Kings raigned, as also for other good causes, we must first assure the time of Abrahams birth, and in what yeere the same hapned after the floud. Now since all agree, that the fortieth three yeere of Ninus was the birth-yeere of Abraham; by prouing directly out of the Scriptures, in what yeere after the floud the birth of Abraham hapned, we shall thereby set all the rest in square and order. But of this time there is much iangling betweene those Chronologers, which follow the Hebrew account, and others: the most part making 292. or 293. yeeres; others 352. yeeres between Abrahams birth and the floud: a matter often disputed, but neuer concluded.

Archilochus de temporibus (as we finde him in Annius) makes but 250. yeeres from the floud to Ninus: then seeing that Abraham was borne in the fortieth three yeere of Ninus, according to Eusebius, and S. Augustine, it followeth by the addition of those two numbers, that the yeere of Abrahams birth was in the yeere after the floud 293. or as the most part of all Chronologers gather, the yeere 292.

Now, since I doe here enter into that neuer-resolued question, and Labyrinth of times, it behoueth me to giue reason for my owne opinion: and with so much the greater care and circumspection, because I walke aside, and in a way apart from the multitude; yet not alone, and without companions, though the fewer in number: with whom I rather choose to endure the wounds of those dartes, which Enuie casteth at nouelty, than to goe on safely and sleepily in the easie waies of ancient mistakings: seeing to be learned in many errors, or to be ignorant in all things, hath little diuersity.

§. II.

A proposall of reasons or arguments, that are brought to proue ABRAHAM was borne in the yeere 292. after the Floud, and not in the yeere 352.

THose which seeke to proue this account of 292. yeeres, betweene the generall floud and Abrahams birth, ground themselues, first on these words of the Scripture: So TERAH lined 70. yeeres, and begot ABRAHAM, NAHOR, and HARAN: secondly, vpon the opinion of Iosephus, S. Augustine, Beda, Isidore, and many of the ancient Hebrewes before them: authorities (while they are slightly lookt ouer) seeming of great weight.

From the place of Scripture last remembred, the latter Chronologers gather these arguments. First out of the wordes as they lie; that TERAH at 70. yeeres begot ABRAHAM, NAHOR and HARAN: and that Abraham being the first named, Abraham being the worthiest, Abraham being the sonne of the promise, ought in this respect to be accounted the eldest sonne of Terah, and so necessarily borne in the seuentieth yeere of his life. Secondly, it was of Abraham that Moses had respect, in whom the Church of God was continued, who was heire of the blessing; and not of Nahor and Haran: for the scope of this Chapter was to set downe the Genealogy of Christ, from Adam to Abraham, without all regard of Nahor, and Haran.

It is thirdly obiected, that if Abraham were not the eldest sonne, then there can bee no certainty of his age, and so are all future times made doubtfull. For it cannot then be proued, that Abraham was borne more assuredly in the 130. yeere of Terah his age, then in the 131. 132, &c. Moſes hauing no where ſet downe preciſely that Abraham went into Canaan that very yeere, in which his Father died.

Terah

Fourthly, it is thought improbable, that Terah begat Abraham at 130. yeere: ſeeing Abraham himſelfe thought it a wonder to be made a Father at 100. yeeres.

§. III.

The anſwere to one of the obiections propoſed, ſhewing that ABRAHAM made but one iourney out of Meſopotamia into Canaan: and it, after his Fathers death.

TO anſwere all which obiections it is very eaſie, the way being prepared thereto by diuers learned Diuines long ſince, and to which I will adde ſomewhat of mine owne, according to the ſmall talent which God hath giuen me. Now foraſmuch as the ſtate of the queſtion cannot well be ſcanned, vnleſſe the time of Abrahams iourney into Canaan be firſt conſidered of; before I deſcend vnto the particular examination of theſe arguments, I will make bold with order and method ſo farre, as to ſearch into a ſtrange tradition concerning his trauailes, that ſerueth as a ground for this opinion, and a bulwarke againſt all that can be ſaid to the contrary.

But it is conceiued that Abraham made two iournies into Canaan: the latter after his Fathers death, the former preſently vpon his calling, which he performed without all delay, not ſtaying for his fathers death at Haran: a coniecture, drawn from a place in the Epiſtle to the Hebrewes, where it is written, By faith ABRAHAM (when hee was called) obeyed God, to goe out into a place, which he ſhould afterward receiue for inheritance: and he went out, not knowing whither hee went. Heb. 11. 8. This ſuppoſition (if it bee granted) ſerues very well to vphold the opinion, that can ill ſtand without it. Let vs therefore ſee whether we may giue credit to the ſuppoſition it ſelfe.

Surely, that Abraham firſt departed Charran or Haran after the death of Terah his Father, the ſame is proued, without the admiſſion of any diſtinction, by theſe words of S. STEPHEN: And after his Father was dead, God brought him into this Land, where ye now dwell, that was, out of Haran into Canaan. Act. 7. 4. Againſt which place ſo direct, and plaine, what force hath any mans fancie or ſuppoſition, perſwading, that Abraham made two iourneys into Canaan; one before Terah's death, and another after: no ſuch thing being found in the Scriptures, nor any circumſtance, probability, or reaſon to induce it? For if any man out of this place before alleadged can picke any argument, prouing, or affording any ſtrong preſumption, that Abraham paſt into Canaan, and then returned vnto Haran, from whence he departed a ſecond time: then I thinke it reaſon, that he be beleeued in the reſt. Heb. 11. 8. But that hee performed the commandement of God after his Fathers death, leauing Vr and Haran for Canaan, it is as true as the Scriptures themſelues are true. For after his Father was dead, (ſaith the Martyr Stephen) God brought him into this Land. And, as Beza noteth, if Abraham made a double iourney into Canaan, then muſt it be inferred, that Moſes omitted the one, and Stephen afterwards remembred the other: and whence had Stephen, ſaith Beza, the knowledge of Abrahams comming into Canaan, but out of Moſes? For if Stephen had ſpoken any thing of thoſe times, differing from Moſes, he had offered the Iewes his aduerſaries too great an occaſion both of ſcandalizing himſelfe, and the Goſpell of Chriſt. Indeed we ſhall finde ſmall reaſon to make vs thinke that Abraham paſſed and repaſſed thoſe wayes, more often than he was enforced ſo to doe, if we conſider, that he had no other guide or comforter in this long and wearieſome iourney, than the ſtrength of his faith in Gods promiſe: in which if any thing would haue brought him to deſpaire, he had more cauſe then euer man had to fall into it. For hee came into a Region of ſtrong and ſtubborne nations: a Nation of valiant and reſolued Idolaters. He was beſieged with famine at his firſt arriuall, and driuen to flie into Ægypt for reliefe. His wife was olde, and he had no ſonne to inherit the promiſe. And when God had giuen him Iſaac, he commaunded him to offer him vp to himſelfe for Sacrifice: all which diſcomforts hee patiently and conſtantly vnderwent.

Secondly, let vs conſider the wayes themſelues, which Abraham had to paſſe ouer, the length whereof was 300. Engliſh miles: and through Countries of which he had no manner of experience. He was to tranſport himſelfe ouer the great riuer of Euphrates, to trauaile through the dangerous and barren Deſarts of Palmyrena, and to climbe ouer the great and high mountaines of Libanus, Hermon or Gilead: and whether theſe were eaſie walkes for Abraham to march twice ouer, containing, as aforeſaid, 300. miles in length, let euery reaſonable man iudge. For if hee trauailed it twice; then was his iourney in all 1800. miles from Vr to Haran: and from Haran twice into Canaan. But were there no other argument to diſproue this fancie; the manner of Abrahams departing from Haran hath more proofe, that hee had not animum reuertendi, not any thought of looking backward, than any mans bare coniecture, be he of what antiquity or authority ſoeuer. For thus it is written of him, Then ABRAHAM tooke SARA his wife, and LOT his brothers ſonne, and all their ſubſtance that they poſſeſt, and the ſoules that they had gotten in Haran: and they departed to go to the land of Canaan, and to the Land of Canaan they came. Now if Abraham brought all with him that was deare vnto him; his wife, and kinſmen, and his, and their goods: it is not probable that he meant to walke it backe againe for his pleaſure, in ſo warme, dangerous, and barren a Country as that was: or if hee could haue beene thereto mooued, it is more likely that he would haue then returned, when he was yet vnſettled, and preſt with extreme famine at his firſt arriuall. For had his Father beene then aliue, hee might haue hoped from him to receiue more aſſured comfort and reliefe, then among the Ægyptians, to whom hee was a meere ſtranger both in Religion and Nation.

Gen. 12. 5.

What the cauſe might bee of Abrahams returne to Haran, as I will not enquire of them, that without warrant from the Scriptures haue ſent him backe thither, about the time of his fathers death: ſo they perhaps, if they were vrged, could ſay little elſe, than that without ſuch a ſecond voyage their opinion were not maintainable. One thing in good reaſon they ſhould doe well to make plaine, if it be not ouer-troubleſome. They ſay that Abraham was in Haran at his Fathers death, or ſome time after, being then by their account 135. yeeres old, or a little more. How then did it happen, that he left quite vndone the buſineſſe, which as wee reade, was within foure or fiue yeeres after that time his greateſt, or (as may ſeeme) his onely care? Did not he binde with a very ſolemne oath his principall ſeruant, in whom hee repoſed moſt confidence, to trauaile into thoſe parts, and ſeeke out a wife for Iſaac his ſonne? and doth it not appeare by all circumſtances, that neither he nor his ſeruant were ſo well acquainted in Meſopotamia, that they could particularly deſigne any one woman, as a fit match for Iſaac? Surely if Abraham had beene there in perſon ſo lately, as within foure or fiue yeeres before, hee would not haue forgotten a matter of ſuch importance; but would haue truſted his owne iudgement, in chooſing a woman, fit for her piety, vertue, and other deſireable qualities, to be linked in marriage with his onely ſonne, who was then 35. yeeres old; before which age moſt of the Patriarches after the floud had begotten children, rather than haue left all at randome to the conſideration of a ſeruant, that neither knew any, nor was knowne of any in that Country. But let it be ſuppoſed (if it may be beleeued) that either Abraham forgot this buſineſſe when he was there, or that ſomewhat hapned which no man can deuiſe. What might be the reaſon, that Abrahams man, in doing his maſters errand, was faine to lay open the whole ſtory of his maſters proſperity, telling it as newes, that Sarah had borne to him a ſonne in her old age? If Abraham himſelfe, a more certaine Author, had ſo lately beene among them, would not all this haue beene an idle tale? It were needleſſe to ſtand long vpon a thing ſo euident

Gen. 24.

Gen. 24. 35, 36. &c.

Wheter.

Whether it were lawful for Abraham to haue returned back to Haran, would perhaps be a question hardly answerable: considering how auerse hee was from permitting his sonne to bee carried thither, euen though a wife of his owne kindred could not haue beene obtained without his personall presence. Iacob indeed was sent thither by his parents, to take a wife of his owne linage; not without Gods especial approbation, by whose blessing he prospered in that iourney: yet hee lined there as a seruant; suffered many iniuries; and finally was driuen to conuey himselfe away from thence by flight. For although it bee not a sentence written, yet out of all written examples it may be obserued, that God alloweth not in his seruants any desire of returning to the place, from whence hee hath taken, and transplanted them. That briefe saying, Remember Lots wife, containes much matter. Let vs but consider Mesopotamia from whence Abraham was taken, and Ægypt, out of which the whole nation of the Israelites was deliuered: we shall finde, that no blessing issued from either of them, to the posterity of the Hebrewes. When Ezechias was visited with an honourable Embassie from Babel, it seemes that hee conceiued great pleasure in his minde, and thought it a piece of his prosperity; but the prophecy which thereupon he heard by Esai, made him to know, that the counsaile of God was not agreeable to such thoughts: which more plainely appeared in a following generation, when by the waters of Babylon they sate downe and wept. Concerning Ægypt we reade, that Sesac and Neco Kings of Ægypt brought calamitie vpon Israel: also that their confidence in the Ægyptian succours was the cause of their destruction. Where they were forbidden to return into Ægypt I doe not remember, nor can readily find; but it is found in Deuteronomie, that God had said, They shou'd no more returne that way; which is giuen, as the reason, why their King might not cause the people to returne to Ægypt, for the muliplying of his Horses. Whether the Lord had laied any such iniunction vpon Abraham of not returning to Mesopotamia, I cannot say; many things do argue it probably: that hee neuer did returne, all circumstances do (to my vnderstanding) both strongly and necessarily conclude.

Gen.24.6. & 8. Gen.28. 2.Kings.20. Psal.137. 1.Kin.14.25. & 2.Kin.23.v.29. Deut.17.v.16.

But because this double passage of Abrahams is but an imagination: and that imaginations of men are rather valuable among children, than that they can perswade those of iudgement or vnderstanding: I take it sufficient, that S. Stephen hath directly taught vs, that Abraham left Haran, his Father being dead. And for the rest, when they shew any one Scripture to proue it, I will beleeue as they doe. For all the trauailes of Abraham are precisely set downe in the Scriptures: as first from Vr or Camerina in Chaldæa to Haran or Charran: and then from Haran (after his Fathers death) to Sichem; from Sichem he remooued to a mountaine betweene Bethel and Haie: thence into Ægypt: from Ægypt hee returned thither againe, where Lot and he parted, because their flockes and heards of Cattle were more, then could bee fed in that part: from thence the second time hee remooued to Mamre, neere Hebron: and thence hauing pursued Amraphel, and rescued Lot, hee after inhabited at Gerar, in the border of Idumæa, vnder Abimelec: and after neere vnto it at Bersabe, at which time hee was ready to offer vp his sonne Isaac on the mountaine Moriah. But this fiction of his retrait to Haran or Charran, appeareth not in any one story, either diuine or humane. Now if it may bee supposed, that Abraham had made any former iourney into Canaan, as Leuita in his Cabala hath fained; it should in reason bee therewithall beleeued, that he would in those his first trauailes haue prouided himselfe of some certaine seat, or place of abiding: and not haue come a second time, with his wife, kinsmen, familie, goods and Cattle, not knowing whereon to rest himselfe. But Abraham, when he came from Charran, past through the North part of Canaan, thence to Sichem, and the Plaine of Moriah: where finding no place to inhabite, he departed thence to Bethel and Haie: and so from Nation to Nation, to discouer and finde out some fit habitation: from whence againe, as it is written in Genesis the eleuenth, He went foorth going and iourneying towards the South: and alwayes vnsettled. By occasion of which wandring to and fro, some say, the Ægyptians gaue him and

Gen.12.v.6.

Mont. in Caleb. his the name of Hebræi. Further, to proue that hee had not formerly beene in the Countrie, we may note, that ere he came to Bethel and Haie, and at his first entrance into Canaan, God appeared vnto him, saying, Vnto thy seed will I giue this Land, shewing it him as vnto a stranger therein, and as a land to him vnknowne. For Abraham without any other prouident care for himselfe, beleeued in the word of the liuing God: neither sending before, nor comming first to discouer it; but being arriued, he receiued a second promise from God, that hee would giue those Countries vnto him and his seede to inhabit and inherit.

Lastly, what should moue any man to thinke, that Moses would haue omitted any such double iourney of Abrahams, seeing hee setteth downe all his passages elsewhere, long and short? as when he moued from Sichem, and seated betweene Haie and Bethel; the distance being but twenty miles: and when he moued thence to the valley of Mamre, being but twentie foure miles: and when hee left Mamre, and sate downe at Gerar, being lesse then sixe miles; no, Moses past ouer all the times of the first age with the greater breuity, to hasten him to the story of Abraham: shutting vp all betweene the Creation and the Floud in six chapters; which age lasted 1656. yeeres: but hee bestoweth on the story of Abraham fourteene chapters, beginning with his birth in the eleuenth, and ending with his death in the fiue and twentieth; and this time endured but 175. yeere. It hath therefore no face of trueth, that Moses forgot or neglected any thing concerning Abrahams trauailes, or other actions: or that hee would set downe those small remooues of fiue miles, and omit those of three hundred. For such a iourney in going and comming would haue ministred some varietie of matter, or accident, worthie the inserting and adding to Abrahams storie.

§. IIII.

The answere to another of the obiections proposed, shewing that it was not vnlikely, that TERAH should beget ABRAHAM in his hundred and thirty yeere.

NOw touching the obiection, where it is said, that it was very vnlikely that Terah should beget Abraham in his 130. yeere, seeing Abraham himselfe thought it a wonder to haue a sonne at an hundred: this is hardly worth the answering. This wonder is indeed miscast, and mistaken: Abraham hauing respect only to Sarah his wife, when he spake of their many yeeres. For when the Angell saide vnto Abraham in his Tent doore at Mamre; Loe, SARAH thy wife shall haue a Sonne, it followeth in the next verse, Now ABRAHAM and SARAH were olde and stricken in age, and it ceased to be with SARAH after the manner of women: therefore SARAH laughed, &c.

So then, in that it is said, it ceased to be with SARAH after the manner of women, it appeareth that the wonder was wrought on her, & not on Abraham. For Abraham by his secõd wife Keturah had many sons after Sarah's death, as Zimron, Iockshan, Medan, Midian, Ishbak, and Shuah: and the eldest of these was borne 37. yeeres after Isaac: and the yongest 40. yeeres after. What strangenesse then, that Terah being 130. yeeres old should beget Abraham, will they say, may bee gathered from this supposed despaire of Abraham at one hundred yeeres? For Sarah died in the yeere of the world 2145. and Isaac was borne in the yeere 2109; and Abraham did not marry Keturah till Sarah was buried. So if wee deduct the number of 2109. out of 2145. there remaineth 36. And therefore if Abraham begat fiue sonnes 36. yeeres after this supposed wonder, and when Abraham was 137. yeeres old: it is not strange that his Father Terah should beget Abraham at 130. And if Booz, Obed, and Iesse, who liued so many yeeres and ages after Abraham, begat sons at 100. yeeres, or neere it, it cannot be mer-nailed at, that Terah begat Abraham at 130; and Abraham others at the same age and seuen yeeres after.

§. V.

The answere to two more of the obiections: shewing that wee may haue certaintie of ABRAHAMS age from the Scripture, though we make not ABRAHAM the eldest Sonne: and that there was great cause, why in the story of ABRAHAM his two brethren should be respected.

IT followeth now to speake something to the obiection, which brings Abrahams age altogether in doubt, except we allow him to be the eldest sonne of Terah, and borne when Terah was 70. yeeres old. For Abrahams age being made vncertaine, all succeeding times are thereby without any perfect rule or knowledge.

But this proposition, That wee cannot be certaine of Abrahams age, vnlesse we make him the eldest sonne, is false. For it is plaine in the Scriptures, that when Terah was 205. which was the yeere of his death, then was Abraham 75. And if you aske, how I can iudge of times, either preceding or succeeding, by knowing that Abraham departed Haran at that age: I answere, that S. Stephen hath told vs, that Abrahams departure followed the death of his Father Terah: and Terah died at 205; so as the 75. yeere of Abraham was the 205. yeere of Terah: which knowne, there can be no error in the account of times succeeding. Now to come to the obiection, where it is said, That Moses had no respect vnto Nachor and Haran, because they were out of the Church, but to Abraham onely, with whom God established the Couenant, and of whom Christ descended according to the flesh, &c. I answere, that Moses for many great and necessary causes had respect of Nachor and Haran. For the succession of Gods Church is not witnessed by Abraham alone, but by the issues of Nahor and Haran, were they Idolaters or otherwise. For Nahor was the Father of Bethuel, & Bethuel of Rebecca, the mother of Israel: & Haran was the parent of Lot, Sarah, and Milcah: and Sarah was mother to Isaac, and grandmother to Iacob: Milcah also the wife of Nahor, and mother of Bethuel, was Iacobs great grandmother: and the age of Sarah the daughter of Haran is especially noted, in that it pleased God to giue her a sonne at 90. yeeres, and when by nature she could not haue conceiued. And therefore, though it were not in regard of themselues, yet because both Nahor and Abraham married the daughters of their brother Haran; and because Isaac married Rebecca the grand-childe of Nahor; and Iacob, Lea, and Rachel, the daughters of Laban, the grand-childe also of Nahor: It was not superfluous in Moses to giue light of these mens times and ages. And though sometime they worshipped strange Gods, as it is Ios. 24. 2. yet I see no cause to thinke, that they still continued Idolaters. For they beleeued and obeyed the calling of Abraham, leauing their naturall Countrey, and Citie of Vr in Chaldaa, as Abraham did, and remooued thence all, except Haran, who died before his Father Terah, ere they left Chaldaa; but Lot, his sonne, followed Abraham into Canaan; and Sarah, the sister of Lot, Abraham married. Nabor also, who remained at Charran, gaue his sonnes daughters to Isaac, and Iacob, his own kinsemen: he himselfe hauing also married in his owne family; not thinking it pleasing vnto God to mixe themselues with strangers and Idolaters. And that these men at length beleeued in the God of Abraham, it can no way be doubted. For when Laban had seene the seruant of Abraham standing at the Well beside Charran, hee inuited him to his Fathers house in this manner: Come in, thou blessed of IEHOVAH, &c. And when this seruant of Abrahams demanded an answere as touching Rebecca, then answered Laban and Bethuel, and said; This thing is proceeded of IEHOVAH: meaning that it was the will of the true God it should be so; wherein he acknowledged Gods prouidence. Likewise in the following verse it is written; Take, take, goe that shee may bee thy thy Masters sonnes wife, euen as IEHOVAH hath said. This their often vsing of the name of IEHOVAH, which is the proper Name of the true God, is a signe that they had the knoledge of him.

Now although it be the opinion of Saint Chrysostome, and some later writers, as Caietan, Oleaster, Musculus, Caluin, Mercer, and others, that Laban was an Idolater, because he retained certaine Idols, or houshold Gods, which Rachel stole from him; yet that he beleeued in the true God it cannot bee denied. For hee acknowledgeth the God of Abraham and of Nahor, and he called Abrahams seruant, blessed of IEHOVAH, as aforesaid. So as for my selfe I dare not auow, that these men were out of the Church, who sure I am were not out of the faith.

§. VI.

That the naming of ABRAHAM first of the three brethren, Gen. 11. v. 26. doth not proue that hee was the eldest: together with diuers reasons prouing that ABRAHAM was not the eldest sonne of TERAH.

TO the maine obiection which I answere last, because it seemeth of most strength, by which, those that striue to shorten the times, endeuour to proue that Abraham was the eldest sonne of Terah, and borne in the 70. yeere of Terahs life: grounding themselues first and chiefly on this place of the Scripture, And TERAH liued 70. yeeres and begat ABRAHAM, NAHOR, and HARAN: To this I say, that although Abraham in this verse be first named, yet the same is no proofe at all that he was the eldest & first born sonne of Terah. For it is no necessary consequence, that the first named in Scriptures was therefore eldest in bloud and birth, neither doth it appeare, that it pleased God to make especiall choice of the first sonnes in nature and time: for Seth was not the first borne of Adam; nor Isaac of Abraham; nor Iacob of Isaac; nor Iuda and Ioseph of Iacob: nor Dauid the eldest of Iesse; nor Salomon of Dauid: as is formerly remembred.

Gen. 11. v 26.

But it is written of NOAH; NOAH was 500. yeres old, and NOAH begat SHEM, HAM, and IAPHET: shewing that at the 500. yeere of his age he began to beget the first of those three sonnes. For according to S. Augustine, speaking generally, Nec attendendus est in his ordo natiuitatis, sed significatio futuræ dignitatis: in qua excelluit ABRAHAM. The order of natiuitie is not here to be respected, but the signification of the future dignitie: in which ABRAHAM was preferred. And therefore, as in the order of the sonnes of Noah: so is it here; where it is said, that TERAH liued 70. yeeres, and begat ABRAHAM, NAHOR, and HARAN: For it was late ere Terah began to beget Sonnes, himselfe being begotten by his Father Nachor at 29. as other his Ancestors were at 30. The like also happened to Noah: for whereas Adam begat Seth at 130; Enosh Kenan at 90; Kenan Mahalaleel at 70; Mahalaleel Iered at 60: Noah was yet 500. yeeres old when he began to beget the first of his three sonnes, as aforesaid. And S. Augustine in the place before cited, rather inclineth to the opinion that Abraham was the yongest of Terahs sonnes, then otherwise: though for his excellencie he was worthily named first. His owne words are these: Fieri enim potuit vt posterior sit generatus ABRAHAM: sed merito excellentiæ, quæ in Scripturis valdè commendatur, prior fuerit nominatus. It might be, saith he, that ABRAHAM was begotten later: but was first named in regard of his excellencie, for which in Scripture he is much commended. So as the naming first or last proueth nothing who was first or last borne: either in those issues of Noah, or in these of Terah: Neither hath God any respect of the eldest in nature, as touching his election or spirituall blessing, for Moses nameth first the children of the promise, and the eldest and first in Gods fauour. Pietas ergò vel ipsa potiùs electio diuina, quæ comitem secum trahit pietatem, & Dei timorem, primas partes dat SEMO in liberis NOA, & ABRAHAMO in liberis THARE. Pietie, saith he, or rather diuine election election, which doth euermore draw with it or after it pietie and the feare of God, gaue place and precedencie to SEM among the children of NOAH, and to ABRAHAM among thoſe of Thare.

For the reſt it is manifeſt, that Abraham entred Canaan in the 75. yeere of his age. And it was in Canaan that Hagar bare him Iſmael, when Abraham had liued 86. yeeres. Gen.12.4. It was at Gerar (the South border of Canaan) that Sarah bare Iſaac, when Abraham Gen.16.16. had conſumed 100. yeeres. It was from the valley of Mamre in Canaan that Abraham roſe out, when he reſcued Lot and ouerthrew Amraphel: and he had then but the age of 83. yeeres: and it is as manifeſt that he parted from Haran after his Father Act.7.4.& Terah was dead. But if Terah begat Abraham at 70. yeere old, then muſt Abraham Gen.14. haue beene 135. yeeres when hee firſt ſet his foote in Canaan: ſeeing Terah muſt bee dead ere he parted, and ſo 70. added to 135. made 205, the true age of Terah, which is contrary to all thoſe places of Scripture before remembred. For hee entred at 75: hee reſcued Lot at 83: hee had Iſmael at 86: hee had Iſaac at 100. proued by the former places.

Moreouer, if Abraham were the eldeſt ſonne of Terah, and borne in the 70. yeere of his age: then had Terah liued till Iſaac had beene 35. yeeres old, and Iſmael 49. both which muſt then haue been borne in Meſopotamia, and therein foſtered to that age: vnleſſe we ſhould either denie credit to S. Stephen, who ſaith that Abraham departed from Meſopotamia after his Fathers death: or elſe giue credit to the interpretation of Daniel Angelocrator, who in his Chronologia antoptica, ſaith it was about his Fathers death: becauſe the Greeke word, μετὰ, may bee tranſported by the Latine ſub, aſwell as by poſt: which though elſewhere it may bee, yet cannot it be ſo in this place. For it were moſt improperly ſpoken, to ſay that thoſe things were done about Terahs death, which were 60. yeeres before. Wherefore ſuppoſing Abraham to haue beene borne in the 70. yeere of Terah; we muſt giue thoſe times and places of birth to Abrahams children, which no authoritie will warrant; For Abraham had no children in Vr of Chaldea, nor in Haran: nor in 10. yeeres after his arriuall into Canaan. For the yeere of Terahs death, in which Abraham left Haran, was the yeere of the World 2083. and the yeere of Iſmaels birth was the Worlds yeere 2094: which maketh 10. yeeres difference. And that Iſaac was borne in Canaan, and was to bee offered vpon the mountaine Moriah therein, 39. miles from Berſabe, where Abraham then inhabited: and that three Angels firſt of all appeared to Abraham in the valley of Mamre, no man doubteth.

And therefore it cannot be that any of Abrahams ſonnes were borne in Meſopotamia; nor while Terah liued; nor in leſſe then 10. yeeres after Terahs death: and conſequently was not Abraham the eldeſt ſonne of Terah, nor borne in the 70. yeere of Terahs age.

Thirdly, whereas Abraham came into Canaan at 75: if Terah had begotten him at 70, then had Terah liued but 145. for 70. and 75. make 145. which muſt alſo haue Gen.12. been the full age of Terah: but Terah liued 205. yeere: and therefore was not Abraham borne in the 70. yeere of Terah.

Fourthly, the ages of Lot and Sarah make it manifeſt, that Haran was the elder, if not the eldeſt brother of Abraham; for Sarah or Iſcah wanted but 10. yeeres of Abrahams age: Iſaac beeing borne when Abraham was 100. and Sarah 90. yeeres olde.

It followeth then, that if Abraham had beene the elder brother of Haran, Haran muſt haue begotten Sarah at 9. yeeres old: for granting that Harah was borne but one yeere after Abraham, and Sarah within 10. yeres as old as Abraham, then of neceſſitie muſt Haran beget her, when hee had liued but 9. yeeres; which were too ridiculous to imagine.

And that Iſcah was Sarah, Rab. Solomon affirmeth; both names, ſaith he, bearing the ſame ſignification; and names of principalitie. Againe, to what end was the word Iſcah or Iſhcah inſerted in this place, if Sarah were not meant thereby? for to thy Masters sonnes wife, euen as IEHOVAH hath said. This their often vsing of the name of IEHOVAH, which is the proper Name of the true God, is a signe that they had the knoledge of him.

Now although it be the opinion of Saint Chrysostome, and some later writers, as Caietan, Oleaster, Musculus, Caluin, Mercer, and others, that Laban was an Idolater, because he retained certaine Idols, or houshold Gods, which Rachel stole from him; yet that he beleeued in the true God it cannot bee denied. So as for my selfe I dare not auow, that these men were out of the Church, who sure I am were not out of the faith.

§. VI.

That the naming of ABRAHAM first of the three brethren, Gen. 11. v. 26. doth not proue that hee was the eldest: together with diuers reasons prouing that ABRAHAM was not the eldest sonne of TERAH.

TO the maine obiection which I answere last, because it seemeth of most strength, by which, those that striue to shorten the times, endeuour to proue that Abraham was the eldest sonne of Terah, and borne in the 70. yeere of Terahs life: grounding themselues first and chiefly on this place of the Scripture, And TERAH liued 70. yeeres and begat ABRAHAM, NAHOR, and HARAN: To this I say, that although Abraham in this verse be first named, yet the same is no proofe at all that he was the eldest & first born sonne of Terah. Gen. 11. v. 26.

But it is written of NOAH; NOAH was 500. yeres old, and NOAH begat SHEM, HAM, and IAPHET: shewing that at the 500. yeere of his age he began to beget the first of those three sonnes. For according to S. Augustine, speaking generally, Nec attendendus est in his ordo natiuitatis, sed significatio futuræ dignitatis: in qua excelluit ABRAHAM. The order of natiuitie is not here to be respected, but the signification of the future dignitie: in which ABRAHAM was preferred. And therefore, as in the order of the sonnes of Noah: so is it here; where it is said, that TERAH liued 70. yeeres, and begat ABRAHAM, NAHOR, and HARAN: For it was late ere Terah began to beget Sonnes, himselfe being begotten by his Father Nachor at 29. as other his Ancestors were at 30. The like also happened to Noah: for whereas Adam begat Seth at 130; Enosh Kenan at 90; Kenan Mahalaleel at 70; Mahalaleel Iered at 60: Noah was yet 500. yeeres old when he began to beget the first of his three sonnes, as aforesaid. And S. Augustine in the place before cited, rather inclineth to the opinion that Abraham was the yongest of Terahs sonnes, then otherwise: though for his excellencie he was worthily named first. His owne words are these: Fieri enim potuit vt posterior sit generatus ABRAHAM: *sed merito excellentiæ, qua in Scripturis valdè commendatur, prior fuerit nominatus. election, which doth euermore draw with it or after it pietie and the feare of God, gaue place and precedencie to SEM among the children of NOAH, and to ABRAHAM among those of Thare.

For the rest it is manifest, that Abraham entred Canaan in the 75. yeere of his age. And it was in Canaan that Hagar bare him Ismael, when Abraham had liued 86. yeeres. Gen.12.4. It was at Gerar (the South border of Canaan) that Sarah bare Isaac, when Abraham had consumed 100. yeeres. It was from the valley of Mamre in Canaan that Abraham rose out, when he rescued Lot and ouerthrew Amraphel: and he had then but the age of 83. yeeres: and it is as manifest that he parted from Haran after his Father Act.7.4.& Terah was dead. But if Terah begat Abraham at 70. yeere old, then must Abraham Gen.14. haue beene 135. yeeres when hee first set his foote in Canaan: seeing Terah must bee dead ere he parted, and so 70. added to 135. made 205, the true age of Terah, which is contrary to all those places of Scripture before remembred. For hee entred at 75: hee rescued Lot at 83: hee had Ismael at 86: hee had Isaac at 100. proued by the former places. Gen.16.16.

Moreouer, if Abraham were the eldest sonne of Terah, and borne in the 70. yeere of his age: then had Terah liued till Isaac had beene 35. yeeres old, and Ismael, 49. both which must then haue been borne in Mesopotamia, and therein fostered to that age: vnlesse we should either denie credit to S. Stephen, who saith that Abraham departed from Mesopotamia after his Fathers death: or else giue credit to the interpretation of Daniel Angelocrator, who in his Chronologia antoptica, saith it was about his Fathers death: because the Greeke word, μετὰ, may bee transported by the Latine sub, aswell as by post: which though elsewhere it may bee, yet cannot it be so in this place. For it were most improperly spoken, to say that those things were done about Terahs death, which were 60. yeeres before. Wherefore supposing Abraham to haue beene borne in the 70. yeere of Terah; we must giue those times and places of birth to Abrahams children, which no authoritie will warrant; For Abraham had no children in Vr of Chaldea, nor in Haran: nor in 10. yeeres after his arriuall into Canaan. For the yeere of Terahs death, in which Abraham left Haran, was the yeere of the World 2083. and the yeere of Ismaels birth was the Worlds yeere 2094: which maketh 10. yeeres difference. And that Isaac was borne in Canaan, and was to bee offered vpon the mountaine Moriah therein, 39. miles from Bersabe, where Abraham then inhabited: and that three Angels first of all appeared to Abraham in the valley of Mamre, no man doubteth.

And therefore it cannot be that any of Abrahams sonnes were borne in Mesopotamia; nor while Terah liued; nor in lesse then 10. yeeres after Terahs death: and consequently was not Abraham the eldest sonne of Terah, nor borne in the 70. yeere of Terahs age.

Thirdly, whereas Abraham came into Canaan at 75: if Terah had begotten him at 70, then had Terah liued but 145. for 70. and 75. make 145. which must also haue been the full age of Terah: but Terah liued 205. yeere: and therefore was not Abraham borne in the 70. yeere of Terah. Gen.12.4.

Fourthly, the ages of Lot and Sarah make it manifest, that Haran was the elder, if not the eldest brother of Abraham; for Sarah or Iscah wanted but 10. yeeres of Abrahams age: Isaac beeing borne when Abraham was 100. and Sarah 90. yeeres olde.

It followeth then, that if Abraham had beene the elder brother of Haran, Haran must haue begotten Sarah at 9. yeeres old: for granting that Haran was borne but one yeere after Abraham, and Sarah within 10. yeres as old as Abraham, then of necessitie must Haran beget her, when hee had liued but 9. yeeres; which were too ridiculous to imagine.

And that Iscah was Sarah, Rab. Solomon affirmeth; both names, saith he, bearing the same signification; and names of principalitie. Againe, to what end was the word Iscah or Iisheah inserted in this place, if Sarah were not meant thereby? For to speake of any thing superfluous it is not vsed in Gods Bookes: and if Iscah had not belonged to the story, it had been but an idle name to no purpose remembred.

Now if it had been true (as those of the contrary opinion affirme) that Moses had no respect of Nachor and Haran, who were notwithstanding the parents of Bethuel and Rebecca, the mother of Israel, and of Christ: what regard then had Moses of Iscah in this place, were she not Sarah, but otherwise an idle name of whom there is nothing else first or last.

The age also of Lot disproueth the eldership of Abraham: for Lot was called an old man when Abraham was but 83. yeeres: And if Lot were of a greater age than Abraham, and Haran were Father to Lot, Sarah, and Milcah, Abraham marrying one of Harans daughters, and Nahor the other, Sarah also being within ten yeeres as old as Abraham: it may appeare to euery reasonable man (not obstinate and preiudicate) that Haran was the eldest sonne of Terah, and not Abraham: who also died first and before his Father left Vr in Chaldea. Also Lyra reasoneth against the opinion of Abrahams eldership, vpon the same place of Genesis: drawing argument from the age of Sarah, who was but 10. yeeres yonger than Abraham himselfe. Lyra his wordes are these: Si igitur HARAN fuit iunior ipso ABRAHAM, sequitur quòd non habebat decem annos quando genuit SARAM: imò nec octo, &c. and afterward, & ideò melius videtur dicendum, quòd ABRAHAM fuit vltimò natus de tribus filijs THARE, tamen nominatur primò, propter eius dignitatem: & quia ponendus erat caput stirpis & generationis sequentis: & quia primò facta est ei repromissio expressa de CHRISTO, sicut supra dictum est de SEM, &c. If therefore (saith Lyra) HARAN was yonger then ABRAHAM himselfe, it followeth that he was not ten yeeres old when he begat SARAH: And therefore it seemeth better to be said, that ABRAHAM was the last borne of the three sonnes of THARE, neuertheless he is named first for his dignitie, both because he was to be ordained head of the stocke and generation following, and because the promise of CHRIST was first made vnto him, as before it is said of SEM.

The conclusion of this dispute, noting the Authors on both sides: with an admonition that they which shorten the times, make all ancient stories the more vnprobable.

IT therefore agreeth with the Scriptures, with Nature, Time, and Reason, that Haran was the eldest sonne of Terah, and not Abraham: and that Abraham was borne in the 130. yeere of Terahs life, and not in the 70. yeere. For Abraham departing Charran after Terah died, according to S. Stephen, and that iourney by Abraham performed when hee was 75. yeeres old, these two numbers added make 205. yeeres, the full age of Terah: seeing that when Terah died, then Abraham entred Canaan. For my selfe, I haue no other end herein then to manifest the truth of the Worlds Story: I reuerence the iudgements of the Fathers: but I know they were mistaken in particulars. Saint Augustine was doubtfull, and could not determine this controuersie. For whatsoeuer is borrowed from him out of his 16. Booke de Ciuitate Dei, ca. 15. the same may bee answered out of himselfe in his fine and twentieth question vpon Gen. But S. Augustine herein followed Iosephus, and Isidor: and Beda followed S. Augustine. And it was out of a foolish pride and vanitie, that the Hebrews and Iosephus sought to make Abraham the first borne: as if God had had respect to the eldest in nature. So did Iosephus together with Nicholas Damascenus (thinking thereby to glorifie the Iewish Nation) make Abraham a king, entitling Sarah by the name of Queene Sarah: and said that Abraham was followed with 318. Captaines, of which euery one had an infinite multitude vnder him: trecentos & octodecem præfectos habuit:

Act. 7. 4.

habuit: quorum ſingulis infinita multitudo parebat. And that Pharao inuading him with a great armie, tooke from him his wife Sarah: Such fables argue that Ioſephus is not to be beleeued, but with diſcreet reſeruations.

This account of times, allowing no more than 292. yeeres from the Floud to Abraham, is vpheld by many of the Hebrews. But how ſhould wee value the opinion of ſuch Chronologers, as take Amraphel for Nimrod? Surely, if their iudgement in ſuch matters were worthy to be regarded, it would haue appeared in ſetting downe the ſucceſſion of the Perſian Kings, vnder whom they liued, whoſe Hiſtorie was not ſo farre remote in time, as theſe antiquities, nor wanting the light of many good writers. Yet groſſely haue they erred therein, and ſo familiar are their miſtakings in all things of like nature, that we ſeldome finde their opinion rehearſed without the confutation treading on the heeles of it. They of the Romane religion are alſo generally on the ſame ſide: it being a thing vſuall among them, to maintaine whatſoeuer they haue beene formerly knowne to holde, and beleeue. Contrariwiſe, of the more ancient, Theodoret, and ſome following him: of later times Beroaldus, Codoman, Peucer, Caluin, Iunius, Beza, Broughton, Doct. Gibbons, and Moore, with diuers of the Proteſtants, hold Abraham to haue been borne in the 130. yeere of his Father Terah. From theſe, (as in a caſe not concerning any point in Religion) diuers of the ſame Religion, and thoſe neuertheleſſe good Authours, as Bucholcerus, Chitræus, Functius and others, are very auerſe herein, eſpecially Ioſephus Scaliger with his Sethus Caluiſius, proclaiming Beroaldus an Arch-heretike in Chronologie, and condemning this opinion of his as poyſonous. Contrariwiſe, Auguſtinus Torniellus a Prieſt of the Congregation of S. Paul, a iudicious, diligent and free writer, whoſe Annales are newly ſet forth, very earneſtly defends the opinion, which I haue already deliuered; not alleadging Beroaldus, nor any Proteſtant writer, as beeing perhaps vnwilling to owe thankes to heretikes. For my ſelfe I doe neither miſlike the contrary opinion, becauſe commonly thoſe of the Romiſh Religion labour to vphold it, Nor fauour this larger account of times, becauſe many notable men of the Proteſtant writers haue approued it; but for the trueth it ſelfe. To ſtrengthen which, after all theſe former reaſons, and teſtimonies of Scripture, I will adde thus much more to the reſt. Firſt, it is apparant to all men of iudgement, that the beſt approoued Hiſtorians, Diuine and prophane, labour to inueſtigate the trueth of times, thereby to approue the ſtories, and forepaſt actions of the world: and not the trueth of hiſtories to approue the times by. Let vs then make iudgement to our ſelues, which of theſe two accounts giue the beſt reputation to the ſtorie of the Scriptures; teaching the Worlds new plantation, and the continuancie of Gods Church: either that of Ioſephus, and thoſe which follow him; who makes but 292. yeeres, or thereabouts, betweene the floud and birth of Abraham: or this other account, which makes 352. yeeres betweene the one and the other: the one taking Abraham to be the firſt borne of Thare, in the 70. yeere of his life: the other a yonger ſonne of Thare, and borne when hee had liued 130 yeeres. And if we looke ouer all, and doe not haſtily ſatisfie our vnderſtanding with the firſt things offered, and thereby being ſatiated doe ſlothfully and drowſily ſit downe; wee ſhall finde it more agreeable rather to allow the reckoning of the Septuagint, who, according to ſome editions, make it aboue 1072. yeeres betweene the Floud and Abrahams birth: then to take away any part of thoſe 352. yeeres giuen. For if we aduiſedly conſider the ſtate and countenance of the world, ſuch as it was in Abrahams time, yea, before Abraham was borne, wee ſhall finde that it were very ill done of vs by following opinion without the guide of reaſon, to pare the times ouer-deepely betweene Abraham and the Floud: becauſe in cutting them too neere the quicke, the reputation of the whole ſtorie might perchance bleede thereby, were not the teſtimonie of the Scriptures ſupreme, ſo as no obiection can approch it: and that wee did not follow withall this precept of S. Auguſtine, That whereſoeuer any one place in the Sctiptures may bee conceiued diſagreeing to the whole, the ſame is by ignorance of interpretation miſunderſtood.

For

For in Abrahams time all the then knowne parts of the World were peopled: all Regions and Countries had their Kings. Ægypt had many magnificent Cities: and so had Palæstina, and all the bordering Countries: yea, all that part of the World besides, as far as India: and those not built with stickes, but of hewne stones, and defended with walles and rampiers: which magnificence needed a parent of more antiquitie, then those other men haue supposed. And therefore, where the Scriptures are plaineſt, and best agreeing with reason and nature, to what end should we labour to beget doubts and scruples, or drawe all things into wonders and marualles? giuing also strength thereby to common cauellers, and to those mens apish braines, who onely bend their wits to finde impossibilities, and monsters in the storie of the World and Mankinde.

§. VIII.

A computation of the times of the Assyrians and others, grounded vpon the times noted in the storie of ABRAHAM.

An. mundi 2008 did. 352. natus Abraham, Euſ. Aug. de Ciuit. Dei, l. 16. c. 17.

IN this sort therefore for the reasons before alleadged, I conclude, that from the generall Floud, to the birth of Abraham, 352. yeeres were consumed: and taking the Assyrian Historie with vs, the same number of yeeres were spent from the Floud to the 43. yeere of Ninus: in which 43. yeere of Ninus Abraham was borne: which happened in the yeere of the World, 2009.

Now of this time of 352. yeeres, wee must giue one part as well to the increase of those people which came into Shinar, as to those that stayed in the East, to wit, 30. yeere to Chus, ere he begat Seba: of which, though the Scriptures are silent, yet because those of the same time had that age when they begat their first sonnes, we may the more safely giue the like allowance to these. For Eber begat Peleg at 34. Peleg Regu at 30. Regu Serug at 32. Now after Seba, Chus begat Hauila, Sabta, Raama and Sabtecha: and Raama begat Sheba and Dedan, before Nimrod was borne, as it appeareth Gen. 10. which S. Augustine approueth. Giuing then 30. yeeres more to Raama ere hee begat Sheba, and fiue yeeres to the fiue elder brothers of Nimrod, it may bee gathered that 65. yeeres were consumed ere Nimrod himselfe was borne: and that Raamah had that age ere any of his sonnes were begotten, it may be gathered, by example and comparison: for Peleg the fourth from Noah, as Raamah was, begat Regu in the same yeere of his life.

Aug. de Ciuit. Dei.

Gen. 11. 18.

Let vs then allow 60. yeeres more after the birth of Nimrod, for two other generations to be brought forth, or else we shal hardly find people to build Babel: for sure wee are that it was done by hands, and not by miracle: becaus it displeased God. These two numbers of 65. and 60. make 125. The rest of the time of 131. (in which yeere they arriued in Shinar, whereof there are 6. yeeres remaining) wee may giue them for their trauels from the East: because they were pestered with women, children and Cattell: and as some ancient writers haue conceiued, and Becanus of later times, they kept alwaies the mountaines sides, for feare of a second Floud. Now, if we take this number of 131. out of 352. there remaines 221. of which number Berosus bestoweth 65. on Belus, and 42. on Ninus, before Abraham borne: both which S. Augustine approueth: which two numbers taken againe out of 221. there remaineth 114. yeeres of the 352. from the Floud to Abrahams birth: which number of 114. necessitie bestoweth on Nimrod.

An. à salute humani generis ab aquis centesimo primo cæpit regnum Babylonicum sub nostro Saturno patre Iouis Beli, qui imperauit annis 65. Berosus.

And if it be obiected that this time giuen to Nimrod, is ouer-long: sure if we compare the age of Nimrod with the rest of the same descent from Noah, it will rather appeare ouer-short. For Nimrod, by this accompt, liued in all but one hundred seuenty nine yeeres: whereof hee reigned one hundred and twelue: whereas Sale who was the sonne of Arphaxad the sonne of Sem, liued foure hundred thirty three yeeres:

yeeres: and of the ſame age of the World was Nimrod, the ſonne of Chus, the ſonne of Cham.

Now after Abraham was borne,

Ninus reigned 9. yeers: which added to 43. make——————————52.

Ninus dieth and leaueth Semiramis his ſucceſſor.

Semiramis gouerned the Empire of Babylonia and Aſſyria 42. yeeres, and died in the 52. yeere compleat of Abrahams life. Of the World 2017. Of the Floud 761. 2059. mundi. 403. a dil. 2083.

Ninias or Zameis ſucceeded Semiramis, and ruled 38. yeeres, in the ſecond yeere of whoſe reigne Abraham left Meſopotamia. 427. 2093. 437.

When Abraham was 85. yeeres old, he reſcued his nephew Lot, and ouerthrew by ſurpriſe Amraphel king of Shinar, or Babylonia. Ninias reigned 38. yeeres, and Abraham came into Canaan but 23. yeeres after Semiramis died: which was the 75. yeere of his age: ſo that Amraphel may ſeeme to haue beene this Ninias the ſonne of Ninus, and Semiramis, whoſe 23. yeere, as aforeſaid, being the 75. yeere of Abraham, he and his fellow-kings might haue receiued this ouerthrow in the 85. yeere of Abraham, and the 33. yeere of his own reigne: after which he reigned fiue yeeres: which make in all 38. But the trueth is, that the reaſons to the contrary, vrging that this Amraphel could not be Ninias, are not eaſily anſwered. Howbeit for the times of the Aſſyrian kings, that they are to bee ordered as wee haue ſet them downe, according to the times noted by Moſes, in the ſtorie of Abraham, it is moſt certaine: vnleſſe we will either derogate from the trueth of Moſes his computation, which were impietie: or account the whole Hiſtorie of Ninus and Semiramis to bee a fiction; which were to condemne all ancient Hiſtorians for fablers.

That AMRAPHEL, one of the foure Kings whom ABRAHAM ouerthrew, Gen. 14. may probably be thought to haue beene NINIAS the ſonne of NINVS.

AND now touching this Amraphel, whom Moſes makes king of Shinar or Babylonia, in the 85. yeere of Abrahams life, that is, in the 33. yeere of the reigne of Ninias Zameis the king of the Aſſyrians, the ſonne of Ninus and Semiramis, it is hard to affirme what he was, and how hee could bee at this time king of Babylonia: Ninias Zameis then reigning there. To this doubt the anſwere which firſt offereth it ſelfe as moſt probable, is that which hath beene alreadie noted, that this Ninias or Zameis, was no other then our Amraphel: who inuaded Traconitis or Baſan, and ouerthrew thoſe fiue kings of Pentapolis, or the valley of Siddim. For the Scriptures tell vs, that Amraphel was king of Shinar, which is Babylonia: and the times before accounted make him to be the ſucceſſour of Ninus and Semiramis: and it falleth out with the 85. yeere of Abrahams life: wherein he reſcued Lot, ſlew Chedorlaomer, and ouerthrew the reſt. True it is, that this Amraphel was not at this time the greateſt Monarke: for Chedorlaomer commanded in chiefe, though Amraphel bee firſt named by Moſes in the firſt verſe of the 14. Chapter of Geneſis. For the Kings of the valley of Siddim, or of Pentapolis, or of the fiue Cities, were the vaſſals of Chedorl. and not of Amraphel: as it is written. Twelue yeeres were they ſubiect to CHEDORLAOMER, but in the 13. yeere they rebelled, and in the 14. yeere came CHEDORLAOMER and the kings that were with him: and therefore was Chedorl. the principall in this enterpriſe, who was then king of Elam, which is Perſia: Now Perſia being ſeated ouer Tigris, and to the Eaſt of Amraphels Countrie; and the other two kings, which were companions with Amraphel, being ſeated to the Weſt of Shinar or Babylonia: Amraphel, who held Babylonia it ſelfe, ſeemeth at this time to haue had no great ſcope or large dominion. For had Amraphel beene ſo great a Prince as prophane Hiſtorians make Ninus or Semiramis Gen. 14.4.

whom hee succeeded, he should not haue needed the assistance of three other kings for this expedition. But though Chedorlaomer were the first and greatest of those foure Kings, (as it is manifest that hee was: For these little kings of Sodome, Gomora, &c. were his vassals, and not Amraphels) yet this makes not the coniecture lesse probable, but that this Amraphel might be Ninias. For it may be, that the great and potent Empire of Assyria, had now (as we shall shew more plainely in that which followeth) receiued a downe-right fall, at the time of this warre: though not long before it commanded all the kingdomes betweene India and the Phœnician Sea: to wit, in the times of Ninus and Semiramis.

Of ARIOCH another of the foure Kings, and that ELLAS, whereof he is said to haue beene King, lies betwene Cœlesyria and Arabia Petræa.

NOw the two other kings ioyned with Amraphel, and Chedorl. were Arioch and Tidal; the one king of Ellassar, the other of the Nations. For Ellassar, Aquila and Hierome write Pontus: so Tostatus thinketh that it should bee Hellespont: which opinion Pererius fauoureth. But this is onely to defend the Latine translation. For as Pontus, so is Hellespont farre distant, and out of the way to send any armies into Arabia Petræa, or into Idumæa: which Countries these foure Kings chiefly inuaded: Besides that, it is certaine, that the Assyrians (when they were greatest) had neuer any dominion in Asia the lesse. For at such time as the Assyrians feared the inuasion of the Medes and Persians, they sent not into Asia the lesse as commaunders: but vsed all the Arte they had to inuite Cræsus to their assistance: perswading him that nothing could bee more dangerous for himselfe, and the other Kings of those parts, than the successe of the Medes against the Assyrians. But examine the enterprise what it was. These Kings (saith the Text) made warre with BERA, king of Sodome, BIRSHA king of Gomorha, SHINAB king of Admath, and SHEMEBAR king of Zeboim, and the king of BELA which is Zoar. All which fiue kings had not so much ground as Middlesex: being such a kind of Reguli, as Iosua found in the land long after: namely, Lords of Cities and small territorries adioyning; of which Canaan had 33. all slaine or hanged by Iosua. Neither can the other Countries, which in the Text they are saide also to haue inuaded, bee imagined to haue beene at that time of any great power: and therefore to call in Kings from Pontus or Hellespont, had manifested a great impotencie and weakenesse in the kings of Babylon and Persia.

Xenophon.

Gen. 14.

And though it bee alleadged for an example, that diuers kings farre off, came to assist Pompey against Cæsar: yet these same examples without like occations and circumstances, do neither lead nor teach. For there was no cause to feare the greatnesse of these pettie kings, or of the other Countries: But the eyes of the world were fixed on Cæsar; and his vndertakings and intents were to all other Princes, no lesse doubtfull then fearefull: But the whole Countrie by these foure kings mastered in their passage, was afterward giuen to the halfe tribe of Manasse, Gad, and Reuben: a narrow valley of ground lying betweene Iordan and the mountaines of Seir: inclosed by the riuer of Arnon on the South side, and by Lybanus on the North, consisting of the two small Prouinces of Traconitis or Basan, and the Region of the Moabites: a conquest farre vnualuable, and little answering the power of the Assyrian Empire, if the same had remained in any comparable estate with the times of Ninus and Semiramis, who subiected all the great kings of that part of the World, without the assistance of any of the Kings of Hellespont, or any other part of Asia the lesse. But as the Vulgar and Aquila conuert Ellassar by Pontus: so Symmachus makes Arioch a King of the Scythians, a King indeed, as farre fetched to ioyne with the Assyrians in in this warre, as the World had any at that time. The Septuagint doe not change the word of Ellassar at all, but as they keep the word Ararat, on the mountaines wherof the Arke did rest, so doe they in this place retaine the Hebrew word Ellassar, being doubtfull to giue it a wrong interpretation. And Pererius himselfe remembreth other opinions farre more probable then this of Pontus or Hellespont: yet he dares not auow his liking of them, because the Latine Translation hath it otherwise. For Stephanus de Vrbibus a Gracian Cosmographer, findeth the Citie of Ellas in the border of Cœlesyria: and S. Hierome calleth Ellas the Citie of Arioch, as in truth it was. Now although the same be seated by Stephanus in Cœlesyria, yet it standeth on the border of Arabia, of which Arioch was king: who formerly ioyned with Ninus in all his conquests, being of the same familie, and descended from Cham and Chus: after whom the name of Arius was by the Hebrews written Arioch: and afterward againe Aretas: as in the Machabees: the kings of Arabia holding that name euen to the time of S. Paul, who was sought to be betrayed by the Lieutenant of Aretas commanding in Damascus. They were Princes for the most part confederate and depending vpon the Assyrian Empire. It is true that wee finde in Daniel, that in the time of Nabuchodonosor, one Arioch was Generall of his armie, and the principall Commander vnder him, who was a king of kings: which makes it plaine, that Arioch heere spoken of, the sonne of that Arioch Confederate of Ninus, was no king of Pontus, nor of Scythia: regions farre remooued from the Assyrians and Babylonians. The name also of Arioch who commanded vnder Nabuchodonosor is mentioned in Iudith, by the name of king of the Elymeans: who are a Nation of Persians bordering Assyria, according to Stephanus: though Plinie sets it betweene the Sea-coast, and Media: and if any brother of the Arabian Kings or other of that house (knowne by the name of Arius, Arioch, Areta or Aretas) had the gouernment of that Persian Prouince called Elymais (as it seemeth they had by the places of Daniel and Iudith) yet the same was in Nabuchodonosors time. But this Arioch heere spoken of may with more reason bee taken for the king of Arabia, the sonne of Arius, the Confederate of Ninus: whose sonnes held league, as their Fathers did, being the next bordering Prince of all on that side towards the West to Babylonia, and Chaldæa: and in amitie with them from the beginning, and of their owne house, and bloud: which D. Siculus also confirmeth.

§. XI.

Of TIDAL another of the foure Kings.

THe fourth King by Abraham ouerthrowne was Tidal, king of the Nations. The Hebrew writes it Goiim, which Vatablus takes to be a proper name: Lyra of mixt people: Caluin of runnagates without habitation: Pererius out of Strabo, findes that Galilæa was inhabited by diuers Nations, which were a mixt people: namely of Ægyptians, Arabians, and Phœnicians. Nàm tales sunt qui Galilæam habitant; Such are the inhabitants of Galilee, saith Strabo: and therefore was Tidal called king of these Nations, as they suppose. And it may be so: but the authoritie of Strabo is nothing in this question. For Galilæa was not peopled at this time, as it was in the time of Strabo. For when Abraham came into Canaan, the Cananite was then in the Land, howsoeuer they might be afterwards mixt; which I know not. But there are many pettie kingdomes adioyning to Phœnicia, and Palæstina; as Palmyrena, Batanea, Laodicene, Apamena, Chalcidice, Cassiotis, Chalibonitis, and all these doe also ioyne themselues to Mesopotamia, on the North, and to Arabia on the East. And that these Nations gathered themselues together vnder Tidal, I take to be the probablest coniecture.

§. XII.

That CHEDORLAOMER the chiefe of the 4. Kings was not of Assyria, but of Persia: and that the Assyrian Empire at this time was much impaired.

LAstly, wheras it is conceiued that Chedorlaomer was the Assyrian Emperor, and that Amraphel was but a Satrape, Viceroy, or Prouinciall gouernour of Babylonia, and that the other kings named were such also, I cannot agree with Pererius in this. For Moses too well acquainted with the names of Assur, and Shinar, to call the Assyrian a king of Elam: those kings being in the Scriptures euermore called by the name of Chaldæa, Shinar, Babylonia, or Assyria: but neuer by Elam; and Chedorlaomer or Kedorlaomer was so called of Kidor, from Cidarim which in the Hebrew signifieth Regale: for so Q. Curtius calleth the garment which the Persian kings ware on their heads.

Neither doe I beleeue that the Assyrian or Babylonian Empire stood in any greatnesse at the time of this inuasion, and my reasons are these: First, example and experience teach vs, that those things which are set vp hastily, or forced violently, doe not long last; Alexander became Lord of all Asia, on this side of Indus, in a time of so short a life, as it lasted not to ouer-looke what it selfe had brought forth. His fortunes were violent, but not perpetuall. For his Empire died at once with himselfe: all whose chiefe Commanders became kings after him. Tamberlain conquered Asia and India with a storme-like and terrible successe: but to preualent furie God hath adioined a short life: and whatsoeuer things Nature herselfe worketh in haste, she taketh the least care of their continuance. The fruit of his victories perished with him, if not before him.

Ninus beeing the first whom the madnesse of boundlesse dominion transported, inuaded his neighbour Princes, and became victorious ouer them: a man violent, insolent, and cruell. Semiramis taking the opportunitie, and being more proud, aduenturous, and ambitious, then her Paramor: enlarged the Babylonian Empire, and beautified many places therein with buildings vnexampled. But her sonne hauing changed Nature and Condition with his Mother, proued no lesse feminine then shee was masculine. And as wounds and wrongs, by their continuall smart, put the Patient in minde how to cure the one, and reuenge the other: so those kings adioyning (whose subiection, and calamities incident were but new, and therefore the more grieuous) could not sleepe, when the aduantage was offered by such a successour. For in regno Babylonico hic parùm resplenduit, this King shined little (saith Nauclerus of Ninias) in the Babylonian kingdome. And likely it is that the neckes of mortall men hauing beene neuer before galled with the yoke of forraine dominion, Nor hauing euer had experience of that most miserable and detested condition of liuing in slauery: no long descent hauing as yet inuested the Assyrian with a right: nor any other title being for him to bee pretended than a strong hand; the foolish and effeminate sonne of a tyrannous and hated Father, could very ill hold so many great Princes and Nations his vassals, with a powerlesse mastering, and a mind lesse industrious than his Father and Mother had vsed before him. And hee that was so much giuen ouer to licentious idlenesse, as to suffer his Mother to raigne 42. yeeres, and thereof the greatest part after he came to mans estate: witnessed thereby to the World, that he so much preferred ease before honour, and bodily pleasures before greatnesse, as he neither indeuoured to gaine what he could not gouerne, nor to keepe what he could not without contentious perill enioy.

These Considerations being ioyned to the storie of Amraphel, deliuered by Moses, by which wee finde that Amraphel king of Shinar was rather an inferiour to the king of Persia, than either his superiour, or equall, make it seeme probable, that the Empire of Ninus and Semiramis was at that time broken asunder, and restrained again to Babylonia.

For

For conclusion I will adde these two arguments confirming the former: First, that at such time as it pleased God to impose that great trauaile vpon Abraham, from Vr in Chaldæa to Charran, and then to Canaan, a passage of 700. miles, or little lesse, with women, children, and carriages: the Countries through which hee wandred were then settled, and in peace. For it was in the 23. yeere of Ninias, when Abraham obeying the voice of God, tooke this great iourney in hand: in which time of 23. yeeres after the death of Semiramis, the neighbour Princes had recouered their libertie and former estates. For Semiramis armie of foure millions, with herselfe vtterly consumed in India, and all her armes and engins of war, at the same time lost, gaue an occasion and opportunitie euen to the poorest soules and weakest hearted creatures of the World, to repurchase their former libertie. Strab. l. 15.

Secondly, it is affirmed by the best and ancientest Historians, that Arius the sonne of Ninias, or Amraphel, inuaded the Bactrians and Caspians, and againe subiected them: which needed not if they had not beene reuolted from Ninias, after Ninus death. And as Arioch recouered one part, so did Baleus or Balaneus, otherwise Xerxes, reduce the rest reuolted to their former obedience. Of whom it is said that hee conquered from Ægypt to India: and therefore was called Xerxes, id est, Victor & triumphator, a conquerour and triumpher, which vndertakings had beene no other then the effects of madnesse, had not those Countries freed themselues, from the Babylonian subiection. Now if we shall make any doubt heereof, that is, of the reconqueft of Arius and Xerxes, both which liued after Ninus and Ninias, wee may as well thinke the rest of Ninus and Semiramis to be but fained: but if wee graunt this reconqueft, then is it true that while Ninias or Amraphel ruled, the Assyrian Empire was torne asunder, according to that which hath beene gathered out of Moses as before remembred.

§. XIII.

That it is not vnprobable that the foure Kings had no dominion in the Countries named, but that they had else-where with their colonies planted themselues: and so retained the names of the Countries whence they came: which if it be so, we neede not say that AMRAPHEL was NINIAS, nor trouble our selues with many other difficulties.

THe consent of all writers, whose workes haue come to my perusall, agreeing as they doe, that these 4. kings, Amraphel of Shinar, Chedorlaomer of Elam, and their fellowes were Lords of those Regions, whereunto they are or seeme intituled: doth almost inforce vs to thinke that the Historie must so be vnderstood, as I haue deliuered. But if in this place, as often elsewhere in the Scriptures, the names of Countries may be set for people of those lands, or if (as Hierome hath it) Chedorlaomer was king of the Elamites, as Tidal was said to be of the Nations, that is, of people either wanting a fixed habitation, or gathered out of sundrie regions: then may we otherwise conceiue of this Historie: remouing thereby some difficulties which men perhaps haue beene vnwilling to find, because they could not find how to resolue them. For as it had been a strange coniecture to thinke that Arioch was drawn to assist the Persian, against the Sodomite; as far as from Pontus, where it is very vnlikely that Chedorlaomer was knowne, and almost impossible that the vale of Siddim should haue beene once named: so in true estimation it is a thing of great improbabilitie, that Chedorlaomer, if he were king of Persia alone, should passe through so great a part of the World, as the Countries of Assyria, Chaldæa, Mesopotamia, Syria, and part of Arabia, and Canaan, to subdue those fiue Townes, whose very names how they should come to his eare, being disioined by so many great Nations of different languages, a wise man could hardly coniecture. And if all the Countries bordering Persia together with the Babylonian himselfe, yea the kingdom of Ellasar, & that of Tidal, so far off remoued, were become his dependants, what reason can we finde that might haue induced him to hearken after Sodome and Gomorah? & when he should haue sought the establishment of his new-gotten Empire, by rooting out the posteritie of Ninus (as Ninus had dealt by Pharnus of Media, and Zoroaster of Bactria) then to imploy the forces of Amraphel, and those other kings, against fiue pettie townes, leauing Tyrus, and Sidon, and the great Citie of Damasco, with many other places of much importance, and farre neerer vnto him, vnsubdued? Now as these doubts which may bee alleadged against the first conquest of the vale of Siddim, are exceeding vehement: so are the obiections to be made against his reconquest of these fiue Cities, when they had reuolted, as forcible; yea and more, as being grounded partly vpon the text it selfe. For first, what madnesse had it beene in that small Prouince to rebell against so powerfull a Monarch? Or if it were so that they dwelling farre from him, hoped rather to bee forgotten, then that hee should come or send to reclaime them: was it not more then madnesse in them, when his terrible armie approached, still to entertaine hope of euasion: yea to make resistance (being themselues a dissolute and therefore vnwarlike people) against the power of all the Nations betweene Euphrates, yea betweene themselues and the riuer of Indus? Likewise on the part of Chedorlaomer we should finde no greater wisedome, if he knowing the weakenesse of this people, had raised such a world of men against them: whom by any Lieutenant, with small forces hee might haue subdued. For the perpetuall inheritance of that little Countrie, was not sufficient to counteruaile one moneths charges of so huge an armie. How small then must his valour haue beene, who with so mightie preparations effected no more then the wasting of that Valley, wherein he left the Cities standing, taking no one of them; but returned well contented with a few prisoners, and the pillage of the Countrie, although hee had broken their armie in the field? Now the Scriptures doe not of this inuasion (supposed so great) make any fearefull matter: but compose the two armies, as equally matcht, saying they were foure kings against fiue: yea, if the place be literally Gen.14.17. expounded, we shall finde that Abraham slew all these kings, of which great slaughter no Historie makes mention: Neither will the raigne of Ninias, who liued foure or fiue yeeres longer, permit that he should haue died so soone: neither would Histories haue forgotten the manner of his death, if hee had so strangely perished in Syria. Whereby it appeares, that these foure kings were not the same that they are commonly thought: nor their forces so great as opinion hath made them. It may therefore well bee true, that these kings were such as many others, who in that age carried the same title: Lords and Commanders euery one of his owne companie, which he carried foorth as a Colonie, seeking place where to settle himselfe and them, as was the vsuall manner of those times.

Neither is it vnprobable, that Chedorlaomer leading a troupe of Persians, Amraphel some people out of Shinar, and Tidal others gathered out of sundry places, might consort together, and make the weakest of the Countrie which lay about them, to pay them tribute. Whosoeuer will consider the beginning of the first booke of Thucydides, with the manner of discoueries, conquests and plantations, in the infancie of Greece, or the manner of the Saracens inuading Affrica, and Spaine, with almost as many kings as seuerall Armies: or the proceedings of the Spaniards in their new discoueries, passages, and conquests in the West-Indies: may easily perceiue, that it was neither vnusuall, for the leaders of Colonies to receiue title from the people whom they conducted: nor to make alliances together, and breake them againe, disturbing sometimes one the other, sometimes helping in pursuit of a conquest. That Amraphel and his associates were such manner of Commaunders, it may seeme the more likely, by the slothfull qualitie of Ninias then raigning in Assyria: whose vnmanlike temper was such, as might well giue occasion to such vndertaking spirits, as wanted the imploiments whereunto they were accustomed, in the raigne of Semiramis, rather to seeke aduentures abroad, than to remain at home vnregarded: whilst others more vnworthie than themselues, were aduanced. If the consent of the whole streame of writers vpon this place make this coniecture disagreeable to the Text, to the authoritie whereof all humane reason must subscribe, then wee may hold our selues to the former coniecture, that Amraphel was Ninias: and that the power of his Ancestours being by his sloth decayed, hee might well be inferiour to the Persian Chedorlaomer: or if this doe not satisfie, wee may say that Amraphel was an Vnder-king or Satrapa of Shinar, vnder Ninias; who may be supposed to haue had his Imperiall seat in his Fathers Citie Ninive: and to haue preferred it before Shinar and Babylon the Citie of his Mother, whom hee hated as an vsurper of his right. But if it were possible that in a case not concerning any mans Salvation, and wherein therefore none hath cared to take great paines, all might erre: then can I thinke that the opinion, That these foure kings were leaders of Colonies, sent out of the Countries named in the Text, and not kings of the Countries themselues, is most consonant both to the condition of those times, and to the Scripture. And hereto adde that Chedorlaomer seemes rather called a Persian king, then king of Persia; and that Arioch (whose kingdome vndoubtedly was betweene Syria and Arabia) hauing beene a man of action, or being a worthy mans sonne, was very well pleased, to giue passage and assistance, to these Captaines or pettie kings. These and such like things heere to vrge, were but with circumstances to adorne a supposition, which either may stand without them, or if it must fall, is vnworthie to haue cost bestowed vpon it: especially considering, that it is not my intent to imploy any more time in making it good, but to leaue it wholly to the Readers pleasure, to follow any of these opinions, or any other, if he finde any that shall seeme better than these. But of what Countries or people soeuer these foure were kings, this expedition is the onely publique action that we know of performed by Abraham. And as for other things belonging to his Storie, and of his sonnes, and of his Nephews Esau and Iacob, as they are registred by Moses, because it is not our purpose, neither to stand vpon things generally knowne to all Christians, nor to repeate what hath beene elsewhere alreadie spoken, nor to preuent our selues in things that may hereafter in due place be remembred, wee passe them heere in silence. And because in this Storie of Abraham and his posteritie, there is much mention of Ægypt: by which it appeares that euen in the time of Abraham, it was a settled and flourishing kingdome, it will not bee amisse in the next place to speake somewhat of the antiquities, and first kings thereof.

CHAP. II.

Of the Kings of Ægypt from the first peopling of it after the Floud, to the time of the deliuerie of the Israelites from thence.

§. I.

A briefe of the names and times of the first Kings of Ægypt: with a note of the causes of difficulty in resoluing of the truth in these points.

One after the confusion at Babel (as it seemes) Cham with many of his issue and followers (hauing doubtlesse knowne the fertilitie of Ægypt before the Floud) came thither and tooke possession of the Countrie: in which they built many Cities: and beganne the kingdome one hundred ninetie one yeeres after the deluge. The ancient Gouernours of this Kingdome till such time as Israel departed Ægypt, are shewne in the Table following.

An. Mundi.	An. dil.
2269.	613.	Typhon } Hercules. }
2276.	620.	Orus.
2391.	735.	Sesostris the great.
2424.	768.	Sesostris the blinde.
2438.	782.	Busiris or Oris the second.
2476.	820.	Acenchere or Thermutis or Meris.
2488.	832.	Rathoris or Athoris.
2497.	841.	Cheucres drowned in the red Sea.

The Table and especially the Chronologie, is to be confirmed by probabilities and coniectures, because in such obscurity manifest and restlesse truth cannot be found. For S. Augustine, a man of exceeding great iudgement, and incomparable diligence, who had sought into all antiquities, and had read the bookes of Varro, which now are lost, yet omitted the succession of the Ægyptian Kings: which he would not haue done, if they had not been more vncertaine then the Sicyonians, whom he remembreth, then whom doubtlesse they were more glorious. One great occasion of this obscurity in the Ægyptian Storie, was the ambition of the Priests: who to magnifie their Antiquities, filled the Records (which were in their hands) with many leasings, and recounted vnto strangers, the names of many Kings that neuer reigned. What ground they had for these reports of supposed Kings, it shall appeare anon. Sure it is that the magnificent workes and royall buildings in Ægypt, such as are neuer found but in States that haue greatly flourished, witnesse that their Princes were of marueilous greatnesse: and that the reports of the Priests were not altogether ther false. A second cause of our ignorance in the Ægyptian History, was the too much credulitie of some good Authors, who beleeuing the manifold and contrary reports of sundry Ægyptians, & publishing in their own name, such as pleased them best; haue confirmed them, and as it were inforced them vpon vs, by their authoritie. A third and generall cause of more than Ægyptian darkenesse in all ancient Histories, is the edition of many Authors by Iohn Annius, of whom (if to the censures of sundry very learned I may adde mine) I thinke thus; That Annius hauing seene some fragments of those writers, and added vnto them what he would, may be credited, as an auoucher of true Histories, where approued writers confirme him: but otherwise is to be deemed fabulous. Hereupon it commeth to passe that the account of Authours, either in the Chronologie or Genealogie of the Ægyptian Kings, runs three altogether different wayes. The Christian writers, such as are ancient, for the most part follow Eusebius: Many late writers follow the edition of Annius his Authors: The prophane Histories follow Herodotus, Diodorus, and such others.

§. II.

That by the account of the Ægyptian Dynasties, and otherwise, it appeares that CHAMS reigne in Ægypt began in the yeere after the Floud, 191.

TO reconcile these, or gather out of them the times of the ancient Kings, about whom is most controuersie, the best meane is by helpe of the Dynasties: of whose continuance there is little or no disagreement. The account of the Dynasties (besides the authoritie of approued Authors) hath this good ground, that it agreeth for the most part, if not altogether with the Histories of the Assyrians, Troians, Italians, and others, &c. The beginning of the 16. Dyn. is ioyned by generall consent, with the 43. yeere of Ninus: in which Abraham was borne. The twelue first Dynasties lasted each of them seuen yeeres, vnder the twelue, which were called the greater Gods: so that all the yeeres of their continuance were 84. The thirteenth Dynast indured foureteene yeeres: the fourteenth 26: the fifteenth 37. These three last, are sayd to haue beene vnder the three yonger Gods. So the fifteene first Dynasties lasted one hundred sixty one yeeres. As I doe not therfore beleeue that the continuance of these Dyn. was such as hath been mentioned, because Annius in such-wise limits out their time: so I cannot reiect the account vpon this onely reason, that Annius hath it so: considering that both hitherto it hath passed as currant, and is greatly strengthened by many good reasons. For, whereas Eusebius placeth the beginning of the sixteenth Dynastie, in the yeere of Abrahams birth, as aforesayd: the reckoning is easily cast; by which the summe of 161. yeeres, which according to our account were spent in the fifteene former, being subducted out of the summe of 352. yeeres, which were betweene the Floud and Abrahams birth, shew that the beginning of the first Dynastie, which was the beginning of Chams reigne in Ægypt, was in the yeere 191. As also by other probabilities the same may appeare. For it is generally agreed, that the multitude of mankinde which came into Shinar, arriued at Babel, Anno à diluuio 131. In building the Tower were consumed fourtie yeeres, as Glicas recordeth: whose report I haue elsewhere confirmed with diuers probabilities. That Cham was long in passing with his company, their Wiues Children, Cattell, and substance, through all Syria then desolate, and full of Bogges, Forrests, and Bryers (which the Deluge and want of culture in one hundred seuentie one yeeres had brought vpon it) no reasonable man will doubt. To this his passage therefore, and the seating of himselfe in Ægypt, wee allow twenty yeere: and these summes being added together, to wit, one hundred thirtie one yeeres after the Floud, before they arriued at Babel, Babel, 40. yeeres for their stay there, and 20. for Cham's passage into Ægypt, and setling there, make vp the summe of 191. yeeres: at which time we said that Cham began his reigne in Ægypt, in the beginning of the first Dynastie. And to this summe of 191. yeeres if we adde the 161. yeeres of the 15. first Dynasties, as they are numbred in common account, we shall fall right with the yeere of Abrahams birth, which was An. Dil. 352. And hereto omitting many other reasons, which might be brought to prooue that these first Dynasties must needes haue beene very short, and not containing in the whole summe of their seueral times aboue 161. yeeres: Let it suffice that had they lasted longer, then either must Ægypt haue been peopled as soone as Babel after the Floud: or the Dynasties (as Mercator thinkes) must haue beene before the Floud. That the arriuall at Babel was many yeeres before the plantation of Ægypt, after the Floud, enough hath been said to prooue: and that the Dynasties were not before the Floud, the number of the long-liu'd generations betweene Adam and the Floud, which was lesse than the number of the Dinasties, may sufficiently witnesse. Or if we will thinke, that one life might (perhaps) bee diuided into many Dynasties, then may this haue beene as well after the Floud, as before: considering that the sonnes of Noah did not in euery Countrie erect such forme of Policie, as had beene vsed in the same ere the Deluge: but such, as the disposition of the people, the authoritie and power of the Conducter, together with many other circumstances, did induce or inforce them to.

§. III.

That these Dynasties were not diuers families of Kings, but rather successions of Regents, oft times many vnder one King.

THe short continuance of the Dynasties, doth shew that they were not seuerall races of Kings, as the vaunting Ægyptians were wont to stile them. What they were it cannot certainly bee warranted. For in restitutions of decayed antiquities, it is more easie to denie than to affirme. But this may be said partly vpon good circumstance, partly vpon the surest proofe, That it was the manner of the Ægyptian Kings, to put the gouernment of the Countrie into the hands of some trustie Counsellor, onely referuing the Soueraignty to themselues, as the old Kings of France were wont to the Masters of the Palace, and as the Turke doth to the chiefe Visier. This is confirmed, first, by the number of the Dynasties, whereof many are vnder Cham, and more then one vnder Osiris or Mizraim; and must therefore haue beene successions, not of Kings, but rather of Counsailors and Regents. Secondly, by custome of such Princes borderers to Ægypt, as are mentioned in the Scriptures: of whom Abimelech the Philistim in his dealing with Abraham and Isaac about confederation, did nothing without Phicol Captaine of his Hoste; though in taking Abrahams wife, and in his priuate carriage, hee followed his owne pleasure. Likewise of Abimelech the sonne of Gideon it was said: Is not hee the sonne of IERVBBAAL? and ZEBVL is his Officer? Also Ishbosheth the sonne of Saul, feared Abner the Captaine of the Hoste. Yea, Dauid himselfe hating Ioab for his crueltie did not punish him, in regard of his greatnesse, which was such, as was feared euen of Hadad the Edomite liuing then in Ægypt. Thirdly, this is confirmed by the temper and disposition of Cham, who was lewd, as appeares by the Scriptures: therefore likely both for his owne idlenesse and pleasure, to haue layd the burden of gouernement vpon others; and vpon iealousie, the companion of vnworthinesse, to haue changed his Lieutenants often. Aboue all other proofes is the aduancement of Ioseph by Pharaoh. For Pharaoh said to IOSEPH; Onely in the Kings throne will I be aboue thee: behold, I haue set thee ouer all the Land of Ægypt. William, Archbishop of Tyre, who flourished about the yeere of our Lord, one thousand one hundred eightie, affirmes that the like like or very ſame forme of gouernement by Viceroys, was in his time practiſed in Ægypt, hauing there beene in vſe (as he beleeued) euer ſince the time of Ioſeph. He plainely ſhewes, that the Soldans of Ægypt were not Lords of the Countrie, how-euer they haue beene ſo deemed; but that they acknowledged and humbly performed the duetie of ſubiects vnto the Caliphe: who reſiding in a moſt magnificent Palace in Cairo, did commit the charge, not onely of ciuill gouernement, but the power of making warre and peace, with the whole office and authority royall into the Soldans hands. He that ſhal reade in William of Tyre, the ſtate of the Caliphe, or Mulene Elhadeth, with the forme of his Court, ſhall plainely behold the image of the ancient Pharaoh, ruling by a Lieutenant, as great in authoritie as Ioſeph was, though farre inferiour in wiſedome. Lib.19.c.20.

To thinke that many names of ſuch Regents or Lieutenants as Ioſeph was, haue crept into the Liſt of the Ægyptian Kings, were no ſtrange imagination. For Ioſephs brethren called him, The man that is Lord of the Land, and the Lord of the Countrie: Beſides, it is not vnlikely that the vaineglorious Ægyptian Prieſts would as eaſily report him a King to poſterity, as ignorant men and ſtrangers deeme him ſuch, vnder whoſe hand all diſpatches of importance, and royall managing of the State had paſſed, whileſt that the King himſelfe intending his quiet, had giuen his office to another. How ſtrangers haue miſtaken in this kinde, the example already cited of Ioſephs brethren, doth ſufficiently witneſſe. The reports of Prieſts doe appeare in Diodorus, and Herodotus: each of whom, citing their relations, as good authoritie, ſay; Diodorus, that Seſoſtris was the nineteenth King after Menas; Herodotus, that hee was the 332. after Menas: which could not haue been, if Menas had been Adam. Therfore we may well conclude, That the Dynaſties were not ſo many races of Kings, but ſucceſſions of Regents, appointed by the kings of ſo many ſundry linages or ſorts of men. Now by whatſoeuer meanes a Dynaſtie or Regencie continued: whether in one familie, as being made an hereditary office: or in one order of men, as held by faction: ſure it is that it was the Kings gift and free choyce, that gaue the office. But the Crowne royal alwaies paſſed by deſcent, & not by election: which (beſide conſent of Authors) the Scriptures alſo proue. For whereas Ioſeph bought all the land of Ægypt for Pharaoh, if the Crowne had paſſed by election, then ſhould Pharaoh's children hereby either haue been inthralled amongſt the reſt of the people, to the next ſucceſſour: or inioying their Fathers land, though not his eſtate, haue been more mighty then the King: as Land-lords of all Ægypt, and the King himſelfe their Tenant. Likewiſe we find in Exod.12. that God ſmote the firſt borne of PHARAOH, that was to ſet on his Throne. And in Eſay it is ſaid of PHARAOH: I am the ſonne of the ancient King. Gen.42.30.& 33. Eſa.19.

℣ IIII.

Of CHAM, and his ſonne MIZRAIM, or OSIRIS.

THat the ſucceſſion of Kings began, and continued in ſuch wiſe as the Table hath ſhewed from Cham to Chencres, now it followeth to ſhew. Ægypt is called in the Scripture, the land of HAM. That this name is not giuen to it, becauſe the poſterity of Cham did reigne there, but for that himſelfe did firſt plant it, we may gather by many circumſtances. For I thinke it is no where found, that the Countries of Cuſh, Put, or Canaan, as well as Ægypt, were called the Land of Ham. Further it is found in Diodorus Siculus, that Oſiris calleth himſelfe the eldeſt ſonne of Cham, ſaying, Mihi pater Saturnus deorum omnium iunior: alſo, Sum Saturni filius antiquior, germen ex pulchro & generoſo ortum: which muſt needs be vnderſtood of Cham: for this Saturnus Ægyptius was Cham: as it is ſaid, that on the monument of Ninus was an inſcription, wherein Cham was called Saturnus Ægyptius. Likewiſe the Temple of Hammon, not farre from Ægypt, doth teſtifie, that Ham reſided in thoſe parts: And S. Hieronie in quæſtionibus Hebraicis, Pſal.78.51. 105.23. 27. 106.22. Diod.Sic.l.1.

cis saith, that the Ægyptians themselues did in his dayes call their Countrie Ham: as in foure seuerall places in the Psalmes this Countrie is called the land of Cham. And Ortelius, noting out of Plutarch in Osiride, that in the sacrifices of the Ægyptians this Countrie of Ægypt was called Chemia, expounds it for Chamia: vt puto (saith he) à Chamo NOES filio, to which also he addeth out of Isidore, Ægyptum vsq; hodie Ægyptiorum lingua KAM vocari: that Ægypt vnto this day in the tongue of the Ægyptians is called KAM. For the beginning and continuance of Chams reigne, the same reasons may suffice to be alleadged, which I haue already giuen in proofe of the time spent in the 15. first Dynasties: Neither is it strange that the reigne of Cham should last so long as 161. yeeres: considering that Sem liued 600. Arpachshad and Shelah each aboue 400. But strange it had beene, if one Saltis created by Manetho, had in those long-liued generations reigned there 19. yeeres, and with Bæon, Apachnas, Apochis, and others of the same brood, obscured the fame and glory of Osiris, Orus, and Sesostris. Reineccius in histor. Iulia, placeth Mizraim next, otherwise called Osiris according to Diodorus: who saith hee was the sonne of Hammon: Krentzhemius saith that Mizraim and Osiris are words of neere affinitie and sound in the Hebrew tongue. Howsoeuer it bee, wee know that Mizraim the sonne of Cham, was Lord of Ægypt, and Reineccius citing good authoritie in this case, affirmeth that Ægypt is now called by the naturalls in their owne language, Mezre. Neither doe I see cause of doubt whether Osiris were the same with Mizraim. It is more necessarie, and hard to shew manifestly, how long Mizraim or Osiris reigned. For whereas the yeere of his death is no where precisely set downe, we must be faine to follow probabilities. That he is not vainely saide by Annius his Berosus, to haue begun his reigne at the birth of Abraham, when the Dynastie of the Thebai began, it appeareth, first, by the authoritie of Eusebius: who auoucheth as much; next by Diodorus, who saith that he inhabited Thebes: which habitation of Osiris there, that it might be cause of that Dynast. I can well beleeue: assenting so farre to Reineccius, who thinkes the Dynasties were named only, according to the seuerall seates of the kings.

§. V.

Of the time when OSIRIS reigne ended: and that IACOB came into Ægypt in the time of ORVS the sonne of OSIRIS.

THe death of Osiris, when it was, none can certainely affirme. The onely coniecture that I know is made thus: Lehabim the sonne of Mizraim called Hercules Lybius, made warre in Italy, to reuenge his Fathers death, on the associats of Typhon, in the 41. yeere of Baleus King of Assyria: before which yeere he had made many great warres in Ægypt, Phœnicia, Phrygia, Crete, Lybia, and Spaine: and hauing ended his Ægyptian warres, left the Kingdome to Orus. Thus farre Berosus, or authors following Berosus. That Orus last of all the Gods (as they were stiled) held the Kingdome of Isis, Diodorus Siculus plainely saith: and Plutarch as much; to which all old Histories agree. Krentzhemius hereupon inferres, that sixe yeeres may bee allowed to the warres, which Hercules made in so many Countries, after the Ægyptian warres were ended: so should the death of Osiris haue beene the 34. of Baleus, when himselfe had reigned 297. yeeres. I thinke that Krentzhemius was a greater Scholler than Souldier. For surely in those dayes when commerce was not such as now, but all Nauigation made by coasting, a farre longer time would haue been required, to the subduing of so many Countries. An allowance of more time though it would alter his computation, yet would it well agree with his intent: which was (doubtlesse) to finde the trueth. If according to his account the death of Osiris had beene the 34. of Baleus, then must Israel haue come into Ægypt but seuen yeeres before the death of Osiris: and haue liued there in the reigne of Typhon. A thing not easily beleeued. For it was the same king king who aduanced Ioſeph, bad him ſend for his Father; and gaue him leaue to goe into Canaan, to the performance of his Fathers funerall: as may eaſily bee gathered out of the booke of Geneſis. Whereas therefore the raigne of Oſiris cannot be extended by any poſſible allowance in account of times, beyond the ſeuenth yeere of Iſraels comming into Ægypt: wee muſt needes cut off 23. yeeres from that number, which Krentzhemius coniectures his raigne to haue continued: namely ſeuen which hee ſhould haue liued after Iacobs comming into Ægypt: nine in which Ioſeph had there flouriſhed, ere his fathers comming: and other ſeuen in which Typhon and Hercules had reigned after the death of Oſiris, yet before Ioſephs aduancement.

Neither will this diſagree with the time of Hercules Lybius his wars. For the warre which Hercules made in Italie, is ſaid to haue indured 10. yeeres: After which proportion we may well giue not only ſixe yeeres, as Krentzhemius doth, but 23. more to ſo many wars in ſo many and ſo far-diſtant Countries, as are named before: yea, by this proportion we may attribute vnto Orus the 13. yeeres, which paſſed betweene the time of Ioſephs being ſold into Ægypt, vnto his aduancement: conſidering that Putiphar who bought him, and whoſe daughter he may ſeeme to haue married, continued all that while chiefe Steward vnto Pharaoh: a thing not likely to haue been, if ſo violent alterations had hapned the whileſt in Ægypt, as the tyrannous vſurpation of Typhon muſt needs haue brought in. If citing ſome fragment of a loſt old author, I ſhould confidently ſay, that Putiphar for his faithfulneſſe to Orus, the ſonne of Oſiris, was by him in the beginning of his raigne made his chiefe Steward: at which time buying Ioſeph and finding him a iuſt man, and one vnder whoſe hand all things did proſper, he rather committed his eſtate into Ioſephs hands, than vnto any of his Ægyptian followers (many of whom he had found either falſe-hearted, or weake and vnlucky in the troubleſom daies of Typhon) I know not what could be obiected againſt this. Perhaps I might proceed further & ſay, That when the ſaying of Ioſeph pleaſed Pharaoh, and all his ſeruants: then Putiphar Prieſt of On, being chiefe Officer to Pharaoh, did acknowledge in Ioſeph, the ancient graces of God, & his iniurious impriſonment: whereupon he gaue him his daughter to wife: and being old, reſigned his office of chiefe Steward vnto him: who afterward in regard of Putiphar, did fauour the Prieſts, when hee bought the lands of all other Ægyptians. This might appeare to ſome a tale not vnlike to the frierly booke of Aſenath, Putiphars daughter: but vnto ſuch as conſider that God workes vſually by means: and that Putiphar was the Steward of that king, vnder whom Iacob died: it would ſeeme a matter not vnprobable, had it an Author of ſufficient credit to auouch it. Concerning the warres of Hercules, in which by this reckoning hee ſhould haue ſpent 42. yeeres after he left Ægypt, ere he began in Italie, it is a circumſtance which (the length of his Italian wars conſidered, and his former enterpriſes & atchieuements proportioned to them) doth not make againſt vs, but for vs: or if it were againſt vs, yet could it not ſo weaken our ſuppoſition, as theſe probabilities collected out of the vndiſputable trueth of Scripture doe confirme it. Neuertheleſſe I freely grant that all theſe proofes are no other, than ſuch as may be gathered out of Authors, not well agreeing, nor to be reconciled in ſuch obſcuritie, otherwiſe than by likelihoods, anſwerable to the holy Text.

§. VI.

Of TYPHON, HERCVLES ÆGYPTVS, ORVS, and the two SESOSTRES, ſucceſſiuely reigning after MIZRAIM: and of diuers errors about the former SESOSTRES.

CONcerning the reigne of Typhon, and of Hercules, I finde none that preciſely doth define how long either of them continued. Daniel Angelocrator giueth three yeeres to Typhon, omitting Hercules. But he is ſo peremptorie without proofe, as if his owne word were ſufficient authoritie, in many points very queſtionable; alleadging no witneſſe, but as it were ſaying, Teſte me ipſo: yet herein we may thinke him to ſpeake probably, foraſmuch as the learned Krentzhemius affirmeth, that Hercules did very ſoone vndertake his Fathers reuenge: and was not long in performing it: and that leauing Ægypt to his brother, hee followed other warres, in the same quarrell, as hath beene shewed before. True it is, that I cannot collect (as Krentzhemius doth) out of Berosus, that Hercules reigned after Typhon: yet seeing Auentinus a follower of Berosus hath it so, I will also beleeue it. That in the reigne of Typhon and Hercules, seuen yeeres were spent, howsoeuer diuided betweene them, I gather out of Krentzhemius onely, who placeth the beginning of Orus seuen yeeres after the death of Osiris: forgetting to set downe his reasons, which in a matter so probable I thinke hee wanted not. Now whereas he alloweth 90. yeeres of the eighteenth Dynastie to Osiris, Typhon, Hercules, and Orus: it seemes that the reigne of Orus lasted 115. yeeres. From the death of Orus to the departure of Israel out of Ægypt, there passed 122. yeeres by our account: who (acccording to Beroaldus and others,) thinke that Abraham was borne in the 130. yeere of Terah, and thereupon reckon thus. From the end of the Floud to the birth of Abraham ——— 352

From that time to the { vocation of Abraham ——— 75 / departure out of Ægypt ——— 430

which summe diuers other wayes may bee collected. Since therefore to the departure out of Ægypt, there doe remaine (as is aforesaid) onely 122. yeeres from the death of Orus: wee are now to consider how many of them are to bee allowed vnto Sesostris or Sesonchosis: who is placed next vnto Orus, by authoritie of the Scholiastes Apollonij: not without good probabilitie. For this great king or conquerour, is by many Histories recorded to haue ouer-run a great part of Asia: to haue built a fleete of shippes on the red Sea: and so to haue entred into India: likewise with another fleete on the middle-earth Seas, to haue passed into Europe, and subdued many Nations. This is hee (as Reineccius iudgeth) whom Iustine erring in account of his time calleth Vexoris: For Iustine placeth Vexoris in ages before Ninus: whereby it would follow that Sesostris, if hee were Vexoris, was more ancient then was Osiris (otherwise Mizraim) a thing altogether vnlikely. Certaine it is that after the departure of Israel out of Egypt, no one Pharaoh came into the land of Canaan (which lieth in the way from Ægypt into Asia) till the Father in law of Salomon, Pharaoh Vaphres, tooke Gezar, and gaue it to his daughter: after which time Sesac oppressed Rehoboam, and gaue it to his daughter: after which time Sesac oppressed Rehoboam, & Necho sought passage through the land of Israel, when he made his expedition against the Chaldeans. Of King Vaphres and Necho it is out of question, that neither of them was the great King Sesostris. Of Sesac it is doubted by some, forasmuch as he came into Iudea with a great armie. Reineccius propounding the doubt, leaueth it vndecided; vnlesse it be sufficient proofe of his owne opinion, that he himselfe placeth Sesostris next to Orus: following the Scholiastes Apollonij. But further answere may bee made to shew that they were not one. For, as Iustine witnesseth, Sesostris, otherwise Vexoris, made warre on people farre remoued, abstaining from his neighbours. Sesac came vp purposely against Hierusalem. Sesostris, as Diodorus witnesseth, had but 24000. horse: Sesac had 60000: Sesostris had 8020. Chariots, Sesac but 1200: Sesostris made his expedition for no priuate purpose, but to get a great name: Sesac, as most agree, had no other purpose then to succour Ieroboam, and giue him countenance in his new reigne; whom he had fauoured euen against Salomon: therefore Sesostris must needes haue reigned whilest Israel abode in Ægypt.

Whereas Krentzhemius collecteth out of Herodotus, and Diodorus, that one Menas, or Menis, was next to Orus: because those Historians affirme that hee reigned next after the Gods; it moueth mee nothing. For Osiris did succeed those 15. Gods, namely the twelue greater, and three lesser: himselfe also (as the learned Reineccius noteth) being called Menas. Which name, as also Menaus, and Menis, were titles of dignitie: though mistaken by some as proper names. Krentzhemius doth verie probably gather, that Menas was Mercurius Ter-maximus: the Hebrew word

Meni

Meni ſignifying an Arithmetician: which name Ter-maximus might well be attributed to Oſiris: who was a great Conquerour, Philoſopher, and benefactor to mankind, by giuing good Lawes, and teaching profitable Artes. In proweſſe and great vndertakings Seſoſtris was no whit inferiour to Oſiris. For he ſought victorie not for gaine, but for honour onely: and being well contented, that many Nations had acknowledged his power, and ſubmitted themſelues to his will and royall diſpoſition, leauing them in a manner to their libertie, returned into Ægypt. Soone vpon his returne he was endangered by a great Treaſon, the houſe in which he was, being by his owne brother purpoſely fired: which neuertheleſſe hee is ſaide to haue eſcaped, and to haue reigned in all thirtie three yeeres: after which time hee choſe rather to die then to liue: becauſe he fell blinde. Both Herodotus, and Diodorus, affirme that Seſoſtris left a ſonne, whoſe name was Pheron or Pherones: who afterwards tooke the name of Seſoſtris: but was nothing like to his Father in glorie: for hee ſhortly fell blinde. The cauſe of his blindneſſe Herodotus attributes to his aſſaulting the riuer Nilus with a iaueline: which tale Diodorus hauing likewiſe heard, yet reports as a fable, ſaying that perhaps he tooke the diſeaſe naturally from his Father. How long this man reigned it is no where expreſſed: yet foraſmuch as Orus the ſecond, (otherwiſe Buſiris) who ſucceeded him, began 14. yeeres after that this Seſoſtris had beene king, it muſt needes bee that this reigned 14. yeeres at leaſt. That Buſiris began not vntill theſe 14. yeeres at leaſt were expired, the very account of time from the firſt of Buſiris, to the departure of Iſrael out of Ægypt plainely ſhewes, being almoſt generally agreed vpon, to haue beene 75. yeeres. That none came betweene Seſoſtris the ſecond and Buſiris or Orus the ſecond, it ſtands only vpon probabilities: which are theſe. After Seſoſtris had reigned ſomewhile, hee fell blinde: after certaine yeeres hee recouered his ſight, as is ſaide: which may haue beene true, but is more like to haue beene a fable: ſurely the manner of his recouerie as it is ſet downe, is very fabulous: namely that by looking vpon a woman, or waſhing his eyes with her water, who had onely knowne her owne huſband, hee got his ſight againe. As the time of his reigne, before his blindneſſe, and when hee was well againe (if euer hee were) may haue taken vp a good part of 14. yeeres: ſo his workes which were great, doe much more ſtrongly argue, that his reigne was not very ſhort. His words are largely ſet downe by Herodotus, and Diodorus: a part of which may ſeeme to haue beene the finiſhing of that which his Father had begun, about the channels and ſluces of Nilus: whom I thinke he rather frighted, (as his Father had done) with ſpades and ſhouels, then with darts, and iauelins: and by his diligent ouerſight of that worke, was like enough to loſe both his eye-ſight and his peoples loue: whom his Father had very buſily employed in exceſſiue labour about it.

§. VII.

Of BVSIRIS the firſt oppreſſor of the Iſraelites: and of his ſucceſſor Queene THERMVTIS that tooke vp MOSES out of the water.

AND heerein (if I may preſume to coniecture) Buſiris, who was afterwards king, is like to haue dealt with him, as Ieroboam did with the ſonne of Salomon. For that Buſiris himſelfe was much addicted to magnificent workes, it well appeared, by the drudgerie wherewith he wearied the children of Iſrael in his buildings: If therefore he were employed by the great Seſoſtris, as Ieroboam was by Salomon, in the ouerſight of thoſe buſineſſes, he had good opportunitie to worke his greatneſſe with the king by induſtrie: and afterward with the people by incenſing them againſt their new king: as Ieroboam did. For what the multitude will endure at one Princes hands, they will not at anothers: vnleſſe hee haue either an equall ſpirit, or a ſurer foundation. If moreouer he ſought to deriue all the paine and labour of publique workes from the Ægyptians, to the Israelites: hee surely did that which to his owne people was very Exod. 1. plausible: who (as appeares in Exodus) were nothing slack in fulfilling the kings cruelty. Now that Orus the 2. or Busiris was the king that first oppressed Israel, and made the Edict of drowning the Hebrew children, which (saith Cedrenus) lasted tenne monethes: it is a common opinion of many great & most learned writers; who also thinke that hereupon grew the fable of Busiris sacrificing strangers. It is also a common interpretation of that place, Ex. 1. that the King who knew not Ioseph, was a king of a new family. That Busiris was of a new familie, Reineccius doth shew: who also thinks him Author of the bloudie edict. Neuertheless, true it is, that Busiris, according to all mens computation, began his reigne 5. yeeres after the birth of Moses; before whose birth it is most manifest, that the Law was made, and much more that the persecution began: which Bunting thinkes to haue lasted 87. yeeres, ere the departure out of Ægypt. Let vs therefore consider, besides the blindnesse of Sesostris the second, how great the power of the Regents or Viceroyes in Ægypt was: and how great confidence the kings did put in them: seeing Ioseph ruled with such full power, that he bought all Ægypt, & all the Ægyptians for bread; giuing at the same time the best of the land to his owne father & brethren, for nothing: seeing also that when the Ægyptians cried out vpō Pharaoh, for bread: Pharaoh said to all the Egyptians, Go to Ioseph: what he saith to you, do ye. If to a stranger borne, lately fetcht out of prison, a king well able to haue gouerned himselfe, would giue such trust, and soueraigne authoritie: it is not vnlikely that a blind Prince should do it to a man of especial reputation. For God often prospers, not only the good (such as Ioseph was) but wicked men also, as his instruments against the day of wrath. Therfore perhaps the king did (as many haue done) resigne his kingdom to him, though his reign was not accounted to haue begun, till the death of Sesostris. But whether Busiris did vsurpe the kingdom, or protection of the land by violence; or whether the blind king resigned it, keeping the title: or whether Busiris were onely Regent, whilst the king liued, and afterwards (as is acknowledged by all) king himselfe: it might well be said that Pharaohs daughter tooke vp Moses, and that Pharaoh vexed Israel: seeing he both at that time was king in effect, and shortly after king in deed and title both. It were not absurd for vs to say that the blind king Sesostris the second oppressed Israel: but forasmuch as it may seeme that the wicked Tyrant shewed his euill nature euen when he first arose: I thinke it more likely, that Busiris did it, vsing at first the power of a king, and shortly after the stile. Thus of the 125. yeeres which passed betweene the beginning of Sesostris his reigne, and the departure of Israel out of Egypt, 47. being spent: the 75. which remaine, are to bee accounted to Busiris or Orus the second, and his children. Busiris himselfe reigned 30. yeeres, according to Eusebius: whom very many iudicious authors heerein approoue. After him his daughter, who tooke Moses out of the water, is saide by all that I haue read, to haue reigned 12. yeeres: Her name was Thermutis Pharei, or Muthis according to Cedrenus: Euseb. cals her Acencris: and out of Artabanus his Historie Meris: Iosephus cals her both Acenchere, & Thermutis. Epiphanius in Panario saith that she was honoured afterward of the Egyptians, by the name of Thermutis the daughter of Amenoph, the son of Pharaoh. Of this last title question might be made & much spoken: for the Scriptures call her not Pharaohs sonnes daughter, but Pharaohs daughter. Amenophis indeed is placed next before Busiris or Orus the second by Eusebius and others: but whether hee were a king or onely a Regent I cannot coniecture. For Herodotus, Diodorus, and the ancient Historians name the sonne of Sesostris, Pheron. Perhaps his name was Pharaoh Amenophis: and his daughter by the Ægyptians called rather the neece or grandchilde, then the daughter of Pharaoh, because of the glory of Sesostris, and the disreputation of his sonne. If so, and if that Busiris or Orus the second marrying her, pretended any title by her, then is our coniecture strengthened, and then was she both daughter, grandchild, and wife vnto Pharaoh: and suruiuing him, Queene of the land, 12. yeeres. But if she were the daughter of Orus the 2. & sister of Atheris, or Ratheris, as many thinke, to whose coniecture I will not oppose mine,

then

then may it seeme, that either her brethren were degenerate, or too yong to rule, when her Father died.

§. VIII.

Of the two brethren of Queene THERMVTIS: and what king it was, vnder whom MOSES was borne: and who it was that perished in the red Sea.

SHee had two brethren: the one was Rathoris or Atheris, who succeeded her; the other Telegonus, who is onely named by Eusebius: but his linage and off-spring described by Reineccius. Rathoris after his sisters death reigned 9. yeeres: after whom Chencres, thought to be his sonne, reigned 10. and then perished in the red Sea. During the reign of Chencres, Eusebius saith, that Telegonus begat Epaphus vpon Io: of which Historie elsewhere he reporteth otherwise. After the death of Chencres (whom some call Acencheres: but all or most do stile him ἀντίθεον & a fighter against God) Acherres reigned 8. yeeres: and then Cherres 15. This descent seemes from Father to sonne. In the 11. yeere of Cherres it is said by Euseb. that Epaphus reigning in the lower part of Ægypt, built Memphis. This is an argument of that which otherwise was not vnlikely: viz. That Ægypt was greatly brought out of order by the plagues which God had laide vpon it, and the destruction of her king and armie in the red Sea: else could it not haue had two reigning in it at once; the later of whom, or his posteritie seemes to haue taken all from Cherres the grand-child of Chencres. For whereas Armais is said to haue reigned 4. yeeres after Cherres: and Armesis one after Armais: these two kings are by Eusebius and others accounted as one; and his reigne said to haue beene 5. yeeres. His name is called Armeus, otherwise Danaus: and his pedigree thus described by Reineccius in Historia Iulia,

Telegonus:
Epaphus:
Lybia, who had Agenor, Belus, and Busiris.

Ægyptus or Rameſſes who gaue name to the Countrie, hauing expelled his brother Danaus, reigned, and begat Lynceus, married to Hypermneſtra.	Danaus or Armeus expelled by his brother Ægyptus, after hee had reigned fiue yeeres, became king of Argos in Greece: was Father to Hypermneſtra.

How it might come to passe that the Nephews sons of Epaphus should haue occupied the kingdome after Cherres, it is hard to say: considering that Epaphus himselfe is reported by Eusebius to haue been borne in the time of Chencres. But forasmuch as the Historie of Epaphus his birth, is diuersly related by Eusebius, it may suffice, that Belus the father of Danaus & Ægyptus, otherwise called Armeus and Rameſſes, was equally distant from Busiris or Orus the second, with Cherres the grand-child of Chencres. And that the posteritie of Telegonus did marrie very yong, it appeares by the Historie of these two brethren, Danaus & Ægyptus: of whom the former had 50. daughters, the later 50. sons: perhaps, or rather questionlesse by diuers women: yet surely they began to beget children in their first youth: Howsoeuer it were, the generall consent of writers is, that Armeus or Danaus did succeede Cherres: and (according to Eusebius and good Authors approuing him) reigned fiue yeeres. Rameſſes followed, who reigned 68. yeeres. This Rameſſes or Ægyptus is that Armeſeſmiamum or Armeſeſmiamus, vnder whom, in the opinion of Mercator, and of Bunting that followes Mercator, Moſes was borne: and the cruell Edict made of drowning the Hebrew children. The length of his reigne ſeemes to me the chiefe, if not the onely ground of Mercators opinion. For whereas the Lord ſaid to Moſes, Goe, returne to Ægypt, for they are all dead which went about to kill thee: Mercator heereupon conceiues, that it was one and the ſame king vnder whom Moſes was borne, and vnder whom he ſlew the Ægptian at the 40. yeere of his age: and fled into the wilderneſſe, and there abode for feare: all which Circumſtances could agree with none, but this Rameſſes, who reigned ſo long: wherefore deſirous rather to hold a true Paradox, then a common errour, hee placeth one Aliſſragmuthoſis (whoſe name is found in the liſt of Ægyptian kings, but the time vncertaine wherein he reigned) in an age 112. or 113. yeeres more ancient than others left him in: and ſo continuing the Catalogue of his ſucceſſours from Thcmoſis (whom Euſ. cals Amaſis) downwards with no other variation of the length of each mans reigne, than is the difference betweene Manetho and Euſeb. hee findes Moſes borne vnder Armeſeſmiamum: and Iſrael deliuered in the dayes of his ſonne Amenophis. The very name of Aliſſragmuthoſis ſeemes to him with little alteration to ſound like Pharatates, of which name one was thought to haue flouriſhed either as a king, or a wiſe man about the time of Iſaac. For (ſaith he) from Aliſſragmuthoſis to Phragmuthoſis, Pharmuthoſis, Pharetaſis, or Pharatates, the change is not great. Mercator was a man of excellent learning and induſtrie: and one to whom the World is bound for his many notable workes: yet my aſſent heerein is with-held from him, by theſe reaſons. Firſt, I ſee all other writers agree, that Chencres was the king who was drowned in the red Sea: Secondly, the place Exod. 4. all are dead, &c. may better be vnderſtood of Buſiris and all his children, then of one king alone: Thirdly, S^t. Cyrill in his firſt booke againſt Iulian the Apoſtata, ſaith that Dardanus built Dardania, when Moſes was 120. yeeres old: Rameſſes, which was this Armeſeſmiamum, being then king of Ægypt. After Rameſſes, Amenophis reigned 19. yeeres: who is thought by Mercator, and peremptorily by Bunting pronounced, to be the King that periſhed in the red Sea: of which our opinion being alreadie laied open, I thinke it moſt expedient to referre the kings enſuing to their owne times (which a Chronologicall Table ſhall lay open) and heere to ſpeake of that great deliuerance of Iſrael out of Ægypt: which for many great conſiderations depending thereupon, wee may not lightly ouerpaſſe.

CHAP. III.

Of the deliuery of Israel out of Ægypt.

§. I.

Of the time of MOSES birth, and how long the Israelites were oppressed in Ægypt.

TRue it is that the Historie it selfe is generally and well knowne: yet concerning the time of Moses his birth, who was the excellent and famous instrument of this and other great workes of the Highest, the different opinions are very neere as many, as the men that haue written of that Argument.

L. Viues in his annotations vpon S. Augustine citeth many of their coniectures: as that of Porphyrie out of Sanchoniato, that Moses liued in the time of Semiramis: but if hee meant the first Semiramis, it was but a fond conceit: for besides that the same is contrarie to all Stories Diuine and humane; while that Semiramis liued, shee commanded Syria, and all the parts thereof absolutely: neither were the Ammonites, or Moabites, or Edomites, while she ruled, in rerum natura.

A second opinion he remembreth of Appion, taken from Ptolomie a Priest of Mendes, who saith that Moses was borne while Inachus ruled the Argiues, and Amesis in Ægypt.

The third opinion is taken out of Polemon, in his Greeke Historie the first booke: that Moses was borne while Apis the third King ruled Argos.

A fourth is borrowed from Tatianus Assyrius, who though hee cite some authorities, that Moses liued after the Troian warre, is himselfe of opinion, that Moses was farre more ancient, prouing it by many arguments.

Fiftly, he setteth downe the testimonie of Numenius the Philosopher, who tooke Musæus and Moses to be one: confirming the same out of Artapanus, who confesseth that Moses was called Musæus, by the Grecians: and who farther deliuereth that he was adopted by Chenephis, or Thermutis, the daughter of Ægypt: the same which Eupolemus calleth Meris; others (as Rabanus Maurus) Thermothes. Euſebius also affirmeth that by Eupolemus in his first booke de bono, Moses vir Deo coniunctissimus is called Musæus Iudæorum. Euſebius in his Chronologie, finds that Moses was borne while Amenophis ruled Ægypt. The ancient Manethon cals that Pharao, which liued at Moses birth, Thumosis or Thmosis: the same perchance which Appion the Grammarian will haue to be Amosis, and elsewhere Amenophis the Father of Sethosis: to whome Lysimachus and Cornelius Tacitus giue the name of Bocchoris. To mee it seemeth most probable, that while Saphrus, called also Spherus or Ipheteus, gouerned Assyria; Orthopolis Sicyonia; and Criasus the Argiues; that then (Sesostris the second ruling in Ægypt) Moses was borne. For if wee beleeue S. Augustine, it was about the end of Cecrops time, that Moses led Israel out of Ægypt. Eduxit MOSES ex Ægypto populum Dei nouissimo tempore CECROPIS Athenienſium regis: MOSES (saith he) led the people of God out of Ægypt, about the end of CECROPS time King of the Athenians. In this sort therefore is the time of Moses birth, and of his departure out of Ægypt best proued. S. August. affirmes (as before remembred) that Moses was borne: Saphrus gouerning Assyria; and that hee left Ægypt about the end of Cecrops time.

Now

Now Saphrus ruled 20. yeeres; his succeſſor Mamelus 30. yeeres; Sparetus after him 40. yeeres: in whoſe fourth yeere Cecrops began to gouerne in Attica: Aſcatades followed Sparetus, and held the Empire 41: So as Moſes being borne while Saphrus ruled Aſſyria; Orthopolis Sicyonia; and Criaſus Argos (for theſe three kings liued at once at his birth, ſaith S. Auguſtine, as Cecrops did when he departed Ægypt) it will follow that the birth of Moſes was in the nineteenth yeere of the Aſſyrian Saphrus: for take one yeere remaining of 20. (for ſo long Saphrus reigned) to which adde the thirtie yeres of Mamelus, and the 40. yeres of Sparetus, theſe make 71. with which there were waſted three yeeres of Cecrops his 50. yeeres: then take nine yeeres out of the reigne of Aſcatades, who was Sparetus ſucceſſour, thoſe nine yeeres added to 71. make 80. at which age Moſes left Ægypt: and adde theſe nine yeeres to the three yeeres of Cecrops formerly ſpent, there will remaine but foure yeeres of Cecrops his 50: and ſo it falleth right with S. Auguſtines words, affirming that towards the end of Cecrops his time, Moſes led the people of Iſrael out of Ægypt.

Now the time in which the Hebrewes were oppreſt in Ægypt, ſeemeth to haue had beginning ſome eight or nine yeeres before the birth of Moſes, and 54. yeere, or rather more, after Ioſeph: betweene whoſe death and the birth of Moſes, there were conſumed 64. yeeres: ſome of which time, and 80. yeeres after, they liued in great ſeruitude and miſerie. For as it is written in Exodus: They ſet taske-maſters ouer them, to keepe them vnder with burdens: and they built the Cities Pithom and Ramaſes, &c. And by crueltie they cauſed the children of Iſrael to ſerue; and made them weary of their liues, by ſore labour in clay and bricke, and in all worke of the field, with all manner of bondage. All which laid vpon them by a maſtering power and ſtrong hand, they endured to the time by the wiſedome of God appointed: euen from 54. yeeres, or not much more after the death of Ioſeph, who left the World when it had laſted 2370. yeeres, to the eightieth yeere of Moſes, and vntill hee wrought his miracles in the field of Zoan, which he performed in the Worlds age 2514. towards the end thereof, according to Codoman, or after our account, 2513. And becauſe thoſe things which we deliuer of Ægypt, may the better bee vnderſtood, I thinke it neceſſary to ſpeake a few words of the principall places therein named, in this diſcourſe.

Of diuers Cities and places in Ægypt, mentioned in this Story, or elſewhere in the Scripture.

Numb. 33. Ezekiel 30. Hierem. 2. 43, 44, 46. Ioſep. l. 1. c. 9. Tyr. de Bell. ſacr. l. 19. c. 23.

THis Citie which the Hebrewes call Zoan, was built ſeuen yeeres after Hebron. Ezekiel calleth it Taphnes; and ſo doth Hieremie; the Septuagint, Tanis; Ioſephus, Protaidis; after the name of an Ægyptian Queene; Antonius giues it the name of Thanis; Hegeſippus, Thamna; and William Tyrius, Tapius. It adioyneth to the land of Goſen, and is the ſame, wherein Hieremie the Prophet was ſtoned to death, for preaching againſt the Ægyptian and Iewiſh Idolatry.

Zoan or Tahnes was in Moſes time the Metropolis of the lower Ægypt, in which their Pharaohs then commonly reſided; and not vnlikely to be the ſame Citie, where Abraham in his time found him. But Euſebius out of Artapanus affirmeth, that Abraham read Aſtronomie in Heliopolis, or On, to Pharetates King of Ægypt. Alex. Polyhiſtor. out of Eupolemus hath it otherwiſe, ſaying, that Abraham inſtructed the Ægyptian Prieſts, and not the King; both which authorities Euſebius citeth. The Septuagint, and the Vulgar edition, for Zoan write Heliopolis. Pagnin, Vatablus, Iunius, and our Engliſh call it On; and Ptolomie, Onium. There are two Cities of that name; the one on the frontier of the lower Ægypt, towards the South; the other ſomewhat lower on the Eaſter-moſt branch of Nilus falling into the Sea at Peleuſium. And it it may be that Heliopolis to the South of the riuer Traian, was the same which Vatablus and our English call Auen. Of the latter it is, that the Scriptures take certaine knowledge: the same, which Pomp.Mela, and Plinie, call Solis oppidum; Tyrius in the Holy Warre, Malbec; the Arabians, Bahalbeth; and Simeon Sethi, Fons Solis. Of this Heliopolis, or On, was Putiphar Priest, or Prince, whose daughter Ioseph married. In the Territory adioyning Iacob inhabited, while he liued in Ægypt. In the confines of this Citie, Onias, the high Priest of the Iewes, built a Temple, dedicated to the eternall God; not much inferiour to that of Hierusalem (Ptolomie Philopater then gouerning in Ægypt) which stood to the time of Vespasian, 333. yeeres after the foundation by Onias, whom Iosephus falsly reporteth, herein to haue fulfilled a prophecie of Esai.c. 19. In die illa erit Altare Domini in medio terræ Ægypti; In that day shall the Altar of the Lord bee in the middest of the Land of Ægypt. Antiochus Epiphanes at that time of the building tyrannizing ouer the Iewes, gaue the occasion for the erecting of this Temple in Ægypt. Lastly, there it was that our Sauiour CHRIST IESVS remained, while Ioseph and the Virgin Mary feared the violence of Herod: neere which (sayth Brochard) the fountaine is still found, called Iesus Well, whose streames doe afterward water the Gardens of Balsamum, no where else found in Ægypt. And hereof see more in Brochard, in his description of Ægypt.

There is also the Citie of Noph, remembred by Esai and Ezekiel; the same which Hosea the Prophet calleth Moph: which latter name it tooke from a Mountaine adioyning, so called, which Mountaine Herodotus remembreth. And this is that great Citie, which was called Memphis; and so the Septuagint write it. It is knowne to the Arabians by the name of Mazar. The Chaldeans name it Alchabyr; and Tudalensis, Mizraim.

Pelusium, which Vatablus, Pagnin, Iunius, and our English write, Sin; the Septuagint call Sais; and Montanus, Lebna; is not the same with Damiata, as Gul Tyrius witnesseth. In the time of Baldwin the third, Pelusium was called Belbeis. Belbeis (saith Tyrius) quæ olim dicta est Pelusium; Belbeis, that in times past was called Pelusium.

G.Tyr.l.20.c.17 lib.2.c.5.

The Citie of No, the Septuagint call Diospolis. Of which name there are two or three in Egypt. Hierome conuerts it Alexandria, by anticipation, because it was so called in the future.

Ezech.30.15,16

Bubastus, for so Hierome and Zeigler write it, is the same which the Hebrewes call Pibeseth.

Ezech.30.17.

To make the storie the more perceiuable, I haue added a description of the land of Gosen, in which the Israelites inhabited; with those Cities and places so often remembred in the Scripture: as of Taphnes or Zoan, Heliopolis or Bethsemes, Balsephon, Succoth, and the rest; together with Moses passage through the Desarts of Arabia the Stonie. For all storie without the knowledge of the places, wherein the actions were performed, as it wanteth a great part of the pleasure; so it no way enricheth the knowledge and vnderstanding of the Reader; neither doth any thing serue to retain, what we reade, in our memories, so well as these pictures and descriptions doe. In which respect I am driuen to digresse in many places, and to interpose some such discourse, otherwise seeming impertinent: taking for my authority, after many others more ancient, that great learned man, Arias Montanus; who in his Preface to the Storie of the Holy Land, hath these words: Si enim absq; locorum obseruatione res gesta narrentur, aut sine Topographiæ cognitione historia legantur, adeò confusa atq; perturbata erunt omnia, vt ex ijs nihil non obscurum, nihil non difficile elici possit; If narration (saith he) be made of those things which are performed, without the obseruation of the places, wherein they were done: or if Histories be read without Topographicall knowledge; all things will appeare so intricate and confused, as wee shall thereby vnderstand nothing but obscurely, nor draw thence any knowledge, but with the greatest difficultie.

§. III.

§. III.

Of the cruelty against the Israelites yong children in Ægypt: and of MOSES his preseruation, and education.

BVt to returne to the story it selfe. It appeareth that notwithstanding the labour and slauery, which the Israelites endured, yet they decreased not in numbers: insomuch as Pharaoh considering the danger of discontented pouertie, and the able bodies of an oppressed multitude, how perillous they might bee to his estate, by suggestion of the Deuill resolued to slaughter all the male children of the Hebrews, as soone as they should be borne. To which end he sent for Sephora and Thua, women the most famous and expert amongst them, quæ præerant (saith Commestor) multitudini obstetricum, who had command giuen them ouer all mid-wiues; by whom (as it seemeth) he gaue order to all the rest for the execution of his Edict. For to haue called all the mid-wiues of Ægypt together, had been a strange Parliament. Now whether these two, before named, were of the Hebrews, or of the Ægyptians, it is diuersly disputed. S. Augustine calls them Hebrews, becausse it is written Exodus the first, The King of Ægypt commanded the midwiues of the Hebrew women, &c. But Iosephus, Abulensis, and Pererius beleeue them to be Ægyptians. Whosoeuer they were, when it pleased God to frustrate the execution of that secret murder, to the end the world might witnesse both the wickednesse of the Ægyptians, and the iust cause, thereby made manifest, of his future indignation and reuenge: Pharaoh finding those women filled with pietie, and the feare of God, commanded others of his people to execute his former intent; and publikely, or howsoeuer, to destroy all the male Hebrew children borne within his dominions.

Ver. 22.

Now besides the doubts, which Pharaoh had of the multitudes of the Hebrewes, the greatest part of whom hee might haue assured, by affoording them the iustice, which euery King oweth to his vassals, and the rest he might haue imployed or sent away at his pleasure; Iosephus giueth another cause of his rage against them, namely, That it was prophetically deliuered him by an Egyptian Priest, that among the Hebrewes there should bee borne a childe; who growing to mans estate, should become a plague and terrour to his whole Nation. To preuent which, (and presuming that he could resist the ordinance of God, by a meane, contrarie to the lawes of Heauen and of nature) hee stretched out his bloudie and mercilesse hand to the execution of his former intent. The same preuention Herod long after practised, when fearing the spirituall kingdome of Christ, as if it should haue beene temporall, he caused all the male children at that time borne to bee slaughtered. And that Pharaoh had some kinde of foreknowledge of the future successe, it may be gathered by these his owne words, in the tenth verse of the fift of Exodus. Come, let vs worke wisely with them, lest they multiplie; and it come to passe, that if there bee warre, they ioyne themselues also vnto our enemies, and fight against vs, and get them out of the Land. But wee see, and time hath told it vs from the beginning, how God derideth the wisedome of the worldly men, when forgetting the Lord of all power, they relie on the inuentions of their owne most feeble, and altogether darkened vnderstanding. For euen by the hands of the dearely beloued daughter of this tyrant, was that great Prophet and minister of Gods meruailous workes taken out of Nilus, being thereinto turned off, in an Arke of reedes, a sucking and powerlesse infant. And this Princesse hauing beheld the child his forme and beautie, though but yet in the blouth, so pierced her compassion, as she did not onely preserue it, and cause it to be fostered; but commanded that it should bee esteemed as her owne, and with equall care to the sonne of a King nourished. And for memory that it was her deede, shee called the childe Moses, as it were, extractus, or ereptus, taken out, to wit, out of the water: or, after Iosephus and Glicas, Moy, a voice expressing water, and hises, as much to say, as that

that which is drawne out of water, or thence taken. Clemens Alexandrinus was of opinion, that Moſes was circumciſed, before he was put into the Arke of Reedes, and that Amram his father had named him Ioachim. In his youth hee was carefully bred, by the care, and at the charge of Pharaohs Daughter, and by men of the moſt vnderſtanding, taught and inſtructed: quem regio more educauit, præfectis et ſapientibus Ægyptiorum Magiſtris, à quibus erudiretur, ſaith BASIL; Vnto whom ſhee gaue princely education, appointing ouer him wiſe Maſters of the Ægyptians for his inſtructers. Thereby (ſay Ioſephus and Philo) hee became excellently learned in all the doctrine of the Ægyptians; which alſo the Martyr Stephen, in the ſeuenth of the Actes confirmeth; And MOSES was learned in all the wiſedome of the Ægyptians. Which wiſedome or ſapience, ſuch as it was, or at leaſt ſo much thereof as Six. Senenſis hath gathered, wee haue added, betweene the death of Moſes, and the reigne of Ioſua.

Phil. de vita Moyſi.

§. IIII.

Of MOSES his flying out of Ægypt; and the opinions of certaine ancient Hiſtorians of his warre in Æthiopia; and of his marriage there: PHILO his iudgement of his Paſtorall life: and that of PERERIVS of the Bookes of GENESIS and IOB.

WHen Moſes was growne to mans eſtate, Ioſephus and Euſebius, out of Artapanus, tell vs of ten yeeres warre that hee made againſt the Æthiopians: of the beſieging of Saba, afterward by Cambyſes, called Meroe; and how he recouered that Citie by the fauour of Tharbis, a Daughter of Æthiopia, whom he tooke to wife. So hath Commeſtor a prettie tale of Moſes, How after the end of that warre, Tharbis reſiſting his returne into Egypt, Moſes moſt skilfull in Aſtronomie, cauſed two Images to bee ingrauen in two precious ſtones, whereof the one increaſed memorie; the other cauſed forgetfulneſſe. Theſe he ſet in two rings; whereof he gaue the one, to wit, that of obliuion, to his wife Tharbis, reſeruing the other of memorie for himſelfe: which ring of forgetfulneſſe, after ſhee had a while worne, ſhee beganne to neglect the loue ſhee bare her husband: and ſo Moſes without danger returned into Egypt. But leauing theſe fancies to the Authors of them: It is true, that about the 40. yeere of Moſes age, when hee beheld an Egyptian offering violence to one of the oppreſſed Hebrewes, moued by compaſſion, in reſpect of his brother, and ſtirred vp by diſdaine againſt the other, in the contention he ſlew the Egyptian. Soone after which act, finding a diſpoſition in ſome of his owne Nation to accuſe him, for whoſe defence hee had thus greatly endangered his owne life: by the ordinance and aduice of God, whoſe choſen ſeruant he was, hee fled into Arabia Petræa, the next bordering Countrie to Egypt; where wandring all alone, as a man left and forſaken, in a place vnknowne vnto him, as among a Nation of barbarous ſtrangers; and who in future times were the irreconciliable enemies of the Hebrewes: it pleaſed God (working the greateſt things by the weakeſt worldly meanes) to make the watering of a few ſheepe, and the aſſiſting of the Daughters of Raguel the Midianite, an occaſion whereby to prouide him a wife of one of thoſe, and a father in law, that fed him, and ſuſtained him in a Countrie neereſt Egypt, fitteſt to returne from: neceſſarie to bee knowne, becauſe interiacent betweene Egypt and Iudæa, through which he was to leade the Iſraelites; and wherein God held him, till the occaſion which God preſented, beſt ſerued. And laſtly, where the glory of the world ſhined leaſt, amidſt mountainous Deſarts, there the glorie of God, which ſhineth moſt, couered him ouer, and appeared vnto him; not finding him as a Kings ſonne, or an adopted child of great Pharaohs daughter, but as a meeke and humble ſheepe-heard, ſitting at a mountaine foote; a keeper and commander of thoſe poore beaſts onely.

In that part of Arabia, neere Madian, hee conſumed 40. yeeres. And though (as Philo in the story of Moses life obserueth) he did not neglect the care of those flocks, committed to his charge, but that he excelled all others in that Pastorall knowledge; yet in that solitary Desart hee enioyed himselfe: and being separate from the presse of the world, and the troublesome affaires thereof, hee gaue himselfe to contemplation, and to make perfect in himselfe all those knowledges, whereof his younger yeeres had gathered the grounds and principles: the same Author also iudging, that his Pastorall life did excellently prepare him for the execution of the Principalitie, which he afterward obtained. Est enim (saith PHILO) ars Pastoralis, quasi præludium ad regnum, hoc est, ad regimen hominum, gregis mansuetissimi. Quemadmodum bellicosa ingenia præexercent se in venationibus, experientia in feris, quod postea in militia & bello perfectura sunt; brutis præbentibus materiam exercitij, tam belli quàm pacis tempore. At verò præfectura mansueti pecoris, habet quiddam simile cum regno in subditis; ideoq; Reges cognominantur Pastores populorum, non contumeliæ sed honoris gratia; The art of keeping sheepe is, as it were, an introductorie exercise vnto a Kingdome, namely, the rule ouer men, the most gentle flocke: Euen as warlike natures doe before-hand exercise themselues in hunting, practising on wild beasts those things, which after they will accomplish in warfare: those brute beasts affording matter, wherein to traine themselues, both in time of warre and of peace. But the gouernement of gentle cattell, hath a kinde of resemblance vnto a Kingly rule ouer subiects; therefore, Kings are stiled sheep-heards of the people, not in way of reproch, but for their honour.

Philo

That Moses, in this time of his abode at Madian, wrote the Booke of Iob, as Pererius supposeth, I cannot iudge of it, becaûse it is thought, that Iob was at that time liuing. Neither dare I subscribe to Pererius opinion, That Moses, while hee liued in that part of Arabia, wrote the bookes of Genesis; although I cannot denie the reason of Pererius coniecture, That by the example of Iobs patience hee might strengthen the oppressed Hebrewes: and by the promises of God to Abraham, Isaac, and Iacob, put them in assurance of their deliuerie from the Ægyptian slauery, and of the Land of rest, and plentie promised.

Perer. in 3. c. Exod.

Of his calling backe into Ægypt by the Angel of God, and the maruailes and wonders which hee performed, thereby to perswade Pharaoh, that he was the messenger of the most High, the particulars are written in the first fourteene Chapters of Exodus; and therefore to treate of all the particulars therein contained, it were needlesse. But for the first, it is to be noted, that when Moses desired to be taught by God, by wat name hee should make him knowne, and by whom hee was sent; he receiued from God so much, as man could comprehend of his infinite and euerbeing nature. Out of which he deliuered him in the first part of his answere, a name to be considered of by the wisest: and in his second, to bee vnderstood by all. For there is nothing that is, or hath being of it selfe, but the eternall: which truely is; which is aboue all; which is immutable. The bodies of men are changed euery moment: their substance wasteth, and is repaired by nutriment; neuer continuing at one stay, nor being the same so long, as while one may say, Now. Likewise, whatsoeuer is consumed in the longest continuance of time, the same in euery shortest piece of time suffereth decay; neither doth any thing abide in one state. Vna est Dei & sola natura, quæ verè est: id enim quod subsistit, non habet aliunde, sed suum est. Cætera quæ creata sunt, etiamsi videntur esse, non sunt, quia aliquando non fuerunt, & potest rursum non esse, quod non fuit; It is the one and onely nature of God, which truly is, for hee hath his being of himselfe, and not from any thing without him. Other things that are created, although they seeme to be, yet they are not; for sometimes they were not: and that which hath not beene, may againe want being. And with this, in respect of the Diuine nature, the saying of Zeno Eleates excellently agreeth: Tota rerum natura vmbra est, aut inanis, aut fallax; The whole nature of things is but a shadow, either emptie or deceitfull: in comparison of whom (saith Esay) all Nations are as nothing, lesse then nothing, and vanitie.

Exod. c. 3. v. 13. 14. & 15.

Hieron. ad Dam.

C. 4. v. 13.

Of the tenne plagues wherewith the Ægyptians were strucken, the first was by changing changing the Riuers into bloud: God puniſhing them by thoſe waters, into which their Forefathers had throwne, and in which they had drowned, the innocent children of the Hebrewes. To which this place of the Reuelation may bee fitly applied: And I heard the Angell of the water ſay, Lord, thou art iuſt, which art, and which waſt: and holy, becauſe thou haſt iudged theſe things; for they ſhed the bloud of the Saints and Prophets, and therefore haſt thou giuen them bloud to drinke. C. 16. v. .

The reſt of the Plagues by Frogges, Lice, Flyes, or ſtinging Waſpes; by the death of their Cattaile; by leprous Scabbes, by Haile and Fire; by Graſhoppers; by darkneſſe; after which Pharaoh forbad Moſes his preſence: moued the hardned heart of the vnbeleeuing King no longer, then the paine and perill laſted, till ſuch time as his owne firſt-borne, and the firſt-borne of all his Nation periſhed. He then, while he feared his owne life, (a time wherein wee remember God perforce) ſtood vpon no condition: whereas before, hee firſt yeelded but to the departure of the men; then of the men, women and children, reſeruing their beſtiall; but hee was now content for the preſent, that the Iſrelites ſhould not only depart with all their owne, but with a part of the Siluer, Gold, and Iewels of his owne people: of which (the feare being paſt) hee ſuddainly repented him, as his purſuit after them proued. For when euery one of the Hebrewes had (according to direction from Moſes receiued) ſlaine a Lambe, without ſpot or blemiſh, for the Paſſeouer, a Sacrament of the moſt cleane and vnſpotted Sauiour) and with the bloud thereof coloured the poſte and linterne of the doores; the Angell of God in the dead of the night ſmote euery firſt-borne of Ægypt, from the ſonne of the King, to that of the Begger and Slaue: the children of the Iſraelites excepted. At which terrible iudgement of God, Pharaoh being more then euer amazed, yeelded, as before is ſayd, to their departure. The Ægyptians (ſaith Epiphanius) did in after-times imitate this colouring with bloud, which the Iſraelites vſed after the Paſſeouer; aſcribing an exceeding vertue to the Red Colour: and therefore they did not only marke their Sheepe and Cattell, but their Trees bearing Fruit, to preſerue them from lightning and other harmes. Epiphan. l. 1. cont. Hæreſ.

§. V.

Of PHARAOHS purſuit of the Iſraelites: and of their paſſage towards the Red Sea, ſo farre as Succoth.

NOw, when the people were remooued, and on their way, (his heart being hardened by God) hee bethought him aſwell of the Honour loſt, as of the ſhame remaining after ſo many Calamities and Plagues, in ſuffering them to depart with the ſpoiles of his people, and in deſpight of himſelfe. And hauing before this time great Companies of Souldiers in readineſſe, hee conſulted with himſelfe, what way the Iſraelites were like to take. Hee knew that the ſhorteſt and faireſt paſſage was through the Countrey of the Philiſtims. But becauſe theſe people were very ſtrong, and a warlike Nation, and in all probabilitie of his Allies, hee ſuſpected that Moſes meant to find ſome other outlet, to wit, through the Deſart of Etham; and there, becauſe the Countrey was exceeding Mountainous, and of hard acceſſe, and that Moſes was peſtered with multitudes of Women, Children, and Cattell, hee thought it impoſſible for the Iſraelites to eſcape him that way. In the meane-while hauing gathered together all the Chariots of Ægypt, and 600. of his owne, and Captaines ouer them; hee determined to ſet vpon them in the Plaines of Goſen, which way ſoeuer they turned themſelues. For it was the ancient manner to fight in thoſe Chariots, armed with broad and ſharpe Hookes on both ſides, in faſhion like the Mowers Sythe. Which kind of fight in Chariots, but not hooked, the Brittaines vſed againſt the Romanes, while they made the Warre for the Conqueſt of this Land. Of this Armie of PHARAOH, IOSEPHVS affirmeth, that it conſiſted of 50000. Exod. 14. v. 7. Ioſ. ant. l. 2. c. 6.

Horse, and 20000. foot; which, were it true, then it cannot be doubted, but that Pharaoh intended long before to assaile the Hebrewes at their departure, or to destroy them in Gosen; and refused them passage, till such time as hee had prepared an Armie, to set on them. For, as it is written in the first of Exodus, hee doubted two things, eyther that the Hebrewes might ioyne themselues to his enemies within the Land, or being so multiplied, as they were, might leaue his seruice, and get themselues thence at their pleasure. But the plagues which God grieued him withall, enforst him at this time to giue an assent to their departure: perchance fore-running his intent. But were it otherwise, and Iosephus partiall in this affaire, yet by the wordes of the Text it appeareth, that he gathered all the Chariots of Ægypt: which could not bee done in haste. For Moses made but three dayes march, ere Pharaoh was at his heeles; and yet the last day he went on sixteene miles: which, in so hot a Countrey, and to driue their Cattell and Sheep with them, pestered with a world of Women and Children, was a march witnessing the dread of a powerfull Enemie at hand. Now, as Moses well knew, that hee went out with a mightie hand, and that God guided his vnderstanding in all his Enterprizes: so he lay not still in the ditch crying for helpe, but vsing the vnderstanding which God had giuen him, hee left nothing vnperformed, becomming a naturall wise man, a valiant and a skilfull Conducter; as by all his actions and counsailes from this day to his death well appeared.

*Exod.*14.7.

When Moses perceiued that Pharaoh was enraged against him, and commanded him not to dare to come thenceforth into his presence: after hee had warned Israel of the Passeouer, he appointed a generall Assembly or Rende-vous of all the Hebrewes at Ramases, in the Territorie of Gosen; a Citie standing indifferent to receiue from all other parts of the Countrey the dispersed Hebrewes: and gaue commandement, that euery Family should bring with them such store as they had, of Dow and Paste, not staying to make it into bread: knowing then that Pharaoh was on foot, and on his way towards them. Which done, and hauing considered the great strength of Pharaohs Horse-men and Chariots, of which kind of defence Moses was vtterly vnprouided (though as it is written, the Israelites went vp armed) hee marched from Ramases Eastward, towards the Desarts of Etham, and incamped at Succoth, which he performed on the fifteenth day of the Moneth Abib. Which Moneth from that time forward they were commanded to account, as the first Moneth of the yeere. Whether in former times they had beene accustomed to begin their yeere in some other Moneth, following the manner of the Ægyptians, and were now recalled by Moses to the rule of their Forefathers, it is vncertaine. Certaine it is, that they had, and retained, another beginning of their politike yeere, which was not now abrogated, but rather by some solemnities thereunto annexed, was confirmed, and still continued in vse. Wherefore in referring things done, or happening among them, vnto the beginning, middest, or ending of the yeere; that distinction of the Sacred, and the Politike yeere is not to bee neglected. Concerning the number of dayes in euery Moneth, and the whole forme of their yeere, like enough it is that Moses himselfe in fortie yeeres space, did sufficiently instruct the Priests, to whose care the ordering thereof (as common opinion holds) was giuen in trust: but that any rule of framing their Kalendar, was made publike, before the captiuitie of Babylon, I doe not find. Now because time and motion beginne together, it will not, I thinke, bee any great breach of order, to shew here at their first setting forth, what was the forme of the Hebrew yeere: with the difference betweene them and other Nations, in ordering the accompt of time.

The Territory of Gosen was afterward called Ramases, after the name of this City, as appeareth in Gen. 47. & *Num.*33. *Exod.*13.

§. VI.

†. VI.

Of the Solarie and Lunarie yeeres: and how they are reconciled: with the forme of the Hebrew yeere, and their manner of intarcalation.

The Hebrew Moneths are thus named.

The first Moneth, Nisan, or Abib.	1. March.
The second, Iar, or Tiar, Zio, or Zin.	2. April.
The third, Sivan, or Sinan, or Siban.	3. May.
The fourth, Tamuz.	4. June.
The fifth, Ab.	5. July.
The sixth, Elul.	6. August.
The seuenth, Tysri, or Ethanim, or Ethanim.	7. September.
The eighth, Marcheſuan, or Mechaſuan, or Bul, or with Ioſephus, Marſonane.	8. October. 1. Ant. c. 4.
The ninth, Chiſleu, or Caſleu.	9. November.
The tenth, Tebeth, or Thobeth.	10. December
The eleuenth, Sebeth, or Sabath.	11. Ianuarie.
The twelfth, Adar, and Ve Adar.	12. February.

VE Adar was an intercalarie Moneth, added, ſome yeeres, vnto the other twelue, to make the Solarie and Lunarie yeere agree; which (beſides the generall inconuenience that would otherwiſe haue riſen, by caſting the Moneths of Summer into the Winter ſeaſon, to the great confuſion of all account) was more neceſſarily to bee regarded of the Hebrewes, becauſe of the diuine Precept. For God appointed eſpeciall Feaſts to be celebrated preciſely in ſuch a Moneth of the yeere, and withall on a ſet day, both of the Moone and of the Moneth; as the Feaſt of the firſt fruits; the new Moones, and the like: which could not haue ſo beene kept, if eyther the day of the Moone had fallen in ſome other part of the Moneth, or the Moneth it ſelfe beene found farre diſtant from his place in the ſeaſon of the yeere. Deut. 16.

Other Nations, the better to obſerue their Solemnities in the due time, and to aſcertaine all reckonings and remembrances, (which is the principall commoditie of time, that is the meaſure of endurance) were driuen in like manner to make their yeeres vnequall, by adding ſometimes, and ſometimes abating one or more dayes, as the errour committed in foregoing yeeres required. The errour grew at firſt, by not knowing what number of dayes made vp a compleat yeere. For though by the continuall courſe of the Sunne, cauſing Summer and Winter duly to ſucceed each other, it is plaine enough euen to the moſt ſauage of all people, when a yeere hath paſſed ouer them; yet the neceſſitie of ordinarie occurrences, that are to bee numbred by a ſhorter Tally, makes this long meaſure of whole yeeres inſufficient for the ſmaller ſort of more daily affaires. Therefore men obſerued the Monethly conſpicuous reuolution of the Moone, by which they diuided the yeere into twelue parts, ſubdiuiding the Moneth into 29. dayes and nights, and thoſe againe into their quarters and houres. But as the markes of time are ſenſible and eaſily diſcerned: ſo the exact calculation of it is very intricate, and worketh much perplexitie in the vnderſtanding. Twelue reuolutions of the Moone, containing leſſe time by eleuen dayes or thereabout, than the yeerely courſe of the Sunne, through the Zodiacke, in the ſpace of ſixteene yeeres, euery Moneth was found in the quite contrarie part of the yeere, to that wherein it was placed at the firſt. This cauſed them to adde ſome daies to the yeere, making it to conſiſt of twelue Moneths, and as many daies more, as they thought would make the courſes of the Sunne and Moone to agree. But herein were committed many new errours. For neither did the Sunne determine his yeerely reuolution by any ſet number of whole dayes; neyther did the Moone 30. & 29.

change alwayes at one houre; but the verie minutes and leſſer fractions were to bee obſerued by him, that would ſeeke to reduce their motions (which motions alſo were not ſtill alike) into any certaine rule. Here lay much wiſedome and deepe art, which could not ſoone bee brought to perfection. Yet as making an eſtimate at randome, the Athenians held the yeere to containe 360. dayes, wherein moſt of the Greekes concurred with them. That 360. dayes filled vp the Grecian yeere (beſides many collaterall proofes) it is manifeſt by that which Plinie directly affirmeth, telling of the Statues, erected in honour of Demetrius Phalereus, which were (ſayth he) 360. whileſt as yet the yeere exceeded not that number of dayes. By this account neyther did any certaine age of the Moone beginne or end their Moneths; neyther could their Moneths continue many yeeres, in their owne places: but muſt needes bee ſhifted by little and little, from Winter to Summer, and from Summer to Winter, as the dayes forgotten to be inſerted into the Almanacke by men, but not forgotten by the ſuperiour bodies in their courſes, ſhould occupie their owne roomes in their due turnes. Now, becauſe the ſolemnitie of the Olympian Games was to be held at the full Moone, and withall on the 15. day of the Moneth Hecatombæon (which anſwereth in a manner to our Iune) they were carefull to take order, that this Moneth might euer beginne with the new Moone; which they effected by adding ſome two daies to the laſt Moneth of euery yeere: thoſe Games being held once in foure yeeres. This intercalation ſufficed not to make the matter euen; which cauſed them ſometimes to omit one day in the fourth yeere, which was the ſecond of the Moneth Bædromian; (agreeing neerely with our Auguſt) ſometimes not to omit it, or (which is all one) to inſert another for it into the fourth Lunarie yeere, accounting by the Moone, after a manner that was not vulgar. All this notwithſtanding, their Moneth of Iune would euery yeere haue growne colder and colder, had they not ſought to keepe all vpright, by intercalating in each other Olympiad, that is, each eighth yeere one whole Moneth, which they called the ſecond Poſideon or December; which was the deuice of Harpalus, who alſo taught them to make one Moneth of 29. dayes, another of 30. and ſo ſucceſſiuely through the whole yeere. Thus with much labour they kept their yeere as neere as they could, vnto the high way of the Planets; but theſe markes which they obſerued, were found at length to bee deceitfull Guides. For it was not poſſible ſo to faſhion this eighth yeeres intercalation, that it ſhould not deceiue them in 11. houres and 18. minutes at the leaſt, or ſome wayes in 34. houres and 10. minutes, or 36. and 41. minutes; which differences would, in few Ages, haue bred much confuſion. The firſt that introduced a good methode, likely to continue, was Meton the Athenian, who not regarding the Olympiads, and the eighth yeeres intercalation, deuiſed a Cycle of 19. yeeres, wherein the Moone hauing 235. times runne her circuit, met with the Sunne in the ſame place, and on the ſame day of the yeere, as in the 19. yeere before paſt ſhee had done. This inuention of Meton was entertained with great applauſe, and paſſing from Greece to Rome, was there inſerted into the Kalendar in Golden Letters, being called the Golden Number, which name it retaineth vnto this day. Hereby were auoyded the great and vncertaine intercalations that formerly had beene vſed; for by the intercalation of 7. Moneths in the 19. yeeres, all was ſo euen, that no ſenſible difference could bee found. Yet that errour which in one yeere could not be perceiued, was very apparent in a few of thoſe Cycles; the new Moones anticipating in one Cycle 7. houres, and ſome minutes of the preciſe rule. Therefore Calippus deuiſed a new Cycle containing foure of Metons, that is to ſay, 76. yeeres; and afterwards Hipparchus, a Noble Aſtrologer, framed another, containing foure of Calippus his Periods, each of them finding ſome errour in the former obſeruations, which they diligently corrected. The laſt reformation of the Kalendar was that which Iulius Ceſar made, who by aduice of the beſt Mathematicians, then to be found, examining the courſes of thoſe heauenly bodies, reduced the yeere vnto the forme which is now in vſe with vs, containing 365. dayes and ſixe houres, which houres in foure yeeres make vp one whole day, that is intercalated euery fourth yeere, the 24. of Februarie. The correction of the Iulian yeere by Pope Gregorie the 13. Anno Domini 1582. is not as yet entertained by generall conſent; it was indeed, but as a note added vnto the worke of Ceſar: yet a note of great importance. For whereas it was obſerued, that the Sunne, which at the time of the Nicene Councell, Anno Dom. 324. entred the Æquinoctiall on the 21. day of March, was in the yeere 1582. ten dayes ſooner found in that time, Pope Gregory ſtrooke out of the Kalendar ten dayes, following the fourth of October, ſo that in ſtead of the fifth day was written the fifteenth; by which meanes the moueable Feaſts depending on the Sunnes entrance into Aries, were a-10 gaine celebrated in ſuch time, as at the Nicene Councell they had beene. And the better to preuent the like alterations, it was by the Councell of Trent ordained, that from thence forward in euery hundreth yeere, the Leape day ſhould be omitted, excepting ſtill the fourth hundred: becauſe the Sunne doth not in his yeerely courſe take vp full ſixe houres aboue the 365. dayes; but faileth ſo many minutes, as in 400. yeeres make about three whole dayes.

But the Cycle of 19. yeeres, which the Hebrewes vſed, was ſuch as neyther did need any nice curioſitie of houres, minutes, and other leſſer Fractions to helpe it; neyther did in ſumming vp the dayes of the whole yeere, neglect the dayes of the Moone, confounding one Moneth with another. For with them it fell out ſo, that 20 alwayes the Kalends or firſt day of the Moneth was at the new Moone, and becauſe that day was feſtiuall, they were very carefull aſwell to obſerue the ſhort yeere of the Moone, paſſing through all the 12. Signes in one Moneth, as that longer of the Sunne, which is needfully regarded in greater accounts. Firſt, therefore they gaue to Niſan their firſt Moneth, which is about our March or April, 30. dayes; to Iar their ſecond Moneth 29. dayes; and ſo ſucceſſiuely 30. to one, 29. to another. Hereby it came to paſſe, that euery two Moneths of theirs contained ſomewhat euenly two reuolutions of the Moone, allowing 29. dayes, 12. houres, and odde minutes, from change to change. The ſpare minutes were beſtowed among the ſuperfluous or Epact dayes; which made vp 7. Moneths in 19. yeeres; to 6. of which 7.
30 were commonly giuen 30. dayes; to one of them 29. dayes, or otherwiſe as was found requiſite. Their common yeere (as appeareth by the ſeuerall dayes of each Moneth) contained 354. dayes, which faile of the yeere, wherein the Sunne finiſheth his courſe, 11. whole dayes, with ſome fractions of time. But theſe dayes, and other broken pieces, howſoeuer they were neglected in one yeere, yet in the Cycle of 19. yeeres were ſo diſpoſed of by conuenient Intercalations, that ſtill at the end of that Cycle, both the Sunne and Moone were found on the ſame day of the yeere, Moneth and weeke, yea commonly on the ſame houre of the day, where they had beene at the beginning of it 19. yeeres before.

Diuers haue diuerſly ſet downe the forme of the Hebrew yeere, with the manner 40 of their Intercalations. SIGONIVS tells vs, that euery ſecond yeere they did adde a Moneth of 22. dayes; euerie fourth yeere a Moneth of 23. in the regard of 11. dayes and a halfe wanting in 12. Moones to fulfill a yeere of the Sunne. But herein SIGONIVS was very much deceiued. For the Moone doth neuer finiſh her courſe in 22. or 23. dayes: and therefore to haue added ſo many dayes to the end of the yeere, had beene the way to change the faſhion of all the Moneths in the yeeres following, which could not haue begunne as they ought, with the new Moone. Genebrard ſaith, that euery third yeere, or ſecond yeere, as need required, they did intercalate one Moneth, adding it at the yeeres end vnto the other 12. This I beleeue to haue beene true; but in which of the yeeres the intercalation was (if it bee worthy of conſidera-50 tion) me thinkes they doe not probably deliuer, who keepe all farre from euenneſſe vntill the very laſt of the 19. yeeres. For (to omit ſuch as erre groſſely) ſome there are who ſay, that after three yeeres, when beſides the dayes ſpent in 36. courſes of the Moone, 33. dayes are left remaining, that is, 11. dayes of each yeere; then did the Hebrewes adde a Moneth of 30. dayes; keeping three dayes, as it were in pluſſage vnto the next account. The like, say they, was done at the end of the sixt yeere; at which time, besides the Intercalarie Moneth, remained sixe daies, namely, three surmounting that Moneth, and the Epact of three yeeres, besides the three formerly reserued. Thus they goe on to the 18. yeere; at which time they haue 18. daies in hand: all which with the Epact of the 19. yeere make vp a Moneth of 29. daies, that being intercalated at the end of the Cycle makes all euen.

Whether this were the practice, I can neither affirme nor denie; yet surely it must needes haue bred a great confusion, if in the 18. yeere euery Moneth were remoued from his owne place by the distance of 48. daies, that is, halfe a quarter of the yeere and more; which inconuenience by such a reckoning was vnauoydable. Wherefore, I preferre the common opinion, which preuenteth such dislocation of the Moneths, by setting downe a more conuenient way of Intercalation in the 8. yeere. For the 6. daies remaining after the two former Intercalations made in the third and sixth yeeres, added vnto the 22. daies, arising out of the Epacts of the seuenth and eighth yeeres, doe fitly serue to make vp a Moneth, with the borrowing of one day or two from the yeere following; and this borrowing of two daies is so farre from causing any disorder, that indeed it helpes to make the yeeres ensuing vary the lesse from the proper season of euery Moneth. This may suffice to bee spoken of the Hebrew Moneths and Yeeres, by which they guided their accounts.

§. VII.

Of the passage of Israel from Succoth towards the Red Sea: and of the diuers wayes leading out of Ægypt.

FRom Succoth in the morning following, Moses led the Israelites towards the Desart of Etham, to recouer the Mountaine foot, by the edge of that Wildernesse, though hee intended nothing lesse then to goe out that way, of all other the neerest. But being assured of the multitude of Horsemen and armed Chariots, that followed him, hee kept himselfe from being incompassed, by keeping the rough and Mountainous ground on his left hand. At Etham hee rested but one night, and then hee reflected backe from the entrance thereof, and marched away directly towardes the South; the distance betweene it and Succoth being about eight mile. That hee forbare to enter Arabia being then in sight thereof, it seemeth to proceed from three respects; the first two naturall; the third diuine. For Pharaoh being then at hand, and hauing receiued intelligence of the way which Moses tooke, perswaded himselfe, that the numbers which Moses led, consisting of aboue a Million, if not two Millions of soules, (for as it is written Exod. the 12. Great multitudes of sundry sorts of people went out with them) could not possibly passe ouer those Desart and high Mountaines with so great multitudes of Women, Children, and Cattell, but that at the very entrance of that fastnesse he should haue ouer-taken them, and destroyed the greatest numbers of them. For these his owne wordes: They are tangled in the Land, the Wildernesse hath shut them in, doe shew his hopes and intents; which Moses by turning another way did frustrate. Secondly, Moses by offering to enter Arabia that way, drew Pharaoh towardes the East-side of the Land of Gosen, or Rameses: from whence (missing Moses there) his pursuit after him with his Chariots was more difficult, by reason of the roughnesse of the way; and howsoeuer, yet while the Hebrewes kept the Mountaine foot on the left hand, they were better secured from the ouer-bearing violence both of the Horse and Chariots. Thirdly, Moses confidence in the Al-powerfull God was such, by whose spirit, only wise, he was directed, as hee rather made choice to leaue the glory of his deliuerance and victorie to Almightie God, than eyther by an escape the next way, or by the strength of his multitude, consisting of 600000. men, to cast the successe vpon his owne vnderstanding, wise conduction, or valour. The third day he marched with a double pace from Etham towards the Valley of Pihachiroth, 16. mile diſtant; and ſate downe betweene two ledges of Mountaynes adioyning to the Red Sea, to wit, the Mountaynes of Etham on the North, and Baalzephon towards the South: the ſame which Oſorius calleth Climax: on the top whereof there ſtood a Temple dedicated to Baal. And, as Phagius noteth, the word ſo compounded, is as much to ſay, as, Dominus ſpecula, ſiue cuſtodia; Lord of the wateh-towre. For the Ægyptians beleeued, or at leaſt made their ſlaues beleeue, that if any of them offered to eſcape that way into Arabia, this Idoll would both arreſt them, and force them to returne to their Lords and Maſters. For the Ægyptians had gods for all turnes. Ægyptij dij fœcundi; The Ægyptians were fruitfull in gods, ſaith Saint Hierome. But Moſes, who incamped at the foot of this Mountayne with a million of ſoules, or as other conceiue, with two millions, found this Lord of the watch-towre aſleepe, or out of countenance.

It is probable that all those Ægyptians and others brought by the Hebrews to the knowledge of the true God, followed Moses at his departure.

Climax is rather ſo called in reſpect of a paſſage vp and downe, then that it is any proper name.

Now theſe two paſſages leading out of Ægypt into Arabia vpon the firme land, Moſes refuſed, as well that of Peluſium and Caſiotis, the fayreſt and ſhorteſt of all other, in reſpect of Iudea, as the other by Etham, from which he reflected, for the reaſons before remembred, and tooke the way by the Valley of Pihachiroth, between the Mountaynes, which made a ſtraight entrance towards the Sea. After whom Pharaoh made ſo great ſpeede with his Horſe-men and Chariots, as he gaue the Hebrewes no time at all to reſt them after ſo long a march; but gate ſight of them, and they of him, euen at the very brinke and waſh of the Sea: inſomuch as the Hebrewes being terrified with Pharaohs ſudden approch, beganne to deſpaire, and to mutine, at that time when it behoued them moſt to haue taken courage for their owne defence; laying it to Moſes charge, that themſelues foreſaw thoſe perills in which they were wrapped. And feare, Which, ſaith the booke of WISEDOME, is the betraying of thoſe ſuccours which reaſon offereth, made them both deſpaire in Gods former promiſes, and to be forgetfull of their owne ſtrength and multitudes.

*Exod.*13. *v.*17.

§. VIII.

Of their paſſage ouer the Red Sea: and of the Red Sea it ſelfe.

BVt Moſes who feared nothing but God himſelfe, perſwaded them to be confident in his goodneſſe, who hath neuer abandoned thoſe, that aſſuredly truſt in him; vſing this comfortable and reſolued ſpeech: Feare not, &c. for the Ægyptians whom yee haue ſeene this day, yee ſhall neuer ſee them againe. The Lord ſhall fight for you. After which Moſes calling on God for ſuccour, receiued encouragement, and commandement to goe on, in theſe wordes: Wherefore cryeſt thou vnto me? ſpeake vnto the children of Iſrael that they goe forward; and lift thou vp thy rod, and ſtretch out thy hand vpon the Sea, and diuide it, and let the children of Iſrael goe on drie ground through the middeſt of the Sea. MOSES obeying the voice of God, in the darke of the night finding the ſands vncouered, paſt on towards the other ſide and coaſt of Arabia: two parts of the night being ſpent ere he entred the Foord, which it pleaſed God by a forcible Eaſterne winde, and by Moſes rod to prepare.

*Exod.*14. *v.*13.

*Exod.*14. *v.*16.

Pharaoh followed him euen at the heeles, finding the ſame drie ground which Moſes trod on. Therefore, as it is written: The Angell of God which went before the Hoſt of Iſrael, remoued, and went behinde them: alſo the piller of the cloud went from before them, and ſtood behinde them; which is, that it pleaſed God therein either by his immediate power, or by the miniſterie of his Angell, to interpoſe his defence betweene the Hebrewes and their Enemies; to the end that the Ægyptians might hereby be blinded, in ſuch ſort, as they could not purſue Iſrael with any harmefull ſpeede. But in the morning watch Moſes ſeized the other banke of Arabia ſide: and Pharaoh (as the dawne of day beganne to illighten the obſcure ayre) finding a beginning of the

Seas

Exod. 14. v. 27. Seas returne, hasted himselfe towards his owne Coast: But MOSES stretched forth his hand, and the Sea returned to his force, that is, the Sea moued by the power of God, ranne backe towards the land with vnresistable furie and swiftnesse, and ouerwhelmed the whole Armie of Pharaoh, so as not one escaped. For it is written, that God tooke off their Chariot wheeles, that is, when the waters began to couer the sands, the Ægyptians being strucken with feare of death, ranne one athwart another, and missing the path by which they had past on after the Hebrewes, their wheeles stucke fast in the mudde and quick-sands, and could not be drawne out: the Sea comming against them with supernaturall violence.

Lyranus vpon Exod. 14. and others, following the opinions or old Traditions of the Hebrewes, conceiued, that after Moses had by the power of God diuided the Red Sea, and that the children of Israel were fearefull to enter it, Aminadab Prince or Leader of the Tribe of Iuda first made the aduenture, and that therefore was that Tribe euer after honored aboue the rest, according to the prophecie of IACOB, Gen. 49. 8. Thy fathers sonnes shall bow downe vnto thee. But Hierome vpon the 11. of Hosee condemnes this opinion. And though it be true, that Iuda had the first place in all their marches in the Desart, and, as we now call it, led the Vangard, (whereupon it may be inferred, that he also led the way through the Red Sea), yet that Moses himselfe was the Conducter of Israel at that time, it is generally receiued. For, as it is written in the 77. PSALME: Thou didst leade thy people like sheepe by the hand of MOSES and AARON.

The Hebrewes haue also another fancie, that the Red Sea was diuided into twelue parts, and that euery Tribe past ouer in a path apart, because it is written in the 135. Psalme, according to the vulgar: Diuisit mare rubrum in diuisiones; He diuided the Red Sea in diuisions. Also that the bottome of the Sea became as a greene Field or Pasture. But Origen, Epiphanius, Abulensis, and Genebrard, fauouring this conceit, had forgotten to consider, that there were not twelue Pillers, nor twelue Armies of the Ægyptians. It is written in the 77. Psalme, v. 16. Thy way is in the Sea; not thy wayes; and in the last of the booke of Wisedome, vers. 7. In the Red Sea there was a way.

Now this Sea, through which Moses past, and in which Pharaoh, otherwise called Chenchres, perished in the 16. yeere of his reigne, is commonly knowne by the name of the Red Sea, though the same differ nothing at all in naturall colour from other waters. But as Philostratus in his third booke noteth, and our selues know by experience, it is of a bluish colour, as other Seas are. It entreth at a narrow strait betweene Arabia the Happy and Æthiopia, or the land of the Abyssins: the mouth of the indraught from the Cape, which Ptolemie calleth Possodium, to the other Land of Æthiopia, hath not aboue sixe leagues in breadth, and the same also filled euerywhere with Ilands, but afterwards it extendeth it selfe 58. Leagues from Coast to Coast, and it runneth vp betweene Arabia the Happy, and Arabia Petræa, on one side, and Æthiopia and Ægypt on the other, as farre as Sues, the vttermost end and indraught of that Sea: where the Turke now keepeth his fleet of Gallies. The Cosmographers commonly giue it the name of the Arabian Gulfe: but the North part towards Sues, and where Moses past, is called Heropolites of the Citie Hero, sometime Troy, and of later times Sues. Plinie calls it Cambisu, by which name it was knowne, saith he, before it was called Hero many yeeres. The Arabians call this Sea towards the North Apocopa, Eccant, and Eant. Artemidorus writes it Æleniticum: King Iuba Læniticum, others more properly Elaniticum, of the Port and Citie Elana: which the Septuagint call Elath: Ptolemie, Elana: Plinie, Lana: Iosephus, Ilana, and Marius Niger, Aila: there is also Ilalah in Assyria, to which Salmanassar carryed the Israelites captiue, Kings 2. c. 8. v. 11. which Ilalah in Assyria, the Septuagint call Elaa: and in the first of Chron. the 5. Ala. But as for this Red Sea or the parts thereof, thus diuersly named, the Moores and Arabians (Vassals to the Turke) know it by no other appellation, then the Gulfe of Meca, after the name of Mahomets Towne Mecca. The Greekes write it the Sea Erythræum, of a King called Erythras, or Erythræus: and because Erythros thros in the Greeke signifieth Red: hence it is, that, being denominated of this Erythraus, the sonne of Perseus and Andromeda, yet it tooke the name of the Red Sea, as Quin. Curtius coniectureth: which Arianus and Strabo confirme. But it seemeth to me by the view of a discouerie of that Sea in the yeere 1544. performed by Stenen Gama, Viceroy of the East India for the King of Portugall, that this Sea was so called from a reflection of rednesse, both from the bankes, clifts, and sands of many Ilands, and part of the Continent bordering it. For I finde by the report of Castro, a principall Commander vnder Gama (which discourse I gaue Master Richard Hacluit to publish) that there is an Iland called Dalaqua, sometime Lequeo, contayning in length 25. Leagues, and 12. in breadth, the earth, sands, and clifts, of which Iland, being of a reddish colour, serue for a foile to the waters about it: and make it seeme altogether of the same colour. Secondly, the same Castro reporteth, that from 24. degrees of Septentrionall Latitude, to 27. (which make in length of Coast 180. mile, lying as it doth Northerly and Southerly) all the clifts and bankes are of red earth, or stone, which by reflection of the Sunne-beames, giue a kinde of reddish luster to the waters. Thirdly, those Portugals report, and we know it by many testimonies, that there are found in the bottome of this Sea towards the shore, great abundance of red stones, on which the greatest store of Corrall growes, which is carryed into most parts of Europe, and elsewhere. There are also on the Ilands of this Sea many red Trees, saith Strabo, and those growing vnder water, may also be a cause of such a colour. Of these appearances of rednesse by the shaddowes of these stones, sands, earth, and clifts, I suppose that it first tooke the name of the Red Sea, because in so many places it seemeth to be such: which Iohannes Barros in his second Decade, eight Booke and first Chapter, confirmeth.

Arian. de gest. Alex. Mag. l. 8. Strabo, l. 6.

The breadth of this Sea from Elana, or Ezion Gaber adioyning, now Toro, called by the ancient Cosmographers Sinus Elaniticus, which washeth the banks of Madian or Midian, is for 16. or 17. Leagues together, along Northward towards Sues, some three Leagues or nine English mile ouer, and from this Port of Toro to Sues, and the end of this Sea it is in length about 28. Leagues, of which the first 26. haue nine miles breadth, as aforesaid, and afterward the lands both from Ægypt and Arabia, thrust themselues into the Sea, and straighten it so fast, as for sixe miles together, it is not aboue three mile ouer; from thence vpward the land on Ægypt side, falleth away and makes a kinde of Bay or Coue for some ten miles together, after which the land growes vpon the Sea againe, and so bindes it into the very end thereof, at foure miles breadth or thereabout, in which tract it was that Moses past it ouer, though others would haue it to be ouer-against Elana or Toro; but without iudgement: for from Ramases to Pihacheroth and Baalzephon, there is not aboue 30. miles interjacent, or 35. miles at most, which Moses past ouer in three dayes: and betweene the land of Ægypt opposite to Elana or Toro, the distance is aboue 80. miles. For Ramases, to which Citie Moses came (being the Metropolis of Gosen) when he left Pharao at Zoan, and tooke his last leaue, standeth in 30. degrees fiue minutes of Septentrionall Latitude: and Migdol, or the Valley of Pihacheroth, at the foot of the Mountayne Climax, or Baalsephon, in nine and twentie and a halfe, which made a difference of fiue and thirtie English mile, the way lying in effect North and South.

That the passage through the Red Sea was miraculous, and not at a low Ebbe.

THE Ægyptians, and of them the Memphites, and other Heathen Writers, who in hatred of the Hebrewes haue obiected that Moses past ouer the Red Sea at a low ebbe, vpon a great spring-tyde, and that Pharao conducted more by furie then discretion, pursued him so far, as before he could recouer the coast of Ægypt, he was ouer-taken by the floud and therein perished, did not well consider the nature of this place with other circumstances. For not to borrow strength from that part of the Scriptures, which makes it plaine, that the Waters were diuided, and that God wrought this miracle by an Easterly winde, and by the hand and rod of Moses (which authoritie to men that beleeue not therein perswadeth nothing) I say, that by the same naturall reason vnto which they fasten themselues, it is made manifest, that had there beene no other working power from aboue, or assistance giuen from God himselfe to Moses, and the children of Israel than ordinarie and casuall, then could not Pharao and all his Armie haue perished in that pursuit.

For whersoeuer there is any ebbing of the Sea in any gulfe, or indraught, there doe the waters fall away from the Land, and runne downeward towards the Ocean, leauing all that part towards the Land as farre as the Sea can ebbe, or fall off, to be drie Land. Now Moses entring the Sea at Migdol vnder Baalzephon (if he had taken the aduantage and opportunitie of the tyde) must haue left all that end of the Red Sea towards Sues, on his left hand drie and vncouered. For if a passage were made by falling away of the water, ten or twelue mile farther into the Sea then Sues, much more was it made at Sues, and betweene it and where Moses past: who entred the same so farre below it, and towards the body of the same Sea. It followeth then, that if all that part of the Sleeue or Strait, had beene by the ebbe of a spring-tyde discouered, when Pharao found the floud increasing, he needed not to haue returned by the same way toward Ægypt side, but might haue gone on in his returne before the tyde, on his right hand: and so taken ground againe at the end of that Sea, at Sues it selfe, or elsewhere. But the Scriptures doe truely witnesse the contrarie, that is, That the Sea did not fall away from the Land, as naturally it doth; but that Moses past on betweene two Seas, and that the waters were diuided. Otherwise, Pharao by any returne of waters could not haue perished, as he did: and therefore the effects of that great Armies destruction, proue the cause to haue beene a power aboue nature, and the miraculous worke of God himselfe. Againe, those wordes of the Scriptures, that God caused the Sea to runne backe by a strong East-winde, doe rather proue the miracle, than that thereby was caused an ebbe more then ordinarie: for that Sea doth not lye East and West, but, in effect, North and South. And it must haue beene a West and North-west winde, that must haue driuen those waters away through their proper Channels, and to the South-east into the Sea. But the East-winde blue athwart the Sea, and cut it asunder: so as one part fell backe towards the South, and mayne body thereof: the other part remayned towards Sues, and the North. Which being vnknowne to Pharao: while he was checkt by that Sea, which vsed in all times before to ebbe away, the floud prest him and ouer-whelmed him. Thirdly, seeing Iosephus auoweth, that Moses was not only of excellent iudgement generally, but also, so great a Captayne, as he ouer-threw the Æthiopians in many battels, being imployed by Pharao, and wan diuers Cities seeming impregnable: it were barbarous to condemne him of this grosseneſſe, and distraction: that rather then he would haue endured the hardneſſe of a Mountaynous passage at hand (had not God commanded him to take that way, and foretold him of the honor which he would there winne vpon Pharao) he would haue trusted to the aduantage of an ebbing water.

For

For he knew not the contrarie, but that Pharao might haue found him, and preſt him, as well when it flowed as when it ebbed, as it ſeemeth he did. For the people, beholding Pharaos approch, cryed out againſt Moſes, and deſpaired altogether of their ſafetie: and when Moſes prayed vnto God for helpe, he was anſwered by God: Wherefore cryeſt thou vnto me? ſpeake vnto the children of Iſrael that they goe forward, and liſt thou vp thy rod, and ſtretch out thy hand vpon the Sea, and diuide it: which proues that there was not at the time of Pharaos approch any ebbe at all; but that God did diſperſe and cut through the weight of waters, by a ſtrong East-winde, whereby the Sands diſcouered themſelues betweene the Sea on the left hand toward Sues, from whence the waters moued not, and the Sea which was towards the South on the right hand, So that the waters were a wall vnto them on the right hand, and on the left hand, that is, the waters ſo defended them on both ſides, as the Ægyptians could onely follow them in the ſame path; not that the waters ſtood vpright as walls doe, as ſome of the Schoole-men haue fancied. For had Pharaoh and the Ægyptians perceiued any ſuch buildings in the Sea, they would ſoone haue quitted the chace and purſuit of Iſrael. Furthermore, there is no man of iudgement, that can thinke, that Pharaoh and the Ægyptians, who then excelled all Nations in the obſeruations of heauenly Motions, could be ignorant of the fluxes, and refluxes of the Sea, in his owne Countrie, on his owne Coaſt, and in his owne moſt traded and frequented Ports and Hauens, and wherein, his people hauing had ſo many hundreds of yeeres experience of the tydes, he could not be caught, as he was, through ignorance, nor by any foreknowne or naturall accident, but by Gods powerfull hand only; which then falleth moſt heauily on all men, when looking through no other ſpectacle but their owne proſperitie, they leaſt diſcerne it comming, and leaſt feare it. Laſtly, if the Armie of the Ægyptians had beene ouer-taken by the ordinarie returne of the floud, before they could recouer their owne Coaſt; their bodies drowned would haue beene carryed with the floud which runneth vp to Sues, and to the end of that Sea, and not haue beene caſt aſhore on that coaſt of Arabia where Moſes landed, to wit, vpon the Sea-banke ouer againſt Baalzephon, on Arabia ſide: where it was that the Iſraelites ſaw their dead bodies; and not at the end of the Red Sea, to which place the ordinarie floud would haue carryed them: Which floud doth not any where croſſe the Channell, and runne athwart it, as it muſt haue done from Ægypt ſide to Arabia, to haue caſt the Ægyptians bodies there; but it keepes the naturall courſe towards the end of that Sea: and to which their carkaſſes ſhould haue beene carried, if the worke had not beene ſupernaturall and miraculous. Apollonius in the liues of the Fathers affirmeth, that thoſe of the Ægyptians which ſtayed in the Countrie, and did not follow Pharaoh in the purſuit of Iſrael, did euer after honor thoſe Beaſts, Birds, Plants, or other Creatures, about which they were buſied at the time of Pharaohs deſtruction: as he that was then labouring in his Garden, made a God of that Plant or Roote, about which he was occupyed: and ſo of the reſt. But how thoſe multitudes of gods were erected among them, a more probable reaſon ſhall be giuen elſewhere. Oroſius in his firſt Booke and tenth Chapter againſt the Pagans, tells vs, that in his time, who liued ſome 400. yeeres after Chriſt, the prints of Pharaohs Chariot wheeles were to be ſeene at a low water on the Ægyptian ſands: and though they were ſometime defaced by winde and weather, yet ſoone after they appeared againe. But hereof I leaue euery man to his owne beliefe.

CHAP. IIII.

Of the iournying of the Israelites from the Red Sea, to the place where the Law was giuen them: with a discourse of Lawes.

§. I.

A transition, by way of recapitulation of some things touching Chronologie: with a continuance of the storie, vntill the Amalekites met with the Israelites.

BVT to goe on with the storie of Israel, in this sort I collect the times. Moses was borne in the yeere of the World 2434. Saphrus then gouerning Assyria; Orthopolis Sycionia, or Peloponnesus; Criasus the Argiues; Orus Ægypt, and Deucalion Thessalie. He fled into Midian when he had liued 40. yeeres, in the yeere of the World 2474. and two yeeres after was Caleb borne. He returned by the commandement and ordinance of God into Ægypt, and wrought his miracles in the fields of Zoan, in the yeere 2514. in the last Moneth of that yeere. On the 14. day of the first Hebrew moneth Abib, or the 15. of that moneth, beginning the day (as they) at Sunne setting, in the yeere of the World 2514. was the celebration of the Passeouer: and in the dead of the night of the same day were all the first-borne slaine through Ægypt, or in all those parts where the Hebrewes inhabited. The 15. day of the first moneth of the Hebrewes called Abib, being about the beginning of the yeere of the World 2514. Moses with the children of Israel remoued from the generall assembly at Ramases, and marched to Succoth.

And departing thence they made their third Station at Etham: and iournying from Etham, they incamped in the Valley of Pihachereth, or Migdol, vnder the Mountayne Baalzephon; and in the same night after mid-night, they past the Red Sea: Pharaoh and his Armie perishing in their returne, about the first dawne of the day. Moses hauing recouered the bankes of Arabia, gaue thankes vnto God, for the deliuerie of Israel; and making no stay on that coast, entred the Desarts of Arabia Petræa, called Sur. But finding no water in that passage, he incamped at Marah, in the Desart of Etham, which in Exod. 15. v. 22. is also called Sur, 25. miles from the Sea: where the children of Israel prest with extreme thirst, murmured against Moses the second time; first at Pharaohs approch in Pihacheroth, and now in Arabia. But Moses taking the branches of a tree, growing neere a Lake of bitter water, and casting the same thereinto, made the same sweet: a playne type and figure of our Sauiour; who vpon the tree of the Crosse changed the bitternesse of euerlasting death into the sweetnesse of eternall life. Plinie remembers these bitter Fountaynes in his sixth Booke and 29. Chapter. From whence to Delta in Ægypt, Sesostris first, Darius after him, and lastly Ptolemie the second, began to cut an artificiall Riuer, thereby by Boats and small Shipping to trade and nauigate the Red Sea, from the great Cities vpon Nilus. From Marah he remoued to Elim, the sixth Mansion, a march of eight miles: where finding twelue Fountaynes of sweet water, and three-score and ten Palme trees, he rested diuers dayes.

Whether

Whether this Helim were the name of a Towne or Citie in Moses time, I cannot affirme. And yet the scarcitie of waters in that Region was such, as Helim, which had twelue Fountaines, could hardly bee left vnpeopled. William, Arch-Bishop of Tyre, in his Historie of the Holie Warre, found at Helim the ruines of a great and ancient Citie. And at such time as Baldwine the first past that way into Ægypt, Ingressus (saith he) Helim, Ciuitatem antiquissimam populo Israelitico aliquãdo familiarem; ad quam cum peruenissent, loci illius incolæ, Regis aduentu præcognito, naiculam ingredientes in mare vicinum se contulerunt; Entring Helim a very ancient Citie, well knowne sometime to the people of Israel; whither, when he came, the inhabitants, forewarned of the Kings approch, tooke Boate, and shifted themselues into the Sea, lying neere them. From Elim hee returned againe towards the South, and sate downe by the banks of the Red Sea: the seuenth Mansion. For it seemeth that he had knowledge of Amalech, who prepared to resist his passage through that part of Arabia. And Moses who had not as yet trained those of the Hebrewes, appointed to beare armes: nor assured the minds of the rest, who encountring with the least miserie, were more apt to returne to their quiet slauerie, than either to endure the wants and perils which euery where accompanied them in that passage, or at this time to vndertake or sustaine so dangerous an enemie: he therefore made stay at this Mansion, vntill the fifteenth of the second Moneth called Zim, or Iar: and made the eight Mansion in the Desart of Zin; where the children of Israel mutinied against Moses the third time, hauing want of foode. In the sixteenth Chapter of Exodus, Moses omitteth this retrait from Elim to the red Sea, but in the collection of euery seuerall incamping, in the 33. of Numbers, it is set downe.

Will. Tyr. l. 11. cap. 19.

Exod. 16.

Here it pleased God to send so many flights of Quailes, as all the Countrie about their incamping was couered with them. The morning following it also rained Manna, being the sixteenth of their Moneth, which serued them in stead of bread. For now was the store consumed which the people carried with them out of Ægypt. And though they had great numbers of Cattel, and Sheepe among them, yet it seemeth that they durst not feede themselues with many of those: but reserued them both for the milke to releeue the children withall: and for breede to store themselues when they came to the Land promised.

Exod. 16.

From hence towards Raphidim they made two remoues of twentie mile: the one to Daphca, the other to Alus, distant from Raphidim sixe miles. Here being againe prest with want of water, they murmured the fourth time, and repented them of their departure from Ægypt, where they rather contented themselues to be fed and beaten after the manner of beasts, than to suffer a casuall and sometime necessarie want, and to vndergoe the hazzards and trauailes which euery manly minde seeketh after, for the loue of God and their owne freedomes.

But Moses with the same rod which hee diuided the Sea withall, in the sight of the Elders of Israel, brought waters out of the Rocke, wherewith the whole multitude were satisfied.

Exod. 17.

§. II.

Of the Amalekites, Madianites, and Kenites, vpon occasion of the battell with the Amalekites, and IETHROES comming: who being a Kenite, was Priest of Madian.

AND while Moses incamped in this place, the Amalekites who had knowledge of his approch, and ghessed that he meant to leade the children of Israel through their Countrie (which being barren of it selfe, would bee vtterly wasted by so great a multitude of People and Cattel) thought it most for their aduantage to set vpon them at Raphidim: where the want of water, and all other things needful for the life of man infeebled them. On the other side Moses perceiuing their resolutions, gaue charge to Iosua, to draw out a sufficient number of the ablest Hebrewes, to incounter Amalech. Betweene whom and Israel, the victorie remained doubtfull, for the most part of the day: the Hebrewes and Amalekites contending with equall hopes and repulses for many houres. And had not the strength of Moses praiers to God been of farre greater force, and more preualent, than all resistance and attempt made by the bodies of men; that valiant and warlike Nation had greatly indangered the whole enterprise. For those bodies which are vnacquainted with scarcitie of food, and those minds whom a seruile education hath dulled, being beaten, & despaired in their first attempts, wil hardly, or neuer be brought again to hazard themselues.

Exod.17.

After this victorie Iethro repaired to Moses, bringing with him Moses his wife, and his two Sonnes, which either Iethro forbare to conduct, or Moses to receiue, till he had by this ouerthrow of Amalech the better assured himselfe of that part of Arabia. For it is written in the 18. of Exod. v.1. When IETHRO the Priest of Midian, MOSES Father in law, heard all that God had done for MOSES, &c. of which, the last deed, to wit, the ouerthrow of Amalech, gaue Iethro courage and assurance, he then repaired to his sonne in law Moses, at Sinai; where amongst other things, he aduised Moses to appoint Iudges, and other Officers, ouer Israel; being himselfe vnable to giue order in all causes and controuersies, among so many thousands of people, full of discontentment and priuate controuersie.

This Iethro, although he dwelt amongst the Midianites, yet he was by Nation a Kenite, as in the fourth of Iudges v.11. & 17. it is made manifest; where it is written; Now HEBER the Kenite, which was of the children of HOBAB, to wit, the sonne of IETHRO, the father in law of MOSES, was departed from the Kenites, and pitched his Tents vntill the Plaine of Zaanaim, which is by Kedesh. Likewise in the first of Samuel, Saul commanded the Kenites to depart from among the Amalekites, lest hee should destroy thē with the Amalekites. For the Kenites inhabited the mountaines of Sin Kadesh: and the Amalekites dwelt in the Plaines, according to the saying of Balaam, speaking of the Kenites; Strong is thy dwelling place, and thou hast put thy nest in the Rocke. And that Saul spared this Nation, he giueth for cause, that they shewed mercie to all the children of Israel, when they came vp from Ægypt. For these Kenites were a Nation of the Madianites, and the Madianites were of the issues of Madian, one of the sixe sonnes which Abraham begat on Kethura: and might also take that name of Kenites from Kethura, of whom they descended by the Mother, who as it seemeth kept the knowledge of the true God among them, which they receiued from their parent Abraham. For Moses, when he fled out of Ægypt into Midian, and married the daughter of Iethro, would not (had he found them Idolaters) haue made Iethroes Daughter the Mother of his children. And although the Kenites are named amongst those Nations, which God promised, that the seede of Abraham should roote out, and inherite their lands; yet it cannot bee meant by these; who are descended from Abraham himselfe: but by some other Nation, bearing the same name; and in all likelihood of the race of Chus. For in the fifteenth of Genes. vers. nineteenth these Kenites or Chusites are listed with the the Hittites and Perizites, with the Amorites, Canaanites, Gergesites, and Iebusites, which were indeede afterwards rooted out. But these Kenites, descended from Abraham, had separated themselues from among the rest, which were altogether idolatrous. For, as is before remembred, Heber the Kenite, which was of the children of Hobab, was departed from the Kenites, that is to say, from those Kenites of Canaan, and inhabited in Zaanaim, which is by Kedesh or Kadesh. Againe, Moses nameth that Nation of the Kenites, before Midian, or any of Abrahams other sonnes were borne: which he did (referring my selfe to better iudgement) rather, because they were more ancient, than by anticipation. Gen.15. Iudg.4.

And as of the Kenites, so we may consider of the Madianites, parted by Moses into fiue Tribes. For some of them were corrupted, and Heathens; as those of Madian by the Riuer Zared, afterwards destroied by Moses. But the Madianites neere the bankes of the Red Sea, where Moses married his wife Zipora, and with whom he left her and his children, til after the ouerthrow of Amalech, seeme likewise not to haue beene corrupted. For these Madianites with the Kenites assisted Israel, and guided them in the Desarts. But the Madianites in Moab, and to the North of the Metropolis of Arabia, called Petræa, were by Israel rooted out, when those adioyning to the Red Sea were not touched. Gen.25.4.

And though it may be doubted, whether those of Madian, of whom Iethro was Priest, and the other Cities in Moab were the same, yet the contrarie is more probable. For Moses would not haue sent 12000. Israelites, as farre backe as the Red Sea, from the Plaines of Moab, to haue destroied that Madian, where his wiues kindred inhabited: seeing himselfe comming with 600000. able men, was encountred by Amalech, in that passage. Neither could Moses forget the length of the way through those discomfortable Desarts, wherein himselfe and Israel had wandered 40. yeare.

That Iethro, or Iothor, Raguel, or Reuel, and Hobab, were but one person, the Scriptures teach vs. For the Vulgar and Septuagint, which call him Raguel; and our English Reuel; *Exod.*2.18. calls him Iethro, or Iothor, *Exod.*3. & *v.*1. *c.*4. *v.*18. & *c.*18.1. & 6.9.10. & 12. and in *Numbers c.*10. *v.*29. Hobab. Others take Iethro and Hobab to be the same, but not Raguel.

§. III.

Of the time when the Law was giuen: with diuers commendations of the inuention of Lawes.

THe rest of the moneths of this yeare 2515. were spent in the Desart of Sinai, neere the mountaine of Sinai or Horeb, the twelfth Mansion. Eusebius thought that Sinai or Horeb were distinct mountaines: Hierome, to be but one, of a double name. And so it appeareth by many Scriptures. For in *Exod.*3. *v.*1. it is called Horeb: and in *Exod.*24. *v.*16. it is written Sinai. In the 100. *Psalme v.*19. Horeb: in *Exod.*19.11. Sinai. And so it is called, Galatians 4.24. and againe, *Deut.*4.10. & 15. & *Deut.*5.2. Horeb. And so is it in the first of Kings 8.6. and the 2. of Chron. 5.10. and in Malachie 4.4. Finally, in Ecclesiasticus the 48 7. they are named as one. Which heardest (saith Ecclesiasticus) the rebuke of the Lord in Sinai, and in Horeb the iudgement of the vengeance. Somewhat they are disioyned at the top by the report of Peter Belonius: who in the yeare 1588. past out of Ægypt into Arabia, with Monsieur de Fumet of France, and trauailed to the top both of Sinai and Horeb: Sinai being by farre the higher hill. From the side of Horeb (saith he) there falleth a very faire spring of water into the Valley adioyning: where he found two Monasteries of Christian Marronites, containing some 100. Religious persons of diuers Nations, who had pleasant gardens, delicate fruits, and excellent wine. These (saith the same Author) giue entertainment to all strangers, which passe that way.

Now, that there was some such Torrent of water neere Sinai in Moses time, it is very probable: First, because he incamped thereabout almost a yeare, and drew no water, as in other places, by miracle: secondly, because it is written Exod. 32. 20. that when Moses had broken the golden Calfe to powder, which Aaron set vp in his absence, he cast the powder thereof into the water, and made the children of Israel to drinke thereof.

On this mountaine, the Law by the Angell of God was giuen to Moses, where he staied a whole yeare, wanting some ten or twelue daies: for he remoued not till the 20. day of the second moneth of the second yeare; and he arriued about the 45. day after the egression: the Law being giuen the 50. day.

At this Mansion all was done, which is written from the beginning of the 29. Chapter of Exodus, to the end of that booke; all in Leuiticus; and all in Numbers, to the 10. Chapter. Whereof (because there is no storie nor other passage) I will omit the repetition, and in place thereof speake somewhat of the Law, and the kinds and vse thereof: whereby, if the Reader finde the storie any way disioyned, he may turne ouer a few leaues, and, omitting this, finde the continuation thereof. We must first consider, that as there can be neither foundation, building, nor continuance of any Common-wealth, without the rule, leuell, and square of Lawes: so it pleased God to giue thereby vnto Moses the powerfullest meane (his miraculous grace excepted) to gouerne that multitude which he conducted; to make them victorious in their passage, and to establish them assuredly in their conquest. For as the North starre is the most fixed directour of the Sea-man to his desired Port: so is the Law of God the guide & conducter of all in generall, to the hauen of eternall life: the Law of nature, from God his eternall law deduced, the rule of all his Creatures: the Law humane, depending on both these, the guard of Kings, Magistrates, and vertuous men; yea, the very spirit, and the very sinewes of euery estate in the world, by which they liue and moue: the Law, to wit, a iust law, being resembled to an Heart without affection, to an Eie without lust, and to a Mind without passion; a Treasurer, which keepeth for euery man what he hath, and distributeth to euery man what he ought to haue.

This benefit the Ancient, though barbarous, esteemed so highly, that among them, those which were taken for the first makers of Lawes, were honoured as Gods, or as the sonnes of Gods: and the rest, that made either additions or corrections, were commended to all posteritie for men of no lesse vertue, and no lesse liberally beneficiall to their Countries, than the greatest & most prosperous Conquerours that euer gouerned them. The Israelites, the Lacedæmonians, and the Athenians, receiued their Lawes from one: as the Israelites from Moses; the Lacedæmonians from Lycurgus; the Athenians from Solon; the Romanes sometime from their first Kings, from their Decemviri, from their Senatours, from their Lawyers, and from the people themselues: others from the Prince, Nobilitie, and People; as in England, France, and in other Christian Monarchies and Estates.

§. IIII.

Of the name and meaning of the words, Law, and Right.

THe word Lex, or Law, is not alwaies taken alike, but is diuersly, and in an indifferent sense vsed. For if we consider it at large, it may be vnderstood for any rule prescribing a necessarie meane, order, and methode, for the attaining of an end. And so the rules of Grammar, or other Arts, are called Lawes. Or it is taken for any priuate ordinance of Superiours to Inferiours: for the commandements of Tyrants, which they cause to be obserued by force, for their decrees doe also vsurpe that title, according to the generall acceptation of the word Law: of which Esay, Woe vnto them that decree wicked decrees, and write grieuous things. Likewise, the word is vsed for the tumultuarie resolutions of the people. For such constitutions doth Aristotle also call lawes, though euill and vnsufficient. Mala lex est quæ tumultuariè posita est; It is an ill law that is made tumultuously. So as all ordinances, good or euill, are called by the name of lawes. Esay 10. Ethic. l. 4. c. 1.

The word Law is also taken for the morall habit of our minde, which doth (as it were) command our thoughts, words, and actions: framing and fashioning them according to it selfe, as to their patterne and platforme. And thus the law of the flesh which the Diuines call legem fomitis, is to be vnderstood. For euery law is a kind of patterne of that which is done according vnto it: in which sense as * elsewhere, this morall habit or disposition of the heart is called the frame or figmentum of the heart: so in S^t. Paul to the Romanes it is called a Law. But I see another law in my members, rebelling against the law of my minde, and leading me captiue vnto the law of sinne. Againe, the nature and inclinations of all creatures are sometime called[a] lawes, so farre as they agree with the reason of the law eternall; as the law of a Lyon, to be fierce or valiant. * Gen. 6. 5. Item 8. 21.

Also priuate contracts among Merchants and other Tradesmen, doe often put on the name of lawes. But law commonly and properly is taken, for a right rule, prescribing a necessarie meane, for the good of a Common-wealth, or Ciuill communitie. The rest, to wit, the commandements of Tyrants, &c. which haue not the common good for their end, but being leges iniquæ, are by Thomas called violentia magis quàm leges; rather compulsions then lawes: And whatsoeuer is not iust, S^t. Augustine doth not allow for lawes, howsoeuer established: for he calls them iniqua hominum constituta, quæ nec iura dicenda, nec putanda sunt; The vniust constitutions of men which are neither to be termed nor thought lawes. For saith ARISTOTLE, Legalia iusta sunt factiua, & conseruatiua fœlicitatis; Iust lawes are the workers and preseruers of happinesse: because by them we are directed ad vitam quietam, to a quiet life, according to Cicero. Yea, to life euerlasting, according to the Scriptures. For the end of the law, saith Plato, is God and his worship. Finis legis Deus & cultus eius. Lex, or the Law is so called by the Latines à legendo, or à ligando, of reading or binding: Leges quia lectæ & ad populum latæ, saith Varro; For after Lawes were written and published, all men might reade them, and behold in them whereto they were bound. The other Etymologie, à ligando, is no lesse agreeable with the nature of a Law: whence in the Scripture it is called also a yoke, and a band: as confregerunt iugum, diruperunt vincula: they haue broken the yoke, they haue broken the bands. And in the second Psalme, Dirumpamus vincula eorum, & proijciamus à nobis funes ipsorum; Let vs breake their bands in sunder, and cast away their cords from vs.

[a] So Virgil, continuò has leges æternas, fœdera certis imposuit natura locis; Where also it is to bee noted that hee ioynes leges & fœdera together: as in the Scripture the law is oft times called the couenant. Arist. Ethic. 5. cap. 1. Plato in Dial. 1. de Leg. Hierem. 5. 5. Psalm. 2.

The Couenant it is called, because of the conditionall promises of God: and because of Gods peoples voluntarie submission of themselues vnto it: for which word the Septuagint, and the Epistle to the Hebrewes, vse the word διαθηκη, a Testament or last will: which name it hath, because it is not otherwise effectuall for our saluation, but in respect of the death of the Testator, for without the death of the Testator, the Testament is of no force: as Hebr. 9. 17. it is said, Testamentum in mortuis ratum est.

The Hebrewes call the law Thorah of teaching, because euery man is thereby taught his dutie, both to God and Men. The Greekes call it Nomos of distributing, because it distributeth to euery man his owne due; the power of the law is the power of God: Iustice being an attribute proper vnto God himselfe. Imperium legis imperium Dei est; The raigne of the law, is the raigne of God.

Law in generall is thus defined by the Philosophers: Lex est vitæ regula, præcipiens quæ sunt sequenda, & quæ fugienda; Law is the rule of life, commanding what to follow, and what to shunne, or Lex est omnium diuinarum & humanarum rerum Regina; Law is the Queene or Princesse of things both humane and diuine. But this description is grounded vpon the opinion of inevitable fate. Law is the very wisedome of Nature: the reason and vnderstanding of the prudent: and the rule of right and wrong. For as a right line is called Index sui & curui, the demonstrance of it selfe, and of the crooked: so is the law, the Iudge and measure of right and wrong.

Mr. Hooker calls the Law a directiue rule to goodnesse of operation: and though law as touching the substance and essence, consist in vnderstanding: Concludit tamen actum voluntatis; Yet it comprehends the act of our will. The word Ius is also diuersly taken, as sometime for the matter of the law and for common right: sometime for the law it selfe: as Ius Ciuile, or Ius gentium. Isidore distinguisheth the two generall words Ius and Fas: whereof Ius, saith he, hath reference to men, Fas to God. Fas lex diuina, Ius lex humana. To goe ouer another mans field, is permitted, by Gods law, not by mans; and therefore in a thing out of controuersie, Virgil vsed both those words: as Fas & iura sinunt, God and men permit.

Isid. Etym.

The word Ius or Right, is deriued or taken from the old substantiue Nowne iussus, a bidding or commandement: or perhaps from the Greeke Ζεὺς, which is the name of Iupiter, or of the Latine genitiue case Iouis, because as the Scripture speaks, the iudgement is Gods. For as it is certaine that ius-iurandum came of Iouis-iurandum, (for so we finde it written in Nonius out of the ancient, in which sense the Scripture calls it iuramentum Iehouæ) so also we may say, that Ius came of Iouis, quia Iouis est: because as God is the Author, and Patterne, and Maintainer of right, so also in his Vicegerents the Magistrates, he is the pronouncer and exequutor of right. Of this Ius the iust are denominated, iustus à iure, and iustitia à iusto; The right giues name to the righteous: and iustice takes her name from the iust.

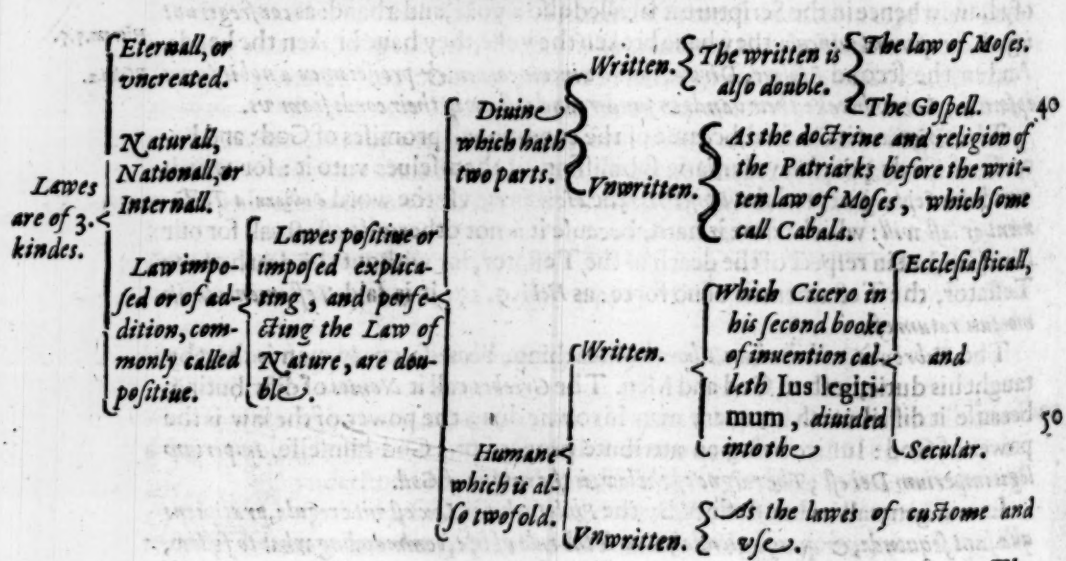
§. V.

Of the definition of Lawes, and of the law eternall.

BVt because lawes are manifold, and that euery kinde hath a proper and peculiar definition, it agreeth with order, first to diuide and distinguish them. I meane those sorts of lawes, from whence all other particulars are drawne: leauing the indiuiduals of humane lawes to their infinite and horrible confusion.



The

The law eternall is thus defined by THOMAS. Lex æterna est æternus diuinæ sapientiæ conceptus, secundum quod ordinatur ad gubernationem rerum ab ipso præcognitarum; The eternall law is the eternall conceipt of Gods wisedome, as it is referred to the gouernement of things foreknowne by himselfe. Or Lex æterna est summa atque æterna ratio diuinæ sapientiæ: quatenus res omnes ad destinatos fines ita dirigit, vt illis iuxta conditionem ipsarum modum aliquem necessitatis adferat; It is the high and eternall reason of diuine sapience: as it directeth all things in such sort to their proper ends, imposing a kinde of necessitie according to their seuerall natures, or conditions. Now the difference lieth in this: That as the same diuine vnderstanding directeth all these to their proper ends; so it is called prouidence: but as it imposeth a necessitie according to the natures of all things which it directeth, so it is called a law. P.1.q.9.art.1. Th.q.93.art.1.

Of this eternall law Cicero tooke knowledge, when in his booke of Lawes, hee wrote in this manner. Erat ratio perfecta, rerum natura, & ad recte faciendum impellens & à delicto auocans: quæ non tum incipit lex esse cum scripta est: sed tum cum orta est. Orta autem simul est cum mente diuina: quamobrem lex vera atque princeps, apta ad iubendum & ad vetandum ratio est recta summi Iouis; That perfect reason and nature of things incouraging or impelling to rightfull actions, and calling vs backe from euill, did not (saith he) then begin to be a law when it was written: but when it had being. Being and beginning it had together with diuine vnderstanding, and therefore a true law and a fit Princesse to command and forbid, is the right reason of the most high God. This eternall law, (if we consider it in God, or as God,) is alwaies one and the same; the nature of God being most simple: but as it is referred to diuers obiects, so the reason of man finds it diuers and manifold. It also seemeth one law in respect of things necessarie, as the motions of the heauens; stabilitie of the earth, &c. but it appeareth otherwise to things contingent: another law to men: another to other creatures, hauing life, and to all those that be inanimate.

By this eternall law all things are directed, as by the counsaile and prouidence of God: from this law all lawes are deriued, as from the rule vniuersall: and thereto referred, as the operation of the second to the first.

The eternall, and the diuine Law, differ only in consideration; the eternall directing more largely, aswell euery creature, to their proper and naturall ends, as it doth man to his supernaturall: but the diuine law to a supernaturall end only: the Naturall law is thence deriued, but an effect of the eternall: as it were a streame from this fountaine. Tho. & Aug.

The Law humane or temporall is also thence drawne: in that it hath the forme of right reason: from which if it differ, it is then impositio iniqua, a wicked imposition: and only borroweth the name of a law.

To this eternall law all things are subiected, aswell Angels and Men, as all other creatures, or things created; whether necessarie or contingent, naturall, or morall, and humane. For the law eternall runneth through all the vniuersall, and therefore it is the law also of things which are simple, naturall, and inanimate.

Hence it is, that all things created are commanded to praise God their Creatour and Director: as Praise him all yee his Angels: praise yee him Sunne and Moone, all bright Starres: heauens of heauens, for he hath established them for euer and euer. He hath made an ordinance which shall not passe: Praise yee the Lord from the earth yee Dragons and all depths: Fire, and haile, snow, and vapours, stormie winds, which execute his Word: mountaines, and hils: fruitfull trees and all Cedars: Beasts, and all Cattell, &c. Now as the reasonable Creatures are by this eternall law bound, by the glorie and felicitie proposed vnto them (beatitude being both the attractiue, and the end) so all other naturall things and creatures, haue in themselues, and in their owne natures, an obedience formall to it, without any proper intention, knowne cause, or end proposed. For beasts are led by sense, and naturall instinct: things without life by their created forme, or formall appetites, as that which is heauie to fall downeward: things light to mount vpward, &c. and fire to heate whatsoeuer is apposed. This Psalm.148.

kinde of working the Aristotelians ascribe to common nature: others to fate; a difference vsed in termes onely; it being no other then Gods generall prouidence: for as it is truly said of God, that he is omnia super omnia: so are all things which appeare in themselues thence deriued: there-vnder subiected: thence-from by his eternall law and prouidence directed, euen from the greatest to the least of his creatures, in heauen and in earth.

The Schoolemen are very curious and ample in the consideration of these lawes: and in discourse of the profit, and of the matter, and obiect of the eternall law. But as the profit is manifest in the good of all creatures, who haue thence-from, either reason, sense, vegetation, or appetition, to conduct them: so is the obiect and matter of the law, the whole creature. For according to Saint AVGVSTINE, Lex aterna est, qua institum est vt omnia sint ordinatissima; The law eternall is that, whereby it is iust, that all things should be disposed in the best and goodliest order.

l. 1. de lib. arb. cap. 6.

Lastly, it is disputed, whether the eternall law be immutable, yea or no? But the resolution is, that it changeth not; for which S^t. Augustine vseth a sufficient argument in his first Booke of Free-will the sixth Chapter. For the law of Moses which had a time prefixed, was eternally by God ordained to last vntill the time of the Padagogia of Gods people, or introduction to Christ should be expired; which time of expiration some thinke our Sauiour noted to be come, when on the Crosse he said, Consummatum est. But I rather thinke these words of our Sauiour to haue no other signification, then that now the prophecie of their giuing him Vineger to drinke was fulfilled. For so S. Iohn expounds it, when he saith v. 28. That Christ seeing all (other) things to be fulfilled, Vt consummaretur Scriptura, That the Scripture in this also might be fulfilled, said, I thirst: though I denie not, but at the same time also the date of the Law was expired, to wit, of the law ceremoniall, and of so much of the iudicial, as appertained peculiarly to the Iewes, and agreeth not with the law of the new Testament and Gospell of Christ. For the immutable law of God, though prescribing things mutable, is not therefore changed in it selfe; but the things prescribed change according to this eternall ordinance, of which the Wisedome of SALOMON, And being one she can doe all things, and remaining in her selfe reneweth all.

Iohn 18. 30. Psal. 69. 22.

§. VI.

Of the Law of Nature.

OF the law of Nature as it is taken in generall, I finde no definition among the Schoolemen: only as it is considered in man, it is called the impression of diuine light, and a participation of the eternall law in the reasonable creature. Lex naturalis est impressio diuini luminis in nobis, & participatio legis aternæ in rationali creatura. VLPIAN defines the naturall law to be the same which nature hath taught all liuing creatures; Ius naturale est quod Natura omnia animalia docuit: and he afterward addeth, Ius istud non humani generis proprium, sed omnium animalium quæ terra mariq; nascuntur, animq; quoque commune est; The law of nature is not proper to man alone, but the same is common to all liuing creatures, as well to birds, as to those which the Land and Sea produceth. But this definition is not generall, but of the naturall law in things of life.

Aug. in Epist. ad Hil. 89. & in Euang. Ioh. tract. 40.

Vlp. de Iustitia & Iure. l. 1. tit. 1

The law of nature in generall, I take to be that disposition, instinct, and formall qualitie, which God in his eternall prouidence hath giuen & imprinted in the nature of euery creature, animate, and inanimate. And as it is diuinum lumen in men, inlightning our formal reason; so is it more then sense in beasts; and more then vegetation in plants. For it is not sense alone in beasts, which teacheth them at first sight, & without experience or instruction, to flie from the enemies of their liues: seeing that Bulls & Horses appeare vnto the sense more fearefull and terrible, then the least kinde of Dogs, and yet the Hare and Deere feedeth by the one, and flieth from from the other, yea though by them neuer ſeene before, and that as ſoone as they fall from their Dammes. Neither is it ſenſe which hath taught other Beaſts to prouide for Winter, Birds to build their neſts, high or low, according to the tempeſtuous or quiet ſeaſons: or the Birds of India to make their neſts on the ſmalleſt twigs which hang ouer Riuers, & not on any other part of the tree, or elſewhere: to ſaue their egs and yong ones from the Monkies, and other beaſts, whoſe weight ſuch a twig will not beare: and which would feare to fall into the water. The inſtances in this kind are exceeding many which may bee giuen. Neither is it out of the vegetable or growing nature of plants, that ſome trees, as the female of the Palmitto, will not beare any fruit except the male grow in ſight. But this they doe by that law, which the infinite and vnſearchable wiſedome of God had in all eternitie prouided for them, and for euery nature created. In man this law is double, corrupt, and incorrupt; corrupt, where the reaſon of man hath made it ſelfe ſubiect, and a Vaſſal to paſſions, and affections brutall: and incorrupt, where time and cuſtom hath bred in men a new nature, which alſo, as is aforeſaid, is a kind of Law. For it was not by the law of Nature incorrupt, which S^t. Auguſtine calleth the law of reaſon, but by a nature blinded and corrupted, that the Germans did anciently allow of theft: and that other Nations were by law conſtrained to become Idolaters; that by the lawes of Lycurgus it was permitted to men to vſe one anothers wife, and to the woman to chooſe them others beſides their huſbands, to beget them with child: which law in thoſe parts hath laſted long, and is not forgotten to this day.

Supra §.4. ex loco ad Rom.7. 23.

Theod.l.9.de curandis affect: Græcorum. Acoſta.

The Scythians, and the people of both Indies, hold it lawfull to burie with them the beſt beloued wiues: as alſo they haue many other cuſtomes remembred by G. Valentia, againſt nature and right reaſon.

And I know not from what authoritie it is that theſe lawes ſome men auow to be naturall: except it be of this corrupt nature, as (among others) to pay guile with guile: to become faithleſſe among the faithleſſe: to prouide for our ſelues by another mans deſtruction: that iniurie is not done to him that is willing: to deſtroy thoſe whom we feare, and the like. For taking the definition of naturall lawes, either out of S^t. Auguſtine or Aquinas, (the one calling it the impreſſion of diuine light; the other, the dictate or ſentence of practique reaſon) the ſame can teach vs, or incline vs to no other thing, then to the exerciſe of Iuſtice & vprightneſſe: and not to offer or performe any thing toward others, ſaue that which we would be content ſhould be offered or performed toward our ſelues. For ſuch is the law of nature to the mind, as the eie is to the bodie; and that which according to Dauid ſheweth vs good, that is, the obſeruation of thoſe things which lead vs therby to our laſt end; which is eternall life: though of themſelues not ſufficient without faith and grace.

Nemo iure naturæ cum alterius detrimento locupletior fieri debet.

Pſalm.4.

Now, that which is truly and properly the law of Nature, where the corruption is not taken for the law, is, as aforeſaid, the impreſſion of Gods diuine light in men, and a participation of the law increated and eternall. For without any law written the right reaſon and vnderſtanding, which God hath giuen vs, are abilities within our ſelues, ſufficient to giue vs knowledge of the good and euill, which by our gratitude to God, and diſtribution of right to men, or by the contrarie, wee prepare and purchaſe for our ſelues. For when the Gentiles (ſaith S. PAVL) which haue not the Law, doe by nature thoſe things contained in the law: they hauing not the law, are a law vnto themſelues. Now, to loue God by whom we are, and to doe the ſame right to all men, which we deſire ſhould be done vnto vs, is an effect of the pureſt reaſon: in whoſe higheſt Turrets, the quiet of conſcience hath made her reſting place, and habitation. In arce altiſſima rationis quies habitat; Therefore, the Gentiles (ſaith S. PAVL) which ſhew the effects of the law written in their hearts, haue their conſciences for a witneſſe of thoſe effects: and the reprobate their thoughts to accuſe them.

Rom.2.ver.14.

Rom.2.ver.15.

And it is moſt true, that whoſoeuer is not a law vnto himſelfe (while he hopeth to abuſe the world by the aduantage of hypocriſie) worketh nothing elſe, but the betraying betraying of his owne soule, by craftie vnrighteousnesse, purchasing eternall perdition. For it helpeth vs not to hide our corrupt hearts from the worlds eie, seeing from him, who is an infinite eie, we cannot hide them: some Garlands wee may gather in this May-game of the world, Sed flos ille, dum loquimur, arescit; Those flowers wither while we discourse of their colours, or are in gathering them. That wee should therefore inhabit and dwell within our selues, and become fearefull witnesses of our secreteſt euils, did that reuerend Philosopher Pythagoras teach in this golden precept: Nil turpe committas, neque coram alijs, neque tecum, maximè omnium verere teipsum; Commit nothing foule or dishoneſt, saith he, neither to be knowne to others, nor to thine owne heart: but aboue all men reuerence thine owne conscience. And this may be a precept of nature and right reason: by which law, men, and all creatures, and bodies, are inclined to those operations, which are answerable to their owne forme; as fire to giue heate. Now, as the reasonable minde is the forme of man, so is he aptly moued to those things which his proper forme presenteth vnto him: to wit, to that which right reason offereth; and the acts of right reason, are the acts of vertue: and in the breach of the rules of this reason, is man least excusable: as being a reasonable creature. For all else, both sensitiue, growing, and inanimate, obay the law which God imposed on them at their first creation.

The Earth performeth her office, according to the Law of God in nature: for it bringeth forth the bud of the hearbe which seedeth seede, &c. and the Beast, which liueth thereon. He gaue a Law to the Seas, and commanded them to keepe their bounds: which they obay. He made a decree for the raine, and a way for the lightning of the thunders. He caused the Sunne to moue, and to giue light, and to serue for signes and for seasons. Were these as rebellious as man, for whose sake they were created, or did they once breake the law of their natures and formes, the whole world would then perish, and all returne to the first Chaos, darkenesse, and confusion.

Iob.c.28.

By this naturall Law, or Law of humane reason, did Caine perceiue his owne wickednesse, and offence, in the murther of Abel: for he not onely feared the displeasure of God, but the reuenge of Men: it being written in his reason, that whatsoeuer he performed towards others, the same by others might bee done vnto him againe. And that this iudgement of well and euill doing, was put into our natures by God, and his eternall law, before the law written: Moses in the person of God witnesseth, Gen. the fourth: If thou doe well, shalt thou not be accepted? and if thou doe not well, sinne lyeth at thy dore.

The Schoolemen are large also in this question of the naturall Law: the same being opened amply by Reinerius, Antoninus, and Valentia. But it is not my purpose to write a volume of this subiect.

But this law which Thomas Aquinas calleth an act of reason taken properly, and not a habite, as it is an euident naturall iudgemẽt of practique reason: they diuide into indemonstrable, or needing no demonstration (as that good is to be followed, and euill eschewed) and demonstrable, which is euidently proued, out of higher and more vniuersall propositions. Againe, as it answereth the naturall appetite, prescribing things to be desired as good, or to be auoided as euill (as of the first, to desire to liue, and to satisfie hunger, &c. and of the second, to eschew paines, sorrow, and death) in this consideration they diuide it, according to the diuers kinds of appetites that are in vs. For in euery man there are 3. sorts of appetites, which answere the three degrees of naturall Law. The first is, to be that which we are; in which is comprehended the desire, both to liue, and to preserue our being & life, also the desire of issue, with care to prouide for them: for the Father after his death liues in his children; and therefore the desire of life comprehends the desire of children. And to these appetites are referred the first indemõstrable lawes of nature, for the most part. For it needs no proofe, that all creatures should desire to be, to liue, and to be defended, and to liue in their issue, when they cannot in themselues. And as man is a being, Ens or Res: so hee doth desire good, and shunne euill. For it is common to all things, to desire things agreeable to their owne natures, which is, to desire their owne good. And so is Good defined by Aristotle, to be that which all desire. Which definition Basil vpon the 44. Psalme approueth: Rectè quidem Bonum definierunt, Quod omnia expetunt; Rightly haue some men defined Good, or Goodnesse, to be that which all things desire. Ethic.l.1.c.1.

The second kinde of appetite is of those things which appertaine to vs, as wee haue sense. Whence, by the law of Nature, wee desire the delights of euery sense; but with such moderation, as may neither glut vs with satietie, nor hurt vs with excesse. For as Sense it selfe is for the preseruation of life and being: so is it meete, euen by the law of nature, that the sensitiue appetite should not carrie vs to the destruction, either of our life or being. And although (seeing both these kinds of appetites are in beasts) we may well say, that Nature hath giuen diuers lawes vnto them: In which sense the Ciuilians define Naturall right, or Ius naturale, to bee the same which Nature hath taught all liuing creatures; Yet the Schoolemen admit not, that the instincts of beasts can be properly called a Law, but onely a Ius, or Right, which is the matter, & aime of euery Law. For so they distinguish it; where Vlpian affirmeth, that Ius naturale is that, which Nature hath taught all liuing creatures. In this place (saith Valentia) Ius is not to be taken for a Law, but for the matter of the Law. And yet where Vlpian also distinguisheth the right belonging to liuing creatures in generall, from the right belonging to men; calling the one Ius naturæ, the other Ius gentium: the Diuines vnderstand the law of nature more largely, that is, for all euident dictates, precepts, or biddings of diuine reason: both in beasts and men; and restraine the law of Nations to a kinde of humane right.

The third appetite is of those things which appertaine properly to man, as he is a liuing creature reasonable: as well with relation to God, and to our Neighbour, as for our selues: and the lawes of this appetite are the Commandements of our religion.

Now although there are many other branches and diuisions of this law of nature answering the diuision of matter, which it prescribeth, and as manifold, as the morall actions are which it commandeth or forbiddeth: yet is the law of nature but one law, according to Aquinas: first, because it hath one fountaine or roote in the naturall or motiue faculties, which is but one, stirring vp to good, and declining the contrarie: secondly, because all is contained in that generall naturall precept, That good is to be followed, and ill auoided: and thirdly, because all the parts are reduced to one and the same last end.

That this law of nature bindeth all creatures, it is manifest: and chiefly man; because he is indued with reason; in whom as reason groweth, so this band of obseruing the law of nature increaseth, Postquam ratio ad perfectum venit, tunc fit quod scriptum est, Adueniente mandato, peccatum reuixit; When reason grew to perfection, then it came to passe, which was written by S. PAVL, When the Commandement came, sinne reuiued. Neither is it a small warrant for this law of nature, when those which breake the same, are said by S. PAVL, To be deliuered ouer into a reprobate sense (or minde) to doe those things which are not conuenient: and againe, that their consciences beare witnesse, and their thoughts accuse them. For, though this law of nature stretch not to euery particular: as to command fasting and the like: yet, it commandeth in generall all good, and whatsoeuer is agreeable to right reason. And therefore, said DAMASCENE; homines facti sunt mali, declinando in id quod contra naturam est; Men (saith he) are made euill, by declining vnto that which is contrarie to nature: and S. AVGVSTINE, Omne vitium naturæ nocet, ac per hoc contra naturam est; Euery vice doth wrong to nature, and is therefore contrarie vnto it. Basil. Rom.1.28. Rom.2.15. L.2.Fid.ortho. c.30.

Neither yet are the rules of this law of nature so streight, but that they suffer exceptions in some particulars. For whereas by this law all men are borne Lords of the earth, yet it well alloweth inequalitie of portions, according to vnequal merit:

by

by taking from the euill, and giuing to the good: and by permitting and commanding that all men shall enioy the fruits of their labours to themselues: according to the rules of iustice and equitie.

And though the law of nature command, that all things bee restored which are left in trust, yet in some causes this her law she suffereth to be broken: as to denie a mad man his weapons, and the like, which he left in keeping while hee was sober. But the vniuersall principles can no more be changed, than the decrees of God are alterable: who according to St. PAVL, abideth faithfull, and cannot denie himselfe. 2. Tim. 2.

§. VII.

Of the written Law of God.

AFter the eternall, and naturall, the law Positiue or imposed is the next in order, which law, being nothing but an addition, or rather explication of the former, hath two kinds; Diuine, and Humane. Againe, the diuine positiue law is double; the old and new: The old was giuen vnto Moses in Mount Sinai or Horeb, at such time as the world had stood 2513. whole yeeres: and in the 67. day of this yeere when as Ascatades or Ascades gouerned the Assyrians, Marathus the Sycionians, Triopas the Argiues, Cecrops Attica, and Acherres Ægypt: to wit, after the promise to Abraham 430. yeeres. And this, it seemes, was the first written law which the world receiued. For the very word Nomos, signifying a law, was not then, nor long after inuented by the Gracians: no not in Homers time: who liued after the fall of Troy 80. yeeres at least: and Troy it selfe was cast downe 335. yeeres, after Moses led Israel out of Ægypt. This law, it pleased God to ingraue in stone, that it might remaine a lasting booke of his expresse will in the Church; and that the Priests and people might haue, whereof to meditate, till the comming of Christ: and that so these children of Israel, though bred among an Idolatrous people in Ægypt, might be without excuse: the slight defences of ignorance being taken from them. Aug. de Ciuit. Dei. l. 1.

The reason knowne to vs why this law was not written before, is, that when the people were few, and their liues long, the Elders of families might easily without any written law instruct their owne children: and yet as they increased, so doubtlesse they had, besides the law of Nature, many precepts from God, before the law written. But now at length, forasmuch as the law of nature did not define all kinds of good, and euil; nor condemne euery sinne in particular: nor sufficiently terrifie the consciences of offenders: nor so expound diuine worship, as for those after-ages was required, who gaue euery day lesse authoritie than other to the naturall law; In these respects it was necessarie, that the law should be written, and set before the eies of all men: which before, they might, but would not reade, in their owne consciences. The Schoolemen, and the Fathers before them, inlarge the causes and necessitie, why the law was written, whereof these are the chiefest.

The first, for restraining of sinne, directly grounded vpon this place of DAVID, The law of the Lord is vndefiled, conuerting soules: The testimonies of the Lord are faithfull giuing wisedome to children. For the humane law, saith St. Augustine, meeteth not with all offences, either by way of prohibition or punishment; seeing thereby it might take away something seeming necessarie, and hinder common profit: but the diuine law written, forbiddeth euery euill, and therefore by Dauid it is called vndefiled.

Secondly, it serueth for the direction of our minds. For the lawes of men can onely take knowledge of outward actions, but not of internall motions, or of our disposition and will: and yet it is required, that we be no lesse cleane in the one, than in the other. And therefore were the words conuerting our soules, added by Dauid: wherein are all our outward acts first generated, according to the Cabalists. Actiones hominum hominum nulla essent, nisi prius in mente dicerentur; The actions of men (say they) would be none at all, were they not first conceiued in the minde.

Thirdly, it leadeth vs to the knowledge of truth, which by reason of diuersitie of opinion, and difference of peculiar lawes among sundrie Nations, we cannot bee assured of; but the law of God bindeth all men, and is without errour: and therefore also said DAVID, That the testimonie of the law of God is faithfull: giuing wisedome to children.

§. VIII.

Of the vnwritten law of God, giuen to the Patriarks by Tradition.

NOw, that in all this long tract of time, betweene the creation and the written law, the world and people of God were left altogether to the law of reason and nature, it doth not appeare. For the Patriarks of the first age receiued many precepts from God himselfe, and whatsoeuer was first imposed by Adam, the same was obserued by Seth, who instructed Enos: from whom it descended to Noah, Sem, Abraham, Isaac, Iacob, Ioseph, and Moses. Yea many particular Commandements afterward written, were formerly imposed and deliuered ouer by Tradition, which kinde of teaching the Iewes afterward called Cabala, or Receptio: precepts receiued from the mouth of their Priests and Elders: to which the Iewes after the law written, added the interpretation of secret mysteries, reserued in the bosomes of their Priests, and vnlawfull to be vttered to the people. But the true Cabala was not to be concealed from any; as being indeede the diuine law reuealed to the Patriarks, and from them deliuered to the posteritie, when as yet it was vnwritten. The Commandements which God gaue vnto Adam in the beginning, were, that he should impose names to all beasts, according to their natures; to whose perfection of vnderstanding they were sufficiently knowne. For finding the reason of his owne name Adam of Adamah, Earth, or red clay, hee gaue other names significant, not only to beasts, but to his Children and Nephewes, which afterward his issues imitated; as the name of Seth signifieth, as some take it, one that was laid for the ground or foundation of the Church, or rather, one giuen in recompence for Abel that was slaine: and Enosh signifieth man or miserable, &c. Further, God commanded Adam to till the ground, and to liue by the labour thereof: God also gaue him the choise of all fruits, but the forbidden, and in Adam also was marriage first instituted: all men thence-after being commanded to cohabite with their Wiues, rather than with their Father and Mother.

That murther and crueltie was also forbidden, both before the law written, and before the floud it selfe, it is manifest. God himselfe making it appeare, that it was one of the greatest causes of the destruction of mankinde by the generall floud. For God said vnto NOAH, *An end of all flesh is come before mee: for the earth is filled with crueltie through them: and behold, I will destroy them from the earth. That offence therefore, for which all perished, could not be vnknowne to all that perished: Gods mercie and iustice interposing betweene the vntaught, and reuenge. This commandement God repeated to Noe, after the waters were dried vp from the earth. Whoso sheddeth mans bloud, by man shall his bloud be shed: for in the Image of God hath he made man.

Also the law of honouring and reuerencing our parents, was obserued among the faithful, and the contrary punished by the fathers curse: as, Cursed be Canaan, a seruant of seruants shall he be vnto his brethren. Againe, we finde that the vnnaturall sinne of the Sodomites was punished in the highest degree; as with fire from Heauen. The sinne of Adulterie and Rauishment, was before the law no lesse detested than the rest, as appeareth by that reuenge, taken for Dina's forcing: and by the iudge-

*The common reading is cum terra: but God did not destroy the earth; and why may not this præpositionin this place haue the same force, which it hath according to Iunius, Gen. 4.1. Item. 44.4. and Deut. 34.1. especially, seeing these words are but a repetition of that which is saide, v. 7. Delebo hominem de superficie terræ. Gen. 9. v. 6.

Gen. 9. 25.

Gen. 34. 25.

Gen.38.14. iudgement which Iuda gaue against Tamar, That she should be burnt: and by the repentance of Pharaoh and Abimelech, against whom this sentence was pronounced, Thou art but dead, because of the Woman which thou hast taken: for she is a mans Wife: To these we may adde the ordinance of Sacrifice, of distinction of cleane and vncleane beasts; of Circumcision, of the Brother to raise vp seed to his brother that left a Widow childlesse, and diuers other constitutions, partly Morall, and partly Ceremoniall, which being deliuered before the written law, were after by it confirmed. So that this Diuine Law imposed, of which the Law of Moses containeth that which is called The old Testament, may be said, not only to haue been written in the hearts of men, before it was ingrauen in stone, but also in substance to haue beene giuen in precept to the Patriarks. For as S. Paul witnesseth of himselfe, I knew not sinne, but by the Law: so euer the Law naturally preceded, and went before offences, though written after offences committed.

It is true, that all the creatures of God were directed by some kind of vnwritten law; the Angels intuitiuely; Men by Reason; Beasts by sense and instinct, without discourse; plants by their vegetatiue powers; and things inanimate by their necessary motions, without sense or preception.

Of the Morall, Iudiciall, and Ceremoniall Law, with a note prefixed, How the Scripture speaketh not alway in one sense, when it nameth the Law of MOSES.

NOw as the word (Law) in generall, as is afore said, hath diuers significations, and is taken for all doctrine which doth prescribe and restraine: so this Law, called the Law of Moses in particular, is taken by Rom.3.v.19. S. Paul diuersly; as sometime for all the old Testament, as, Now we know whatsoeuer the Law saith, it saith to them which are vnder the Law.

When it is opposed, or differenced from the Prophets and Psalmes, it is there taken for the fiue Bookes of Moses. For so Saint Luke hath distinguished them;

Luc.24.44. as, All must be fulfilled which are written of mee in the Law, in the Prophets, and in the Psalmes.

When it is opposed to the Gospell, then it is taken for the Law Morall, Ceremoniall, and Iudiciall; as,

Rom.3.28. Therefore we conclude, that a man is iustified by faith without the workes of the Law.

When it is opposed to Grace, it signifieth the declaration of Gods wrath, and our guilt of condemnation; or the extremity of the law, and summum ius: as,

Rom.6.4. Gal.3.18. For ye are not vnder the Law, but vnder grace.

When it is opposed to the Truth, namely, where the Ceremonies or signes are taken for the things signified; as the Sacrifice for Christ, and the like: then it signifieth but shadowes and figures; as, The Law was giuen by MOSES, but grace and truth

Iohn 1.17. came by IESVS CHRIST.

Lastly, when it is opposed to the time of Christs comming, it signifieth the whole policie of the Iewes Common-weale; as, Before faith came, wee were kept vnder the Gal.3.23. Luc.16.6. Law, &c. or the Law of the order and institution of the Aaronicall Priesthood; as, All the Prophets and the Law, or the Priests, prophecied vnto IOHN. And if the Heb.7.12. & 10.1. Priesthood bee changed, the Law also, to wit, of the Priesthood, must needes bee changed.

The word (Law) is sometime also taken by the Figure Metonymia, for Interest, Authority, and Empire, or for constraining force; as, The Law of the Spirit of life, Rom.8.2. the law or the force of sinne and death, the enforcements of concupiscence, &c.

Rom.7.23. But the Written Law of MOSES, or the Law of the Old Testament, of which we now speake, is thus defined. The Law is a doctrine, which was first put into the the mindes of men by God, and afterwards written by Moses, or by him repeated, commanding Holinesse and Iustice, promising eternall life conditionally, that is, to the obseruers of the law, and threatning death to those which breake the law in the least. For according to Saint Iames; Whosoeuer shall keepe the whole, and faileth in one point, is guilty of all. The definition vsed by the Schoolemen, in which both the Old and New law are comprehended, is thus giuen. Lex diuina est diuinum decretum, hominibus præscribens modum necessarium vt aptè peruenire possint ad supernaturalem beatitudinem, quæ est vltimus humanæ vitæ finis; The diuine law (say they) is the decree of God, prescribing vnto men a necessary meane, where by they may aptly attaine supernaturall beatitude, which is the last end of mans life. Iames 2. 10.

The law of Moses hath three parts: Morall, Ceremoniall, and Iudiciall. The Morall part commandeth this or that good to be done, and this or that euill to be auoided, in particular; as also it declareth, for whose sake it is to be done; as Do this, for I am the Lord, whereas the law of nature commands it but in generall. Againe, the Morall law entreateth of vertue and goodnesse; The Ceremoniall of diuine seruice, and of holines; (for external worship, and the order of hallowing our selues vnto God is called Ceremony) and the Iudiciall teacheth the particular gouernment, fit for the Common-wealth of the Iewes, and prescribeth orders for iustice and equity. And therefore was it said of Saint Paul, The commandement is iust, holy and good: iust, or iustice being referred to the Iudiciall: holy, or holinesse to the Ceremoniall; good, or honest to the Morall. The Iudiciall part is touching the gouernment of the commonwealth of the Iewes, in which many things must needs be proper to that estate, as such as were instituted either in respect of place or persons. Rom. 7. 12.

The Ceremoniall is diuided into foure parts, according to the foure kindes of things of which it speaketh, to wit, Sacrifice, Holy things, Sacraments, and Obseruances. To Sacrifices belong beasts, and the fruits of the earth; to Holy things the Tabernacle, Temple, Vessels, Altars, and the like; to Sacraments, Circumcision, the Passeouer, & such like. For the Obseruances, they consisted either in prohibition of certaine meats, as not to eate the bloud and fat of beasts; or in some other outward things, as in washings, purifyings, anointings, and attire, as not to weare mixt garments of Linnen and Woollen; as also it prohibiteth other vnnatural and vnproper commixtions, as Thou shalt not yoke together in a plough an Oxe and an Asse, or cast mingled seed in one field. It also exhorteth naturall compassion, and forbiddeth cruelty euen to beasts, birds, and plants, whereby the creatures of God might be destroyed without any profit to man. For so some referre these precepts, Thou shalt not kill the bird sitting on her nest; nor beate downe the first buddes of the tree, nor muzzell the labouring Oxe, and the like, to the Ceremoniall Law.

Neither is there any of these three parts of the Law of Moses, but it hath as yet in some respects, the same power which it had before the comming of Christ. For the Morall liueth still, and is not abrogated or taken away: sauing in the ability of iustifying or condemning; for therein are wee commanded to loue and worship God: and to vse charitie one towards another: which for euer shall be required at our hands. Therein also are we in particular directed, how this ought to be done: which power of directing by speciall rules and precepts of life, it retaineth still. For these things also are commanded in both Testaments to be obserued: though principally for the feare of God in the one, and for the loue of God in the other.

The Ceremoniall also liueth in the things which it fore-signified. For the shadow is not destroyed, but perfected, when the body it selfe is represented to vs. Besides, it still liueth, in that it giueth both instruction and testimony of Christ, and in that it giueth direction to the Church, for some Ceremonies and Types of holy signification, which are still expedient; though in a farre fewer number than before Christs comming, and in a farre lesse degree of necessity.

Lastly, the Iudiciall liueth in substance, and concerning the end, and the naturall and vniuersall equity thereof.

But the Morall faileth in the point of iustification, the Ceremoniall as touching the vse and externall obseruation (because Christ himselfe is come, of whom the ceremonies were signes and shadowes) and the Iudiciall is taken away, as farre forth as it was peculiar to the Iewes Common-weale, and policie.

§. X.

A proposall of nine other points to be considered, with a touch of the fiue first.

AS for that which remaineth in the generall consideration of the diuine written Lawe, it may in effect bee reduced into these nine points.

1. The dignitie and worth of the law.
2. The Maiestie of the law-giuer.
3. The propertie and peculiaritie of the people receiuing it.
4. The conueniencie of the time in which it was giuen.
5. The efficacie and power thereof.
6. The difference and agreement of the old and new Testament.
7. The end and vse of the Law.
8. The sense and vnderstanding of the Law.
9. The durance and continuance thereof.

1. The dignitie of the Law is sufficiently proued by S. Paul, in these wordes: Wherefore the Lawe is holy, and the Commandement is holy, and iust, and good: which three attributes are referred, as aforesaid, to the Morall, Ceremoniall, and Iudiciall.

2. The Maiestie of the Law-giuer is approued in all his creatures: who as he hath giuen all things their liues, and beings, so he onely gaue the law, who could onely giue the end and reward promised, to wit, the saluation of mankinde: but he gaue it not to Moses immediatly, but by the ministery of Angels: as it is said. And the Law was ordained by Angels, in the hand of a Mediatour: and in the Acts, Hee gaue the Law by the ordinance of Angels.

Gal. 3. v. 19.

3. The proprietie and peculiarity of the people, receiuing this Law, is in three respects. First, in that they were prepared: Secondly, in that they were a Nation apart and dissenered: Thirdly, in that they were the children of the promise made to Abraham. Prepared they were, because they had the knowledge of one God, when all other Nations were Idolaters. A Nation apart and seuered they were, because of Gods choice and election. Children of the promise they were, for the promise was made by God vnto Abraham, and his seed: not vnto his seedes, as to Esau and Iacob, but to his seede, as to Iacob, or Israel singularly, of whom Christ. Now to ABRAHAM and his seede were the promises made: he saith not to the seeds, as speaking of many, but to thy seede, as of one, which is Christ.

Gal. 3. v. 6.

4. The conueniencie of the time, in which it was giuen, is noted by S. Augustine: that it was about the middle time, betweene the Law of Nature, and Grace: the law of Nature continued from Adam to Moses: the law written in the Commandements receiued by Moses in the worlds yeere 2514. continued to the Baptisme of Iohn: from which time begun the Law of Grace, which shall continue to the worlds end. Other reasons for the conueniencie are formerly giuen.

5. The fifth consideration is of the efficacie of this law, the same being a disposition to, or signe of our iustification: but not by it selfe sufficient, but as a figure of Christ in ceremonies, and a preparation to righteousnesse in morall precepts. For through the passion of Christ were sinnes forgiuen, who taketh away the sinnes of the the world: and therefore S. Paul calleth the rudiments of the law beggerly and weake, beggerly as containing no grace, weake as not able to forgiue and iuſtifie. The bloud of Goates and Bulles, and the aſhes of an Heifer could only cleanſe the body; but they were figures of Chriſts bloud, which doth cleanſe the inward ſoule. For if the law could iuſtifie, then Chriſt died in vaine. Gal. 4. Heb. 9. Gal. 2.

§. XI.

Of the ſixth poynt, to wit, of the difference and agreement of the Old and New Teſtament.

THe Old and New Teſtament differ in name, and in the meane and way propoſed for attaining to ſaluation; as the Old by workes, the New by grace: but in the thing it ſelfe, or obiect and remote end, they agree: which is mans happineſſe and ſaluation.

The Old Teſtament, or Law, or Letter, or the Witneſſe of Gods will, was called the Old, becauſe it preceded the New Teſtament; which is an explication of the Old: from which the New taketh witneſſe. Yet the new of more excellencie, in that it doth more liuely expreſſe, and openly and directly delineate the wayes of our redemption. It is alſo called the Old, to ſhew that in part it was to bee abrogated: In that he ſayth the New Teſtament, he hath abrogated the Old. For the old law, though greatly extolled by the Prophets, and deliuered with wonderfull miracles, yet was it conſtituted in a policie periſhable: but the New was giuen in a promiſe of an euerlaſting Kingdome, and therefore called in the Apocalyps, a Teſtament and Goſpel for euer during. Heb. c. 8. v. 13.

The Old Teſtament is called the Law, becauſe the firſt and chiefe part is the Law of Moſes, of which the Prophets and Pſalmes are Commentaries, explicating that Law.

The New Teſtament is called the Goſpel, becauſe the firſt and chiefe part thereof is the glad tidings of our Redemption: the other Bookes, as the Epiſtles, or Letters of the Apoſtles, and the Acts or Story of the Apoſtles, are plentifull interpreters thereof: The word Euangelion ſignifying a ioyfull, happie and proſperous meſſage, or (as Homer vſed it) the reward giuen to the Meſſenger, bringing ioyfull newes. It is alſo ſometime taken for a ſacrifice, offered after victory, or other pleaſing ſucceſſe, as by Xenophon. In the Scriptures it hath three ſignifications; Firſt, for glad tidings in generall, as in Eſay the 52. v. 7. concerning peace: Secondly, by an excellencie it is reſtrained, to ſignifie that moſt ioyfull meſſage of ſaluation, as in Luc. 2. 10. whence alſo by figure it is taken for the Hiſtory of Chriſt: and ſo wee vnderſtand the foure Goſpels. Act. 1.

Laſtly, for the preaching and diuulging the doctrine of Chriſt, as Cor. 1. 9. v. 14. and Cor. 2. 8. v. 18.

The agreement of both Teſtaments (taken, I thinke, as they are diuided in volumes) is by Daneus compriſed in theſe foure.

In their Author.
In the ſubſtance of the Couenant, or things promiſed.
In the foundation, to wit, Chriſt.
In the effects, that is, in righteouſneſſe and iuſtification.

In the Author they agree, becauſe both are of God, and therefore both one Teſtament and will of God in ſubſtance of doctrine. For as there was euer one Church, ſo was there one Couenant, one Adoption, and one Doctrine. As the old Law doth point at Chriſt, ſo doth the new Law teach Chriſt: the old propoſing him as to come, the new as already come; one and the ſame thing being promiſed in both; both tending to one, and the ſame end: euen the ſaluation of our ſoules; which according to S. Peter is the end of our faith. For although it bee ſaid, that Moſes did promiſe by obseruing the law an earthly Kingdome, a land flowing with milke and honie, the propagation of children, and other worldly blessings: yet all these were but figures to teach, and pledges to assure the Fathers of those spirituall blessings by Christ; for by the earthly hee raised their mindes to the hope of heauenly. And the Fathers notwithstanding these worldly goods, did yet acknowledge themselues strangers, and pilgrims, expecting the heauenly Hierusalem: according to this place of the Hebrewes: All these died in faith, and receiued not the promises, but saw them a farre off, and beleeued them: confessing that they were strangers and pilgrimes on the earth. To which purpose also Saint AVGVSTINE: Omnino pauci veterem legem intelligunt, non attendentes per promissa terrena aeterna promitti: Few (saith hee) doe vnderstand the olde law: not attending that by things earthly eternall are promised. And S. HIEROME: Noluit Deus pascere Iudæos more pecorum corporalibus donis opibusque, vt Iudei somniant: God would not feede the Iewes as beasts with corporall gifts and riches, as themselues dreame. And this may be gathered out of Gods owne words, Ego sum Deus tuus, & ero vobis in Deum; I am thy God, and I will be your God. For the words, I will be your God, proue that it was not for the present, or for perishable things, that God gaue them this promise; but in respect of the future: to wit, the safetie of their soules. For as God created both body and soule, so hath he of his goodnesse, not left the better part vncared for, which liueth euer.

C.11.v.13.

Lib. de Ciuit. Dei 18.c.15.

In Sophon.c.3. v.9.

The agreement betweene the Old and New Testament in substance, inferres also the agreement in foundation. For Christ is called the foundation of the law, laid both by the Apostles and Prophets: in whom all the promises of God in the Old and New, are assured: the fathers hauing eaten the same spirituall foode, which wee eate in our Sacraments.

The agreement in effects is, in that the knowledge of our sinne and miserie, which is taught vs by the law, maketh way, and as it were, serueth in subordination to the Gospel, the proper effects whereof are mercie and saluation: to which the Law seruing as an introduction (for to those which acknowledge their sinne and miserie, God sheweth his mercie and saluation) may be said to agree with the Gospel in the effect. For otherwise if we seuer the law from subordination to the Gospel, the effects are very different: the one sheweth the way of righteousnesse by workes, the other by faith; the Law woundeth, the Gospel healeth: the Law terrifieth, the Gospel allureth; Moses accuseth, Christ defendeth: Moses condemneth, Christ pardoneth. The Old restraineth the hand, the New the minde. Data est lex quæ non sanaret (saith S. AVGVSTINE) sed quæ ægrotantes probaret; The Law was giuen, not to helpe but to discouer sicknesse: and S. CHRYSOSTOME, Data est lex, vt se homo inueniret, non vt moribus sanaretur, sed vt medicus quæreretur; The law was giuen that man might finde and know his owne imperfection: not that his disease was thereby holpen: but that he might then seeke out the Phisician. For Christ came to saue the world, which the law had condemned. And as Moses was but a seruant, and Christ a Sonne, so the greatest benefit was reserued to bee brought, as by the worthiest person, sayth Cyril: for this law made nothing perfect, but was an introduction of a better hope.

Homil. ad Rom.

Heb.7.

§. XII.

Of the rest of the points proposed.

THe seuenth consideration is of the end, and vse of the law: which is to bring vs to Christ: for finding no righteousnesse in our owne workes, we must seeke it in some other. But this is the last, and remote, and vtmost end: the next and proper end of the law, is to prescribe righteousnesse, and to exact absolute and perfect obedience to God. Cursed is he which continueth not in all the things of this law.

Leuit.18.5.

The second end of the law, is to render vs inexcusable before God: who knowing

ing ſo perfect a law, doe not keepe it: the law requiring a perfect and intire, not a broken or halfe obedience: but both inward and outward righteouſneſſe, and performance of dutie to God and Men.

The third and chiefe end of the law is, as hath beene ſaid, to ſend vs to Chriſt, and his grace, being in our ſelues condemned and loſt. For the law was deliuered with thunder, and with a moſt violent and fearefull tempeſt, threatning eternall death.

The fourth end of the law was to deſigne, and preſerue, the place of the Church and true people of God: and to hold them in one Diſcipline, and awe, till the comming of Chriſt: after whom the Church was to be diſperſed ouer the whole world.

These be the ends of the Morall law. The end and vſe of the Ceremoniall law, is to confirme the truth of Chriſt, and the new Teſtament. The vſe of the Iudiciall, to teach vs naturall equitie, and right, whereto we muſt conforme our ſelues.

The ſenſe and vnderſtanding of the law is double, literall and ſpirituall: by the literall we are taught the worſhip and ſeruice of God: by the ſpirituall, the figures and myſticall fore-ſpeakings of Chriſt.

Laſtly, for the durance or continuance of the law, the ſame had being vntill the paſſion of Chriſt: before which time, and while Chriſt taught in the world, both the old and the new were in force. But after that the true ſacrifice was offered vpon the Altar of the Croſſe, then the Iewiſh ſacrifices and ceremonies, which were Types and figures of Chriſt (Chriſt being the body of thoſe ſhaddowes) ceaſed to binde the conſciences any longer: the myſterie of our redemption being now by Chriſt and in him finiſhed. In token whereof the vaile of the Temple rent aſunder; noting that the ceremoniall vailes and ſhaddowes were now to be remoued, not that the morall law of the Commandements was hereby aboliſhed, or weakened at all: otherwiſe then that it had not power to condemne according to the Iewiſh doctrine, as aforeſaid. For the obſeruing of the law was by Chriſt himſelfe ſeuerely commanded: our loue towards God being thereby to be witneſſed. And herein Dauid ſo much reioyced, as he preferred the obſeruation of the law, before all that the world could yeeld. In via teſtimoniorum tuorum delectatus ſum, ſicut in omnibus diuitijs; I haue beene delighted in thy law as in all manner of riches: And againe. The law of thy mouth is good for me aboue thouſands of gold and ſiluer. This is the loue of God (ſaith S. IOHN) that wee keepe his Commandement. And that there is no excuſe for the neglect of the things commanded in the law, God himſelfe in Deuteronomie witneſſeth. This Commandement (ſaith hee) which I command thee this day, is not hidde from thee, neither is it farre off. It is not in heauen that thou ſhouldeſt ſay, Who ſhall goe vp for vs to heauen, and bring it vs, and cauſe vs to heare it that we may doe it? neither is it beyond the Sea, that thou ſhouldeſt ſay, Who ſhall goe ouer the Sea for vs, and bring it vs? &c. but the word is very neere vnto thee, euen in thy mouth and in thy heart for to doe it. Behold (ſaith MOSES) I haue ſet before thee this day, life and death, good and euill, in that I command thee this day to loue the Lord thy God, to walke in his waies, and to keepe his Commandements, and his Ordinances, and his Lawes, that thou maieſt liue, &c. Neither is it ſaid in vaine in S. MATTHEVV. Si vis ad vitam ingredi, ſerua mandata; If thou wilt enter into life, keepe the Commandements: and in S. IOHN: Scio quia mandatum eius vita æterna eſt; I know that his Commandement is life euerlaſting. And if this be the charitie of God, or of Men towards God, as S. Iohn hath taught, to wit, that we keepe his Commandements: certainely he is but a lyar, that profeſſeth to loue God, and neglecteth to obſerue the word of his will, with all his power. And though I confeſſe it is not in mans abilitie, without the ſpeciall grace of God, to fulfill the law (Chriſt onely as man excepted) yet if wee rightly conſider the mercifull care which God had of his people in thoſe his Commandements, we ſhall finde in our ſelues, how we borrow libertie, and rather let ſlip our affections, and voluntarily looſen them from the chaines of obedience, to which the word of God and diuine reaſon hath faſtened them, than that we are excuſable by thoſe difficulties and impoſſibilities, which our minde (greedie of libertie) propoſeth to it ſelfe. For this is the loue of God, that wee keepe his Commande-

ments, and his Commandements are not grieuous, 1. IOHN 3. verse 12. and if wee examine euery precept apart, and then weigh them each after other, in the ballance of our consciences; it is not hard for any man to iudge, by what easie persuasions, wee steale away from our owne power, as vnwilling to vse it against our pleasing desires.

§. XIII.

Of the seuerall Commandements of the Decalogue: and that the difficultie is not in respect of the Commandements, but by our default.

FOr by the first wee are commanded to acknowledge, serue, and loue one God. Now, whereby are we inticed to the breach of this precept? seeing euery reasonable man may conceiue and know, that infinite power cannot be diuided into many infinites: and that it is of necessitie, that by this almightie Vnitie, all things haue beene caused, and are continued. And if brute beasts had this knowledge of their Creatour, and how in his prouidence he hath also prouided for euery of them, which giueth to beasts their foode, &c. there is no doubt but that they would also serue and loue him only.

Psal.147.v.9.

The second precept is the forbidding of Idolatrie, and worship of Images: the making whereof, out of doubt, was not the inuention of an ill intent in the beginning, seeing this is generally true. Omnia mala exempla bonis initijs orta sunt; All ill examples did spring and arise from good beginnings. For their first erection was to keepe the memorie of men famous for their vertue: vntill (saith Lactantius) the Deuill crept into them, and (hauing blotted out the first intent) working in weake and ignorant soules, changed the nature of the one, and the reason of the other, to serue himselfe thereby. For what reasonable man, if he be not forsaken of God, will call on those blinde, deafe, dumbe, and dead stocks, more worthlesse then the most worthlesse of those, that hauing life and reason, implore their helpe, which haue neither: yea, of more vilde prize and baser, then the basest of beasts, who haue sense and estimation? for what doe wee thereby (saith the Wisedome of SALOMON) but call to the weake for helpe, pray to the dead for life, require aide of him that hath no experience, assistance in our iournies of him that cannot goe, and successe in our affaires of him that hath no power? And whether the Idolater, or the blocke, to which hee prayeth, be more senseless: Dauid maketh a doubt. For (saith he) they that make them are like vnto them, and so are all the rest that trust in them.

Gloss. in verb. Calum.

Wisd.13.19.

Psal.35.18.

The breach of the third Commandement is neither perswaded by worldly pleasure, nor worldly profit: the two greatest inchanters of mortall men. No, wee are no way allured to this horrible disdaine of God, vnlesse the hate of good men, and Gods curse, bee accounted an aduantage. For as our corruptest nature giues vs nothing towards it, so can it satisfie no one appetite, except euerlasting sorrow, and Hell dwell in our desire. And therefore this strange custome hath the Deuill brought vp among men, without all subtletie of argument, or cunning perswasion, taking thereby the greatest and most scornefull aduantage ouer vs. For slaughter satisfieth hatred, Theft giues satisfaction to neede, Adulterie to lust, Oppression to couetousnesse: but this contemptuous offence of blasphemie, and the irreuerent abuse of Gods name, as it giueth no helpe to any of our worldly affections, so the most saluage Nations of the world doe not vse it.

The fourth Commandement, to keepe the Sabbath day holy, hath neither paine, burthen, nor inconuenience. For it giueth rest to the labourer, and consolation to their Masters. And that this law was imposed on man for his benefit, Moses teacheth in the reason of the law: as in *Exod.*23.12. And in the seuenth day thou shalt rest, that thine Oxe and thine Asse may rest, and the sonne of thy maide, and the stranger may be refreshed.

The

The first of the second Table to honour our Parents, with whom we are one and the same, is a gratitude which nature it selfe hath taught vs towards them, who after God gaue vs life and being, haue begotten vs, and borne vs, cherished vs in our weake and helpelesse infancie, and bestowed on vs the harueſt and profit of their labours and cares. Therefore, in the Temporall and Iudiciall ordinances, cursing of parents, or the offering them violence, was made death.

The next is, that thou shalt not Murther, that is, thou shalt not doe the acts following the affections of hatred. For the law of God, and after it our owne lawes, and in effect the law of all Nations, haue made difference between slaughter casuall, and furious. Affectio enim tua (saith BRACTON) imponit nomen operi tuo; It is the affection and will that makes the worke such as it is. And certainely whosoeuer cannot forbeare to commit murther, hath neither the grace of God, nor any vse of his owne will.

The third of the second Table, commands vs from adulterie. Now, if the preseruation of Virginitie haue been possible, for thousands of Men and Women, who in all ages haue mastered their fleshly desires, and haue returned chast to the graue: It cannot be accounted a burthen, to forbeare the dishonour and iniurie, which we offer to others by such a violation, seeing marriage is permitted by the lawes of God, and Men, to all that affect it. And there is no man liuing whom the desire of beautie and forme hath so constrained, but he might with ease forbeare the prosequution of this ill: did not himselfe giue sucke to this Infant, and nourish warmth till it grow to strong heate, heate till it turne to fire, and fire to flame. Nuptiæ replent terram, Virginitas Paradisum.

The fourth of the second Table, is, that we shall not steale. And if that kind of violent robberie had been vsed in Moses time, which many Ruffians practise nowa-daies in England, and to the dishonour of our Nation more in England, than in any Region of the world among Christians, out of doubt, he would haue censured them by death, and not by restitution, though quadruple. For I speake not of the poore and miserable soules, whom hunger and extreme necessitie inforceth, but of those detested Theeues, who to maintaine themselues Lord-like, assault, robbe, and wound the Merchant, Artificer, and Labouring man, or breake by violence into other mens houses, and spend in Brauerie, Drunkennesse, and vpon Harlots, in one day, what other men sometime haue laboured for all their liues: impouerishing whole families: and taking the bread and food from the mouthes of their children. And that this Commandement might easily be obserued; it would soone appeare, if Princes would resolue, but for a few yeeres to pardon none. For it is the hope of life, and the argument of sparing the first offence, that incourageth these Hellhounds. And if euery man may presume to be pardoned once, there is no state or Common-wealth, but these men would in a short time impouerish or destroy it.

The fifth Commandement of this second Table, is, the prohibition of false witnesse: from which if men could not forbeare, all surety of estate and life were taken away. And so much did God detest a false witnesse, and a false accuser, especially in matters criminall, that the law ordained him to suffer the same death or punishment, which he sought by falsehood to lay on his brother.

The last of the ten Commandements forbiddeth vs to couet any thing, which belongeth to another man, either the bodies of their wiues for concupiscence, or their goods for desire of gain. And this precept seemeth the hardest for men to obserue; so esteemed by reason of our fraile affections: and yet if wee iudge hereof rightly, it may be doubted whether it extend to all our inconsiderate fancies and vaine thoughts. For although it be not easie to master all our sudden passions, yet we may restraine and hinder the growing, and farther increase, if wee please to intend our strength, and seeke for grace. How the word Coueting reacheth to all those it is to be considered. For Concupiscentia, according to some, Est effrænatus habendi appetitus; An vnbrideled, or vnrestrained appetite of hauing: And as touching such an appetite, we cānot excuse our selues by any our natural frailty, or vnaduised error;

But

But, as I ſuppoſe, the word Concupiſcence is more largely taken, either for a determinate and vnbridled euill intent, or for ſome vrging inclination thereunto. All the queſtion is of the later ſort: which is, Actus imperfectus, id eſt, non deliberatus ratione qua eſt principium proprium actus boni aut vitioſi; Such paſſions, or inclinations are vnperfect acts, that is, not deliberated vpon by reaſon, which is the proper principle of a good or vitious action. And ſure, it may ſeeme, that ſo long as wee reſiſt ſuch motions, they harme vs not: as they ſay, Quamdiu refragamur nihil nocent: nocent autem cum eis dominari permittimus; As long as wee giue no aſcent vnto them, it is thought by ſome that they hurt vs not: and that then onely they hurt, when we ſuffer them to beare ſway. But theſe men, as it ſeemes, make nothing forbidden in this tenth precept, but what hath been forbidden in the other: for in euery Commandement, not only the outward act, but alſo the inward aſſent vnto euill, though it breake not out into act, is forbidden: therefore, that wee may know the difference betweene this Commandement and the reſt, the diſtinction of deſires is to be held: that ſome are with aſſent, and vnbridled; others bridled, and without aſſent. For ſo euen the Morall Philoſopher can tell vs, that the Continent man hath euill deſires, but without aſſent (for they are bridled by the ſtrength of right reaſon) as on the other ſide the Incontinent hath good deſires, but reſtrained and ſuppreſſed by contrarie paſſions. The euill deſires when they are accompanied with aſſent, are in euery Commandement forbidden, together with the outward act: and therefore, if wee will haue any thing proper to this Commandement, we muſt needes ſay, that the euill deſires of the Continent man (that is, euen thoſe which we reſiſt and bridle) are heere forbidden. For though he that bridleth his euill deſires, be much better than he that yeeldeth vnto them: yet ſuch a man, euen according to the Heathen Philoſopher, is not worthy the name of a vertuous man. For Ariſtotle himſelfe makes Continentia, not to be vertue, but only a degree vnto it: confeſſing, that though the Continent man do well in bridling his euill affections, yet he doth not all, ſeeing he ought not ſo much as to haue them at all. Neither is it much more, that true diuinitie deliuereth touching this matter. For, as he ſaith, that in the Continent man the hauing of theſe euill deſires, though he reſiſt them, is the cauſe that he cannot be called a vertuous man: ſo we, that the hauing of them is a ſinne. Only in this we excell him heere: that we are able out of Diuinitie to giue the true reaſon of this doctrine: which is, that euery one ſinneth, that doth not loue God with his whole heart and affection: whence it followeth that the euil deſires of the Continent man; that is, of him which bridleth them, muſt needs be ſinne: ſeeing ſuch deſires, though bridled, are a-pulling away of a part of our heart and affection from God.

Seeing therefore it hath pleaſed God, to make vs know, that by our faithfull indeuours to keepe his commandements, we witneſſe our loue toward himſelfe: wee may not ſafely giue libertie to our vanities, by caſting backe vpon God (who is iuſtice it ſelfe) that he hath giuen vs precepts altogether beyond our power, and commandements impoſſible for vs to keepe. For as hee is accurſed (ſaith S^t. Hierome) that auowes that the law is in all things poſſible to bee obſerued: ſo hee hath made this addition: Maledictus qui dicit impoſsibilia Deum præcepiſſe; Accurſed is hee that ſaith that God hath commanded things (in themſelues, and not through our fault) impoſſible. Now, as the places are many which command vs to keepe the law: ſo is our weakeneſſe alſo in the Scriptures laid before vs, and therefore it is thus ſafely to be vnderſtood, that we ſhould without euaſion, or without betraying of our ſelues, do our faithfull indeuours to obſerue them: which if we doe vnfainedly, no doubt, but God will accept our deſires therein. For that there is no man iuſt, Dauid witneſſeth. Enter not into iudgement with thy ſeruant, for in thy ſight no fleſh that liueth ſhall bee iuſtified. And in the firſt of Kings, There is no man that ſinneth not: And againe, Who can ſay, I haue made my heart cleane? But ſeeing there is no ſinne grieuous without deliberation; let euery mans conſcience iudge him, whether he giue way willingly, or reſtraine himſelfe in all that he can; yea, or no? For when a King giues to his ſubject iect a commandement vpon paine of losse of his loue, to perfome some seruice: if the subject neglecting the same, seeke to satisfie his Soueraigne with shifting excuses, out of doubt such a Prince will take himselfe to be derided therein.

§. XIIII.

If there were not any Religion nor Iudgement to come, yet the Decalogue were most necessarie to be obserued.

AND if we consider aduisedly and soberly, of the Morall law, or ten Commandements, which God by the hand of Moses gaue vnto his people, it will appeare that such was his mercifull prouidence in the choise of them, as were there neither paine, nor profit adioyned to the obseruing, or not obseruing of them, were there no diuine power at all, nor any Religion among men, yet if we did not for our owne sakes striue to obserue these lawes: all societie of men, and all indeuours, all happinesse and contentment in this life would bee taken away: and euery state and common-weale in the world fall to the ground and dissolue. Therefore, these lawes were not imposed as a burthen, but as a blessing: to the end that the innocent might bee defended, that euery man might enioy the fruits of his owne trauaile, that right might be done to all men from all men: that by iustice, order, and peace, wee might liue the liues of reasonable men, and not of beasts; of free-men, and not of slaues; of ciuill men, and not of saluages. And hereof making our humane reason only Iudge, Let vs see the inconueniences in this life which would follow by the breach and neglect of these lawes.

As first, what would the issue be if wee acknowledged many Gods? would not a farre greater hatred, war, and bloud-shed follow, than that which the difference of ceremonie, and diuersitie of interpretation, hath already brought into the world, euen among those Nations which acknowledge one God, and one Christ?

And what could it profit mankind to pray to Idols, and Images of gold, metall, dead stones, and rotten wood, whence nothing can be hoped, but the losse of time, and an impossibilitie to receiue thence-from, either helpe or comfort?

The breach of the third Commandement bringeth there-with this disaduantage, and ill to man, that whosoeuer taketh the name of God in vaine, shall not at any time benefit himselfe by calling God to witnesse for him, when hee may iustly vse his holy name.

The obseruing the Sabbath holy, giueth rest to men and beasts, and nature her selfe requireth intermission of labour.

If we despise our Parents, who haue giuen vs being, we thereby teach our owne children to scorne and neglect vs, when our aged yeeres require comfort and helpe at their hands.

If murther were not forbidden, and seuerely punished, the races of mankinde would bee extinguished: and whosoeuer would take the libertie to destroy others, giueth libertie to others to destroy himselfe.

If adulterie were lawfull and permitted, no man could say vnto himselfe, This is my sonne: there could be no inheritance proper, no honour descend to posteritie, no indeuour by vertue and vndertaking to raise families: murthers and poisonings betweene man and wife would be daily committed: and euery man subiect to most filthie and vncleane diseases.

If stealth and violent rapine were suffered, all mankinde would shortly after perish, or liue as the saluages, by rootes and acornes. For no man laboureth but to enioy the fruits thereof. And such is the mischiefe of robberie, as where Moses for lesser crimes appointed restitution foure-fold, policie of State and necessitie hath made it death.

To

To permit false witnesses, is to take all mens liues and estates from them by corruption: the wicked would sweare against the vertuous: the waster against the wealthie: the idle begger and loiterer, against the carefull and paineful labourer: all triall of right were taken away, and iustice thereby banished out of the world.

The coueting of that which belongs to other men, bringeth no other profit than a distraction of minde, with an inward vexation: for while wee couet what appertaines to others, we neglect our owne: our appetites are therin fed with vaine and fruitlesse hopes, so long as we doe but couet; and if we doe attaine to the desire of the one, or the other, to wit, the wiues or goods of our neighbours, wee can looke for no other, but that our selues shall also, either by theft or by strong hand, be depriued of our owne.

Wherein then appeareth the burthen of Gods Commandements, if there be nothing in them, but rules and directions for the generall and particular good of all liuing? Surely, for our owne good, and not in respect of himselfe, did the most mercifull and prouident God ordaine them; without the obseruation of which, the vertues of heauenly bodies, the fertilitie of the earth, with all the blessings giuen vs in this life, would be vnto vs altogether vnprofitable, and of no vse. For we should remaine but in the state of brute beasts, if not in a farre more vnhappie condition.

§. XV.

Of humane Law, written and vnwritten.

HVmane Law, of which now it followeth to speake, is first diuided into two, viz. Written, and Vnwritten. The vnwritten consists of vsage, approued by time: which Isidore calls Mores: and he defines Mores to be Consuetudines vetustate probatæ, to be customes approued by antiquitie or vnwritten lawes. Now custome differeth from vse, as the cause from the effect: in that custome is by vse and continuance established into a law: but yet there where the law is defectiue, saith Isidore.

And of customes there are two generall natures, containing innumerable particulars, the first are written customes, receiued and exercised by Nations, as the customes of Burgundie, and Normandie: the ancient generall custome of England, and the customes of Castill, and other Prouinces.

The second are these pettie customes, vsed in particular Places, Cities, Hundreds, and Mannors. The generall or Nationall customes are some written, others vnwritten.

The particular or pettie customes are seldome written, but witnessed by testimonie of the inhabitants. The customes of the Duchie of Cornewall comprehending also the Stannerie of Deuon, as touching Tin, and Tin causes, are written in Deuon, but not in Cornewall. But howsoeuer vse and time hath made these customes as lawes, yet ought euery custome to be rationabilis, as well as præscripta. Non firmatur tractu temporis quod de iure ab initio non subsistit; That which at first was not grounded vpon good right, is not made good by continuance of time. And (saith VLPIAN) quod ab initio vitiosum est, non potest tractu temporis conualescere; Course of time amends not that which was naught from the first beginning. For these two defences are necessarie in all lawes of custome; the one, that it be not repugnant to the law diuine, and naturall: the other, that the cause and reason be strong, prouing a right birth, and necessarie continuance: it being manifest that euery custome, which is against the law, had his beginning from euill deedes, and therefore not without the former considerations to be allowed. And it is true, that all customes of this nature were but tolerated for a time, by the law-makers, though they haue beene since continued, because posteritie is not bound to examine by what cause their Ancestors were thereto moued.

In Reg. Iuris. v. 2 q. 117. art. 1.

Vlp. l. 29.

ued. For non sufficit simplex toleratio. And it is in this sort ouer-ruled in the law; Per populum consuetudo contra legem induci non potest, nisi de voluntate illius qui nouam legem, & nouam constitutionem statuere potest, qui solus princeps est; The people cannot bring a new custome against law: saue by his will, who hath power to make a new law and ordinance, which is onely the Prince.

Humane Law generally taken, to wit, humane law written, is by some defined to be the decree or doome of practique reason: by which humane actions are ruled and directed. Papinian calls the Law a common precept, the aduisement of Wisemen, and the restraint of offences committed, either willingly or ignorantly. Isidore calls the Law a Constitution written, agreeing with Religion, fittest for Gouernement and common profit: And more largely, Omne id quod ratione consistit; All that stands with reason.

Lastly, and more precisely it is thus defined. Humane Law is a righteous decree, agreeing with the Law naturall, and eternall: made by the rationall discourse of those, that exercise publique authoritie: prescribing necessarie obseruances to the subiect. That euery law ought to be a righteous decree, S. Augustine teacheth, saying: Mihi lex esse non videtur, qua iusta non fuerit; It seemes to be no law at all to me, which is not iust: and iust it cannot be, except it agree with the law naturall and eternall. For there is no law iust and legitimate (saith S. Augustine) which the Lawmakers haue not deriued from the eternall. Nihil iustum atque legitimum est, quod non ab aterna lege sibi homines deriuauerint. Greg. de Val. ex Tho. q. 91. art. 3. & q. 94. art. 2. L. 1. de lib. Arb. cap. 6.

Secondly, it ought to be constituted by discourse of reason, whereby it is distinguished from the law naturall, to wit, the naturall, indemonstrable, or needing no demonstration from whence the law humane is taken and deduced.

Thirdly, that it ought to bee made by an authorised Magistracie, it cannot bee doubted, be the Gouernment of what kinde soeuer. For it falleth otherwise vnder the Title of those decrees called Violentia, or iniqua constitutiones; Violences, or wicked constitutions.

Of humane Law there are foure properties, especially answering these foure conditions in the former definition. First, as it is drawne out of the law of nature: so euery particular of the humane law may be resolued into some principle or rule of the naturall. 4. Parts: Tho. q. 95. art. 2.

Secondly, it is to be considered as it is referred vnto, and doth respect the common good.

Thirdly, it is to be made by publique authoritie.

Fourthly, concerning the matter of the law, it prescribeth, and directeth, all humane actions. And so is the Law as large and diuers, as all humane actions are diuers, which may fall vnder it. For according to THOMAS, Alia lex IVLIA de Adulteriis, alia CORNELIA de Sicariis; The law of IVLIAN against Adulterie is one, the CORNELIAN against Ruffians, is another. Now the humane law, generally taken, is in respect of the first of these considerations, diuided into the law of Nations, and the Ciuill.

The Law of Nations is taken lesse or more properly; lesse properly for euery law which is not of it selfe, but from other higher principles deduced: and so it seemeth that Vlpian vnderstands it: for he defineth Ius gentium, or the law of Nations, to be that which is onely common amongst Men, as Religion, and the worship of God: which is not in the very nature of this law of Nations: but from the principles of the Scriptures, and other diuine Reuelations. But the law of Nations properly taken, is that dictate, or sentence, which is drawne from a very probable, though not from an euident principle, yet so probable, that all Nations doe assent vnto the conclusion, as that the free passage of Ambassadours be graunted betweene enemies, &c. which Nationall law, according to diuers acceptions, and diuers considerations had of the Humane law, may be sometime taken for a Species of the Naturall, sometime of the Humane.

Ius Ciuile, or the Ciuill Law, is not the same in all Common-wealths, but in diuers estates it is also diuers and peculiar, and this Law is not so immediately deriued from the Law of Nature, as the Law of Nations is: For it is partly deduced out of such principles as all Nations doe not agree in, or easily assent vnto; because they depend on particular circumstances, which are diuers, and doe not fit all estates.

In Leg. 6. ta. ff. de Iustitia Iure. Hereof VLPIAN, Ius ciuile, neque in totum à naturali & gentium recedit, neque per omnia ei seruit: itaq; cum aliquid addimus vel detrahimus Iuri communi, Ius proprium, id est, Ciuile efficimus; The Ciuill law (saith he) doth neither wholly differ from the law of Nature, and Nations, nor yet in all points obay it: therefore when wee adde ought to, or take from the Law that is common, we make a Law proper, that is, the Ciuill Law.

The law now commonly called the Ciuill Law, had its birth in Rome; and was first written by the Decem-viri, 303. yeeres after the foundation of the Citie. It was compounded aswell out of the Athenian, and other Grecian lawes, as out of the ancient Romane customes and lawes Regall. The Regall lawes were deuised by the first Kings, and called Leges Regiæ, or Papyrianæ, because they were gathered by Papyrius, Tarquin then raigning. For though so many of the former lawes as maintained Kingly authoritie were abolished, with the name; yet those of Seruius Tullius, for Commerce and Contracts, and all that appertained to Religion, and common vtilitie, were continued, and were a part of the lawes of the twelue Tables. To these lawes of the twelue Tables were added (as the times gaue occasion) those made by the Senate, called Senatus-consulta: those of the common people, called Plebiscita: those of the Lawyers, called responsa prudentum: and the Edicts of the Annuall Magistrate: which Edicts being first gathered and interpreted by Iulian, and presented to Adrian the Emperour, they were by him confirmed and made perpetuall lawes; and the Volume stiled Edictum perpetuum; as those and the like Collections of Iustinian afterward were.

Dion. Hal.

C. Sigon. l. 1. out of Pomponius.

The difference anciently between Lawes and Edicts, which the French call Reglements, consisted in this, that lawes are the Constitutions made or confirmed by soueraigne authoritie (bee the soueraigntie in the people, in a few, or in one) and are withall generall and permanent: but an Edict (which is but Iussum Magistratus, vnlesse by authoritie it be made a law) hath end with the Officer, who made the same, saith VARRO. Qui plurimum Edicto tribuunt, legem annuam esse dicunt; They who ascribe the most vnto an Edict, say that it is a law for one yeere: Though Isidore doth also expresse by the word Constitutions or Edicts, those Ordinances called Acts of Prerogatiues; as Constitutio vel Edictum est quod Rex, vel Imperator constituit, vel edicit; An Ordinance or Edict is that which a King or Emperour doth ordaine or proclaime.

Lastly, the Humane law is diuided into the Secular, and into the Ecclesiasticall, or Canon. The Secular commanding temporall good, to wit, the peace and tranquillitie of the Common-wealth: the Ecclesiasticall the spirituall good, and right Gouernment of the Ecclesiasticall Common-wealth, or Church, illud naturæ legem, hoc diuinam spectat; That respecteth the Law of Nature, this the Law of God. And so may Ius Ciuile be taken two waies; first, as distinguished from the law of Nations, as in the first diuision; Secondly, as it is the same with the Secular, and diuers from the Ecclesiasticall. But this diuision of the Schoolemen is obscure. For although the Ciuill be the same with the Secular, as the Ciuill is a law, yet the Secular is more generall, & comprehendeth both the Ciuill, and all other lawes not Ecclesiasticall. For of Secular lawes, in vse among Christian Princes, & in Christian Common-weales, there are three kinds; the Ciuill which hath euery where a voyce; and is in all Christian estates (England excepted) most powerfull; the Lawes of England called Common, and the Lawes of custome or Prouinciall. In Spaine besides the Law Ciuill, they haue the customes of Castill, and other Prouinces. In France besides the Ciuill, the customes of Burgundie, Bloys, Berri, Niuernois, and Lodunois, &c. Tous lieux situes & assis en Lodunois, seront gouernez selon les coustumes du dit pays; All places lying within the precincts of Lodunois, shall bee gouerned according to the customes of that place.

Art. 3. tit. 5. 6. Cust.

There

There are alſo in France the cuſtomes of Normandie, and theſe of two kindes; Generall, and Locall; and all purged and reformed by diuers Acts of the three eſtates. The Charters of confirmation of theſe ancient cuſtomes, before and ſince their reformation haue theſe words; Nos autem, regiſtrum prædictum, vſus laudabiles, & conſuetudines antiquas, &c. Laudamus, approbamus, & authoritate Regia confirmamus; The Regiſter aforeſaid, laudable vſe, and ancient cuſtomes wee praiſe, approoue, and by our Kingly authoritie confirme. The common law of England is alſo compounded of the ancient cuſtomes of the ſame, and of certaine Maximes by thoſe cuſtomes of the Realme approoued. Vpon which cuſtomes alſo are grounded thoſe Courts of Record, of the Chancerie, Kings Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer, with other ſmall Courts.

Theſe ancient cuſtomes of England haue beene approoued by the Kings thereof, from age to age: as that cuſtome by which no man ſhall be taken, impriſoned, diſſeiſed, nor otherwiſe deſtroyed, but he muſt firſt be put to anſwere by the law of the Land, was confirmed by the Statute of Magna Charta. It is by the ancient cuſtome of England, that the eldeſt Sonne ſhould inherite without partition. In Germanie, France, and elſewhere otherwiſe, and by partition. In Ireland it is the cuſtome for all Lands (that haue not beene reſigned into the Kings hands) that the eldeſt of the houſe ſhall enioy the inheritance during his owne life: and ſo the ſecond and third eldeſt (if there bee ſo many brothers) before the Heire in lineall deſcent: this is called the cuſtome of Taniſtrie. For example, if a Lord of Land haue foure ſonnes, and the eldeſt of thoſe foure haue alſo a ſonne, the three brothers of the eldeſt ſonne, ſhall after the death of their brother, enioy their Fathers lands before the Grandchilde: the cuſtome being grounded vpon the reaſon of neceſſitie. For the Iriſh in former times hauing alwaies liued in a ſubdiuided Ciuill warre, not onely the greateſt againſt the greateſt, but euery Baron and Gentleman one againſt another, were inforſt to leaue ſucceſſors of age and abilitie to defend their owne Territories. Now as in Normandie, Burgundie, and other Prouinces of France, there are certaine peculiar, and pettie cuſtomes, beſides the great and generall cuſtome of the Land, ſo are there in England, and in euery part thereof. But the greateſt bulke of our lawes, as I take it, are the Acts of Parliament: lawes propounded and approoued by the three eſtates of the Realme, and confirmed by the King, to the obedience of which all men are therefore bound, becauſe they are Acts of choiſe, and ſelfe-deſire. Leges nulla alia cauſa nos tenent quàm quod iudicio populi receptæ ſunt; The lawes doe therefore binde the ſubiect, becauſe they are receiued by the iudgement of the ſubiect. Vlp. ff. de Leg. Leg. 32. Tùm demum humanæ leges habent vim ſuam, cum fuerint non modò inſtitutæ, ſed etiam firmatæ approbatione communitatis; It is then that humane lawes haue their ſtrength, when they ſhall not onely be deuiſed, but by the approbation of the people confirmed. Aug. de vera relig. cap. 31. Gratian. in dec. diſt. 4. Cum in iſtis.

Iſidore faſteneth theſe properties to euery Chriſtian law, that the ſame be honeſt, that it be poſſible, that it bee according to Nature, and according to the cuſtome of the Countrie; alſo for the time and place conuenient, profitable, and manifeſt, and without reſpect of priuate profit, that it be written for the generall good. Hee alſo giues foure effects of the law, which Modeſtinus comprehends in two; to wit, obligation, and inſtigation: the former binds vs by feare, to auoide vice; the later incourageth with hope, to follow vertue. For according to CICERO; Legem oportet eſſe vitiorum emendatricem, commendatricemq; virtutum; It behooueth the law to be a mender of vices, and a commender of vertues. The part obligatorie or binding vs to the obſeruation of things commanded or forbidden, is an effect common to all lawes: and it is two-fold, the one conſtraineth vs by feare of our conſciences, the other by feare of externall puniſhment. Theſe two effects the law performeth, by the exerciſe of thoſe two powers, to wit, Coactiue, and Directiue.

The ſecond of theſe two effects remembred by Modeſtinus, is Inſtigation, or incouragement to vertue, as Ariſtotle makes it the end of the law, to make men vertuous. For lawes being ſuch as they ought to bee, doe both by preſcribing and forbidding, bidding, vrge vs to well-doing; laying before vs the good and the euill, by the one and the other purchased. And this power affirmatiue, commaunding good, and power negatiue, forbidding euill, are those into which the law is diuided, as touching the matter: and in which Dauid comprehendeth the whole body and substance thereof: saying, Declina à malo, & fac bonum; Decline from euill, and doe good.

Psal. 36.

§. XVI.

That onely the Prince is exempt from humane lawes, and in what sort.

NOw whether the power of the humane Law bee without exception of any person, it is doubtfully disputed among those that haue written of this subiect, as well Diuines as Lawyers: and namely, whether Soueraigne Princes bee compellable; yea, or no? But whereas there are two powers of the law, as aforesaid; the one Directiue, the other Coactiue: to the power Directiue, they ought to be subiect, but not to that which constraineth. For as touching violence or punishments, no man is bound to giue a prejudiciall judgement against himselfe; and if equalls haue not any power ouer each other, much lesse haue inferiours ouer their superiours, from whom they receiue their authoritie and strength.

And speaking of the supreme power of lawes, simply then is the Prince so much aboue the lawes, as the soule and body vnited, is aboue a dead and senseless carcasse. For the King is truely called, Ius viuum & lex animata: An animate and liuing law. But this is true, that by giuing authoritie to lawes, Princes both adde greatnesse to themselues, and conserue it; and therefore was it said of Bracton out of IVSTINIAN: Meritò debet Rex tribuere legi quod lex attribuit ei: nam lex facit vt ipse sit Rex; Rightfully ought the King to attribute that to the law, which the law first attributeth to the King; for it is the law that doth make Kings.

Bract. l. 2.

But whereas Bracton ascribeth this power to the humane law, he is therein mistaken. For Kings are made by God, and lawes diuine; and by humane lawes onely declared to bee Kings. As for the places remembred by the Diuines and Lawyers, which inferre a kinde of obligation of Princes, they teach no other thing therein, than the bond of conscience, and profit arising from the examples of vertuous Princes, who are to giue an account of their actions to God onely.

Psal. 50.

Tibi soli peccaui, saith DAVID; Against thee onely haue I sinned: therefore, the Prince cannot be said to be subiect to the law; Princeps non subijcitur legi. For seeing according to the Schoolemen, the law humane is but quoddam organum & instrumentum potestatis gubernatiuæ: non videtur posse eius obligatio ad eum se extendere, ad quem ipsa vis potestatis humanæ non pertinet; sed vis potestatis humanæ non se extendit ad gubernatorem, in quo illa residet. Ergo neq; lex condita per talem potestatem obligare potest ipsum conditorem. Omnis enim potentia actiua, est principium transmutandi aliud; Seeing humane law (say they) is but a kinde of organ, or instrument, of the power that gouerneth, it seemes that it cannot extend it selfe to binde any one whom no humane power can controll, or lay hold of: but the Gouernour himselfe, in whom the gouerning power doth reside, is a person that cannot by himselfe, or by his owne power be controlled. And therefore the law which is made by such a power, cannot binde the law-maker himselfe: for euery actiue abilitie is a cause or principle of alteration in another body, not in the body in which it selfe resides. And seeing Princes haue power to deliuer others from the obligation of the law: Ergo etiam potest ipsemet Princeps siue legislator sua se voluntate pro libito ab obligatione legis liberare; Therefore also may a Prince or law-maker at his owne will and pleasure deliuer himselfe from the bond of the law. Therefore in the rules of the law it is thus con-concluded. Subditi tenentur leges obſeruare neceſſitate coactionis, Princeps verò ſola voluntate ſua, & intuitu boni communis; The ſubiects are bound to fulfill the law by neceſſitie of compulſion, but the Prince onely by his owne will, and regard of the common good.

Now concerning the politique lawes, giuen by Moſes to the Nation of the Iſraelites, whether they ought to be a Preſident, from which no ciuill inſtitutions of other people ſhould preſume to digreſſe, I will not preſume to determine, but leaue it as a queſtion for ſuch men to decide, whoſe profeſſions giue them greater abilitie. Thus much I may be bold to affirme, that we ought not to ſeeme wiſer than God himſelfe, who hath told vs that there are no lawes ſo righteous, as thoſe which it pleaſed him to giue to his Elect people to be gouerned by. True it is, that all Nations haue their ſeuerall qualities, wherein they differ, euen from their next borderers, no leſſe than in their peculiar languages: which diſagreeable conditions to gouerne aptly, one and the ſame law very hardly were able. The Roman ciuill lawes did indeede containe in order a great part of the then knowne world, without any notable inconuenience, after ſuch time as once it was receiued and become familiar: yet was not the adminiſtration of it alike in all parts, but yeelded much vnto the naturall cuſtomes of the ſundrie people, which it gouerned. For whether it bee through a long continued perſwaſion; or (as Aſtrologers more willingly graunt) ſome influence of the Heauens; or peraduenture ſome temper of the ſoile and climate, affoording matter of prouocation to vice (as plentie made the Sybarites luxurious: want and opportunitie to ſteale, makes the Arabians to bee Theeues) very hard it were to forbid by law an offence ſo common, with any people, as it wanted a name, whereby to be diſtinguiſhed from juſt and honeſt. By ſuch rigour was the Kingdome of Congo vnhappily diuerted from the Chriſtian Religion, which it willingly at the firſt embraced, but after with great furie reiected, becauſe pluralitie of Wiues was denyed vnto them, I know not how neceſſarily, but more contentiouſly than ſeaſonably. In ſuch caſes, me thinks, it were not amiſſe to conſider that the high God himſelfe permitted ſome things to the Iſraelites, rather in regard of their naturall diſpoſition (for they were hard-hearted) than becauſe they were conſonant vnto the ancient rules of the firſt perfection. So, where euen the generall nature of man doth condemne (as many things it doth) for wicked and vniuſt; there may the law, giuen by Moſes, worthily bee deemed the moſt exact reformer of the euill, which forceth man, as neere as may by, to the will and pleaſure of his Maker. But where nature or cuſtome hath entertained a vicious, yet not intolerable habite, with ſo long and ſo publique approbation, that the vertue oppoſing it would ſeeme as vncouth, as it were to walke naked in England, or to weare the Engliſh faſhion of apparell in Turkie: there may a wiſe and vpright Law-giuer, without preſumption, omit ſomewhat that the rigour of Moſes his law required; euen as the good King Hezekia did, in a matter meerely Eccleſiaſticall, and therefore the leſſe capable of diſpenſation, praying for the people; The good Lord bee mercifull vnto him, that prepareth his whole heart to ſeeke the Lord God, the God of his Fathers, though he bee not cleanſed according to the purification of the Sanctuarie: which praier the Lord heard and granted. 2. Chron. cap. 30. v. 18. 19.

To this effect it is well obſerued by Maſter Doctor Willet, that the morall Iudicialls of Moſes doe partly binde, and partly are let free. They doe not hold affirmatiuely that we are tyed to the ſame ſeueritie of puniſhment now, which was inflicted then; but negatiuely they doe hold, that now the puniſhment of death ſhould not be adiudged, where ſentence of death is not giuen by Moſes: Chriſtian Magiſtrates ruling vnder Chriſt the Prince of peace, that is, of Clemencie and Mercie, may abate of the ſeueritie of Moſes law, and mitigate the puniſhment of death, but they cannot adde vnto it to make the burden more heauie: for to ſhew more rigour than Moſes, becommeth not the Goſpell. Iſay 9.

But I will not wander in this copious argument, which hath beene the ſubiect of many learned discourses, neither will I take vpon mee, to speake any thing definitiuely in a case which dependeth still in some controuersie among worthie Diuines. Thus much (as in honour of the Iudiciall Law, or rather of him that gaue it) I may well and truely say, that the defence of it hath alwaies beene very plausible. And surely howsoeuer they bee not accepted (neither were it expedient) as a generall and onely law; yet shall wee hardly finde any other ground, whereon the conscience of a Iudge may rest, with equall satisfaction, in making interpretation, or giuing sentence vpon doubts, arising out of any Law besides it. Hereof, perhaps, that Iudge could haue beene witnesse, of whom Fortescue that notable Bulwarke of our lawes doth speake, complaining of a judgement giuen against a Gentle-woman at Salisburie, who being accused by her owne Man, without any other proofe, for murdering her Husband, was thereupon condemned, and burnt to ashes: the man who accused her, within a yeere after being Conuict for the same offence, confest that his Mistris was altogether innocent of that cruell fact, whose terrible death hee then (though ouer-late) grieuously lamented: but this Iudge, saith the same Authour, Sepius ipse mihi fassus est, quòd nunquam in vita sua animam eius de hoc facto ipse purgaret; Hee himselfe often confessed vnto mee, that hee should neuer during his life, be able to cleare his conscience of that fact. Wherefore that acknowledgement which other Sciences yeeld vnto the Metaphysiques, that from thence are drawne propositions, able to prooue the principles of sciences, which out of the sciences themselues cannot be proued, may iustly be granted by all other politique institutions, to that of Moses; and so much the more iustly, by how much the subject of the Metaphysiques, which is, Ens quatenus Ens; Being as it is being, is infinitely inferiour to the Ens Entium; The being of beings, the only good, the fountaine of truth, whose feare is the beginning of wisedome. To which purpose well saith Saint AVGVSTINE, Conditor legum temporalium si vir bonus est & sapiens, illam ipsam consulit aternam, de qua nulli animæ iudicare datum est; The Author of temporall lawes if he bee good and wise, doth therein consult the law eternall, to determine of which there is no power giuen to any soule. And as well Prince Edward, in Fortescue his discourse, Nemo potest melius aut aliud fundamentum ponere, quam posuit Dominus; No man can lay a better or another foundation, than the Lord hath laid.

CHAP. V.

The Storie of the Israelites from the receiuing of the Law to the death of MOSES.

§. I.

Of the numbring and disposing of the Host of Israel, for their marches through the Wildernesse; with a note of the reuerence giuen to the worship of God, in this ordering of their troupes.

WHEN Moses had receiued the Law from God, and published it among the people, and finished the tabernacle of the Arke and Sanctuarie; hee mustred all the Tribes and Families of Israel: and hauing seene what numbers of men fit to beare armes, were found in euery Tribe, from 20. yeeres of age vpwards; hee appointed vnto them, by direction from the Lord, such Princes and Leaders, as in worth and reputation were in euery Tribe most eminent. The number of the whole Armie was 603550. able men for the warres, besides women and children; also, besides the strangers which followed them out of Ægypt. This great Armie was diuided by Moses into foure grosse and mightie Battalions, each of which contained the strength of three whole Tribes.

The first of these containing 186400. able men, consisted of three Regiments, which may well, in respect of their numbers, bee called Armies; as contayning the three whole Tribes of Iudah, Issachar, and Zabulon. In the Tribe of Iudah were 74600 fighting men, led by Naason: in Issachar 54400. led by Nathaniel: in Zabulon 57400. led by Eliab. All these marched vnder the Standard of the Tribe of Iudah, who held the Vauntguard, and was the first that mooued and marched, being lodged and quartered at their generall incamping on the East side of the Armie, which was held the first place, and of greatest dignitie.

The second Battalion or Armie, called in the Scriptures the Host of Reuben, had joyned vnto it Simeon and Gad, in number 151450. All which marched vnder the Standard of Reuben. In the Tribe of Ruben were 46500. vnder Elizur: in Simeon 59300. vnder Shelumiel: in Gad 45650. vnder Eliasaph. These had the second place, and incamped on the South side of the Tabernacle.

The third Armie marched vnder the Standard of Ephraim, to whom were ioyned the Regiments of Manasse and Beniamin; who, ioyned together, made in number 108100. able men. These marched in the third place, incamping on the West quarter of the Tabernacle. Ephraim had 40500. vnder Elishama: Manasse 32200. vnder Gamliel: Beniamin 35400. vnder Abidan.

The fourth and last Armie, or Squadron, of the generall Armie, contayning 157600. able men, marched vnder the Standard of Dan; to whom were joyned the two Tribes of Nephtali and Asher. And these had the Rereward, and moued last, incamping on the North side. Dan had 62700. vnder Ahiezer: Asher 41500. vnder Pagiel: Nephtali 53400. vnder Ahira.

Besides

Besides these Princes of the seuerall Tribes, there were ordained Captaines ouer Thousands, ouer Hundreds, ouer Fifties, and ouer Tens; as it may appeare by that mutinie and insurrection against Moses, Num. 16. v. 1. & 2. For there arose vp against Moses 250. Captaines of the Assembly, famous in the Congregation, and men of renowne: of which number were Korah, Dathan, and Abiram. Which three principle Mutiners, with those 250. Captaines that followed them, were not any of the twelue Princes of the Tribes, or Generall Colonells before spoken of, as by their names Num. 1. is made manifest.

The blessing which Israel gaue to his children, tooke place not onely in the diuision of the Land of promise, and other things of more consequence, long after following; but euen in sorting them vnder their seuerall Standards in the wildernesse it was obserued. For Iudah had the precedencie and the greatest Armie, which also was wholly compounded of the sonnes of Lea, Iacobs wife. Ruben hauing lost his birth-right, followed in the second place, accompanied with his brother Simeon, who had vndergone his Fathers curse; and with Gad, the sonne of his Mothers Hand-maide. Ioseph, who in temporall blessings had the prerogatiue of the first borne a double portion, was accounted as two Tribes, and diuided vnto two Regiments: the yonger (according to Iacobs prophecie) taking place before the Elder. He was assisted by Beniamin, his best beloued brother, the other sonne of Rachel. To Dan, the eldest sonne of Iacobs Concubines, was giuen the leading of the fourth Armie, according to Iacobs prophecie. Hee had with him vnder his Standard none of the children of Lea, or Rachel, but onely the sonnes of the Hand-maides.

In the middle of these foure Armies, was the Tabernacle, or portable Temple of the Congregation carried, sur-rounded by the Leuites. Neere vnto which, as the Heathens and Pagans could not approch, by reason of these foure powerfull Armies which guarded the same: so was it death for any of the children of Israel to come neere it, who were not of the Leuites, to whom the charge was committed. So sacred was the mooueable Temple of God, and with such reuerence guarded and transported, as 22000. persons were dedicated to the seruice and attendance thereof: of which 8580. had the peculiar charge, according to their seuerall offices and functions; the particulars whereof are written in the third and fourth of Numbers. And as the Armies of the people obserued the former order in their incampings: so did the Leuites quarter themselues, as in an inner square, on euery side of the Tabernacle; the Gesburites on the West, within the Armie, and Standard of Ephraim, ouer whom Eliasaph commanded, in number 7500. The familie of Cohath on the South side, guided by Elizaphan, within the Armie of Reuben, and betweene him and the Tabernacle, in number 8600. The third companie were of the familie of Merari, ouer whom Zuriel commaunded, in number 6200. and these were lodged on the North side within the Armie of Dan; On the East side, and next within those Tribes and Forces which Iudah led, did Moses and Aaron lodge, and their children, who were the first and immediate Commanders, both of the Ceremonies and of the People; vnder whom, as the chiefe of all the other Leuiticall families, was Eleazar the sonne of Aaron, his successour in the high Priest-hood.

This was the order of the Armie of Israel, and of their incamping and marching; the Tabernacle of God being alway set in the middle and center thereof. The reuerend care, which Moses the Prophet, and chosen seruant of God, had in all that belonged euen to the outward and least parts of the Tabernacle, Arke and Sanctuarie, witnessed well the inward and most humble zeale borne towards God himselfe. The industrie vsed in the framing thereof, and euery, and the least part thereof; the curious workmanship thereon bestowed; the exceeding charge and expence in the prouisions; the dutifull obseruance in the laying vp and preseruing the holie Vessels; the solemne remooving thereof; the vigilant attendance thereon, and the prouident defence of the same, which all Ages haue in some degree imitated, is now so forgotten and cast away in this super-fine Age, by those of the Familie, by the Anabaptists, Brownists, and other Sectaries, as all cost and care bestowed and had of the Church, wherein God is to be serued and worshipped, is accounted a kinde of Poperie, and as proceeding from an idolatrous disposition: insomuch as Time would soone bring to passe (if it were not resisted) that God would be turned out of Churches into Barnes, and from thence againe into the Fields and Mountaines, and vnder the Hedges; and the Offices of the Ministerie (robbed of all dignitie and respect) bee as contemptible as these places; all Order, Discipline, and Church-gouernement, left to newnesse of opinion, and mens fancies: yea, and soone after, as many kindes of Religions would spring vp, as there are Parish-Churches within England: euery contentious and ignorant person clothing his fancie with the Spirit of God, and his imagination with the gift of Reuelation; insomuch, as when the Truth, which is but one, shall appeare to the simple multitude, no lesse variable than contrarie to it selfe, the Faith of men will soone after dye away by degrees, and all Religion bee held in scorne and contempt. Which distraction gaue a great Prince of Germanie cause of this answere to those that perswaded him to become a Lutheran, Si me adiungo vobis, tunc condemnor ab alijs: si me alijs adiungo, à vobis condemnor; quid fugiam video, sed quid sequar, non habeo; If I adioyne my selfe to you, I am condemned by others; if I ioyne with others, I am condemned by you; What I should auoide I see, but I know not what I should follow.

Anabaptist

§. II.

The offerings of the twelue Princes: the Passeouer of the second yeere: The departing of IETHRO.

NOw when Moses had taken order for all things necessarie, prouided for the seruice of God, written the Lawes, numbred his Armie, and diuided them into the battailes and troupes before remembred, and appointed them Leaders of all sorts, The twelue Princes or Commanders of the Tribes brought their offerings before the Lord, to wit, Num. 8. sixe couered Chariots, and twelue Oxen to draw them, therein to transport, as they marched, the parts of the Tabernacle, with all that belonged thereunto: the Sanctuarie excepted, which for reuerence was carryed vpon the shoulders of the sonnes of Korah, to whom the charge was committed; and the Chariots in which was conueied the other parts of the Tabernacles and Vessels thereto belonging, were deliuered to the Leuites for that seruice, namely to the sonnes of Gershan and Merari.

Besides these Chariots, each of these Commanders, Princes, or Heads of Tribes, offered vnto God, and for his seruice in the Temple, a charger of fine siluer, waighing 130. sheckles; a siluer Boll of 70. sheckles; after the sheckle of the Sanctuarie; and an incense-Cup of gold, of ten sheckles, which they performed at the same time when the Altar was dedicated vnto God by Aaron: and before they marched from Sinai towards their conqueste, besides the beasts which they offered for sacrifice, according to the law Ceremoniall, the waight of all the twelue siluer chargers, and twelue siluer Bolles, amounted vnto 2400. sheckles of siluer; and the waight of gold in the incense-Cups, to 120. sheckles of gold; which makes of sheckles of siluer 1200. euery sheckle of gold valuing ten of siluer, so that the whole of gold & siluer which they offered at this time, was about foure hundreth and twentie pound sterling. This done, Moses, as in all the rest by the Spirit of God conducted, gaue order for the celebrating of the Passeouer, which they performed on the foureteenth day of the second moneth of the second yeere: and on the 20. day of the same, the cloude was lifted vp from aboue the Tabernacle, as a signe of going forward; Moses beginning his march with this inuocation to God; Rise vp, Lord, and let thine enemies bee scattered, and let them that hate thee, flie before thee. Then all the people of Isral remoued from their incamping at the foote of the Mountaine Sinai, towards Paran, the

The Hebrew Gerah waigheth sixteene graines: so a Getah of siluer is about three halfpence sterling: the Sicle of the Sanctuarie (as it is expounded Exod. 30.13.) conteineth 20. Gerahs so a Sanctuarie Sicle of siluer is about 7. groats the cõmon Sicle is but halfe so much, to wit ten Gerahs: as it is vsually expoũded; though Villalpandus labours to proue that the common and the Sanctuarie Sicle were all one.

the Armie, or great squadron of Iuda, led by Naasson, taking the Vauntguard, followed by Nethaneel and Eliab, Leaders of the Tribes of Issachar and Zabulon: after whom the rest marched, as in the figure expreſt. And becauſe the paſſage through ſo many Deſarts and Mountaines, was exceeding difficult: Moſes leauing nothing vnforethought which might ſerue for the aduancement of his enterprize, he inſtantly intreated his Father-in-law, whom in the tenth of Numbers hee calleth Hobab, to accompanie them in their journey towards Canaan; promiſing him ſuch part and profit of the enterprize, as God ſhould beſtow on them: for this man, as hee was of great vnderſtanding and iudgement (as appeared by the Counſaile he gaue to Moſes for the appointing of Iudges ouer the people) ſo was hee a perfect guide in all thoſe parts, himſelfe inhabiting on the frontier thereof, at Midian, or Madian: and (as it ſeemeth) a man of great yeeres and experience; for he was then the Prieſt or Prince of Madian, when Moſes fled firſt out of Ægypt, and married his Daughter, which was 42. yeeres before this requeſt made. And though Moſes himſelfe had liued 40. yeeres in theſe parts of Arabia, through which hee was now to trauell: yet the better to aſſure his paſſage, and ſo great a multitude of ſoules, which could not bee ſo few as a Million, it was neceſſarie to vſe many guides, and many conducters. To this requeſt of Moſes, it may ſeeme by the places, Exod. 18. 27. and Num. 10. 30. that Iethro, otherwiſe called Hobab, yeelded not: for it is euident, that he went backe from Moſes into his owne Countrie. But becauſe it appeareth by other places of Scripture, that the poſteritie of this Hobab was mingled with the Iſraelites, it is moſt likely that this his returne to his owne Countrie was rather to fetch away his familie, and to take his leaue of his owne Countrie, by ſetting things in order, than to abide there.

§. III.

The voiage from Horeb to Kades: the mutinies by the way: and the cauſe of their turning backe to the red Sea.

After this diſmiſſion of Hobab, Iſrael beganne to march towards the Deſarts of Paran: and after three daies wandring, they ſate downe at the Sepulchers of luſt, afterward called Tabeera, or Incenſio: by reaſon that God conſumed with fire thoſe Mutiners and Murmurers which roſe vp in this remoue, which happened about the 23. day of the ſame Moneth. And from this 23. day of the ſecond moneth, of the ſecond yeere, they reſted and fed themſelues with Quailes (which it pleaſed God by a Sea-winde to caſt vpon them) to the 24. day of the third moneth, to wit, all the moneth of Sinan or Iune: whereof ſurfaiting there died great numbers: from whence in the following moneth, called Thamus, anſwering to our Iuly, they went on to Hazeroth, where Miriam the ſiſter of Moſes was ſtricken with the leproſie, which continued vpon her ſeuen daies, after whoſe recouery Iſrael remooued toward the border of Idumæa; and incamped at Rithma, neere Kades Barnea, from whence Moſes ſent the twelue diſcouerers into the Territorie of Canaan, both to informe themſelues of the fertilitie and ſtrength of the Countrie; as alſo to take knowledge of the Waies, Paſſages, Riuers, Fords, and Mountaines. For Arad King of the Canaanites ſurpriſed diuers companies of the Iſraelites, by lying in ambuſh neere thoſe waies, through which the diſcouerers and ſearchers of the Land had formerly paſt. Now, after the returne of the diſcouerers of Cades, the wrath of God was turned againſt Iſrael; whoſe ingratitude and rebellion after His ſo many benefits, ſo many remiſſions, ſo many miracles wrought, was ſuch, as they eſteemed their deliuerance from the Ægyptian ſlauerie, his feeding them, and conducting them through that great and terrible wilderneſſe (for ſo Moſes calleth it) with the victorie which hee gaue them againſt the powerfull Amalekites, to be no other then the effects of his hatred, thinking that hee led led them on and preſerued them, but to bring them, their wiues, and children to be ſlaughtered, and giuen for a prey and ſpoile to the Amorites or Canaanites. For it was reported vnto them, by the ſearchers of the Land, that the Cities of their enemies were walled and defended with many ſtrong Towers and Caſtles; that many of the people were Gyantlike (for they confeſt that they ſaw the ſonnes of Anac there) who were men of fearefull ſtature, and ſo farre ouer-topped the Iſraelites, as they appeared to them, and to themſelues, but as Graſhoppers in their reſpect. Now, as this mutinie exceeded all the reſt, wherein they both accuſed God, and conſulted to chooſe them a Captaine (or as they call it now-a-daies, an Electo) to carry them backe againe into Ægypt; ſo did God puniſh the ſame in a greater meaſure, than any of the former. For he extinguiſhed euery ſoule of the whole multitude (Ioſua and Caleb excepted) who being confident in Gods promiſes, perſwaded the people to enter Canaan, being then neere it; and at the mountaine foote of Idumæa; which is but narrow, laying before them the fertilitie thereof; and aſſuring them of victorie. But as men; whom the paſſion of feare had bereaued both of reaſon and common ſenſe, they threatned to ſtone theſe encouragers to death; accounting them as men either deſperate in themſelues, or betrayers of the liues, goods, and children of all their brethren, to their enemies; but God reſiſted theſe wicked purpoſes, and interpoſing the feare of his bright glory betweene the vnaduiſed furie of the multitude, and the innocencie and conſtancie of his ſeruants, preſerued them thereby from their violence; threatning an intire deſtruction of the whole Nation, by ſending among them a conſuming and mercileſſe peſtilence. For this was the tenth inſurrection and rebellion, which they had made, ſince God deliuered them from the ſlauerie of the Ægyptians. But Moſes (the mildeſt or meekeſt of all men) praied vnto God to remember his infinite mercies; alledging, that this ſo ſeuere a judgement, how deſeruedly ſoeuer afflicted, would increaſe the pride of the Heathen Nations, and giue them occaſion to vaunt, that the God of Iſrael, failing in power to performe his promiſes, ſuffered them to periſh in theſe barren and fruitleſſe Deſarts. Yet as God is no leſſe iuſt than merciful, as God is ſlow to anger, ſo is his wrath a conſuming fire; the ſame being once kindled by the violent breath of mans ingratitude: & therfore, as with a hand leſſe heauy than hoped for he ſcourged this iniquitie, ſo by the meaſure of his glory (euermore iealous of neglect and deriſion) he ſuffered not the wicked to paſſe vnpuniſhed; reſeruing his compaſſion for the innocent: whom, becauſe they participated not with the offences of their Fathers, he was pleaſed to preſerue, and in them to performe his promiſes, which haue neuer beene fruſtrate.

§. IIII.

Of their vnwillingneſſe to returne: with the puniſhment thereof, and of diuers accidents in the returne.

NOw when Moſes had reuealed the purpoſes of God to the people, and made them know his heauie diſpleaſure towards them, they beganne to bewaile themſelues, though ouer-late: the times of grace and mens repentance, hauing alſo their appointment. And then when God had left them to themſelues, and was no more among them, after they had ſo often plaid and dallied with his mercifull ſufferings, They would needes amend their former diſobedience by a ſecond contempt: and make offer to enter the Land contrarie againe to the aduice of Moſes; who aſſured them, that God was not now among them; and that the Arke of his couenant ſhould not moue, but by His direction, who could not erre; and that the enemies ſword which God had hitherto bended and rebated, was now left no leſſe ſharpe than death; and in the hands of the Amalekites, and Canaanites no leſſe cruel. But as men from whom God hath with-drawne his grace, doe alwaies follow thoſe counſells which carrie them them to their own destructions: so the Hebrewes, after they had forsaken the opportunitie by God and their Conductors offered: and might then haue entered Idea before their enemies were prepared and joyned; did afterward, contrarie to Gods commaundement, vndertake the enterprise of themselues; and ranne headlong and without aduice into the mountaines of Idumæa. There the Canaanites and the Amalekites being ioyned and attending their aduantage, set on them, brake them: and of their numbers slaughtered the greatest part: and following their victorie and pursuite, consumed them all the way of their flight euen vnto Hormah: the Amalekites in reuenge of their former losse, and ouerthrow at Raphidim: the Canaanites to preuent their displantation and destruction threatned. Of which powerfull assemblie of those two Nations (assisted in all likelihood with the neighbour Kings joyned together for their common safetie) it pleased God to forwarne Moses, and to direct him another way, than that formerly intended. For hee commaunded him to returne by those painefull passages of the Desarts, through which they had formerly trauelled, till they found the bancks of the red Sea againe: in which retraite before they came backe to passe ouer Iordan, there were consumed 38. yeeres; and the whole number of the sixe hundreth and odde thousand, which came out of Ægypt (Moses, Ioshua and Caleb excepted) were dead in the Wildernesse, the stubborne and careless generations were wholy worne out, and the promised Land bestowed on their children; which were increased to 600000. and more. For besides the double fault both of refusing to enter the Land vpon the returne of the discouerers, and the presumption then to attempt it, when they were countermaunded: it seemeth that they had committed that horrible Idolatrie of worshipping Moloch, and the Host of heauen. For although Moses doth not mention it, yet Amos doth, and so doth the Martyr Stephen; as also that the Israelites worshipped the Sunne and Moone in after-times it is prooued out of sundry other places.

Amos c. 5. v. 25. Act. c. 7. v. 42. 2. Kings c. 17. v. 16. & cap. 21. v. 3. & c. 23. v. 4 5. 11. 2. Chron. 33. v. 3 Hierem. c. 19. v. 13. &c.

Now after the broken companies were returned to the Campe at Cades, Moses, according to the commaundement receiued from God, departed towards the South from whence he came, to recouer the shoares of the Red Sea. And so from Cades or Rithma he remooued to Remmonparez, so called of abundance of Pomegranates there found and diuided among them. From thence he went on to Libnah, taking that name of the Frankincense there found. From Libnah hee crost the valley, and sate downe at Ressa, neere the foote of the mountaine. And after he had rested there, he bended towards the West, and incamped at Ceelata; where one of the Hebrewes, for gathering broken wood on the Sabbath, was stoned to death. After which, Moses alwaies keeping the valley, between two great ledges of mountaines (those which bound the Desart of Sin, and those of Pharan) crost the same from Ceelata, and marched Eastward to the mountaine of Sapher, or Sepher: this making the Twentieth mansion. From thence he passed on to Harada; then to Macheloth; and then to Thahah; & so to Thara or Thare: the foure & twentieth mansion. Where while Moses rested, the people began that insolent and dangerous mutinie of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram; who for their contempt of God and his Ministers, were some of them swallowed vp aliue, and by the earth opening her mouth deuoured; others, euen two hundred and fiftie which offered incense with Korah, were consumed with fire from heauen; & 14700. of their partie, which murmured against Moses, stricken dead with a sudden pestilence: one of the greatest maruailes and judgements of God, that hath beene shewed in all the time of Moses his gouernment, or before. For among so great a multitude, those lay-men who would haue vsurped Ecclesiasticall authoritie, were suddenly swallowed vp aliue into the earth with their families and goods; euen while they sought to ouerthrow the Order, Discipline, and power of the Church, and to make all men alike therein, rebelliously contending against the High Priest and Magistrate, to whom God had committed the gouernment both of his Church and Common weale of his people. And the better to aſſure the people, and out of his great mercie to confirme them, it pleaſed him in this place alſo to approoue by miracle the former election of his ſeruant Aaron, by the twelue rods giuen in by the Heads of the twelue Tribes; of which Moſes receiued one of euery Head, and Prince of his Tribe: which being all withered and drie Wands, and on euery rod the name of the Prince of the Tribe written, and Aarons on that of Leui; it pleaſed God, that the rod of Aaron receiued by his power a vegetable Spirit, and hauing laine in the Tabernacle of the Congregation before the Arke one night, had on it both Buddes, Bloſſomes, and ripe Almonds.

From Tharah the whole Armie remoued to Methra; and thence to Eſmona; and thence to Moſeroth, (or Maſurit after S. Hierome) and from Moſeroth to Beneiacan; and ſo to Gadgad, which Hierome calleth Gadgada; thence to Ietabata, the thirtieth Manſion; where from certaine fountaines of water gathered in one, Adrichomius maketh a Riuer, which falleth into the Red Sea, betweene Madian and Aſiongaber.

Now although it be very probable, that at Aſiongaber, where Salomon furniſhed his Fleetes for the Eaſt India: there was ſtore of freſh water; and though Herodotus maketh mention of a great Riuer in Arabia the ſtonie, which he calleth Corys, from whence (ſaith hee) the inhabitants conueigh water in pipes of leather to other places, by which deuice the King of Arabia relieued the Armie of Cambyſes: yet is Adrichomius greatly deceiued, as many times he is, in finding theſe ſprings at Gadgad, or Ietabata, being the nine and twentieth or thirtieth Manſion. For it was at Punon, that thoſe Springs are ſpoken of, which in Deut. the 10. v. 7. is alſo called Ietabata, or Iotbath, a Land of running waters, and which by all probabilitie fall into the Riuer Zared, the next adioyning. And that theſe Springs ſhould fall into the Red Sea, at Aſiongaber, or Eloth, I cannot beleeue, for the way is very long. And this I finde in Belonius, that there are diuers Torrents of freſh water in thoſe ſandie parts of Arabia: which though they continue their courſe for a few miles, yet they are drunke vp by the hot and thirſty ſand, before they can recouer the bankes of the Red Sea. Her. l. 3.

From Ietabata, Moſes directed his iourney towards the Red Sea, and incamped at Hebrona, and from thence to Eſiongaber: which Citie in Ioſephus time had the name of Berenice; and in Hieroms Eſtia. From thence keeping the Sea, and Eloth on his right hand, he turned towards the North, as he was by God commanded: Eſiongaber being the fartheſt place towards the South-Eaſt, that Moſes trauailed in that paſſage. Deut. 2.

It ſeemeth that Eſiongaber or Aſiongaber, Eloth and Madian were not at this time in the poſſeſſion of the Kings of Edom. For it is ſaid, That the Lord ſpake vnto MOSES and AARON in the Mount Hor; neere the coaſt of the Land of Edom; ſo as the Mount Hor was at this time in the South border of Idumæa. And if Eſiongaber, and the other places neere the Red Sea, had at this preſent been ſubiect to the Idumæans, Moſes would alſo haue demanded a free paſſage through them. It is true, that in the future the Idumæans obtained thoſe places: for it is ſaid; And they aroſe out of Midian, and came to Paran, and tooke men with them; which were thoſe companies that followed yong Adad of Idumæa, into Ægypt, when he fled from Ioab. Likewiſe it is ſaid of Salomon, that he made a Nauie of ſhips in Eſiongaber beſides Eloth, in the Land of Edom. Num. c. 20. v. 13 1. King. 11. 18.

§. V.

Of MOSES arriuall at Zin Kades: and the accidents while they abode there.

FRom Eſiongaber he turned againe towards the North, and pitched in the Wilderneſſe of Zin, which is Kadeſh: or in Beroth, of the children of Iacan; where they ſate downe in the firſt Moneth of the fortieth yeere after they left Ægypt. For at the next Manſion Aaron died in the firſt day of the fifth Moneth of the fortieth yeere: the nine and thirtieth yeere taking end at Esiongaber. And at this Citie of Cades (for so it was thought Num.20.1. to be) or neere it, died Miriam or Mary, Moses sister, whose Sepulchre was to bee seene in Saint Hieromes time, as himselfe auoweth. From hence ere they departed Num.20.3. to the Mountaine Hor, all the people murmured most violently against Moses, by reason of the scarcitie of water. For neither the punishments by fire from Heauen; by beeing deuoured and swallowed vp by the earth; by the sudden pestilence, which often seized them; nor any miracle formerly shewing, either the loue or wrath of God, could preuaile with this Nation any longer, than while they were full fed and satisfied in euery of their appetites: but in stead of seeking for helpe and relieſe at Gods hands, when they suffered hunger, thirst, or any other want, they murmured, repined, and rebelled, repenting them of their changed estates, and casting vngratefully on Moses all their misaduentures; yea, though they well knew that their owne Fathers had left their bodies in the Desarts, and that they were now entred into the fortieth yeere, wherein all their miseries were to take end. And beeing, as it were, in the sight of the Land promised, they againe as obstinately tempted God as in former times, and neither trusted his promises, nor feared his indignation. But as the will and purposes of God are without beginning; so his mercies being with-

Num.20.9. out end; he commanded Moses to strike a Rocke adioyning with his rod; and the waters issued out in a great abundance, with which both themselues and their cattell were satisfied. Neuertheleſſe, because God perceiued a kinde of diffidence both in Moses and Aaron, at this place; therefore he permitted neither of them to enter the Land promised, whereto perchance their worldly desires might inuite them. But it pleased Him to ende the trauailes of Aaron at the Mountaine Hor, beeing the 2553. next, and foure and thirtieth Station. At which Mountaine of Hor, Aaron was despoiled of the Garments of his Priest-hood, and the same put on Eleazar his Sonne, as God had commanded. Which done, Moses and Eleazar descended the Mountaine; but God receiued Aaron on the top thereof, and hee was no more seene.

Of this Mountaine called Hor, otherwise Mosera, as in Deuter. 10. vers. 6. those Horites tooke name, which the Idumeans had formerly vanquished. Some there are which make Mosera, which was the seuen and twentieth Mansion; and Mosera which they write Moseroth for difference, which was the foure and thirtieth Mansion, and is also called Hor, to be two distinct places: because Moses in passing from Cadesbarne towards Esiongaber, incamped at Mosera, after he departed from Hesmona, and before hee came to Beniaacan. And this Mosera, which is also called Hor, he Num.33. came vnto after hee left Cades, where Miriam, Moses sister died; the first beeing the seuen and twentieth, and the second being the foure and thirtieth Mansion. But for Hor, which is also called Mosera, it should haue beene written, Hor iuxta Mosera; Hor neere Mosera: for it is but one roote of a Mountaine, diuided into diuers tops, as Sinai and Horeb are: Whereof the West part Moses calleth Mosera, and the East part Horeb. By the West part Moses encamped, as he past towards the Red Sea, on his left hand; by the East part, as hee went backe againe North-wards towards Moab: as in the description of Moses his passage through Arabia, the Reader may perceiue.

Now it was from Cades, before they came to Hor, because Hor belonged to Edom, that Moses sent Messengers to the Prince of Idumea, praying him that hee might passe with the people of Israel through his Territorie into the Land of Canaan, which bordered it. For it was the neereſt way of all other from the Citie of Kadesh, where Moses then encamped; whereas otherwise taking his iourney by the Riuers of Zared, Arnon, and Iordan, hee might haue runne into many hazzards in the passage of those Riuers, the farre way about, and the many powerfull Kings, which commaunded in those Regions. Now the better to perswade the Prince of Idumea hereunto, Moses remembred him, that hee was of the same race and familie with Israel: calling him by the name of Brother, because both the Edomites and Israelites were the Sonnes of one Father, to wit, Isaac; inferring thereby, that hee had more reason to fauour and respect them, than hee had to assist the Canaanites; against whome Esau his Ancester had made warre, and driuen out the Horites (who were of their ancient races descended of Cham) out of the Region of Seir, calling it by his owne name Edom, or Edumæa. Hee also making a short repetition of Gods blessings bestowed on them, and of his purposes and promises; assured Edom, or the King thereof, that hee would no way offend his people, or waste his Countrey, but that hee would restraine his Armie within the bounds of the Common, and Kings high wayes, paying money for whatsoeuer hee vsed, yea, euen for the water, which themselues or their Cattell should drinke. For Moses was commaunded by God, not to prouoke the children of Esau. But the King of Edumæa knowing the strength of his owne Countrey, the same beeing neere Canaan, rampard with high and sharpe mountaines: and withall suspecting; as a naturall wise man, that 600000. strangers being once entred his Countrey, it would rest in their wills to giue him law, resoluedly refused them passage, and deliuered this answere to the Messengers: That, if they attempted to enter that way, he would take them for enemies, and resist them by all possible meane. And not knowing whether such a deniall might satisfie or exasperate, hee gathered the strength of his Countrie together, and shewed himselfe prepared to defend their passage. For, as it is written; Then EDOM came out against him (to wit, MOSES) with much people, and with a mighty power. Whereupon Moses considering, that the ende of his enterprise was not the conqueste of Seir or Edumæa, and that the Land promised was that of Canaan: like vnto himselfe who was of a naturall vnderstanding the greatest of any man, and the skilfullest man of warre that the world had, hee refused to aduenture the Armie of Israel against a Nation, which being ouer-come, gaue but a passage to inuade others; and which by reason of the seate of their mountainous Countrey, could not but haue endangered, or (at least) greatly enfeebled the strength of Israel, and rendred them lesse able, if not altogether powerlesse, to haue conquered the rest.

Edomites

§. VI.

Of their compassing Idumæa, and trauailing to Arnon, the border of Moab.

HE therefore leauing the way of Idumæa, turned himselfe towards the East, and marched towards the Desarts of Moab. Which when Arad King of the Canaanites vnderstood, and that Moses had blanched the way of Edumæa; and knowing that it was Canaan, and not Edom, which Israel aimed at, hee thought it safest, rather to finde his enemies in his neighbours Countrey, than to be found by them in his owne: which he might haue done with a farre greater hope of victorie, had Moses beene enforst first to haue made his way by the sword through Idumæa, and thereby though victorious, greatly haue lessened his numbers. But although it fell out otherwise than Arad hoped for, yet being resolued to make triall, what courage the Israelites brought with them out of Ægypt, before they came neerer his owne home, leading the strength of his Nation to the edge of the Desart, hee set vpon some part of the Armie; which, for the multitude occupied a great space, and for the many heards of Cattell that they draue with them, could not encampe so neere together, but that some quarter or other was euer-more subiect to surprise. By which aduantage, and in that his attempts were then perchance vnexpected, he slew some few of the Israelites, and carried with him many prisoners.

Now it is very probable, that it was this Canaanite, or his Predecessour, which ioyned his forces with the Amalekites, and gaue an ouerthrow to those mutinous

Num. 14. 45. Israelites, which without direction from God by Moses would haue entred Canaan from Cadesbarne. For it seemeth that the greatest number of that Armie were of the Canaanites, because in the first of Deuteron. 44. the Amorites are named alone without the Amalekites, and are said to haue beaten the Israelites at that time. And this Arad, if hee were the same that had a victory ouer Israel, neere Cadesbarne, or if it were his Predecessour that then preuailed, this man finding that Moses was returned from the Red Sea, and in his way towards Canaan, and that the South part of Canaan was first to bee inuaded, and in danger of beeing conquered, not knowing of Moses purpose to compasse Moab, determined while he was yet in the Desart to trie the quarrell. And whereas it followeth in the third verse of the twelfth Chapter of Numbers, that the Israelites vtterly destroyed the Canaanites and their Cities, they are much mistaken that thinke, that this destruction was presently performed by the Israelites. But it is to be vnderstood, to haue beene done in the future, to wit, in the time of Iosua. For had Moses at this time entred Canaan in the pursuit of Arad, hee would not haue fallen backe againe into the Desarts of Zin and Moab, and haue fetcht a wearisome and needelesse compasse, by the Riuers of Zared and Arnon.

Neither is their coniecture to bee valued at any thing, which affirme, that Arad did not inhabite any part of Canaan it selfe, but that his Territorie lay without it, and neere the Mountaine Hor. For Hor and Zin Cades were the South
Num. 33. 40. borders of Edom, and not of Canaan. And it was in the South of the Land of Canaan, that Arad dwelt: which South part of Canaan was the North part of Edom.

Againe, Horma (for so farre the Israelites after their victory pursued the Canaanites) is seated in the South of Iudea. There is also a Citie of that name in Simeon. But there is no such place to the South of Edom. And were there no other argument, but the mutinie which followed presently after the repetition of this victory, it were enough to proue, that the same was obtained in the future, and in Iosua his time, and not at the instant of Arads assault. For had the Israelites at this time sackt the Cities of Arad, they would not the next day haue complained for want of water and bread. For where there are great Cities, there is also water, and bread. But it was in the time of Iosua, that the Israelites tooke their reuenge, and after they had past Iordan: Iosua then gouerning them; who in the twelfth Chapter and fourteenth Verse, nameth this Arad by the name of his Citie so called; and with him the King of Horma: to which place the Israelites pursued the Canaanites. And hee nameth them amongst those Kings, which hee vanquished, and put to death.

Now after this assault and surprise by Arad, Moses finding that all entrance on that side was defended, hee led the people Eastward to compasse Idumæa and the Dead Sea, and to make his entrance by Arnon and the Plaines of Moab, at that time in the possession of the Amorites. But the Israelites, to whom the very name of a Desart was terrible, began againe to rebell against their Leader; till God by a multitude of fiery Serpents, (that is, by the biting of Serpents, whose venome inflamed them, and burnt them as fire) made them know their error, and afterward, according to his plentifull grace cured them againe by their beholding an artificiall Serpent, by his Commandement set vp.

From the Mount Hor, Moses leauing the ordinarie way which lyeth betweene the Red Sea, and Cœlosyria, encamped at Zalmona: and thence hee remooued to Phunon, where hee erected the Brazen Serpent; making these iourneys by the edge of Edumæa, but without it. For Phunon was sometime a principall Citie of the Edomites. Now where it is written in Numbers 21. Verse 4. That from Mount Hor they departed by the way of the Red Sea, which grieued the people, it was not thereby meant that the Israelites turned backe towards the Red Sea; neither neither did they march (according to FONSECA) per viam, quæ habet à latere mare rubrum; By the way that sided the Red Sea, but in deede they croſt, and went athwart the common way from Galaad, Trachonitis, and the Countries of Moab, to the Red Sea, that is, to Esiongaber; Eloth, and Midian: which way, as it lay North and South, ſo Israel to ſhunne the border of Edom, and to take the vtmoſt Eaſt part of Moab, croſt the common way towards the Eaſt, and then they turned againe towards the North, as before.

From Phunon he went to Oboth; where they entred the Territory of Moab, adioyning to the Land of Suph, a Countrey bordering on the Dead Sea; and from thence to Abarim, the eight and thirtieth Manſion, that is, where the Mountaines ſo called take beginning, and are as yet but ſmall Mountures of Hills, on the Eaſt border of Moab; From thence they recouered Dibon Gad, or the Riuer of Zared, which riſeth in the mountaines of Arabia, and runneth towards the Dead Sea, not farre from Petra the Metropolis thereof, being the nine and thirtieth Station. And hauing paſt that Riuer, they lodged at Dibon Gad, and from thence they kept the way to Diblathaim, one of the Cities of Moab; which Hieremie the Prophet c.48.v.22. calleth the Houſe of Diblathaim, the ſame which afterward was deſtroyed among the reſt by Nabuchadneſſar. From thence they came to the Riuer of Arnon, and incamped in the mountaines of Abarim: though in the 22. of Numbers, Moſes doth not remember Helmon diblathaim, but ſpeaketh of his remooue from the Riuer of Zared, immediately to the other ſide of Arnon; calling Arnon the border of Moab, betweene them and the Amorites: ſpeaking, as hee found the ſtate of the Countrie at that time. For Arnon was not anciently the border of Moab, but was lately conquered from the Moabites, by Sehon, King of the Amorites: euen from the Predeceſſour of Balac Peor then raigning. From Diblathaim, Moſes ſent Meſſengers to Sehon, King of the Amorites, to deſire a paſſage through his Countrie: which though he knew would be denied him, yet he deſired to giue a reaſon to the neighbour Nations, of the warre he vndertooke. And though Edom had refuſed him as Sehon did, yet hee had no warrant from God to enforce him. Moſes alſo in ſending meſſengers to Sehon, obſerued the ſame precept, which he left to his poſteritie, and ſucceſſors, for a law of the war, namely in Deut.20.v.10. in theſe words, When thou commeſt neere vnto a Citie to fight againſt it, thou ſhalt offer it peace, which if it doe accept of and open vnto thee, then let all the people found therein bee tributaries vnto thee, and ſerue thee; but if it refuſe, &c. thou ſhalt ſmite all the males thereof with the edge of the ſword. Which ordinance all Commanders of Armies haue obſerued to this day, or ought to haue done.

§. VII.

Of the Booke of the battailes of the Lord, mentioned in this Storie, and of other Bookes mentioned in Scripture which are loſt.

NOw concerning the Warre betweene Israel and Sehon, Moſes ſeemeth to referre a great part of this Storie to that Booke, entituled, Liber bellorum Domini; The booke of Gods battailes: and therefore paſſeth ouer many encounters, and other things memorable, with greater breuity in this place. His wordes after the Geneua tranſlation are theſe. Wherefore it ſhall be ſpoken in the Booke of the battailes of the Lord, what things he did in the Red Sea, and in the Riuers of Arnon. The Vulgar copie differeth not in ſenſe from this: But the Greeke Septuagint varie. For the Greeke writes it to this effect; For thus it is ſaid in the boooke: the Warre of the Lord hath burnt (or inflamed) Zoob, and the brooks of Arnon. Iunius for the Red Sea, which is in the Geneuan and Vulgar Edition, names the Region of * Suph, a Countrie bordering the Dead Sea towards the Eaſt, as he coniectureth. The Text hee readeth thus. Idcirco dici ſolet in recenſione bellorum IEHOVÆ, contra VAHEBVM in Regione SVPH: & contra flumina, flumina Arnonis; Therefore it is ſpoken spoken in repeating of the battailes of IEHOVAH, against VAHEB in the Countrie of SVPH: and against the Riuers, the Riuers of Arnon. In which words he vnderstands, that amongst the Warres which the Lord disposed for the good of the Israelites, there was in those times a famous memory in the mouth of most men, concerning the Warre of Sehon against Vaheb, the King of the Moabites, and of his winning the Countrie neere Arnon, out of the possession of the Moabites. For this Vaheb was the immediate Predecessour of Balac, who liued with Moses: though it be written that this Balac was the sonne of Zippor, and not of Vaheb. For it seemes (as it is plaine in the succession of the Edomites) that these Kingdomes were elective, and not successiue. And as Iunius in this translation vnderstandeth no speciall Booke of the battailes of the Lord: so others, as Vatablus in his Annotations, doubt whether in this place any speciall Booke bee meant; and if any; whether it bee not a prediction of Warres in future ages, to be waged in these places, and to be written in the booke of Iudges. Siracides c.46. tells vs plainely, that those battailes of the Lord were fought by IOSVA. Who was there (saith he) before him like to him? for he fought the battailes of the Lord. But seeing the Histories of the Scripture elsewhere often passe ouer matters of great weight in few words, referring the Reader to other Bookes, written of the same matter at large: therefore it seemeth probable, that such a booke as this there was; wherein the seuerall victories by Israel obtained, and also victories of other Kings, making way for the good of the Israelites, were particularly and largely written. And that the same should now be wanting, it is not strange, seeing so many other Volumes, filled with diuine discourse, haue perished in the long race of time, or haue been destroyed by the ignorant and malicious Heathen Magistrate. For the bookes of Henoch, howsoeuer they haue been in later ages corrupted, and therefore now suspected, are remembred in an Epistle of Thaddæus, and cited by Origen περὶ ἀρχῶν, and by Tertullian.

Num.21.26.

Chron.1.c.1.

That worke also of the Patriarch Abraham, of Formation, which others bestow on Rabbi Achiba, is no where found. The bookes remembred by Iosua c.10.v.13. and in the second of Samuel c.1.v.18. called the Booke of Iasher, or Iustorum, is also lost; wherein the stay of the Sunne and Moone in the middest of the Heauens is recorded, and how they stood still till Israel had auenged themselues of their enemies: out of which also Dauid tooke the precept, of teaching the children of Iuda, to exercise their bowes against their enemies.

Some thinke this to be the booke of eternall Predestination, in which the iust are written, according to the 69. Psalme, v.28. where it is said, Let them be put out of the booke of life, neither let them bee written with the righteous. HIEROME thinkes, that Dauid by this booke vnderstood those of Samuel; Rabbi Salomon, that the bookes of the Law are thereby meant, in which the acts of the iust Abraham, of Isaac, Iacob, and Moses, are written; others, that it was the booke of Exodus; others, as Theodoretus, that it was a Commentary vpon Iosua, by an vnknowne Author.

Hieron.in queſt. ſuper lib.Regum.

The booke of Chozai, concerning Manasse, remembred in the second of Chron. 33. v.18. & 16. Of this booke, also lost, Hierome conceiues that the Prophet Isay was the Author.

Hieron.in annot. in Paralip.

The same mischance came aswell to the Story of Salomon, written by Ahia Silonites, who met with Ieroboam, and foretold him of his obtaining the Kingdome of Israel from the sonne of Salomon: as to the bookes of Nathan the Prophet, and to those of Ieedo the Seer, remembred in the second of Chron. c.9.v.29. with these haue the bookes of Shemaiah and of Iddo, remembred in the second of Chron. c.12.v.15. perished: and that of Iehu the sonne of Hanani, of the acts of Iehosaphat, cited in the second of Chron. c.20.v.34. Also that booke of Salomons which the Hebrewes write Hasirim, of 5000. verses, of which that part called Canticum Canticorum onely remaineth, 1.Kings 4.32. and with this diuers other of Salomons workes haue perished, as his booke of the natures of Trees, Plants, Beasts, Fishes, &c. 1.King. 4.33. with the rest remembred by Origen, Iosephus, Hierome, Cedrenus, Ciccus Asculanus, Picus Mirandula, and others.

Of theſe and other bookes many were conſumed with the ſame fire, wherewith Nebuchadneſſar burnt the Temple of Hieruſalem. But let vs returne thither where we left.

§. VIII.

Of MOSES his ſparing the iſſue of LOT; and of the Giants in thoſe parts; and of SEHON and OG.

WHen Moſes had paſt Arnon, hee incamped on the other ſide thereof at Abarim, oppoſite to the Citie of Nebo, leauing the Citie of Midian on his left hand, and attempting nothing vpon the Moabites on that ſide. For Moab did at this time inhabite on the South ſide of Arnon, hauing loſt all his ancient and beſt Territorie, which was now in the poſſeſſion of Sehon the Amorite. For Moſes was commanded by God not to moleſt Moab, neither to prouoke them to battaile, God hauing giuen that Land to the children of Lot; the ſame which was anciently poſſeſt by the Emims, who were men of great ſtature, and comparable to thoſe Giants called Anakims, or the ſonnes of Anac. Deut. 2. v. 9. & 10. 11. & 12.

God alſo commanded Moſes to ſpare the Ammonites, becauſe they likewiſe were deſcended of Lot: who had expelled from thence thoſe Giants, which the Ammonites called Zamzummims. For it ſeemeth that all that part, eſpecially to the Eaſt of Iordan, euen to the Deſart of Arabia, aſwell on the Weſt, as on the Eaſt ſide of the Mountaines of Gilead, were inhabited by Giants. And in the plantation of the Land promiſed, the Iſraelites did not at any time paſſe thoſe Mountaines to the Eaſt of Baſan, but left their Countrie to them, as in the diſcription following is made manifeſt. We finde alſo, that as there were many Giants both before and after the floud: ſo theſe Nations, which anciently inhabited both the border of Canaan, and the Land it ſelfe, had among them many families of Giant-like men. For the Anakims dwelt in Hebron, which ſometimes was called the Citie of Arbah, which Arbah in Ioſua is called the Father of the Anakims; and the greateſt man of the Anakims. Ioſ. 15. v. 13. & 14. v. 15.

There had alſo beene Giants in the Land of the Moabites, called Emims: and their chiefe Citie was Aroer or Ar, neere the Riuer of Arnon. To the Giants of the Rephaims, the Ammonites gaue the name of Zamzummims; which were of the ſame ancient Canaanites: and their chiefe Citie was Rabba, afterward Philadelphia. They were alſo called Zuzims, which is as much to ſay, as Viri robuſti, horrendiq; Gigantes; Strong men, and fearefull Giants, who inhabited other Cities of Ham, or Hom, in the ſame Prouince, and not farre to the North of Aroer.

Now Moſes hauing paſt Arnon, and being incamped at Abarim; and hauing (as before) ſent to Sehon, as hee had done to Edom, to pray a paſſage through his Countrie, was denied it. For Sehon being made proude by his former conqueſt vpon Vaheb the Moabite, which Nation the Amorites eſteemed but as ſtrangers and vſurpers, (themſelues being of the ſonnes of Canaan, and the Moabites of Lot) refuſed to grant Iſrael any entrance that way; and withall prepared to encounter Moſes with as much ſpeede as he could, becauſe Moſes incamped in the Countrie of his new conqueſts, to wit, the Plaines of Moab; the two and fortieth and laſt Manſion: which Moſes waſted with the multitude of his people, and cattell. Towards him therefore haſting himſelfe, they encountred each other at Iahaz: where Sehon with his children and people were broken and diſcomfited: and the victorie ſo purſued by Moſes, as few or none of the Amorites eſcaped. Hee alſo ſlaughtered all the Women and Children of the Amorites, which hee found in Eſſebon, and all the other Cities, Villages, or Fields; they being of the race of Canaan, as thoſe of Baſan alſo were: and deſcended of Emoreus or Amoreus: for Moſes calleth the Baſanites alſo Amorites. And although Iſrael might now haue taken a ready way and paſſage into Iudæa: being at this time, and after this victorie at the bankes of Iordan: yet hee knew it to bee Deut. 1. v. 8.

perilous

perilous to leaue so great a part of that Nation of the Amorites on his backe, as inhabited all the Region of Basan or Traconitis: and therefore he led on his Armie to inuade Og: a person of exceeding strength and stature: and the only man of marke remaining of the ancient Giants of those parts, and who at that time had 60. Cities walled and defenced: lying betweene the mountaine of Hermon (which mountaine saith Moses, the Sidonians call Shirion, and the Amorites Shenir) and the Riuer of Iordan. And it befell vnto the King of Basan (who attended Moses comming at Edrei) as it did vnto Sihon: for he and his sonnes perished, and all his Cities were taken and possest. After this, Moses with-drawing himselfe backe againe to the mountaines of Abarim, left the prosequution of that warre vnto Iair the sonne of Manasse: who conquering the East parts of Basan, to wit, the Kingdome of Argob, euen vnto the Nations of the Gessuri and Machati, 60. walled Cities: called the same after his owne name Hauoth Iair: of all which conquests afterward the halfe Tribe of Manasse possest the North part as farre as Edrei, but the East part that belonged to Sihon the Amorite, with the mountaines of Gilead adioyning, was giuen to Reuben and Gad.

Of the troubles about the Madianites, and of MOSES his death.

AFter these victories, and while Israel sojourned in the valley of Moab, the Madianites and Moabites (ouer both which Nations it seemeth that Balac King of the Moabites then commanded in chiefe) sought, according to the aduice of Balaam, both by alluring the Hebrewes to the loue of their daughters, and by perswading them to honour and serue their Idols, to diuide them both in Loue and Religion among themselues: thereby the better both to defend their owne interest against them, as also to beate them out of Moab, and the Countries adioyning. The Israelites as they had euer beene inclined, so were they now easily perswaded to these euill courses, and thereby drew on themselues the plague of pestilence, whereof there perished 24000. persons: besides which punishment of God, the most of the offenders among the Hebrewes, were by his commandement put to the sword, or other violent deaths: after this, when that Phineas the sonne of Eleazar had pierced the bodies of Zimri, a Prince of the Simeonites, together with Cosbi a Daughter of one of the chiefe of the Midianites, the plague ceased, and Gods wrath was appeased. For such was the loue and kindnesse of his all-powerfulnesse, respecting the ardent zeale of Phineas in prosequuting of Zimri (who being a chiefe among the Hebrewes became an Idolater) as hee forgaue the rest of Israel, and staied his hand for his sake.

Num.25.v.9.

In this valley it was that Moses caused the people to be numbred the third time: and there remained of able men fit to beare armes, 601730. of which as his last enterprise, he appointd 12000. to bee chosen out, to inuade the Cities of Midian, who together with the Moabites practised with Balaam to curse Israel: and after that sought to allure them (as before remembred) from the worship of the true God, to the seruice of Beth-Peor: and to the rest of their barbarous Idolatrie. Ouer which companies of 12000. Moses gaue the charge to Phineas, the sonne of Eleazar the high Priest: who slew the fiue Princes of the Midianites, which were, or had lately beene, the vassalls of Sehon, as appeareth by Iosuah. These fiue Princes of the Midianites slaine by Eleazar, were at this time but the vassalls of Sehon the Amorite, to wit, Eui, Rekem, Zur, Hur, and Reba, the Dukes of Sehon, saith Iosua. Hee slew also all the men, male-children, and women: sauing such as had not yet vsed the companie of men, but those they saued and dispersed them among the children of Israel to serue them.

And Moses hauing now liued 120. yeeres, making both his owne weakenesse of body body knowne to the people, and his vnabilitie to trauaile: and alſo that he was fore- warned of his ende by the ſpirit of God: from whom hee receiued a new comande- ment to aſcend the Mountaines of Abarim, and thereon to render vp his life: Hee haſtned to ſettle the Gouernement in Ioſua: whom hee perſwaded with moſt liuely arguments to proſcquute the conqueſt begunne, aſſuring him of Gods fauour and aſſiſtance therein. And ſo hauing ſpent theſe his later dayes after the Conqueſt of Og and Sehon, King of the Amorites, in the repetition and expoſition of the Law (or an iteration of the Law, according to S. Auguſtine) vſing both arguments, prayers, and threats vnto the people: which hee often repeated vnto them; thereby to con- firme them in knowledge, loue, feare, and ſeruice, of the all-powerfull God: Hee bleſſed the twelue Tribes, that of Simeon excepted, with ſeuerall and moſt comfor- table bleſſings: praiſing the greatneſſe and goodneſſe of him, vnto whom in his prayers hee commended them: Hee alſo commanded the Prieſts to lay vp the booke of the Law, by the ſide of the Arke of God: The laſt that he indited was that Pro- pheticall Song, beginning: Hearken yee Heauens and I will ſpeake, and let the earth heare the word of my mouth: and being called by God from the labours and ſorrowes of this life, vnto that reſt which neuer afterward hath diſquiet, hee was buried in the Land of Moab, ouer againſt Beth-peor: but no man knoweth of his Sepulchre to this day, which happened in the yeere of the World 2554.

Obſeruations out of the Storie of MOSES, how God diſpoſeth both the ſmalleſt occaſions, and the greateſt reſiſtances, to the effecting of his purpoſe.

NOw let vs a little, for inſtruction, looke backe to the occaſions of ſun- drie of the great euents, which haue beene mentioned in this Storie of the life of Moſes, for (excepting Gods miracles, his promiſe, and fore-choiſe of this people) hee wrought in all things elſe by the me- dium of mens affections, and naturall appetites. And ſo we ſhall find that the feare which Pharao had of the increaſe of the Hebrewes, multiplied by God to exceeding great numbers, was the next naturall cauſe of the ſorrowes and loſſe, which befell himſelfe, and the Ægyptian Nation: which numbers when he ſought by cruell and vngodly policies to cut off and leſſen, as when hee commanded all the male-children of the Hebrewes to be ſlaine, God (whoſe prouidence cannot bee reſi- ſted, nor his purpoſes preuented by all the fooliſh and ſaluage craft of mortall men) moued compaſſion in the heart of Pharao's owne Daughter, to preſerue that child, which afterward became the moſt wiſe, and of all men the moſt gentle and milde, the moſt excellently learned in all Diuine and Humane knowledge, to be the Con- ductor and deliuerer of his oppreſſed Brethren, and the ouerthrow of Pharao, and all the flower of his Nation; euen then, when he ſought by the ſtrength of his men of Warre, of his Horſe, and Chariots, to tread them vnder and burie them in the duſt. The griefe which Moſes conceiued of the iniuries, and of the violence offered to one of the Hebrewes in his owne preſence, moued him to take reuenge of the Ægyptian that offered it: the ingratitude of one of his owne Nation, by threatning him to diſ- couer the ſlaughter of the Ægyptian, mooued him to flie into Midian: the conten- tion betweene the ſheepe-heards of that place, and Iethro's Daughters, made him knowne to their Father: who not onely entertained him, but married him to one of thoſe Siſters: and in that ſolitarie life of keeping of his Father in lawes ſheepe, farre from the preſſe of the world, contenting himſelfe (though bred as a Kings Sonne) with the lot of a poore Heardſ-man, God found him out in that Deſart, wherein hee firſt ſuffered him to liue many yeeres, the better to know the wayes and paſſages through which hee purpoſed that hee ſhould conduct his people, toward the Land promiſed:

promiſed: and therein appearing vnto him, he made him know his Will and diuine Pleaſure for his returne into Ægypt. The like may be ſaid of all things elſe, which Moſes afterward by Gods direction performed in the Storie of Iſrael before remembred. There is not therefore the ſmalleſt accident, which may ſeeme vnto men as falling out by chance, and of no conſequence: but that the ſame is cauſed by God to effect ſomewhat elſe by: yea, and oftentimes to effect things of the greateſt worldly importance, either preſently, or in many yeeres after, when the occaſions are either not conſidered, or forgotten.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Nations with whom the Iſraelites had dealing after their comming out of Ægypt; and of the men of renowne in other Nations, about the times of MOSES and IOSVA, with the ſumme of the Hiſtorie of IOSVA.

§. I.

How the Nations with whom the Iſraelites were to haue Warre, were diuers wayes, as it were, prepared to be their enemies.

IN like manner if we looke to the qualitie of the Nations, with whom the Iſraelites, after their comming out of Ægypt, had to doe, either in the Wilderneſſe, or afterward: we ſhall finde them long before-hand, by the diſpoſing prouidence of God, as it were prepared for enmitie: partly in reſpect that they were moſt of them of the iſſue of Canaan, or at leſt of Ham: and the reſt (as the Edomites, Moabites, Ammonites, and Iſmaelites) were mingled with them by mutuall marriages: whereas the Iſraelites ſtill continued ſtrangers, and ſeparate from them: and ſo partly in this reſpect, and partly by ancient injuries or enmities, and partly by reaſon of diuerſitie in Religion, were theſe Nations, as it were prepared to be enemies to the Iſraelites: and ſo to ſerue for ſuch purpoſes as God had reſerued them for. To make theſe things more manifeſt, we muſt vnderſtand that this part of Syria, bounded by the mountaines of Libanus, and Zidon on the North, by the ſame mountaines continued as farre as the Springs of Arnon on the East: by the way of Ægypt, and the Red Sea on the South: and by the Mediterran Sea on the Weſt: was inhabited and peopled by two Nations, the one ſpringing from the ſonnes of Cham, the other from Sem: but thoſe of Sem, were but as ſtrangers therein for a long time, and came thither in effect but with * one familie, to wit, that of Abraham, and a few of his kindred. The other for the greateſt part were the Canaanites, the ancient Lords and Poſſeſſors of thoſe Territories: by proceſſe of time diuided into ſeuerall families and names: whereof ſome some of them were of eminent stature and strength, as the Anakims, Zamzummims, or Zuzei, Emims, Horites, and others. These (as men most valiant and able commonly doe) did inhabite the vtter borders and mountaines of their Countries: the rest were the Zidonians, Iebusites, Amorites, Heuites, Hetites, and others, who tooke name after the sonnes of Canaan, and after whom the Countrie in generall was still called.

* It ſeemeth alſo that Hus, the Sonne of Nachor, & Buz his Brother, planted themſelues in the Eaſtſide of Iordan, about Baſan: where they finde the Land of Hus: in which both Iob dwelt, as one of the iſſue of Hus the Sonne of Nachor, and Elihu, his friend, which is called a Buzit. See hereafter Cha. 10. §. 7.

As for the Hebrewes which descended of Shem by Abraham, they were of another familie, and strangers in that Countrie: especially the Israelites, and this was some cause that the Canaanites did not affect them, or indure them: no more then the Philistims did, who descended also of Cham by Mizraim. For though Abraham himselfe being a stranger was highly esteemed and honoured among them: especially by the Amorites inhabiting the West part of Iordan: yet now euen they which descending from Abraham, or from his kindred, abode and multiplied in those parts, were alienated in affections from the Israelites: as holding them strangers and intruders: making more account of their alliance with the Canaanites, and the rest of the issue of Cham, with whom they dayly contracted affinitie: than of their olde petigree from Abraham. Exod.c.17.v.16

True it is that these Nations descended of Abraham, or of his kindred, who had linckt themselues and matched with the Canaanites and others, had so farre possest themselues of the borders of those Regions, as they began to bee equall in strength to the bordering Canaanites, if not superiour. For of Lot came those two great families of the Moabites, and Ammonites: of Esau the Idumæans: of Madian the Madianites: of Ismael, the eldest son of Abraham, came the Ismaelites, with whom are ioyned as of the same nation, the Amalekites, whom though the more common opinion thinketh to haue been a tribe of Edom, because Esau had a grand-child of that name, yet manifest reason conuinceth it to haue been otherwise. For the Israelites were forbidden to prouoke the Edomites, or doe them any wrong, whereas contrariwise Amalek was cursed, and endlesse warre decreed against him: but hereof more elsewhere. Chap. 8. §. 3. Of Ismaels eldest Sonne Nabeth sprung the Arabians of Petræa, called Nabathæi. Now euen as Abraham besought God to blesse Ismael, so it pleased him both to promise and performe it. For of him those twelue Princes came, which inhabited, in effect, all that Tract of Land betweene Hauilath vpon Tigris, and Sur which is the West part of the Desart of Arabia Petræa. Yet howsoeuer the strength of these later named nations, which descended from Abraham, were great: yet it is not vnlikely, but that some reason which moued them not to fauour the entrance of the Israelites into Canaan, was in respect of feare: because all Princes and States doe not willingly permit any stranger or powerfull Nation to enter their Territories. Wherefore, though all these families beforenamed, were not so vnited, in and among themselues, but that they had their jealousies of each other, and contended for Dominion: yet fearing a third more strong than themselues, whether they stood a-part or vnited, they were taught by the care of ther owne preseruation, to joyne themselues together against Israel: though they did it nothing so maliciously and resoluedly as the Canaanites did. For the Edumæans only denied the Hebrewes a passage: which the Moabites durst not denie: because their Countrie lay more open; and because themselues had lately beene beaten out of the richest part of their Dominions, by the Amorites: and as for the Ammonites, their Countrie lay altogether out of the way, and the strength of Sehon and Og Kings of the Amorites, was interjacent: and besides that, the border of the Ammonites was strong, by reason of the mountaines which diuided it from Basan. Againe, that which moued the Moabites in their owne reason not much to interrupt Israel, in the conquest of Sehon the Amorite, and of Og his Confederate, was that the Moabites might hope after such time as the Amorites were beaten by Moses, that themselues might recouer againe their owne inheritance: to wit, the Vallies and Plaines lying betweene the mountaines of Arabia and Iordan: But as soone as Sehon was slaine, and that the King of Moab, Deut.c.11.v.5. Deut.c.11.v.5. Exod.c.17.v.16 Gen.17. Num.c.21.v.24

Moab, Balac, perceiued that Moses allotted that valley to the Tribes of Gad and Ruben, hee began to practise with Balaam against Israel, and by the Daughters of Midian; as aforesaide, to allure them to Idolatrie: and thus at length the Moabites by speciall occasion were more and more stirred vp to enmitie against Israel. And as for diuers of the rest that were descended from Abrahams kindred, wee may note, how in the beginning, betweene the Authors of their Petigrees, God permitted some enmities to be as it were presages of future quarrells, which in the posteritie might bee the easier incensed, by the memorie of olde grudges: and withall by some disdaine from the elder in nature to the yonger. For the Ismaelites being descended from the eldest sonne of Abraham, and the Edomites from the eldest sonne of Isaac, Iacob, being but a second sonne, of a second brother, those Princes which were descended of the elder Houses being naturall men, might scorne to giue place, much lesse to subiect themselues, to their inferiours, as they tooke it, and for a more aggrauation the issues of Esau Princes of Edumæa, might keepe in record that their Parent was bought out of his birth-right by Iacobs taking his aduantage, and that he was deceiued of his Fathers blessings also by him: and that Iacob after reconciliation came not vnto him as he promised into Seir or Idumæa.

Gen. 35.
Gen. 27.
Gen. 33. 14.

So also in the posteritie of Ismael, it might remaine as a seede or pretence of enmitie, that their fore-father was by the instigation of Sara, cast out into the Desart, with his Mother Hagar: and had therein perished, but that it pleased God by his Angel to relieue them. Ismael also had an Ægyptian both to his Mother and to his Wife: and Amalec was also an Horite by his Mother: which Horites were of the ancient Canaanites. The Edumæans also, or Edomites, were by their Maternall line descended of the Canaanites. For Esau tooke two Wiues of that Nation: one of them was Adath, the Daughter of Elon, the Hittite, and the other Aholibamah, the grand-child of Zibeon the Heuite, Lord of Seir, before the same was conquered by Esau, and called after his name, Edom, or Idumæa.

Gen. 36.

Lastly, it appeareth that all those families of the Ismaelites, Amalekites, Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, &c. were in processe of time corrupted, and drawne from the knowledge and worship of God, and became Idolaters, infected and seduced by the conuersation of those people among whom they dwelt, and by those Wiues of the Canaanites which they had married: onely a few of the Kenites and those Madianites, which inhabited on the edge of the Red Sea, whereof Iethro was Priest, or Prince, or both, worshipped the true and euer-liuing God.

§. II.

Of the Kings of the Canaanites and Madianites, mentioned in the ancient Warres of the Israelites.

OF the Kings of the Canaanites, descended of Cham, (for Melchizedek may be thought to be of a better Petigree) wee finde foure named by Moses: and one and thirtie remembred by Iosua, though few of these named, otherwise than by the Cities ouer which they commanded: to which each of them had a small Territorie adioyning, and no other Dominion. These Canaanites in a generall consideration are to be vnderstood for all those Nations, descended of Cham by Canaan, as the Hittites, Iebusites, Amorites, Gergesites, Heuites, &c. and so heere wee vnderstand this name in speaking of the Kings of the Canaanites: and so also we call the Countrie of their habitation, the holy Land, or the Land of promise: for God had appointed that the seuen principall Families should bee rooted out: and that his owne people should inherite their Lands and Cities. But if wee consider of the Name and Nation in particular, then is their proper habitation bounded by Iordan, on the East, and by the Mediterran Sea on the West: in which narrow Countrie, and in the choisest places thereof, those Canaanites which held their Paternall name chiefly inhabited.

The

The first King of these Nations, named in the Scriptures, was Hamor or Hemor, of the Heuites, whom Simeon and Leui slew, together with his Sonne Sichem, in reuenge of their Sisters rauishment. Gen. 34.

Arad was the second King which the Scriptures haue remembred, who had that part of Canaan towards the South, neighbouring Edom and the Dead Sea; the same which surprised Israel, as they incamped in the Wildernesse in the edge of Edumaa. Num. 21.1.

The third named was Sehon King of Essebon, who before Moses arriuall had beaten the Moabites out of the West part of Arabia Petræa or Nabathea, and thrust them ouer Arnon into the Desarts, the same whom Moses ouer-threw in the plaines of Moab: at which time he tooke Essebon, and all the Cities of the Amorites. Num. 21.24. Ios. 9. Ioseph. ant. lib. 4. c. 5.

Presently after which victorie, Og was also slaine by Israel, who commaunded the North part of that Valley betweene the Mountaines Traconi or Galaad and Iordan, who was also a King of the Amorites. Num. 21.35.

The fift was Adonizedek King of the Iebusites, and of Hierusalem, with whom Iosua nameth foure other Kings.

Hoham, King of Hebron.

Piram, King of Iarmuth.

Iapia, King of Lachis: and Deber, King of Eglon, who were all Amorites ouerthrowne in battell: and hanged by Iosua. After this ouerthrow Iosua nameth Iabin, King of Hazor, and Iosua. 10. Ioseph. ant. lib. 5. cap. 1.

Iobab, King of Madon: whom he also slaughtered, and tooke his Cities: and this Iabin seemed to haue some Dominion ouer the rest, for it is said in the Text, For HAZOR before-times was the head of all those Kingdomes. Iosua. 11. v. 10.

After these Adonibezek that notorious Tyrant is named: who confest that he had cut off the thumbs of the hands, and feete, of 70. Kings, inforcing them to gather crummes vnder his Table: who, after Iuda and Simeon had vsed the same exequution vpon himselfe, acknowledged it to be a iust reuenge of God: this King was carried to Hierusalem where he died. Iud. 1. Ioseph. lib. 5. cap. 2.

The last King named is Iabin the second, who as it seemeth had rebuilt Hazor, burnt by Iosua. For at such time as he imploied Sisara against Israel, whom hee oppressed twentie yeeres, after the death of Ehud, He inhabited Hazor. This Iabin, Barac (incouraged by Debora) ouerthrew; and his Captaine Sisara had by Iael, the Wife of Heber the Kenite, a naile driuen into his head while hee slept in her Tent: Iabin himselfe perishing afterward in that warre. Iud. 4. Iud. 4. Psal. 85.

The Madianites had also their Kings at times, but commonly mixt with the Moabites: and they held a corner of Land in Nabathea: to the South-east of the Dead Sea. They descended from Madian, Abrahams sonne, by Cethura. Raguel surnamed Gethegleus or Iethres, saith Iosephus, called Iethro in Exodus, Kenis in the first of Iudges, the sonne of Dathan, the grand-child of Iexanis, or Iokshan, the great grand-child of Abraham by Cethura, was Priest or Prince of the Madianites by the Red Sea: whose Daughter, or Neece, Moses married: and of whom I haue spoken elsewhere more at large. This Iethro if hee were not the same with Hobab, must be his Father: and this Hobab had seuen Daughters. Hee guided Moses in the Wildernesse: and became one of the Israelites: of him descended the Kenites so called of his Father Raguels surname, of which Kenites was Heber, which had peace with Iabin the second, euen now remembred. Ioseph. l. 5. c. 6. Exod. 3. Cedren. pag. 34. Iud. 1.

At such time as Saul inuaded the Amalekites, he knowing the good affection of the Kenites to Israel, gaue them warning to separate themselues: and yet the Kenites had strong seates, and liued in the mountaines of the Desarts. 1. Sam. 15.6.

The Kings of the Canaanites, and Madianites, and the Amalekites, as many as I finde named were these.

1. Homer the Heuite of Sichem
2. Arad of the South parts
3. Sehon of Essebon
4. Og of Basan.
5. Adonizedek the Iebusite, King of Hierusalem

Afterward in the pursute of the rest Gedeon himselfe laid hands vpon Zebah and Salmana, or Salmunna, and exequnted them, being prisoners, in which expedition of Gedeon there perished 120000. of the Madianites and their Confederates. Of the Idumæans, Moabites, and Ammonites, I will speake heereafter in the description of their Territories.

§. III.

Of the Amalekites and Ismaelites.

OF the Kings of the Amalekites and Ismaelites, I finde few that are named, and though of the Ismaelites there were more in number than of the rest (for they were multiplied into a greater Nation, according to the promise of God made vnto Abraham) yet the Amalekites, who together with the Midianites were numbred among them, were more renowned in Moses time than the rest of the Ismaelites. So also were they when Saul gouerned Israel. For Saul pursued them from Sur vnto Hauilah, to wit, ouer a great part of Arabia Petræa, and the Desart. The reason to me seemeth to bee this: That the twelue Princes which came of Ismael, were content to leaue those barren Deserts of Arabia Petræa, called Sur, Paran, and Sin, to the issue of Abraham by Cetura, that ioyned with them (for so seeme the Amalekites to haue beene, and so were the Madianites:) themselues taking possession of a better soile in Arabia the Happie, and about the Mountaines of Galaad in Arabia Petræa. For Nabaioth the eldest of those twelue Princes planted that part of Arabia Petræa, which was very fruitfull though adioyning to the Desart, in which Moses wandred, afterward called Nabathea: the same which neighboureth Iudæa on the East side. They also peopled a Prouince in Arabia the Happie, whereof the people were in after-times called Napathei (B) changed into (P).

Kedar

Kedar, the ſecond of Iſmaels Sonnes, gaue his owne name to the Eaſt part of Baſan, or Batanea, which was afterward poſſeſt by Manaſſe, ſo much thereof as lay within the Mountaines Traconi, or Gilead. Which Nation Lampridius calleth Kedarens, and Plinie Cedreans.

Adbeel ſate downe in the Deſart Arabia, neere the Mountaines which diuide it from the Happie: and gaue name to the Adubens, which Ptolomie calleth Agubens.

Mibſam was the Parent of the Maſamancuſes, neere the Mountaine Zamath, in the ſame Arabia the Happie.

The Raabens were of Miſhma: who ioyned to the Orchens, neere the Arabian gulfe, where Ptolomie ſetteth Zagmais.

Of Duma were the Dumæans, betweene the Adubens and Raabens: where the Citie Dumeth ſometimes ſtood.

Of Ietur the Ituræans, or Chamathens: of whom Tohu was King in Dauids time.

Of Naphri the Nubeian Arabians: inhabiting Syria Zoba: ouer whom Adadezer commanded, while Dauid ruled Iſrael. Plin. l. 6. c. 28.

The Amalekites gaue their Kings the name of Agag, as the Ægyptians the name of Pharaoh to theirs, and the ancient Syrians Adad to theirs, and the Arabian Nabatheans, Aretas, as Names of Honour.

The Amalekites were the firſt that fought with Moſes, after he paſt the Red Sea: when of all times they flouriſhed moſt, and yet were vanquiſhed. Exod. 17.

Afterward they ioyned with the Canaanites, and beate the Iſraelites neere Cadesbarne. After the Gouernement of Othoniel, they ioyned them with the Moabites: after Barac with the Madianites: and inuaded Iſrael. God commanded that as ſoone as Iſrael had reſt; they ſhould roote out the name of the Amalekites: which Saul exequuted in part, when hee waſted them from the border of Ægypt, to the border of Chaldæa: from Hauilah to Shur. Num. 14.

In Dauids time they tooke Siklag in Simeon: but Dauid followed them, and ſurpriſed them, recouering his priſoners and ſpoiles. And yet, after Dauid became King, they againe vexed him, but to their owne loſſe. 1. Sam. 30. 2. Sam. 8, 12.

In Ezekias time as many of them as ioyned to Edumæa were waſted and diſplanted by the children of Simeon. 1. Chron. 4.

And as the World was but euen now enriched with the written Law of the liuing God, ſo did Art and Ciuilitie (bred and foſtered farre off in the Eaſt, and in Ægypt) beginne at this time to diſcouer a paſſage into Europe, and into thoſe parts of Greece, neighbouring Aſia and Iudæa. For if Pelaſgus beſides his bodily ſtrength, was choſen King of Arcadia, becauſe he taught thoſe people to erect them ſimple Cottages, to defend them from raine and storme: and learned them withall to make a kinde of Meale, and bread of Acornes, who before liued for the most part, by Hearbs and Rootes: we may thereby iudge how poore, and wretched those times were, and how falsly those Nations haue vaunted of that their antiquities accompanied not onely with ciuill learning, but with all other kinds of knowledge, And it was in this age of the World, as both Eusebius and S. Augustine haue obserued, that Prometheus flourished: Quem propterea ferunt de luto formasse homines, quia optimus sapientiæ Doctor fuisse perhibetur; Of whom it is reported that he formed men out of clay, because he was an excellent teacher of Wisedome: and so Theophrastus expoundeth the inuention of fire ascribed to PROMETHEVS, Ad inuenta sapientiæ pertinere; To haue reference to wise inuentions: and Æschylus affirmeth, That by the stealing of Iupiters fire was meant, that the knowledge of Prometheus reached to the Starres, and other celestiall bodies. Againe, it is written of him, that hee had the art so to vse this fire, as thereby hee gaue life to Images of Wood, Stone, and Clay: meaning that before his birth and being, those people among whom hee liued had nothing else worthy of men, but externall forme and figure. By that fiction of Prometheus, being bound on the top of the Hill Caucasus, his entrailes the while deuoured by an Eagle, was meant the inward care and restlesse desire hee had to inuestigate the Natures, Motions, and Influences of Heauenly bodies, for so it is sayde: Ideò altissimum ascendisse Caucasum, vt sereno cælo quàm longissimè astra, signorum obitus & ortus spectaret; That hee ascended Caucasus, to the end that hee might in a cleere skie discerne a farre off the settings and risings of the Starres: though Diodorus Siculus expound it otherwise, and others diuersly.

There liued also at once with Moses, that famous Atlas, brother to Prometheus, both being the Sonnes of Iapetus, of whom though it bee saide, that they were borne before Moses dayes, and therefore are by others esteemed of a more ancient date: yet the aduantage of their long liues gaue them a part of other ages among Men, which came into the World long after them. Besides these Sonnes of Iapetus, Æschylus findes two other, to wit, Oceanus, and Hesperus, who being famous in the West, gaue name to the Euening, and so to the euening Starre. Also besides this Atlas of Libya or Mauritania, there were others, which bare the same name: but of the Libyan, and the brother of Prometheus, it was that those Mountaines which crosse Africa, to the South of Marocco, Sus, and Hea, with the Sea adioyning tooke name, which memorie Plato in Critias bestowes on Atlas, the Sonne of Neptune.*

Cicero in the fifth of his Tusculan questions, affirmeth that all things written of Prometheus and Atlas, were but by those names to expresse diuine knowledge. Nec verò ATLAS sustinere cælum, nec PROMETHEVS affixus Caucaso, nec stellatus CEPHEVS cum Vxore traderetur, nisi diuina cognitio nomen eorum ad errorem fabulæ traduxisset; Neither should ATLAS bee said to beare vp heauen, nor PROMETHEVS to be fastened to Caucasus, nor CEPHEVS with his Wife to bee stellified; vnlesse their diuine knowledge had raised vpon them names these erroneous fables.

Orpheus sometime expresst Time by Prometheus, sometime hee tooke him for Saturne; as Rhea coniux, alme Promethen. But that the storie of Prometheus was not altogether a fiction: and that he liued about this time, the most approued Historians and Antiquaries, and among them Eusebius and S. Augustine haue not doubted, For the great iudgement which Atlas had in Astronomie, saith S. Augustine, were his Daughters called by the names of constellations, Pleiades and Hyades: Others attribute vnto him the finding out of the Moones course, of which Archas the sonne of Orchomenus challengeth the inuention. Of this Arcas Arcadia in Peloponnesus tooke name, and therefore did the Arcadians vaunt that they were more ancient than the Moone. Et Luna gens prior illa fuit: which is to bee vnderstood, saith Natalis Comes, before there had beene any obseruation of the Moones course: or of her working in inferiour bodies. And though there bee that bestow the finding out thereof vpon Endymion: others (as Xenagoras) on Typhon: yet Isacius Tzetzes, a curious searcher of antiquities, gaue it Atlas of Libya: who besides his gifts of minde, was a man of vnequalled and incomparable strength: from whom Thales the Milesian, as it is saide, had the ground of his Philosophie.

of DEVCALION and PHAETON.

AND in this age of the World, and while Moses yet liued, Deucalion raigned in Thessalie, Crotopus then ruling the Argiues. This Deucalion was the Sonne of Prometheus, saith Herodotus, Apollonius, Hesiodus, and Strabo. Hesiodus gaue him Pandora for Mother; the rest Clymene: Homer in the fifteenth of his Odysees makes Deucalion the Sonne of Minos: but he must needes haue meant some other Deucalion; for else either Vlysses was mistaken, or Homer, who put the tale into his mouth. For Vlysses after his returne from Troy fained himselfe to bee the brother of Idomeneus, who was sonne to this later Deucalion, the sonne of Minos: but this Minos liued but one age before Troy was taken: (for Idomeneus serued in that Warre) and this Deucalion the Sonne of Prometheus, who liued at once with Moses, was long before. In the first Deucalions time happened that great inundation in Thessalie by which in effect euery soule, in those parts, perished, but Deucalion, Pyrrha his Wife, and some few others. It is affirmed that at the time of this floud in Thessalie, those people exceeded in all kinde of wickednesse and villanie: and as the impietie of men is the forcible attractiue of Gods vengeance, so did all that Nation for their foule sinnes perish by waters: as in the time of Noah, the corruption and crueltie of all mankinde drew on them that generall destruction by the floud Vniuersall. Only Deucalion, and Pyrrha his wife, whom God spared, were both of them esteemed to bee louers of Vertue, of Iustice and of Religion. Of whom Ouid:

Strabo. lib. 9.

Non illa melior quisquam, nec amantior aqui
Vir fuit: aut illa reuerentior vlla deorum.

No man was better, nor more iust than hee:
Nor any Woman godlier than shee.

It is also affirmed that Prometheus fore-told his sonne Deucalion of this ouer-flowing; and aduised him to prouide for his safetie: who hereupon prepared himselfe a kinde of Vessell, which Lucian in his Dialogue of Timon calls Cibotium; and others Larnax. And because to these circumstances, they afterward adde the sending out of the Doue, to discouer the Waters fall and decrease, I should verily thinke that this Storie had beene but an imitation of Noahs floud deuised by the Greekes, did not the times so much differ, and S. Augustine with others of the Fathers and reuerent Writers approue this storie of Deucalion. Among other his children Deucalion had these two of note, Hellen of whom Greece had first the name of Hellas, and Melantho, on whom Neptune is said to haue begot Delphus, which gaue name to Delphos, so renowned among the Heathen for the Oracle of Apollo therein founded.

August. de Ciuit. Dei. l. 18. c. 10. ex Eusebio & Hieronyme.

And that which was no lesse strange and maruailous than this floud, was that great burning and conflagaration which about this time also happened vnder Phaeton; not onely in Æthiopia, but in Istria, a Region in Italie, and about Cumæ, and the Mountaines of Vesunius: of both which the Greekes, after their manner, haue inuented many strange fables.

§. VI.

of HERMES TRISMEGISTVS.

BVt of all other which this age brought foorth among the Heathen, Mercurius was the most famous, and renowned; the same which was also called Trismegistus, or Ter maximus; and of the Greekes Hermes.

Many there were of this name; and how to distinguish, and set them in their owne times, both S. Augustine and Lactantius finde it difficult. For that Mercurie which was esteemed the God of Theeues, the God of Wrestlers, of Merchants, and Sea-men, and the God of Eloquence (though all by one name confounded) was not the same with that Mercurie, of whose many workes some fragments are now extant.

Cicero, Clemens Alexandrinus, Arnobius, and certaine of the Greekes reckon fiue Mercuries. Of which, two were famous in Ægypt, and there worshipped; one, the Sonne of Nilus, whose name the Ægyptians feared to vtter, as the Iewes did their Tetragrammaton; the other, that Mercurie, which slew Argus in Greece, and flying into Ægypt, is said to haue deliuered literature to the Ægyptians, and to haue giuen them Lawes. But Diodorus affirmeth, that Orpheus, and others after him, brought learning and letters out of Ægypt into Greece: which Plato also confirmeth, saying; That letters were not found out by that Mercurie which slew Argus, but by that ancient Mercurie, otherwise Theuet; whom Philo Biblius writeth Taautus; the Ægyptians Thoyth; the Alexandrians Thot; and the Greekes (as before) Hermes. And to this Taautus, Sanconiatho, who liued about the Warre of Troy, giues the inuention of letters. But S. Augustine making two Mercuries, which were both Ægyptians, calls neither of them the sonne of Nilus, nor acknowledgeth either of them to haue slaine Argus. For he finds this Mercurie, the slayer of Argus, to be the grand-child of that Atlas, which liued while Moses was yet yong. And yet L. Viues vpon S. Augustine seemes to vnderstand them to bee the same with those, whom Cicero, Alexandrinus, and the rest haue remembred. But that coniecture of theirs, that any Græcian Mercurie brought letters into Ægypt, hath no ground. For it is manifest, (if there bee any any truth in prophane antiquitie) that all the knowledge which the Greekes had, was tranſported out of Ægypt or Phœnicia; and not out of Greece, nor by any Grecian into Ægypt. For they all confeſſe, that Cadmus brought letters firſt into Bœotia, either out of Ægypt, or out of Phœnicia: it being true, that betweene Mercurius, that liued at once with Moſes, and Cadmus, there were theſe deſcents caſt; Crotopus King of the Argiues, with whom Moſes liued, and in whoſe time about his tenth yeere Moſes died; after Crotopus, Sthenelus who raigned eleuen yeeres; after him Danaus fiftie yeeres; after him Lynceus: in whoſe time, and after him in the time of Minos King of Crete, this Cadmus arriued in Bœotia. And therefore it cannot be true, that any Mercurius about Moſes his time, flying out of Greece for the ſlaughter of Argus, brought literature out of Greece into Ægypt. Neither did either of thoſe two Mercuries of Ægypt, whom S. Auguſtine remembreth, the one the grand-father, the other the Nephew or grand-child, come out of Greece. Eupolemus and Artapanus note, that Moſes found out Letters and taught the vſe of them to the Iewes; of whom the Phœnicians their Neighbours receiued them; and the Greekes of the Phœnicians by Cadmus. But this inuention was alſo aſcribed to Moſes, for the reaſon before remembred; that is, becauſe the Iewes and the Phœnicians had them firſt from him. For euery Nation gaue vnto thoſe men the honour of firſt Inuentors, from whom they receiued the profit. Ficinus makes that Mercurie, vpon part of whoſe workes he Commenteth, to haue beene foure deſcents after Moſes; which he hath out of Virgil, who calls Atlas, that liued with Moſes, the maternall grand-father of the firſt famous Mercurie, whom others, as Diodorus, call the Counſailer and Inſtructer of that renowned Iſis, wife of Oſiris. But Ficinus giueth no reaſon for his opinion herein. But that the elder Mercurie inſtructed Iſis, Diodorus Siculus affirmeth, and that ſuch an inſcription was found on a piller erected on the Tombe of Iſis. Lod. Viues vpon the ſixe and twentieth Chapter of the eighth Booke of S. Auguſtine, De Ciuitate Dei, conceiueth, that this Mercurie, whoſe workes are extant, was not the firſt which was entituled, Ter maximus, but his Nephew or grand-child. * Sanchoniaton, an ancient Phœnician, who liued ſhortly after Moſes, hath other fancies of this Mercurie; affirming that hee was the Scribe of Saturne, and called by the Phœnicians, Taautus; and by the Ægyptians Thoot, or Thoyt. It may bee, that the many yeeres which he is ſaid to haue liued, to wit, three hundred yeeres, gaue occaſion to ſome Writers to finde him in one time, and to others in other times. But by thoſe which haue collected the grounds of the Ægyptian Philoſophie and Diuinitie, he is found more ancient than Moſes: becauſe the Inuentor of the Ægyptian Wiſedome, wherein it is ſaid, that Moſes was excellently learned.

It is true, that although this Mercurie or Hermes doth in his Diuinitie differ in many particulars from the Scriptures, eſpecially in the approuing of Images, which Moſes of all things moſt deteſted; yet whoſoeuer ſhall read him with an euen iudgement, will rather reſolue, that theſe workes which are now extant, were by the Greekes and Ægyptian Prieſts corrupted, and thoſe fooleries inſerted, than that euer they were by the hand of Hermes written, or by his heart and Spirit deuiſed. For there is no man of vnderſtanding, and maſter of his owne wits, that hath affirmed in one and the ſame Tract, thoſe things which are directly contrarie in doctrine, and in nature: For out of doubt (Moſes excepted) there was neuer any man of thoſe elder times that hath attributed more, and in a ſtile more reuerend and diuine, vnto almightie God, than he hath done. And therefore if thoſe his two Treatiſes, now among vs; the one conuerted by Apuleius, the other by that learned Ficinus, had beene found in all things like themſelues: I thinke it had not beene perilous to haue thought with Eupolemus, that this Hermes was Moſes himſelfe; and that the Ægyptian Theologie hereafter written, was deuiſed by the firſt, and more ancient Mercurie, which others haue thought to haue beene Ioſeph, the ſonne of Iacob: whom, after the expoſition of Pharaohs dreames, they called Saphanet phane, which is as much to ſay, as abſconditorum repertor; A finder out of hidden things. But theſe are ouer-ventu-turous opinions. For what this man was, it is knowne to God. Enuie and aged time hath partly defaced, and partly worne out the certaine knowledge of him: of whom, whosoeuer he were, Lactantius writeth in this sort: Hic scripsit libros, & quidem multos, ad cognitionem diuinarum rerum pertinentes, in quibus Maiestatem summi ac singularis Dei asserit, ijsdemq; nominibus appellat, quibus nos, Deum & Patrem; Hee hath written many Bookes belonging to, or expressing the knowledge of diuine things, in which he affirmeth the Maiestie of the most High and one God, calling him by the same names of God and Father, which we doe. The same Father also feareth not to number him among the Sybils and Prophets. And so contrary are these his acknowledgements to those Idolatrous fictions of the Ægyptians and Graecians, as for my selfe I am perswaded, that whatsoeuer is found in him contrary thereunto, was by corruption inserted. For thus much himselfe confesseth: Deus omnium Dominus, & Pater, fons & vita, potentia & lux, & mens, & Spiritus; & omnia in ipso, & sub ipso sunt. Verbum enim ex eius esse prodiens, perfectissimum existens, & generator & opifex, &c. God (saith hee) the Lord and Father of all things, the fountaine, and life, and power, and light, and minde, and Spirit: and all things are in him and vnder him. For his Word out of himselfe proceeding being most perfect, and generatiue, and operatiue, falling vpon fruitfull nature, made it also fruitfull and producing. And he was therefore (saith Suidas) called Ter maximus, quia de Trinitate loquutus est: in Trinitate vnum esse Deum asserens; Because he spake of the Trinitie, affirming that there is one God in Trinitie. Hic ruinam (saith FICINVS) prauidit priscæ Religionis, hic ortum nouæ fidei, hic aduentum Christi, hic futurum iudicium, resurrectionem sæculi, beatorum gloriam, supplicia peccatorum; This MERCVRY foresaw the ruine of the old or superstitious Religion, and the birth of the new faith, and of the comming of Christ, the future iudgement, the resurrection, the glory of the Blessed, and the torment or affliction of the wicked or damned.

In Præf. Mercu. Trismeg.

To this I will only adde his two last speeches reported by Calcidius the Platonist, and by Volateran out of SVYDAS. Hactenus fili pulsus à patria, vixi peregrinus & exul, nunc incolumis repeto: cumq; post paulum à vobis corporeis vinculis absolutus discesserò, videte ne me quasi mortuum lugeatis: Nam ad illam optimam beatamq; Ciuitatem regredior: ad quam vniuersi cives mortis conditione venturi sunt. Ibi namq; solus Deus est summus Princeps: qui ciues suos replet suauitate mirifica: ad quam hæc, quam multi vitam existimant, mors est potius dicenda quam vita; Hitherto, O Sonne, being driuen from my Countrey, I haue liued a stranger and banished man: but now I am repairing home-ward againe in safety. And when I shall after a few dayes (or in a short time) by being loosed from these bonds of flesh and bloud depart from you, see that you doe not bewaile me as a man dead, for I doe but returne to that best and blessed Citie, to which all her Citizens (by the condition of death) shall repaire. Therein is the onely God, the most high and chiefe Prince, who filleth or feedeth his Citizens with a sweetnesse more then marueilous: in regard whereof this being which others call a life, is rather to bee accounted a death then a life. The other and that which seemeth to be his last, is thus conuerted by others, agreeing in sense but not in words with SVYDAS. O cœlum magni Dei sapiens opus, teq; O vox patris quam ille primam emisit, quando vniuersum constituit mundum, adiuro per vnigenitum eius verbum, & Spiritum cuncta comprehendentem, miseremini mei; I adiure thee O heauen, thou wise worke of the great God, and thee O voyce of the Father, which he first vttered, when hee framed the whole world, by his onely begotten Word, and Spirit, comprehending all things, Haue mercie vpon mee.

But Suydas hath his inuocation in these words: Obtestor te cœlum magni Dei sapiens opus, obtestor te vocem Patris quam loquutus est primum, cum omnem mundum firmauit, obtestor te per vnigenitum Sermonem omnia continentem, propitius, propitius esto; I beseech thee O heauen, wise worke of the great God, I beseech thee O voyce of the Father, which he spake first when he established all the World, I beseech thee by the only begotten Word containing all things, be fauourable, be fauourable.

of IANNES and IAMBRES, and ſome other that liued about thoſe times.

THere were alſo in this age both Æſculapius, which after his death became the God of Phyſicians, being the brother of Mercurius, as Viues thinkes in his Commentary vpon Auguſtine, de Ciuitate Dei, lib. 8. and alſo thoſe two notorious Sorcerers, Iannes and Iambres, who in that impious art excelled all that euer had been heard of to this day: and yet Moſes himſelfe doth not charge them with any familiaritie with Deuils, or ill Spirits: words indeed that ſeldome came out of his mouth; how-euer by the Septuagint they are called Sophiſtæ or Venifici and Incantatores, Sophiſts, poiſoners, and Inchanters: by Hierome, ſapientes & malefici, Wiſemen, and euill doers: and ſo by Vatablus, who alſo vſeth the word Magi. The Greeke it ſelfe ſeemes to attribute ſomewhat of what they did to natural Magick: calling them φαρμακὸς, workers by drugges. The Genenan, Sorcerers and Inchanters: IVNIVS Sapientes, Præſtigiatores & Magi. Magicians and Wiſemen here by him are taken in one ſenſe: and Preſtigiators are ſuch as dazell mens eyes, and make them ſeeme to ſee what they ſee not: as falſe colours, and falſe ſhapes. But as ſome vertues and ſome vices are ſo nicely diſtinguiſhed, and ſo reſembling each other, as they are often confounded, and the one taken for the other: (religion and ſuperſtition hauing one face and countenance) ſo did the workes and workings of Moſes, and of Pharaos Sorcerers appeare in outward ſhew, and to the beholders of common capacities, to bee one and the ſame art and gift of knowledge. For the Deuill changeth himſelfe into an Angel of light: and imitateth in all he can the wayes and workings of the moſt High. And yet on the contrary euery worke which ſurmounteth the wiſedome of moſt men, is not to bee condemned as performed by the helpe or miniſterie of ill Spirits. For the properties and powers which God hath giuen to naturall things, are ſuch as where hee alſo beſtoweth the knowledge to vnderſtand their hidden and beſt vertues, many things by them are brought to paſſe, which ſeeme altogether impoſſible, and aboue nature or arte: which two ſpeculations of workes of nature, and of miracle, the Cabaliſts diſtinguiſhed by theſe names; Opus de Bereſith, & opus de mercana: the one they call Sapientiam naturæ; The Wiſedome of nature: the other Sapientiam diuinitatis; The Wiſedome of diuinity: the one Iacob practiſed in breeding the pied Lambs in Meſopotamia, the other Moſes exerciſed in his miracles wrought in Ægypt, hauing receiued from God the knowledge of the one in the higheſt perfection, to wit, the knowledge of nature: of the other ſo farre as it pleaſed God to proportion him, both which he vſed to his glory, that gaue them: aſſuming to himſelfe nothing at all, either in the leaſt or moſt. Alſo S. Auguſtine noteth, that from the time that Moſes left Ægypt, to the death of Ioſua, diuers other famous men liued in the world, who after their deaths for their eminent vertues and inuentions, were numbred among the Gods: as Dionyſius otherwiſe Liber Pater, who taught the Græcians the vſe of the Vine in Attica: at which time alſo there were inſtituted Muſicall playes to Apollo Delphicus: thereby to regaine his fauour, who brought barrenneſſe and ſcarcitie vpon that part of Greece, becauſe they reſiſted not the attempts of Danaus, who ſpoiled his Temple and ſet it on fire: ſo did Erichthonius inſtitute the like games to Minerua: wherein the Victor was rewarded with a preſent of Oyle, in memory of her that firſt preſt it out of the Oliue.

But whosoeuer they were, or how worthy soeuer they were that liued in the dayes and age of Moses, there was neuer any man, that was no more than man, by whom it pleased God to worke greater things; whom he fauoured more; to whom (according to the appearing of an infinite God) hee so often appeared; neuer any man more familiar and conuersant with Angels; neuer any more learned both in Diuine and Humane knowledge; neuer a greater Prophet in Israel. He was the first that receiued and deliuered the Law of God entire; the first that left to posteritie by letters, the trueth and power of one infinite God; his creating out of nothing the World vniuersall, and all the creatures therein; that taught the detestation of idolatry, and the punishment, vengeance, and eradication, which followed it.

He is remembred among prophane Authors; as by Clearchus the Peripatetick: by Megastenes, and Numenius the Pythagorian. The long liues which the Patriarchs enioyed before the floud, remembred by Moses, Estieus, Hieronymus Ægyptius, Hecatæus, Elanicus, Acusilaus, Ephorus, and Alexander the Historian, confirme. The vniuersall floud which God reuealed vnto Moses, Berosus, Nicolaus Damascenus, and others haue testified. The building of the Tower of Babel, and confusion of tongues, Abydenus, Estieus, and Sybilla haue approued. Berosus also honoureth Abraham. Hecatæus wrote a Booke of him. Damascenus before cited, speaketh of Abrahams passage from Damascus into Canaan, agreeing with the bookes of Moses. Eupolemon writeth the very same of Abraham, which Moses did. For beginning with the building of Babel, and the ouerthrow thereof by diuine power, hee saith that Abraham, borne in the tenth generation, in the Citie called Camerina, or Vrien, excelled all men in wisedome: and by whom the Astrologie of the Chaldeans was inuented. Is iustitia pietatéq; sua (saith Eusebius out of the same Author) sic Deo gratus fuit, vt diuino præcepto in Phœnicem venerit, ibiq; habitauerit; For his iustice and piety hee was so pleasing vnto God, as by his commandement he came into Phœnicia, and dwelt there. Likewise Diodorus Siculus in his second Booke and fifth Chapter, speaketh reuerently of Moses: There are many other among prophane Authors, which confirme the Bookes of Moses, as Eusebius hath gathered in the ninth of his Preparation to the Gospel, Chapter the third and fourth, to whom I referre the Reader. Lastly, I cannot but for some things in it commend this notable testimony of Strabo, who writeth of Moses in these wordes.
Strabo l. 16. MOSES enim affirmabat, docebatq; Ægyptios non rectè sentire, qui bestiarum & pecorum imagines Deo tribuerunt: itemq; Afros & Græcos, qui Dijs hominum figuram affinxerunt: id verò solum esse Deum, quod nos & terram & mare continet, quod cœlum & mundum, & rerum omnium naturam appellamus: cuius profectò imaginem, nemo sanæ mentis, alicuius earum rerum, quæ penes nos sunt, similem audeat effingere. Proinde (omni simulachrorum effictione repudiata) dignum ei Templum ac Delubrum constituendum, ac sine aliqua figura colendum: MOSES affirmed and taught, that the Ægyptians thought amisse, which attributed vnto God the Images of beasts and cattell: Also that the Africans and Greekes greatly erred in giuing vnto their Gods the shape of men: whereas that onely is God indeede, which containeth both vs, the Earth and Sea, which we call Heauen, the world, and the nature of all things, whose image, doubtlesse, no wise man will dare to fashion out vnto the likenesse of those things, which are amongst vs: That therefore (all deuising of Idols cast aside) a worthy Temple and place of prayer was to bee erected vnto him, and he to be worſhipped without any figure at all therein.

Temple

Now concerning the Ægyptian wiſedome, for which the Martyr Stephen commended Moſes, ſaying, That MOSES was learned in all the wiſedome of the Ægyptians, and was mighty in his workes and words; the ſame is collected (how truly I know not) by Diodorus, Diogenes Laertius, Iamblicus, Philo Iudæus, and Euſebius Cæſarienſis, and diuided into foure parts, viz. Mathematicall, Naturall, Diuine, and Morall. Act. c. 7. v. 22.

In the Mathematicall part, which is diſtinguiſhed into Geometrie, Aſtronomie, Arithmetike, and Muſicke; the ancient Ægyptians excelled all others. For Geometry which is by interpretation, meaſuring of grounds, was vſefull vnto them: becauſe it conſiſting of infallible principles, directed them certainely in bounding out their proper Lands, and Territories, when their fields and limits, by the inundations of Nilus, were yeerely ouerflowne and confounded, ſo as no man could know what in right belonged vnto him.

For the ſecond part, to wit, Aſtronomie, the ſite of the Countrey being a leuell and ſpacious Plaine, free and cleere from cloudes, yeelded them delight with eaſe, in obſeruing and contemplating the riſings, fallings, and motions of the Starres.

Arithmeticke alſo, which is the knowledge of numbers, they ſtudied; becauſe without it, in Geometrie and Aſtronomie, nothing can be demonſtrated or concluded. But of Muſicke they made no other account, nor deſired farther knowledge, than ſeemed to them ſufficient to ſerue and magnifie their Gods, their Kings, and good Men.

The Naturall part of this Wiſedome, which handleth the principles, cauſes, elements, and operations of naturall things, differs little from Peripateticall Philoſophie; teaching, that Materia prima is the beginning of all things; that of it all mixt bodies and liuing creatures haue their beeing; that Heauen is round like a Globe; that all Starres haue a certaine fouent heate, and temperate influences, whereby all things grow and are produced; that raines proceede and bee from mutations in the ayre; that the Planets haue their proper ſoules, &c.

The Diuine part of this wiſedome, which is called Theologie, teacheth and beleeueth that the world had a beginning, and ſhall periſh; that men had their firſt originall in Ægypt; partly by meanes of the temperateneſſe of that Countrey, where neither Winter with cold, nor Summer with heate are offenſiue; and partly through the fertilitie, that Nilus giueth in thoſe places; That the ſoule is immortall, and hath tranſmigration from body to body; That God is one, the Father and Prince of all Gods; and that from this God, other Gods are, as the Sunne and Moone, whom they worſhipped by the names of Oſiris and Iſis, and erected to them Temples, Statues, and diuers Images, becauſe the true ſimilitudes of the Gods is not knowne; that many of the Gods haue been in the eſtate of mortall men, and after death, for their vertues, and benefits beſtowed on mankinde, haue beene Deified; that thoſe beaſtes, whoſe Images and formes the Kings did carrie in their Armes, when they obtained victory, were adored for Gods: becauſe vnder thoſe Enſignes they preuailed ouer their enemies. Moreouer, the Ægyptian Diuines had a peculiar kinde of writing, myſticall and ſecret, wherein the higheſt points of their Religion and worſhip of God, which was to bee concealed from the vulgar ſort, were obſcured.

Clemens diſtributeth the whole ſumme of this later Ægyptian learning into three ſeuerall ſorts, viz. Epiſtolar, which is vſed in writing common Epiſtles; Sacerdotall, which is peculiar to their Prieſts; and Sacred; which Sacred containeth Scripture of two kindes: the one proper, which it expreſſed by letters Alphabeticall in obſcure and figuratiue wordes; as for example, where it is written: The Ibis by the Hornet participateth the beauty of the Hawke; which is read thus: The Moone doth by the Sunne borrow part of the light of God: becauſe Light is an Image of Diuine beauty; the other ſymbolicall, or by ſignatures, which is three-fold, viz. Imitatiue, Tropicall, and Ænygmaticall: Imitatiue, which deſigneth things by characters, Clem. Strom. l. 5.

racters, like to the things signified, as by a Circle the Sunne; and by the Hornes of the Moone, the Moone it selfe: Tropicall or transferent, which applies the diuers formes and figures of naturall bodies or creatures, to signifie the dignities, fortunes, conditions, vertues, vices, affections, and actions of their Gods and of men. So with the Ægyptian Diuines, the Image of an Hawke signifieth God, the figure of the Hornet signifieth the Sunne, the picture of the Bird Ibis signifieth the Moone: by the forme of a Man, Prudence and Skilfulnesse: by a Lion, Fortitude: by a Horse, Libertie: by a Crocodile, Impudencie: by a Fish, Hatred is to be vnderstood: Ænygmaticall is a composition or mixture of Images or Similitudes: in which sense, the monstrous Image of a Lions body hauing a Mans head, was grauen on their Temples and Altars, to signifie, that to men all diuine things are Ænygmaticall and obscure. So the Image of the Sunne set on the head of a Crocodile, (which liueth aswell in the Waters, as on Land) expresseth that the Sunne nourisheth Meteors in the Ayre, aswell from the Waters as from the Earth. So a Scepter, at the top whereof is made an Eye, and an Eare, signifieth God, Hearing, Seeing, and Gouerning all things. The Scythians are thought to haue been delighted with this kinde of writing. For Pherecides Syrius reporteth, That when Darius sending letters, threatned Idanthura, King of the Scythians, with ruine and destruction of his Kingdome, vnlesse he would acknowledge subiection: Idanthura returned to him a Mouse, a Frog, a Bird, a Dart, and a Plough-share: which Orontopagas, Tribune of the Souldiers, interpreted to signifie, that by the Mouse, their dwellings: by the Frog, their waters: by the Bird, their aire: by the Dart, their weapons: by the Plough, their lands: were signified to be ready to bee deliuered to Darius, as their Soueraigne Lord. But Xyphodres made another construction, viz. that the King meant, That except Darius with his Men did hasten away, as a Bird through the ayre, or creepe into holes as a Mouse, or runne into the waters which they had passed as a Frog, they should not escape his armes, but either be slaine, or being made Captiues, Till his grounds. The same Historie is with little difference reported by Herodotus.

Herod. l. 4.

The fourth and last part, which is Morall and Politique, doth containe especially the Lawes, which (according to Laertius) Mercurius Trismegistus, or Ter Maximus deuised: who in his Bookes or Dialogues of Pimander and Asclepius, hath written so many things of God, worthy of admiration; aswell (saith Sixtus Senensis) of the Trinitie, and of the comming of Christ, as of the last and fearefull day of iudgement: that (as saith the same Author, the opinion being also ancient) hee is not onely to be accounted a Philosopher, but a Prophet of things to come.

Iamblicus in his Bookes of Mysteries of the Ægyptians, taking two very ancient Historians for his Authors, to wit, Seleucus and Menatus, affirmeth that this Mercurie was not only the Inuentor of the Ægyptian Philosophie, but of all other learning, called the Wisedome of the Ægyptians before remembred: and that he wrote of that subiect 36525. Bookes, or Pages. Of which there were numbred, of Fiery Spirits, one hundred Bookes; of Aereall Spirits as many, and of Spirits Celestiall a thousand; which because they were out of the Ægyptian language conuerted by certaine learned Philosophers into the naturall Greeke, they seemed to haue been first written in that Tongue. Clemens Alexandrinus writeth, that among the Bookes of Hermes, to wit, of the Wisedome of the Ægyptians, there were extant in his time 36. of Physicke sixe bookes; of the orders of Priests ten; and of Astrologie foure.

§. VIII.

A Briefe of the Historie of IOSVA; and of the space betweene him and OTHONIEL: and of the remainders of the Canaanites; with a note of some Contemporaries to IOSVA: and of the breach of Faith.

AFter the death of Moses, and in the one and fortieth yeere of the Egression, in the first moneth called Nisan, or March, Iosua the sonne of Nun, of the Tribe of Ephraim, being filled with the Spirit of wisedome, tooke on him the Gouernment of Israel: God giuing him comfort, and encouraging him to passe the Riuer of Iordan, and to possesse, and diuide among the Israelites the Land promised.

The beginning of Iosuas rule S. Augustine dates with the raigne of Amintas, the eighteenth King in Assyria; with Corax the sixteenth King in Sicyonia, when Danaus gouerned the Argiues; and Ericthonius, Athens. Lib.18.de Ciuit. Dei. c. 11.

Iosua imitating in all things his Predecessor, sent ouer Iordan certaine discouerers to view the seat and strength of Ierico, the next Citie vnto him on the other side of the Riuer, which hee was to passe ouer. Which discouerers being saued, and sent backe by Rahab, a Woman of ill fame, because she kept a Tauerne or Vitling-house, made Iosua know, that the Inhabitants of Ierico, and those of the Countrie about it, hearing of the approch of Israel, had lost courage. Whereupon the day after the returne of the Spies, which was the sixth day of the one and fortieth yeere after the Egression, Iosua remooued from Sittim in the Plaines of Moab, and drew downe his Armie to the banks of the Riuer Iordan; and gaue them commaundment to put themselues in order to follow the Arke of God, when the Leuites tooke it vp, and mooued towards the Riuer; giuing them withall this forcible encouragement, That they should thereby assure themselues of his fauour and presence who is Lord of all the world, when the Riuer of Iordan should beecut off and diuided, and the waters comming from aboue should stand still in a heape; whereby those below towards the Dead sea wanting supply, they might passe ouer into the land of Canaan with dry feet. Ios. 2. 1. Ios. 2. 11. Ios. 3. 1. Ios. 3. 3. Ios. 3. 13.

He also commanded Reuben, Gad, and the halfe Tribe of Manasse, to prepare themselues (according to their Couenant made with Moses) to march in the head of the rest, and as we call it in this age, to leade in the Vanguard, which through all the Desarts of Arabia, from the Mount Sinai to this place, those of the Tribe of Iuda had performed. For these Tribes being alreadie prouided of their habitations, and the Countrie and Cities of the Amorites, by the helpe of the rest, conquered for them: It agreed with iustice & equalitie, that Reuben, Gad, and the halfe of Manasse should also assist their brethren in the obtaining of their parts, as yet in their enemies possession. Ios. 1. 12.

On the banks of Iordan they rested themselues from the sixth day to the ninth; and on the tenth day of the first Moneth Nisan, or March, they past ouer to the other side, taking with them twelue stones from the drie ground in the middest of the Riuer: which, for a memorie of that miracle by God wrought, they set vp at Gilgal, on the East side of the Citie of Ierico, where they incamped the first night. At which place Iosua gaue commandement, that all borne in the last fortieth yeere in the Desarts should bee circumcised, which ceremonie to that day had beene omitted. Of the neglect whereof S. Augustine giueth for cause, The peoples contempt of their superiours. Thomas excuseth it in this sort; That the Israelites knew not the certaine time of their remouing from one place to another: Damascen, That it was not needfull by circumcision to distinguish them from other Nations, at such time as they liued by themselues, and a-part from all Nations. Ios. 4. 19. Ios. 5. 2. Aug. q. 3. in Ios. Thom. part. 3. quæst. 70. art. 4. ad. 3.

On the foureteenth day of the same Moneth, the children of Israel celebrated the Passeouer now the third time; first, at their leauing Ægypt; secondly, at Mount Sinai; and now at Gilgal. After which being desirous to taste of the fruits of the Countrie, and hauing, as it were, surfeited on Man, they parched of the Corne of the land, being not yet fully ripe, and ate thereof. Ios. 5. 10.

And as Moses beganne to distribute those Regions beyond Iordan, to wit, the Lands of the Amorites, which Og of Basan, and Sihon held, so did Iosua performe the rest; and after a view and partition made of the Territories, hee gaue to each Tribe his portion by lot. But this partition and distribution was not done at once, but at Ios.14.3. three seuerall times; first, by Moses to Gad, Ruben, and the halfe Tribe of Manasse, of the Lands ouer Iordan; Secondly, by Iosua, to the Tribe of Iuda, Ephraim, and the other halfe Tribe of Manasse, about the fifth yeere of his gouernment; proued in the 14. of Iosua. v. 10. and a third diuision was made to the other seuen Tribes at Ios.18. Shilo, where Iosua seated the Tabernacle of the Congregation.

The victories of Iosua against the Kings of the Canaanites, are so particularly set downe in his owne bookes, as I shall not neede to lengthen this part by their repetition. In whose Storie I chiefly note these particulars. First, how in the beginning of the warre, those little Kings or Reguli of the Canaanites, had not so much vnderstanding, as to vnite themselues together against the Israelites; but according to the custome of those estates, from whose Gouernours God hath taken away all wisdome and fore-sight, they left those of their owne Nation, which were next the inuaders, to themselues, and to their owne defences; hoping that the fire kindled somewhat farre off, might againe haue beene quenched, ere it could spread it selfe so far as their owne Territories and Cities. But after such time as Ierico and Ai were entred, and the Kings, People, and Cities consumed; fiue of those 31. Kings (all which at length perished in that warre) ioyned themselues together, first attempting the Gibeonites, who had rendred themselues to Iosua. Onely fiue (the rest looking on to see the successe) namely, the King of the Iebusites, in Iebus, or Hierusalem, the Kings of Hebron, Iarmoth, Lachis, and Eglon, addrest themselues for resistance: whose Armie being by Iosua surprised and broken, themselues despairing to scape by flight, and hopelesse of mercy by submission, creeping into a Caue vnder ground, were thence by Iosua
Ios.10. drawne forth and hanged. In the prosequution of which victorie hee also tooke Makkedath, and Libnah, and Lachis. To the relieue whereof Horam King of Gezar Ios.10. hastened, and perished. After which Iosua possest himselfe of Eglon, Hebron, and Debir, destroying the Cities with their Princes.

In the end, and when the South Countries were possest, the Cities thereof conquered, and their Kings and People made dust: the rest of the Canaanites, guided by the ouer-late counsailes of necessitie, vnited themselues, to make one grosse strength and body of an Armie: which Iabin, King of Hazor, practised and gathered together, by Iosua discouered, as the same rested neere the Lake of Merom, hee vsed such diligence, as hee came on them vnawares; and obtaining an absolute victorie ouer them, he prosequuted the same to the vttermost effect. And, besides the slaughter of the defendants, he entred their Cities, of which hee burnt Hazor only, reseruing the rest for Israel to inhabite and enioy.

Secondly, I note, that Iosua shewed himselfe a skilfull man of Warre, for that in those ancient times he vsed the stratageme of an ambush in taking of Ai; and in that he broke the Armies of the first fiue Kings of the Amorites, which attempted Gibeon, Ios.10.v.9. by surprise. For he marched all night from his camp at Gilgal, and set on them early the next day; when they suspected no enemie at hand: as hee did also at Merom, when he ouerthrew Iabin, and his confederates. After which, making the best profit of his victorie, he assaulted the great Citie of Hazor.

Thirdly, the miracles which God wrought during this warre, were exceeding admirable; as the stay of the Riuer Iordan at the Springs, so as the Armie of Israel
Ios.3.v.13. past it with a drie foote; the fall of Ierico by the sound of the Hornes; the showres of Cap.10.v.11. Haile-stones, which fell vpon the Amorites in their flight from Gibeon, whereby more of them perished, than by the sword of Israel: againe, the arrest of the Sunne in the firmament, whereby the day was so much the more lengthened, as the Israelites had time to execute all those, which fled after the ouerthrow: a wonder of wonders, and a worke onely proper to the all-powerfull God.

Fourthly, out of the paſſage betweene Ioſua and the Gibeonites, the Doctrine of keeping Faith is ſo plainly and excellently taught, as it taketh away all euaſion, it admitteth no diſtinction, nor leaueth open any hole or out-let at all to that cunning perfidiouſneſſe, and horrible deceit of this latter age, called Æquiuocation. For, notwithſtanding that theſe Gibeonites were a people of the Heuites, expreſly and by name, by the commandement of God to be rooted out, and notwithſtanding that they were liers, and deceiuers, and counterfeits, and that they did ouer-reach, and as it were, deride Ioſua, and the Princes of Iſrael, by faining to bee ſent as Embaſſadours from a farre Countrie, in which trauaile their clothes were worne; their bread mouldie, which they auowed to haue beene warme for newneſſe when they firſt ſet out; their barrells and bottles of wine broken; their ſhoes patcht; and their ſacks rent and ragged: Yet Ioſua hauing ſworne vnto them by the Lord God of Iſrael, hee durſt not, though vrged by the murmure of the people, to lay violent handes on them; but hee ſpared both their Liues, and the Cities of their inheritance. Ioſ.9.7. Ioſ.9. from the 5. to the 13. Verſ.

Now if euer man had warrant to breake Faith, and to retract his promiſe made, Ioſua had it. For firſt, the commandement which hee receiued from God to roote out this Nation among the reſt, preceded by farre the peace which hee had granted them. Secondly, he might iuſtly haue put theſe men to the ſword, and haue ſackt their Cities; if there bee any euaſion from a promiſe made, whereof the liuing God is called to witneſſe. For it was not to the Gibeonites that hee gaue peace, becauſe hee knew them to bee a people hated of God. Hee told them, that if they were of the Heuites, it was not in his power to make a league with them. But it was to a ſtrange people that hee gaue faith, and to a Nation which came from farre, who hearing of the wonders which the God of Iſrael had done in Ægypt and ouer Iordan, ſought for peace and protection from his people. Thirdly, the accord, which Iſrael made with theſe craftie Canaanites, was without warrant. For it is written in the ſame place, That the Iſraelites accepted their tale, that is, beleeued what they had ſaid, and counſailed not with the mouth of the Lord. Fourthly, theſe men who were knowne Idolaters, and ſerued thoſe Puppets of the Heathen, men of an Apiſh Religion, as all Worſhippers of Images are, could not challenge the witneſſe of the true God, in whome they beleeued not. I ſay therefore, that if euer man might haue ſerued himſelfe by any euaſion or diſtinction, Ioſua might iuſtly haue done it. For hee needed not in this caſe the helpe of Æquiuocation, or Mentall Reſeruation. For what hee ſware, hee ſware in good Faith; but hee ſware nothing, nor made any promiſe at all to the Gibeonites. And yet, to the end that the faithleſſe ſubtilitie of man ſhould borrow nothing in the future from his example, who knowing well, that the promiſes hee made in the name of God, were made to the liuing God, and not to the dying Man, hee held them firme, and inuiolable, notwithſtanding that they, to whom hee had ſworne it, were worſhippers of the Deuill. Ioſ.9.ver.14.

For it is not, as faithleſſe men take it, that he which ſweareth to a Man, to a Societie, to a State, or to a King, and ſweareth by the name of the liuing Lord, and in his preſence, That this promiſe (if it be broken) is broken to a Man, to a Societie, to a State, or to a Prince; but the promiſe in the name of God made, is broken to God. It is God, that wee therein neglect: wee therein profeſſe that wee feare him not, and that we ſet him at nought and defie him. If hee that without Reſeruation of honour giueth a lie in the preſence of the King, or of his Superiour, doth in point of Honour giue the lie to the King himſelfe, or to his Superiour; how much more doth he breake Faith with God, that giueth Faith in the preſence of God, promiſeth in his name, and makes him a witneſſe of the Couenant made?

Out of doubt, it is a fearefull thing for a Sonne to breake the Promiſe, Will, or Deed of the Father; for a State, or Kingdome, to breake thoſe Contracts which haue beene made in former times, and confirmed by publique faith. For though it were 400. yeeres after Iosua, that Saul, euen out of deuotion, slaughtered some of those people descended of the Gibeonites: yet God who forgat not what the Predecessours and Fore-fathers of Saul & the Israelites had sworne in his name, afflicted the whole Nation with a consuming famine; and could not be appeased, till seuen of Sauls sonnes were deliuered to the Gibeonites grieued, and by them hanged vp.

And certainly, if it be permitted by the helpe of a ridiculous distinction, or by a God-mocking equiuocation, to sweare one thing by the name of the liuing God, and to reserue in silence a contrarie intent: the life of man, the estates of men, the faith of Subiects to Kings, of Seruants to their Masters, of Vassalls to their Lords, of Wiues to their Husbands, and of Children to their Parents, and of all trialls of right, will not onely be made vncertaine, but all the chaines, whereby freemen are tied in the world, be torne asunder. It is by oath (when Kings and Armies cannot passe) that we enter into the Cities of our enemies, and into their Armies: it is by oath that warres take ende, which weapons cannot ende. And what is it or ought it to be that makes an oath thus powerfull, but this; That he that sweareth by the name of God, doth assure others that his words are true, as the Lord of all the World is true whom he calleth for a witnesse, and in whose presence he that taketh the oath hath promised? I am not ignorant of their poore euasions, which play with the seueritie of Gods Commaundements in this kinde: But this indeed is the best answere, That he breakes no faith, that hath none to breake. For whosoeuer hath faith and the feare of God, dares not doe it.

The Christians in the Holie Land when they were at the greatest, and had brought the Caliph of Egypt to pay them tribute, did not only lose it againe, but were soone after beaten out of the Holie Land it selfe: by reason (saith William of Tyre, a reuerend Bishop which wrote that storie) that Almerick the fiftieth King after Godfrey brake faith with the Caliph Elhadech, and his Vicegerent, The Soldan Sanar; who beeing sodainely inuaded by Almerick, drew in the Turke Syracon to their aide: whose Nephew Seladine, after he had made Egypt his owne, beat the Christians out of the Holie Land; neither would the woodden Crosse (the very Crosse, say they that Christ died on) giue them victorie ouer Seladine, when they brought it into the field as their last refuge: seeing they had forsworne themselues in his name, that was crucified thereon. And if it be a direction from the holy Ghost, That hee that speaketh lies, shall be destroied, and that the mouth which vttereth them, slaieth the soule: how much more perilous is it (if any perill be greater than to destroy the soule) to sweare a lie? It was Eugenius the Pope, that perswaded, or rather commanded the King of Hungarie after his great victorie ouer Amurath the Turke, and when the said King had compelled him to peace, the most aduantagious that euer was made for the Christians, to breake his faith, and to prouoke the Turke to renew the warre. And though the said King was farre stronger in the field than euer; yet he lost the battaile with 30000. Christians, and his owne life. But I will stay my hand: For this first volume will not hold the repetition of Gods iudgements vpon faith-breakers; bee it against Infidels, Turkes, or Christians of diuers Religions. Lamentable it is, that the taking of oathes now-a-daies, is rather made a matter of custome than of conscience.

Psal. 5. 6.

Wisd. 1. 11.

It is also very remarkeable; That it pleased God to leaue so many Cities of the Canaanites vnconquered by Israel, to scourge and afflict them, by fore-seeing their Idolatrie, and as it is said in the Scriptures, To bee Thornes in their eies to proue them, and to teach them to make Warre. For these Cities hereafter named did not onely remaine in the Canaanites possession all the time of Iosua; but soone after his death, the Children of Dan were beaten out of the plaine Countries, and enforst to inhabite the Mountaines, and places of hardest accesse. And those of Iuda were not able to bee Masters of their owne Vallies; because, as it is written Iosu. 23.

Iudg. 1. & Iudg. 3. v. 2.

Iudg. 1. v. 34.

ten in the Iudges, The Canaanites had Chariots of yron. And those principall Cities which stood on the Sea-side, adioyning vnto Iuda, were still held by the remainder of the Anakims, or Philistims: as Azzah, Gath, Asdod; out of one of which Cities came Goliath, remembred in Samuel. Iud.1.v.19. Ios.11.v.19. Sam.1.17.4.

Neither did the children of Manasse ouer Iordan expell the Gesshurites, nor the Maachathites: which inhabited the North parts of Basan, afterward Traconites.

Nor the Nepthalims possesse themselues of Beths hemish: nor of Bethanah, but they inforst those Canaanites to pay them tribute. Neither did Asher expell the Zidonians, nor those of Acho, or Acon, Athlab, Achzib; Heblah, Aphike, and Rehob, nor inforce them to tribute. Ios.13.v.13. Iud.1.v.31.

No more could Zabulon enioy Kitron, and Nahalol, but receiued tribute from them. Also the Canaanites dwelt in Gezer among the Ephraims: and among the children of Manasse, on the West of Iordan, the Canaanites held Beths hean, Taenach, Dor, Ibleam, and Meggado; yea Hierusalem it selfe did the Iebusites defend aboue foure hundred yeeres, euen till Dauids time. Ios.16.v.10. Iud.2.v.27.

Now Iosua liued one hundred and ten yeeres, eighteene of which he gouerned Israel, and then changed this life for a better. The time of his rule is not expressed in the Scriptures, which causeth diuers to coniecture diuersly of the continuance. Iosephus giues him fiue and twentie yeeres, Seder Ollam Rabbi the Authors of the Hebrew Chronologie eight and twentie: And Massæus sixe and twentie: Maimonius cited by Massius, fourteene: Ioannes Lucidus, seuenteene: Caietanus, ten: Eusebius giueth him seuen and twentie: and so doth S. Augustine: Melancthon, two and thirtie: Codoman, fiue and twentie. But whereas there passed 480. yeeres from the deliuerance of Israel out of Ægypt, vnto the building of the Temple, it is necessarie that wee allow to Iosua onely eighteene of them; as finding the rest supplied otherwise, which to mee seemes the most likely, and as I thinke, a well approoued opinion.

The same necessitie of retaining precisely 480. yeeres from the departure out of Ægypt vnto the building of the Temple, conuinceth of errour, such as haue inserted yeeres betweene Iosua and Othoniel, of whom Eusebius findes eight yeere, to which Arius Montanus adhereth; and for which hee giueth his reason in his foure and twentieth and last Chapters vpon Iosua: Bunting reckons it nine yeere: Bucholzer and Reusner but one, Codoman twentie, and Nicephorus no lesse than three and thirtie: whereas following the sure direction of these 480. yeeres, there can be no void yeeres found betweene Iosua and Othoniel, vnlesse they be taken out of those eighteen ascribed vnto Iosua by the account alreadie specified. The prayses and acts of Iosua are briefly written in the sixe and fortieth Chapter of Ecclesiasticus, where among many other things it is said of him, Who was there before him like to him, for hee fought the battells of the Lord? Euseb.Præp.Euang.

That he wrote the booke called by this name, it was the opinion of Arius Montanus, because it is said in the last Chapter ver.26. And IOSVA wrote these wordes in the booke of the law of God: which seemeth rather to haue beene meant by the couenant which Iosua made with Israel in Sichem, where they all promised to serue and obey the Lord: which promise Iosua caused to be written in the booke of the Law: and of this opinion were Caietan and Abulensis: Theodoret doth likewise conceiue that the booke of Iosua was collected out of an ancient Volume, intituled Liber Iustorum; remembred by Iosua himselfe, and others, that it was the worke of Samuel: for whereas Montanus groundeth his opinion vpon these wordes of the 26. verse, And IOSVA wrote these wordes, &c. this place hath nothing in it to proue it, for when the people had answered IOSVA; The Lord our God will we serue, and his voice will we obey, it followeth that Iosua made a couenant with the people, and wrote the same in the booke of the Law of God. 1.10.13. 5.last.v.24.v.26

There liued at once with Iosua, Erichthonius in Attica, who taught that Nation to yoke beasts together, thereby to till the ground with more ease and speede: And about the ſame time the fiftie Daughters of Danâus (as it is ſaid) ſlew the fiftie Sonnes of Ægyptus, all but Lynceus who ſucceeded Danâus, if the tale be true. There liued alſo with Ioſua, Phœnix and Cadmus, and neere the end of Ioſuas life, Iupiter is ſaid to haue rauiſhed Europa the Daughter of Phœnix, (afterward marryed to Aſterius King of Creta) and begat on her Minos, Radamanthus, and Sarpedon. But S. Auguſtine reports this rauiſhment to be committed by Xanthus, and yet they are more commonly taken for the Sonnes of Iupiter. But it may be doubted whether Minos was Father to Deucalion, and Deucalion to Idomeneus, who was an old man at the war of Troy, and Sarpedon was in perſon a young or ſtrong man at the ſame Troian warre. And ſo doth Neſtor reckon vp in the Councell of the Greekes, Theſeus and Perithous for men of antiquitie, and of ages paſt: Minos being yet more ancient than any of theſe. But hereof elſewhere.

CHAP. VII.

Of the Tribes of Iſrael, that were planted in the borders of Phœnicia, with ſundrie Stories depending vpon thoſe places.

§. I.

The Proeme to the deſcription of the whole Land of Canaan, with an expoſition of the name of Syria.

THE Storie of the Iudges ought to follow that of Ioſua, after whome the Common-wealth of the Iewes was gouerned by Kings, of which ſo many of them as ruled the tenne Tribes, ſhall be remembred when wee come to the deſcription of Samaria: but becauſe the Land of Canaan, and the borders thereof, were the Stages and Theaters, whereon the greateſt part of the Storie paſt, with that which followeth, hath beene acted, I thinke it very pertinent (for the better vnderſtanding of both) to make a Geographicall deſcription of thoſe Regions: that all things therein performed by the places knowne, may the better bee vnderſtood, and conceiued. To which purpoſe (beſides the addition of the Neighbour Countries) I haue beſtowed on euery Tribe his proper portion: and doe ſhew what Cities and Places of ſtrength, were by the Iewes obtained: and what numbers it pleaſed God to leaue vnconquered: by whom he might correct and ſcourge them, when vngrateful for his many graces, they at ſundry times forgat or neglected the Lord of all power, and adored thoſe deafe and dead Idols of the Heathen. Diuina bonitas (ſaith AVGVSTINE) ideo maximè iraſcitur in hoc ſeculo, ne iraſcatur in futuro: & miſericorditer temporalem adhibet ſeueritatem, ne eternam iuſtè inferat vltionem; The diuine goodneſſe is eſpecially therefore angrie in this world, that it may not be angrie in the world to come, and doth mercifully vſe temporall ſeueritie, that it may not iuſtly bring vpon vs eternall vengeance.

To the Cities heerein deſcribed, I haue added a ſhort Storie of the beginnings and ends of diuers Kingdomes and common-weales: and to helpe my ſelfe herein, I haue

I haue perused diuers of the best Authors vpon this subiect: among whom, because I finde so great disagreement in many particulars, I haue rather in such cases aduentured to follow mine owne reason, than to borrow any one of their olde patternes.

And because Canaan, with Palæstina of the Philistims, and the Lands of Og and Sihon Kings of Basan, and the Arabian Amorites, were but small Prouinces of Syria: it shall be necessarie, first to diuide and bound the generall, and so to descend to this particular, now called the holy Land.

Syrra, now Soria, according to the largest description, and as it was anciently taken, imbraced all those Regions from the Euxine Sea, to the Red Sea: and therefore were the Cappadocians, which looke into Pontus, called Leucosyrians, or white Syrians. But taking it shorter, and from the coast of Cilicia, which is the North border, vnto Idumæa towards the South, Tigris towards the Sunne rising, and the Mediterran Sea Westward: it then containeth besides Babylonia, Chaldæa, Arabia the Desart, and Arabia Petræa, that Region also which the Greekes call Mesopotamia, the Hebrewes Syria, of the two Riuers, to wit, Tigris and Euphrates, for so Aram-Nahairaijm is expounded: also Padan Aram: that is, Iugum Syriæ, because the two Riuers goe along in it as it were in a yoke. Ptol. Asiæ. tab. 4. Ptol. 5.

Edessa, sometime Rages, now Rage, was the Metropolis of this Region of Syria. In Syria taken largely, there were many small Prouinces, as Cœlesyria which the Latines call Syria Cana, because it lay in that fruitfull Valley betweene the Mountaines of Lybanus, and Anti-lybanus, in which the famous Cities of Antioch, Laodicea, Apamea, with many others were seated. Then Damascena or Syria Lybanica, taking name of the Citie Damascus, and the Mountaines of Lybanus, the Regall seate of the Adades, the first Kings of Syria. Adioyning to it was the Prouince of Sophene, or Syria Soba, Choba, or Zobal: ouer which Adadezer commanded in Salomons time. Then Phœnicia and the people Syraphœnices: and lastly Syria Palæstina bordering Ægypt: of which Ptolomie maketh Iudæa also a part: and to that Prouince which Moses calleth Seir and Edom, Pomponius Mela giueth the name of Syria Iudæa. Aurogallas. 1. K. 11. Herod. in Polym. Dion. l. 27. Ptol. Asiæ. tab. 4.

§. II.

Of the bounds of the Land of Canaan, and of the promises touching this Land.

BVt that Land which was anciently Canaan, taketh a part of Phœnicia, and stretcheth from behinde Lybanus to the great Desarts betweene Idumæa and Ægypt: bounded by the Mid-land Sea on the West, and the Mountaines of Hermon; Galaad, and Arnon towards the East: the same Hills which Strabo calleth Traconi or Traconitæ, and Ptolomie Hippus. The name of Canaan it had from Canaan the Sonne of CHAM, & lingua appellata fuit CANAAN; The language was also called CANAAN, saith Montanus: and after Hebræa of the Hebrewes: who tooke name from Heber, the Sonne of Sale, according to S. Augustine. But Arias Montanus not so well allowing of this deriuation, makes it a common name to all those of Noahs Sonnes, which past ouer Euphrates towards the West Sea. For the word Heber, saith hee, is as much as transiens or transmittens, of going or passing ouer. And because the children of Abraham had for a long time no certaine abiding: therefore as he thinks, they were by the Ægyptians called Hebræi, as it were passengers, which is also the opinion of C. Sigonius, and of Eusebius long before them both. It had also the name of Iudæa from Iuda; and then afterwards intituled The holy Land, because therein our Sauiour Christ was borne and buried. Now this part of Syria was againe diuided into foure; namely, into Edom, (otherwise Seir, or Edumæa) Galilee, Samaria, and Iudæa. Galilee is double, the superior called Gentium, and the inferiour: and that Galilee and Iudæa are distinguished, it is plaine in the Euangelists, though both of them belong to Phœnicia. Strab. l. 10. Caleb. f. 62. Euseb. Præp. Euang. l. 7. c. 3. Math. 2. Luke 2. Iohn 4.

Now

Now besides these prouinces of Phœnicia, and Palæstina (both which the Riuer of Iordan boundeth; sauing that Phœnicia stretcheth a little more Easterly towards Damascus) that part also to the East of Iordan, and within the Mountaines of Hermon Gilead and Arnon, otherwise Traconi, fell to the possession of halfe Manasse, Gad, and Ruben, and therefore are accounted a part of Canaan also: aswell because anciently possest by the Amorites, as for that they were conquered and enioyed by the Israelites, which Eastermost parts are againe diuided into Basan or Batanea, into Gilead, Moab, Midian, Ammon, and the Territories of the Machati, Gessuri, Argobe, Hus. They are knowne to the later Cosmographers by the name of Arabia in generall: and by the names of Traconitis, Pieria, Batanea, &c. of which I will speake in their proper places.

But where Moses describeth the Land of Canaan in the tenth of Genesis, he maketh no mention of the later Prouinces, which fell to Manasse, Gad, and Ruben, for these be his words, Then the border of the Canaanites was from Zidon, as thou commest to Gerar vntill Azzah (which is Gaza) and this was the length of the Countrey North and South: then it followeth in the Text; And as thou goest vnto Sodome and Gomorah, and Admah, and Seboiim, euen vnto Lasha: by which words Moses setteth
Deut.11.24. downe the breadth, to wit, from thd Dead Sea to the Mediterran. But in Deuteronomie it seemeth to be farre more large: For it is therein written; All the places whereon the soale of your feet shall tread, shall be yours: your coast shall be from the wildernesse and from Libanon, and from the Riuer Perah, vnto the vttermost Sea. Now for the length of the Countrie North and South, this description agreeth with the former: onely Libanon is put for Zidon: and the Wildernesse for Gerar and Azzah, which make no difference: but for the breadth and extent East and West, if Perah bee taken for Euphrates: then the Land promised stretcheth it selfe both ouer Arabia Petræa, and the Desart as farre as the border of Babylon: which the Israelites neuer possest: nor at any time did so much as inuade or attempt. And therefore Vadianus doth conceiue that by the Riuer Perah, was meant Iordan, and not Euphrates: taking light from this 23.v.4. place of IOSVA: Behold, I haue diuided vnto you by lot these Nations, that remaine to be an inheritance according to your Tribes: from Iordan with all the Nations that I haue destroied, euen vnto the great Sea Westward.

Vadian. Epitom. trium terræ partium. cap. Palæstina. And though it bee true that Dauid greatly enlarged the Territorie of the holy Land: yet as Vadianus well noteth, if Perah in the former place be taken for Euphrates, then was it put per gentes in amicitiam receptas. For Dauid did not at any time enter so farre to the East as Assyria, or Babylonia. Neither doth the not possessing of all these Countries giue aduantage to those that would make any irreligious cauill, as touching the promise of God to the Israelites vnperformed: For when both their Kings, Magistrates, and People, fell from his worship and seruice, it pleased him not onely to inclose them within that Territorie, which was for so many people exceeding narrow; but therein and elsewhere to subiect them vnto those Idolatrous Nations, whose false and foolish Gods themselues also serued and obeyed. And sure the promise by which the Hebrewes claimed the inheritance of Canaan, and the lasting inioying thereof, to wit, as long as the heauens were aboue the earth,
Deut.11.v.21. was tied to those conditions, both in the Verses preceding, and subsequent; which the Israelites neuer performed. And therefore they could not hope for other than all mankinde could or can expect; who know that all sorts of comforts from the mercifull goodnesse of God looked for, aswell in this life as after it, are no longer to bee attended, than while wee persеuer in his loue, seruice, and obedience. So in the eighth Verse of the eleuenth of Deuteronomie, the keeping of Gods Commandements was a con-
Deut.11. dition ioyned to the prosperity of Israel. For therein it is written; Therefore shall yee keepe all the Commandements which I command you this day: that ye may be strong, and goe in, and possesse the Land, whither yee goe to possesse it. Also that you may prolong your dayes in the Land which the Lord sware vnto your Fathers, &c.

The like condition was also annexed to the enioying of the land conquered, and the the poſſeſſion thereof, ſo long as the heauens were aboue the earth. For if yee keepe diligently, ſaith he, all theſe commandements, which I command you to doe, that is, to loue the Lord your God, &c. then will the Lord caſt out all theſe Nations before you, and yee ſhall poſſeſſe great Nations, and mightier than you. And heere, though it bee manifeſt, that by reaſon of the breach of Gods Commandements, and their falling away from the worſhip of his all-powerfull Majeſtie, to the Idolatrie of the Heathen, the conditionall promiſes of God were abſolutely void, as depending vpon obedience vnperformed: yet I cannot miſlike that expoſition of Melanćthon: For, ſaith he, oſtendit promiſſionem præcipuam non eſſe de hoc Politico regno; He ſheweth that his chiefe promiſe is not of a ciuill Kingdome. To which agrees that anſwere, which S. Hierome made to a certaine Heretique in his Epiſtle ad Dardanum, who accuſed S. Hierome that he ouerthrew the reputation of the Iewes Storie, and brought the truth thereof in queſtion, by drawing it altogether into an Allegorie, and ad illam duntaxat viuentium terram quæ in cœlis eſt; (that is) Onely to that Land of the liuing which is in Heauen. Quoniam tota Iudæorum Regio adeo anguſta ſit ambitu, vt vix longitudinem habeat 160. milliarium, latitudinem verò 40. & in his etiam regiones, loca, vrbes & oppida ſunt plurima, nunquàm à Iudæis occupata, ſed tantum diuina pollicitatione promiſſa; Becauſe the whole Countrie of the Iewes is ſo narrow in compaſſe, that it ſcarce hath 160. miles in length, and 40. miles in breadth, and in theſe are Countries, Places, Cities, and many Townes, which the Iewes neuer poſſeſt, but were only granted by diuine promiſe. In like manner the ſame Father ſpeaketh vpon Eſay touching the bleſſings promiſed vnto Hieruſalem: where hee hath theſe words: De quo diſcimus Hieruſalem nequaquam in Palæſtinæ Regione petendam: quæ totius Prouinciæ deterrima eſt: & ſaxoſis montibus aſperatur, & penuriam patitur ſitis: ita vt cœleſtibus vtatur pluuijs, & raritatem fontium ciſternarum extructione ſoletur: ſed in Dei manibus ad quam dicitur feſtinauerunt ſtructores tui; From whence, ſaith he, we learne, that Hieruſalem is not to be ſought in that Region of Palæſtina, which is the worſt of the whole Prouince, and ragged with craggie Mountaines, and ſuffereth the penurie of thirſt: ſo as it preſerueth raine water, and ſupplieth the ſcarcitie of Wells by building Ceſternes, but this Hieruſalem is in Gods hands, to which it is ſaid, Thy builders haue haſtened, ſo farre S. Hierome, where alſo to preuent miſtaking, hee thus expoundeth himſelfe. Neque hoc dico in ſuggillationem terræ Iudææ, vt Hæreticus Sycophanta mentitur: aut quo auferam hiſtoriæ veritatem: quæ fundamentum eſt intelligentiæ ſpiritualis, ſed vt decutiam ſupercilium Iudæorum: qui Synagogæ anguſtias latitudini Eccleſiæ præferunt. Si enim occidentem tantum ſequuntur literam, & non ſpiritum viuificantem: oſtendant terram promiſſionis lacte & melle manantem; Neither (ſaith he) ſay I this to diſgrace the land of Iudæa (as the Hereticall Sycophant doth belie me) or to take away the truth of the Hiſtorie, which is the foundation of ſpirituall vnderſtanding, but to beate downe the pride of the Iewes: which enlarge the ſtraits of the Synagogue farther then the breadth of the Church: for if they follow onely the killing letter, and not the quickening ſpirit, let them ſhew the Land of promiſe, flowing with milke and honnie.

Deut. 11.

Cap. 49. 14.

By this it may alſo be gathered, how ſoeuer it be vnlikely (ſeeing the Weſt-bound in the place, Deut. 11. 24. had his truth in the literall ſenſe, that Euphrates or Perath, which is made the Eaſt bound, ſhould be taken only in a ſpirituall ſenſe) yet neuertheleſſe that Hieroms opinion inclineth to this, as if this Perath were not to be vnderſtood for Euphrates: and that the promiſe it ſelfe was neuer ſo large: much leſſe the plantation and conqueſt of Iſrael.

And now for a more particular deſcription of this Holy Land, becauſe Aſher, Nephtalim, and Zabulon, held the Northermoſt part, and were ſeated in Phœnicia, I will begin with theſe three, taking Aſher for the firſt: of which Tribe yet before I ſpeake, I muſt admoniſh the Reader touching the names of places in this, and the other Tribes to be mentioned, that he remember that many names by reaſon of the diuers fancies of Tranſlators, are diuerſly expreſſed, ſo that to the vnskilfull they may ſeeme diuers, when they are one and the ſame: the reaſon of this diuerſitie (as by thoſe learned in the Hebrew I am taught) is, partly becauſe the ancient Editions tions of the Hebrew want vowels, the old Translators imagined other vowels than now the Hebrew Editions haue; and partly because the Ancient expressed or omitted diuers consonants, otherwise than the latter thinke fit.

§. III.

THE TRIBE OF ASHER.

†. I.

The bounds of the Tribe of Asher.

THe Asherites descended of Asher the Sonne of Iacob by Zelpha, the hand-maid of Lea, were increased while they abode in Ægypt, to the number of 41500. and odde persons, all men aboue twentie yeeres of age, and able to beare armes at the time, when they were mustered by Moses at Mount Sinai: all which number perishing in the Desarts, there remained of their issues, besides women and children 53400. bodies fit for the warres: which past the Riuer of Arnon, into the Plaines of Moab, and after the Conquest of Canaan, had for their portion that part of Phœnicia, from Zidon and the fields of Libanus, vnto Ptolomais Acon alongst the Sea-coast: containing thirtie English miles or thereabout: and from the Mid-land sea to the East border some twelue miles: though Antoninus makes it somewhat larger. This part of Canaan was very fruitfull, abounding in Wine, Oile, and Wheate, besides the Balsamum, with other pleasant and profitable commodities: according to that Prophecie, ASSER pinguis panis: concerning Asser, his bread shall be fat: And he shall giue pleasures for a King.

†. II.

Of Zidon.

THe first Citie seated on the North border of the Territorie of Asser, was Zidon, which Iosua calleth the great Zidon, both for strength and magnitude. The Greekes and Q. Curtius make Agenor the founder thereof: and Iustine deriues the name from the abundance of Fish found on those shores: whereof it hath been called Zidona. But that it was farre more ancient, Moses, Iosua, and Iosephus witnesse, the same being founded by Zidon the eldest of Canaans Sonnes: and so strong it was in Iosuas time, as neither did himselfe attempt it, neither could the Asserites, or any of their Successors master it: but it continued all the time of the Iudges and Kings, euen vnto the comming of Christ, a Citie interchangeably gouerned, by their owne Princes or other Magistrates: though according to the warnings and threats of the Prophets Esay, Hieremie, Ezekiel, and Zacharie, it was often afflicted both by the enemies sword, and by the pestilence.

Zidon is seated on the very wash of the Phœnician Sea, which is a part of the Mediterran or Mid-land Sea. It hath to the North the Citie of Berythus, and the Riuer Leontis: and to the South Sarepta, or Sarphat: which standeth betweene it and Tyre, the distance betweene which two great and famous Cities, to wit, Zidon and Tyre, is fourteene thousand paces, saith Seigelerus: but Vadianus makes it two hundred furlongs, and so doth Weissinburie in his description of the holy Land, and both from Strabo: which two hundred furlongs make fiue and twentie miles. This difference of diſtance as well betweene theſe two knowne Cities, as all the reſt, make it ouer difficult to deuiſe any new ſcale to the Map, and deſcription of the holy Land.

What Kings it had till Agenors time there is no memorie: The Storie which Zeno the Philoſopher, who was a Zidonian, wrote thereof, being by time conſumed and loſt. It ſeemeth to bee more ancient than Tyre: which was alſo built by the Zidonians. For as Strabo noteth, Homer ſpeaking of Zidon, neglecteth the memorie of Tyre: becauſe it was but a member of Zidon, and a Citie ſubiect to the Kings thereof: though it bee true that in after-times it contended with Zidon for Primacie, and became farre more renowned, opulent, and ſtrong: From Zidon had Salomon and Zorobabel, their principall workmen, both in Timber and Stone; for the building of the Temple. For as it flouriſhed in all ſorts of learning, ſo did it in all other Mechanicall Arts and Trades: the Prophet Zacharie calling them the wiſe Zidonians. The Citie was both by nature and art exceeding ſtrong, hauing a Caſtle or Citadell on the North-ſide, ſtanding vpon an vnacceſſible Rocke, and compaſſed by the Sea, which after the Citizens became Chriſtians, was held and defended by the Knights of the Dutch Order: and another Caſtle it hath on the South ſide by the Port of Ægypt, which the Templers guarded. It alſo ſent many other Colonies beſides that of Tyre, into places remote: as vnto Thebes, and Sephyra, Cities of Bœotia in Greece.

Strabo and Plinie giue the Zidonians the inuention of* Glaſſe, which they vſed to make of thoſe ſands which are taken out of the Riuer Belus, falling into the Mediterran Sea, neere Ptolomais or Acon: and from whence the Venetians fetch the matter of thoſe cleare Glaſſes which they make at Murana: of which S. Hierome and Plinie. Ioſ.*11.8. as it ſeems, becauſe theſe Fornaces were wher ther was ſtore of water, either for the mouing of the bellows by the force of the water, or for other neceſſarie vſes. But there are others that take them for ſalt pits, and other againe for hot baths.

They were in Religion Idolaters (as the reſt of the Canaanites) worſhippers of Baal and Aſtaroth: which Idols though common to the other of the iſſue of Canaan (as Pineda gathers out of 1. Sam. 31. 10. and *Iud.*10.6.) yet eſpecially and peculiarly were accounted the Gods of the Zidonians: as appeares 1. Kings 11.5. in the ſtorie of Salomons Idolatrie: where Aſtaroth is called the God of the Zidonians: and 1. *Reg.*16.33. in the ſtorie of Achab, the chiefe worſhipper of Baal, where it is ſaid that hee marrying Iezabel the Daughter of the King of the Zidonians, worſhipped their Baal. Diuers Baals and diuers Aſtaroths in their Idolatries they acknowledged: as it appeares by the plurall names of Baalim and Aſtaroth, 1. *Sam.*12.10. and elſewhere: for euen the name Aſtaroth, as I am informed by a skilfull Hebritian, is plurall: the ſingular being Aſtoreth: whence *Iud.*2.13. the Septuagint reade ἐλάτρευσαν τοῖς ἀσταρτοις: They worſhipped the Aſtarties. The occaſion of this their multiplying of their Baals, and Aſtoreths, may be diuerſly vnderſtood: either in reſpect of the diuerſitie of the formes of the Images, or of the worſhip in diuers places, or of the ſtories depending vpon them: which (as fables vſe to bee) were doubtleſſe in diuers Cities diuers. Auguſtine quæſt.16. in Iudg. thinkes Baal and Aſtarte to bee Iupiter and Iuno. For the Carthaginians (which were Tyrians) call Iuno by ſome ſuch name as Aſtarte. Tullie, lib. 3. de Nat. Deorum, making diuers Goddeſſes of the name of Venus, expounds the fourth to be Aſtarte: whom hee makes to bee borne of Tyrus and Syria, and to haue beene the wife of Adonis: as alſo Macrob. 2. *Saturn.cap.*21. ſaies that Adonis was with great veneration commonly worſhipped of the Aſſyrians: and Hierome vpon *Ezek.*8.44. notes that Thammuz (whom there the Idolatrous women are noted to bewaile) is the name of Adonis among the Syrians. So that it may ſeeme that in the worſhip of Aſtarte, or Venus, they did bewaile her huſband Adonis: as alſo the Gracians did in their ſongs of ADONIS. Mourne for ADONIS the faire, dead is ADONIS the faire. Howbeit others in that place of Ezekiel not without good probabilitie, expound the mourning for Thammuz, to be the mourning for Oſiris in the ſacrifices of Iſis: whoſe loſſe of her huſband Oſiris, was as famous in the Ægyptian Idolatrie, as with the Gracians, Venus loſſe of Adonis. And to this agreeth that which Plutarch hath, de Iſide & Oſiride; that Oſiris with the Ægyptians is called Ammuz: which word may ſeeme

The forme of Aſtoreth (or Aſtarte) ſeemeth to haue beene a ſheepe, for Deut. 7.13. the word in the plurall number ſignifieth ſheep: and this may confirme Auguſtins opinion, that Aſtarte was Iuno: for the forme of her husband Iupiter Hammon was a Ramme. χλαίνη χαλὸν Ἄδωνιν.

But howſoeuer theſe Zidonians were thus anciently ſoſtered with the milke of Idolatrie: yet they were more apt to receiue the Doctrine and Goſpell of Chriſt after his Aſcenſion, than the Iewes: who had beene taught by Moſes, and the Prophets ſo many yeeres, whereof our Sauiour

But in the yeere of our Redemption 636. it fell into the hands of the Saracens: and continued in their poſſeſſion till Baldwinus the firſt, then King of Hieruſalem, in the yeere 1111. by the helpe of the Danes and Norwaies, who came with a Fleete to viſite the holy Land, and tooke Port at Ioppa, it was againe recouered, the commaundement thereof being giuen to Euſtace Gremer, a Noble man of that Countrie. And againe in the yeere 1250. it was reedified and ſtrengthned by Lodowicke the French King: while hee ſpent foure yeere in the Warre of the holy Land. Of Sarepta, with a briefe Hiſtorie of Tyre in the ſame coaſt.

Sarepta, or after the Hebrew, Sarphath, is the next Citie Southward from Zidon, betweene it and the Riuer called Naar, or Fons hortorum Libani (of which more hereafter) ſtanding in the way towards Tyre, a Citie very famous for the excellent Wine growing neere it: of which Sidonius.

Vina mihi non ſunt Gazetica, Chia, Falerna,
Quæq; Sareptano palmite miſſa bibas.

I haue no wine of Gaza, nor Falerna wine,
Nor any for thy drinking of Sarepta's vine.

This Citie had alſo a Biſhop of the Dioceſſe of Tyre: after it came to the Saracens and Turkes, as the reſt: and is now called Saphet, ſaith Poſtellus.

Not farre from Sarepta was ſituate that ſometime famous Citie of Tyre, whoſe fleets of ſhips commanded, and gaue the law ouer all the Mediterran Sea, and the borders thereof: during which time of greatneſſe and power, the Tyrians erected Vtica, Leptis, and Carthage in Affrica, of which VIRGIL. Vrbs antiqua fuit Tyrij tenuere Coloni Carthago. And Carthage was therefore called Punica quaſi Phœnicum, a Colonie of the Phœnicians. In Spaine they founded Gades, now Caliz. In Italie, Nola: in Aſia the leſſe, Dromos Achillis, which Citie the Scholiaſt of Apollonius placeth neere the Riuer Phyllis, in Bithynia.

It had anciently the name of Zor, or Tzor; and ſo it is written in Ioſua the 19. taking name from the ſituation; becauſe built on a high Rocke, ſharpe at one end. The Latines, as it ſeemes, knew it by the name of Sarra; for Virgil calleth the purple of Tyre, oſtrum Sarranum, by which name Iuuenal and Silius remember it. The Zidonians built it vpon a high Hill, whereof many ruines remaine to this day; the place being ſtill knowne by the name of the ancient Tyre: and becauſe it was a Colonie of the Zidonians, the Prophet Eſay calleth it the Daughter of Zidon; which Trogus alſo confirmeth, though Beroſus by affinitie of name makes Thiras the Sonne of Iaphet to be the Parent thereof: and though no doubt it was very ancient (for ſo much the Prophet Eſay alſo witneſſeth, Is not this your glorious Citie whoſe antiquitie is of ancient daies?) daies:) yet, that Thiras the sonne of Iaphet set himselfe in the bosome of the Cananites who built Zidon, and peopled all that Region: I see nothing to perswade mee.

But that new Tyre in after-times so renowned, seemeth to bee the worke of Agenor: and of this opinion was Curtius: and Iosephus, and Eusebius make this Citie elder than Salomons Temple 240. yeeres: Cedrenus 361. who also addeth that Tyria the Wife of Agenor gaue it her name: but of Agenor I will speake more at large in the storie of their Kings. Iustin. l. 18. Curt. l. 4. Euseb. in Chron. Iosephus lib. 8. cap. 2. Cedren. pa. 17.

For strength and for the commoditie of the harbour, and the better to receiue Trade from all places, it was in this new erection founded in an Iland, 700. paces from the continent: and therefore Ezekiel placeth it in the middest of the Sea, as some reade, or as others in the inner-most part of the Sea, whence hee calleth it situate at the entrie of the Sea, as also the same Prophet calleth it the Mart of the people for many Iles: and ESAY a Mart of the Nations: and so Proude, Wealthie, and Magnificent was this Citie, as the Prophet Esay calleth the Merchants thereof Princes, and their Chapmen the Nobles of the world. Ezek. 28. 2. 27. vers 3. Esai. 23. 3. 27. 8.

It excelled both in learning, and in manu-facture: especially in the making and dying of Purple, and Scarlet-cloth: which, saith Iulius Pollux, was first found out by Hercules Dogge, who passing alongst the Sea-coast, and eating of the Fish Conchilis or Purpura: the haire of his lips became of that colour. It worshipped the same Idolls that Zidon did: sauing that Hercules became their Patron in after-times. For Alexander Macedon, when the Tyrians presented him with a crowne of gold, and other gifts, desiring to remaine his friends and allies, answered them, that he had vowed a sacrifice to Hercules, the Defender of their Citie: and the Ancestor of the Macedonians Kings: and must therefore enter it. Whereupon they sent him word, that Hercules his Temple was in the Mountaine of old Tyre: where he might performe that ceremonie: but this auailed not. For Alexander was not so superstitious, as ambitious, hee desired to enter the Towne, which being denied, he as one whom no perill could feare, nor labour wearie, gathered together as many ships as he could; and brought from Libanus so great a number of Cedars, and so many waightie Stones, from the old Citie of Tyre adioyning, as notwithstanding that his materialls were often washt away with the strength of the Sea, and the Tides, yet he neuer rested, till hee had made a foote passage from the Continent to the Iland: and hauing once approched their Walls, hee ouer-topt them with Turrets of wood, and other frames: from whence (hauing filled the body of force with the violent mouing Spirit of resolution) he became Lord thereof, putting all to the sword that resisted, after which he caused 2000. more to bee hung vp in a ranke all alongst the Sea-shore: which exequution vpon cold bloud hee performed (as some Authors affirme) vpon the issues of those slaues which had formerly slaine all their Masters, taking their Wiues, Children, Riches, and power of Gouernement to themselues. This victorie of Alexander ouer the Tyrians, Iosephus remembreth: and how Sanaballat reuolted from Darius, and came to Alexander with 8000. Souldiers: who was the last Satrapa or Prouinciall Gouernour, which Darius seated in Samaria: the same who hauing married his Daughter to Manesse, brother to Iaddus the high Priest of Hierusalem, obtained of Alexander that a Temple might bee built on the Mountaines Garizim ouer Samaria: that the forces of the Iewes being diuided, Alexander might the better hold them in obedience. The Honour of which Priesthood he bestowed on his sonne-in-law Manasse, whom the Iewes oppugned, for that he had married out of their Tribes, and with a Gentile: but while Alexander besieged Gaza, Sanaballat, whom Guil. Tyrius calleth Sanabula, died. Iosep. ant. Iude. l. 11. c. 8. De. bell sacr. l. 13. c. 4.

Long before this desolation of Tyre, by the crueltie of Alexander, it was attempted by Salmanasser the Assyrian King: when the growing pride of the Assyrians, after that they had conquered the ten Tribes, with the rest of Syria, became enuious of the beautie, riches, and power of that Citie. Hee besieged it both on the Land-side, and with three-score ships of Warre held the Port: to the end that neither any victualls nor any supply of men might enter it: but the Tyrians with twelue saile scattered that fleete, and tooke 500. prisoners of the Assyrians: notwithstanding, the Assyrian continued his resolution and lay before it by his Lieutenants fiue yeeres, but with ill successe. And this siege Menander Ephesius, cited by Iosephus, made report of in his Chronicles, as hee found the Storie among the Annalls of the Tyrians (which the said Menander conuerted into Greeke) adding that Elulæus, whom Tyrius calleth Helisæus, was then King of Tyre, hauing gouerned the same sixe and twentie yeeres. Soone after this repulse of Salmanassar, and about 200. yeeres before the victorie of Alexander, Nabuchodonosor at such time as hee destroyed Hierusalem with the Temple, came before this Citie: who indeed gaue to Alexander the example of that despairefull worke, of ioyning it to the Continent. For Nabuchodonosor had formerly done it: though by the diligence of the Citizens, and the strength of the Sea, the same cawsey and passage was againe broken downe, and demolished.

Ioseph. Ant. lib. 9. cap. 15.

Against Nabuchodonosor, for many yeeres, the Tyrians defended themselues: for so long did these Babylonians continue before it, As euery head was made bald, and euery shoulder made bare, saith Ezekiel, who with the Prophet Esay had manifestly foretold the destruction of this proude place. In the end and after thirteene yeeres siege or more, the Tyrians despoiled of all their hopes, and remembring ouer-late the predictions and threatnings of Gods Prophets, hauing prepared a conuenient number of ships, abandoned their Citie, transporting with themselues the ablest of all that remained; and with their wiues, children, and portable riches sailed thence into Cyprus, Carthage, and other Maritimate Cities of their Tributaries, or Confederates: so as the Babylonians finding nothing therein, either to satisfie so many labours and perills, or any person vpon whom to auenge themselues for the losse of so many bodies in that Warre: It pleased God in recompence thereof (who strengthened this resolution, as in a worke of his owne) to make Nabuchodonosor victorious ouer the Ægyptians: and gaue him that Kingdome and the spoile thereof, as it were in wages for his Armie. Whereupon Saint Hierome noteth, that God leaueth not the good deeds of the Heathen vnrewarded: who though they cannot hope by any laudable worldly action, to attaine vnto that eternall happinesse reserued for his Seruants and Saints: yet such is the boundlesse goodnesse of God, as he often repaieth them with many worldly gifts and temporall blessings.

Now of this enterprise of Nabuchodonosors against Tyre, prophane Historians haue not beene silent. For both Diocles, and Philostratus (as Iosephus citeth them) the one in his second Booke, the other in his Phœnician Histories remember it.

Iosep. ant. l. 10. c. 13.

After these two great Vastations by the Kings of Babylon and Macedon: this Citie of Tyre repaired and recouered it selfe againe: and continued in great glorie about 300. yeeres, euen to the comming of our Sauiour Christ: and after him flourished in the Christian Faith neere 600. yeeres: the Archbishop whereof gaue place to none but to the Patriarke of Hierusalem only: who within his owne Dioceese had fourteene great Cities, with their Bishops and Suffragans: namely Caipha, otherwise Porphiria, Acon or Ptolomais, Sarepta, Zidon, Cæsarea Philippi, Berytus, Byblus, Botrys, Tripolis, Orthosia, Archis, Aradus, Antaradus (or Tortosa) and Maraclea. But in the yeere 636. it was with the rest of that beautifull Region of Phœnicia and Palæstina, subiected to the cruell and faithlesse Saracen. Vnder the burthen and yoke of whose tyrannie it suffered with the other Palestine Cities 488. yeeres.

Gul. Tyr. bell. sac.

In the yeere 1112. it was attempted by Baldwine King of Hierusalem; but in vaine: yet in the yeere 1124. by Guaremonde, Patriarke of Hierusalem, Vicegerent to Baldwine the second, with the assistance of the Venetians, and their fleete of Gallies, it was againe recouered, and subiected to the Kings of Hierusalem, and so it remained 165. yeeres.

Gul. Tyr. 11. Bell. sacr. 17.

Finally, in the yeere 1189. Saladine hauing first taken Hierusalem, remoued his whole Armie and sate downe before Tyre: drawing his fleete of ships and Gallies from from Alexandria into the port, this Citie as then onely remaining in the Chriſtian power.

The citizens finding themſelues reduced into great famine, and many other miſeries, they at once with certaine rafters of timber, fiered, burnt, and brake the Saracens fleete, and ſallying out reſoluedly vpon his armie, ſlew ſo great numbers of them, and followed their victorie with ſuch furie, as that the Saracens forſaking their Trenches and Tents, remoued in great diſorder and diſhonour. Two yeeres after which victorie the bodie of that famous Fredericke Barbaroſſa (who by the lamentable accident of following the Chriſtians enemies ouer a Riuer vnfoordable, periſhed by the weight of his armor therein) was brought and interred in the Cathedrall church of Tyre, neere vnto that glorious Sepulchre of Origen, garniſhed and grauen with guilt pillars of Marble, 940. yeeres before therein buried: but in the yeere 1289. the Saracens againe attempted it, and carried it, and it now remaineth ſubiect to the Turks.

THe third Citie alongſt the coaſt of the Sea, which the Aſſerites could not obtaine, on the South bound of Aſſer was Acho, which was the ancient name thereof after Hierome, though other good Authors affirme that it tooke name from Acon the brother of Ptolomie. Plinie calleth it Ace: and otherwiſe the Colonie of Claudius. And though for the credit of S. Georges killing the Dragon, I leaue euery man to his owne beliefe: yet I cannot but thinke, that if the Kings of England had not ſome probable record of that his memorable act, among many others: it was ſtrange that the Order full of Honour, which Edward the third founded, and which his Succeſſours Roially haue continued, ſhould haue borne his name, ſeeing the world had not that ſcarcitie of Saints in thoſe dayes, as that the Engliſh were driuen to make ſuch an erection vpon a Fable, or Perſon fained. †. VII.

Of Thoron, Giſcala, and ſome other places.

FArther into the Land towards Iordan, was ſeated the Caſtle of Thoron, which Hugo de Sancto Abdemare built on the Eaſter-moſt Hills of Tyre, in the yeere 1107. thereby to reſtraine the excurſions of the Saracens, while they held Tyre againſt the Chriſtians: the place adioyning being very fruitfull, and exceeding pleaſant. From this Caſtle the Lords of Thoron, famous in the Storie of the Warres for the recouerie of the Holy Land, deriue their names, and take their Nobilitie. It had in it a curious Chappell, dedicated to the bleſſed Virgin, in which Humphrey of Thoron, Conſtable to Baldwine the third, King of Hieruſalem, lieth buried: There were fiue Caſtles beſides this within the Territorie of Aſſer: whereof foure are ſeated almoſt of equall diſtance from each other: to wit, Caſtrum Lamperti, Montfort, Indin (or Saron) Caſtrum Regium, and Belfort: The firſt neere the Sea vnder the Hills of Saron: the next three, to wit, Indin, Montfort, and Regium, ſtand more within the Land, and belonged to the Brother-hood and Fellowſhip of the Teutonici, or Dutch Knights (by which they defended themſelues, and gaue ſuccour to other Chriſtians at ſuch time as the Saracens poſſeſt the beſt part of the vpper Galilee) the chiefe of which Order was in Ptolomais Acon. The firſt Fortreſſe was for beautie and ſtrength called Belfort, ſeated in the high ground vpon the Riuer Naar, neere the Citie Rama: of which in this Tribe *Ioſ.*19.29. for which the Vulgar reades Horma: making the article a part of the word, and miſtaking the vowells: from the ſiege of this Caſtle of Belfort, the great Saladine King of Syria and Ægypt, was by the Chriſtians Armie raiſed, and with great loſſe and diſhonour repulſed. Herold.l.2.c.4. Continuation is Bell. ſac.

To the Eaſt of Belfort, is the ſtrong Citie of Alab (or Achlab) which S. Hierome calleth Chalab, one of thoſe that defended themſelues againſt Aſſer, as Roob (or Rechob) not farre thence did.

Towards the South from Roob they place Gabala (which Herod, ſurnamed the Aſcalonite rebuilt) making it of the Territorie of Chabol, Quad Syrorum lingua diſſipicere ſignificat (ſaith Weiſſenburg) ſo called, becauſe Hiram of Tyre was ill pleaſed with thoſe twentie Cities, ſeated hereabout, which Salomon preſented vnto him in recompence of thoſe prouiſions ſent him for the building of the Temple. Others thinke this Chabol or Cabul, containing a circuit of thoſe twentie Cities giuen to Hiram, to haue beene without the compaſſe of the holy Land: though bordering Aſher on the North ſide: as it is ſaid, 1. *Reg.*9.11. that they were in Regione limitis: that is, in limite Regionis, in the border of the Countrie: for it was not lawfull, ſay they, to giue to ſtrangers any part of the poſſeſſions allotted to the Iſraelites: howſoeuer, that af- *Ioſep.ant.*13.21. & 15.10. Ian. annot. in 1.*Reg.*9.11.

ter Hiram had refused them, they were peopled by the Israelites, it appeares 2. Chron. 8. 14. And it seemes they were conquered by Dauid from the Syri Rechobæi, whose Citie Roob, or Rechob, was in these parts.

2. Sam. 10. 6.

Almost of equall distance from the Castle of Thoron, they place the Cities of Giscala, and Gadara: of which Gadara is rather to be placed ouer Iordan: Giscala was made famous by Iohn the Sonne of Leui, who from a meane estate gathering together foure hundred Theeues, greatly troubled all the vpper Galilee: at such time as the Romans attempted the conquest of Iudea: by whose practice Iosephus, who then commanded in the vpper Galilee, was greatly indangered: whereof himselfe hath written at large, in his second Booke of those Warres. This Iohn betraying in all hee could the Citie of Giscala (whereof he was native) to the Roman State: and finding a resistance in the Citie, gaue opportunitie, during the contention, to the Tyrians and Gadarims, to surprize it: who at the same time forst it, and burnt it to the ground: but being by Iosephus authoritie rebuilt, it was afterward rendred to Titus by composition. They finde also the Cities of Cana Maior, and * Cades: (or Cedessa) of the first was that Syro-phœnician, whose Daughter Christ deliuered of the euill Spirit. Neere the other, they say, it was that Ionathas Machabæus ouer-threw the Armie of Demetrius.

There are besides these forenamed Cities within the Tribe of Asser, diuers others: as on the South border, and neere the Sea, Messall or Misheall: within the Land [a] Besara, [b] Bethdagon, and Bethemec, standing on the South border betweene Asher and Zabulon: on the North side ioyning to Syro-phœnicia, is the Citie of Hethalon, or Chethlon, the vtmost of the holy Land that way: vnder which towards the Sea is Chali, and then [c] Enoch supposed to bee built by Cain, and named of his Sonne Enoch, but without probabilitie, as I haue formerly proued: there are others also besides these, as Ammon or Chammon, of which Ios. 19. 28. where also wee reade of Nebiel, Rama, Alamelec, and Beton: the Cities of Alcath, or Chelcath, Habdon, and Rechob, and Misheal, which we haue already mentioned, were by the Asserites giuen to the Leuites. Of others held by the Canaanites, mention is made, Iudg. 1. 30. to which out of Iosua wee may adde Ebron, Amhad, and others, on which no storie dependeth; and therefore I will not pester the description with them.

Of the Riuers and Mountaines of Asser.

THe riuers to the North of Asser, are Adonis, afterward Canis, to which Ziegler ioyneth Lycus, Ptolomie, Leontis: both which fall into the Sea neere Berytus: which Riuer of Leontis, Montanus drawes neere vnto Zidon: finding his head notwithstanding, where Ptolomie doth, betweene Zidon and Tyre. It hath also a Riuer called fons hortorum Libani, which Adrichome out of Brochard intituleth Eleutherus: for which hee also citeth Plinie; and the first of Machabees the 11. Chap. but neither of those authorities proue Eleutherus to be in Asser: for this Riuer falleth into the Sea at the Ile of Aradus: not farre from Balanea, witnesse Ptolomie: and therefore Pinetus calleth it Valania, and Postellus Velana: which Riuer boundeth Phœnicia on the North side: to which Strabo also agreeth: but this principall Riuer of Asser, Arias Montanus calleth Gabatus. Christianus Schrot out of the mouth and Papers of Peter Laicstan (which Laicstan in this our age both viewed and described the Holy Land) calleth the maine Riuer Fons hortorum Libani: and one of the streames which runneth into it from the North side, Naar, and another from the South-west, Chabul: of the Citie adioyning of the same name: for Eleutherus it cannot be. There is also another Riuer described by Adrichome, named Iepthael, which I finde in no other Author, and for which he citeth the nineteenth of Iosua, but the word [d] Ghe which is added there to Iepthael, is not taken for a Riuer, but for a Valley: and for a Valley the the Vulgar, the Geneua, and Arius Montanus turne it. There is also found in Asser, the Riuer of Belus, remembred by Iosephus and Tacitus, which is also called Pagidas, saith * Plinie: out of the sands of this Riuer are made the best Glasse, which sometime the Zidonians practised: and now the Venetians at Murana. Arias Montanus makes Belus to be a branch of Chedumim, which it cannot be: for Belus is knowne to flow from out the Lake Cendeuia, as all Cosmographers both Ancient and Moderne, and the later Trauailers into those parts witnesse. It is true that the Riuer of Chison taketh water from Chedumim: but not in that fashion which Montanus hath described it: neither doth it finde the Sea at Ptolomais Acon; according to Montanus: but farther to the South betweene Caiphas and Sicaminum, witnesse Ziegler, Adrichomius, and Schrot.

Iosep. lib. 2. Bell. Iud. c. 3.

* L. 5. c. 19. in Iosua, c. 19. v. 26 It is called Shichor, of which name many vnderstand an other streame. Ios. 13. 3. which running by Petra of Arabia, falleth into the Lake Sirbonis, & diuideth Ægypt from the promised Land whereabout they place Rhinocolura, for which city Iunius taketh Shichor in that place of Iosua: but howsoeuer whether this Shichor, Ios. 13. 3 be a Riuer or a city, it appears that this name is found, both in the North bound of the holy Land, Ios. 19. 26. & in the South bound, Ios. 13. 3.

Besides these Riuers there are diuers famous Springs and Fountaines, as that of boiling waters adioyning to Tyre: and [a] Maserephot, or after S. Hierome, Maserephotmaim, whose Well filled by the floud of the Sea adioyning, (they say) the Inhabitants by seething the water make salt thereof, as at Nantwich.

The Mountaines which bound Asser on the North, are those of Anti-libanus, which with Libanus bound Cœlesyria: two great ledges of Hills, which from the Sea of Phœnicia and Syria, extend themselues farre into the Land Eastward: foure hundreth stadia or furlongs, according to Strabo: for that length he giueth to the Valley of Cœlesyria: which those Mountaines inclose: but Plinie giues them 1500. furlongs in length from the West (where they beginne at Theipsophon, or Deifacies, neere Tripolis) to the Mountaines of Arabia beyond Damascus: where Anti-libanus turneth towards the South. These ledges where they beginne to part Traconitis and Basan, from the Desart Arabia, are called Hermon: which Moses also nameth Sion, the Phœnicians Syrion, and the Amorites Sanir, neither is this any one Mountaine apart; but a continuation of Hills: which running farther Southerly, is in the Scriptures called Galaad or Gilead: the same being still a part of Libanus, as the Prophet Hieremie proueth: Galaad tu mihi caput Libani: noting that this Galaad is the highest of those Hils of Libanus. Strabo knowes them by the name of Traconite: and Ptolomie by Hippus. Arias Montanus calleth these Mountaines bordering Asser, Libanus, for Anti-libanus, contrary to all other Cosmographers, but hee giueth no reason of his opinion.

They take the name of Libanus from their white tops, because according to Tacitus, the highest of them are couered with Snow all the Summer, the Hebrew word Libanon (saith Weissenburg) signifieth whitenesse. Others call them by that name of the Frankincense which those trees yeeld: because λίβανος is also the Greeke word for that Gumme.

Niger out of Aphrodiseus affirmeth, that on Libanus, there falleth a kinde of honie dew, which is by the Sunne congealed into hard sugar, which the Inhabitants call Saccher, from whence came the Latine word Saccarum.

The Riuers which Libanus bestoweth on the neighbour Regions are, Chrysorrhoas, Iordan, Eleutherus, Leontes, Lycus, Adonis, Fons hortorum Libani, and others.

The rest of the Mountaines of Asser, are those Hils aboue Tyre, and the Hills of Saron, both exceeding fruitfull: but those are but of a low stature, compared with Libanus: for from Nebo, or the Mountaine of Abarim, in Reuben, Moses beheld Libanus three-score miles distant.

THE TRIBE OF NEPHTALIM.

†. I.

Of the bounds of Nephtalim, and of Heliopolis, and Abila.

THE next Portion of the Land of Canaan bordering Asher, was the vpper Galilee: the greatest part whereof fell to the lot of Nephtalim, the Sonne of Iacob by Billa, the hand-maide of Rachel: who while they abode in Ægypt, were increased to the number of 53400. persons, able to beare armes, numbred at Mount Sinai: all which leauing their bodies in the Desarts, there entred the Holy Land of their Sonnes 45400. besides, Infants, Women, and Children, vnder twenty yeeres of age. The Land of Nephtalim tooke beginning on the North part, from the Fountaines of Iordan, and the Hills of Libanus adioyning, as farre South as the Sea of Galilee, bounded on the West by Asher, and on the East and South-east by Iordan.

On the North-side of Libanus, and adioyning to this Territory of Nephtalim, did the Amorites (or Emorites) also inhabite, in which Tract and vnder Libanus, was the Citie of Heliopolis: which the heighth of the Mountaines adioyning shadowed from the Sunne, the better part of the day. POSTELLVS calls it Balbec; NIGER, Marbech; and LEONCLAVIVS, Beallebeca.

Of this name of Heliopolis, there are two great Cities in Ægypt: the first called On, by the Hebrewes, and the Chaldean Paraphrast, otherwise Bethsemes, or after the Latines, Solis oppidum, or Domus Solis; The Citie of the Sunne: into which, saith Vlpian, Seuerus the Roman Emperour sent a Colonie: the other Gesselius nameth Dealmarach: and of this name Stephanus also findeth a Citie in Thrace, and Glycas in Phrygia.

There is also in the same Valley adioyning to Nephtalim, Chalcis, and Abila. Chalcis, of whom the Region towards Palmyrena hath the name of Chalcidica, ouer which Herod, Agrippa, and Berenice the Queene commanded.

Abila also gaue name to the Region adioyning, of which Lysanius the Sonne of Herod the elder, became Tetrarch or Gouernour: whereof Ptolomie gaue it the addition of Lysanij, and called it Abila Lysanij. Volaterran names it Aphila; of which hee notes that one Diogenes, a famous Sophister, was native, who by Volaterran is intituled Aphileus, not Abileus. After that this Citie of Abila or Aphila, had receiued the Christian Faith, Priscillinus became Bishop thereof: slaine afterward by our British Maximus at Treuer. For distinction of this Citie (if it be not the same, as it may be thought to be the same) it is to be remembred that in the Tribe of [a] Manasse, ioyning vpon the bounds of the Tribe of Nephtalim, there is another Citie of the same name, saue that it is written with an (E) for an (I) and called Abela, remembred in the 20. Chapter of the second of Samuel. The same Iosephus calls Abelmauhel, and Hierome Bethmacha. In the place of Samuel for distinction sake it is written, Abel Beth-Machaa, (for belike it was the Towne of Mahaca, the Wife of Macir, the Sonne of Manasse, the Father of Gilead) in the Chronicles it is called Abel-Maim. This Citie Ioab besieged: because Seba the sonne of Bichri, who rebelled against Dauid, fled thereinto for succour: but a certaine wise woman of the Citie perswading the people to cast Sebas his head ouer the wall, Ioab retired his Armie. The same Citie was afterward taken by the King of Damascus, Benadad: and after a while by Teglatphalasar.

The word Abel may bee expounded, either to signifie bewayling, or a plaine ground, and therefore no maruell, that many Townes (with some addition for distinction

Of Hazor.

IN this Tribe of Nephtalim, was that famous Citie of Iabin, in Ioſua's time called Aſor (or after the Chaldean Paraphraſt, Haſzor) by Ioſephus, Aſora; by Iunius, *Chatzor: which Laicſtan names Hefron; the Regall Citie, and Metropolis of Canaan: ſeated in the Weſt part of Nephtalim, towards Aſher. In this Citie was that great Rendeuous, and aſſembly of thoſe foure and twenty Kings againſt Ioſua: who being all ouerthrowne, ſlaine, and ſcattered, this their powerfull Citie was by Ioſua taken and burnt to duſt. But in proceſſe of time the ſame being rebuilt by the Canaanites, a ſecond King Iabin, 137. yeeres after the death of this firſt Iabin, inuaded the Iſraelites: and being ordained of God to puniſh their Idolatry, he preuailed againſt them, and held them in a miſerable ſeruitude twentie yeeres: till Debora the Propheteſſe ouerthrew Siſera, Iabins Lieutenant, and his Armie, neere the Mountaine Tabor. This Citie Salomon reſtored at ſuch time as he alſo reedified Gezar, burnt by Pharao of Ægypt, with [a] Megido, Bethoron, and other Cities; but about 260. yeeres after, it fell into the hands of Teglatphalaſar, King of the Aſſyrians. It is now, ſaith Adrichomius, called Antiopia: it was one of the principall Cities of Decapolis. There is another Citie of this name in the Territory of Beniamin, ſeated on the confines of Aſcalon, called the new Hazor, [b] ſaith Hierome.

* Of two other Cities of this name in Iuda, See chap. 9. §. 1. of a fourth in Beniamin. Of Ceſaria Philippi.

THere was alſo on the border, and within the Territory of Nephtalim, that renowned Citie of Lais, or Laiſch, as Iunius writes it, or Leſchen; which Citie the children of Dan (being ſtraitned in their Territorie vnder Iuda) inuaded and maſtered; and gaue it the name of their owne Parent Dan: and by that name it is written in Gen. the fourteenth, at which place Abraham ſurprized Chedorlaomer and his confederates, and followed his victorie as farre as Sobah, formerly remembred in the diuiſion of Syria, otherwiſe called Sophena. And after the poſſeſſion of the Danites, it had the ioynt name of Leſchem-Dan. Weiſſenburg writes it Lacis, the Geneua Laiſh, IOSEPHVS, Dana; BENIAMIN, Balina; BREITENBACH, Belena: but the now Inhabitants know it by the name of Belina to this day: witneſſe Neubrigenſis, Tyrius, Volaterranus, Brochard the Monke, and Poſtellus: who alſo taketh this Citie to bee the ſame, which in Matthew the 15. v. 39. in the Vulgar is called Magedan, for which the Greeke Text hath Magdala in that place, and in S. Marke ſpeaking of the ſame ſtorie, Dalmanutha. At ſuch time as the children of Dan obtained this place, it ſeemeth that it was either a free Citie, of the alliance and confederacie of the Zidonians, or elſe ſubiect vnto the Kings thereof; for it is written in the eighteenth of Iudges, And there was none to helpe, becauſe Lais was farre from Zidon: and they had no buſineſſe with other men, for it was aboue thirty Engliſh miles from the Mediterran Sea, and from Zidon.

In after-times when these Regions became subiect to the State of Rome, it had the name of Paneas, from a Fountaine adioyning so called: and therefore Ptolomie calls it Cæsaria Paniæ. Hegesippus calls it Parnium, saith Weissenburg: but he had read it in a corrupt copie: for in Hegesippus set out by Badius, it is written Paneum without an (R): and at such time as Philip the sonne of the elder Herod, brother to Herod Tetrarch of Galilee, became Gouernour of Traconitis, sometime Basan; this Citie was by him amplified and fortified; and both to giue memorie to his owne name, and to flatter Tiberius Cæsar, he called it Cæsaria Philippi*: and so it became the Metropolis, and head Citie of Traconitis: and one of the first Cities of Decapolis. And being by Agrippa in the succeeding age greatly adorned: by him in honour of Nero, it was called Neronia, or Neroniada. But as nothing remained with that Emperour, but the memorie of his impietie: so in S. Hieromes time the Citizens remembred their former Paneas, and so recalled it, with the Territorie adioyning by the ancient name. Of this Citie was that woman whom Christ healed of a bloudie issue, by touching the hemme of his Garment with a constant Faith: who afterward, as shee was a woman of great wealth and abilitie, being mindfull of Gods goodnesse, and no lesse gratefull for the same, as Eusebius and Nicephorus report, caused two Statues to bee cast in pure Copper: the one representing Christ, as neere as it could bee moulded: the other made like her selfe, kneeling at his feete, and holding vp her hands towardes him. These shee mounted vpon two great Bases or Pedestals of the same Metall, which shee placed by a Fountaine neere her owne house: both which (saith Eusebius) remained in their first perfection, euen to his owne time: which himselfe had seene, who liued in the Raigne of Constantine the Great. But in the yeere after Christ 363. that Monster Iulius Apostata, caused that worthie Monument to be cast downe, and defaced: setting vp the like of his owne in the same place: which Image of his was with fire from heauen broken into fitters: the head, body, and other parts, sundered and scattered, to the great admiration of the people at that time liuing. The truth of this accident is also confirmed by Sozomenus Salaminius, in his fifth booke, and twentieth Chapter.

This Citie built by the Danites, was neere the ioyning together of those two Riuers which arise from the springs of Ior and Dan, the two [a] apparant Fountaines of Iordan: in a soyle exceeding fruitfull, and pleasant; for, as it is written, Iudg. 18. It is a place which doth want nothing that is in the world. In the fields belonging to this Citie, it was that S. Peter acknowledged Christ to be the Sonne of God: whereupon it was answered, Tues PETRVS, & super hanc Petram, &c. After this Citie receiued the Christian faith, it was honoured with a Bishops seate: and it ranne the same fortune with the rest, for it was after taken and retaken by the Saracens, and Christians: vnder Fulch the fourth, King of Hierusalem, and after the death of Godfry of Bullion, the King of Damascus wrested it from the Christians; and shortly after by them againe it was recouered. Lastly, now it remaineth with all that part of the world subiected to the Turke.

a Iosephus in the booke of the Iewish war 18. saith, that Philip the Tetrarch cast chaffe into a fountaine called Phiala, distant 120. stadia North-east from Cæsaria, which Chaffe being carried vnder ground was cast vp againe at Paniũ or Dan, whereby it is coniectured that the first Spring of Iordan is from this Fountaine called Phiala, from whence Ior and Dan receiue their waters.

Of Capernaum, and the Cities of Decapolis.

AMong the remarkable Cities within this Tribe, Capharnaum is not the least: so often remembred by the Euangelists. This Citie had the honour of Christs presence three yeeres: who for that time was as a Citizen therof, in which he first preached and taught the Doctrine of our saluation: according to that notable Prophecie of Esay 9. The people that walked in darknesse, haue seene a great light: they that dwelt in the Land of the shadow of death, vpon them hath the light shined.

Capharnaum was seated on Iordan, euen where it entreth into the Sea of Galilee: in an excellent and rich soile: of whose destruction Christ himselfe propheciedin-

these

these words. And thou Capharnaum which art lifted vp vnto heauen, shalt be brought downe to Hell, &c. which shewed the pride and greatnesse of that Citie: for it was one of the principall Cities of Decapolis, and the Metropolis of Galilee. And although there were some markes of this Cities magnificence in S. Hieromes time, as himselfe confesseth: it being then a reasonable Burge or Towne: yet those that haue since, and long since seene it, as Brochard, Breidenbech, and Salmiac affirme, that it then consisted but of sixe poore Fisher-mens houses.

The Region of ten principall Cities called Decapolitana or Decapolis, is in this description often mentioned, and in S. Matthew, Marke, and Luke, also remembred; but I finde no agreement among the Cosmographers, what proper limits it had: and so Plinie himselfe confesseth; for Marius Niger speaking from others, bounds it on the North by the mountaine Casius in Casiotis: and endeth it to the South at Ægypt and Arabia; by which description it imbraceth Phœnicia, a part of Cœlesyria, all Palæstina, and Iudæa. Matth. 4. Marke, 7. Luke 8. Niger. comment. Asiæ. 4. f. 503.

Plinie also makes it large, and for the ten Cities of which it taketh name, he numbreth foure of them to be situated towards Arabia: to wit, first these three, Damascus, Opotos, Raphana, then Philadelphia (which was first called Amana, saith Stephanus, or as I gheese Amona rather, because it was the chiefe Citie of the Ammonites, knowne by the name of Rabbah, before Pto. Philadelphus gaue it this later and new name.) Then Scythopolis, sometime Nisa, built (as is said) by Bacchus, in memorie of his Nurse, who died therein, anciently knowne by the name of Bethsan; for the sixth he setteth Gadara (not that Gadara in Cœlesyria, which was also called Antioch and Seleucia:) but it is Gadara in Basan, which Plinie in this place meaneth, seated on a high hill, neere the Riuer of Hieromaix. This Riuer Ortelius takes to bee the Riuer Iaboc: which boundeth Gad and Manasseh ouer Iordan: but he mistaketh it; for Hieromaix falleth into the Sea of Galilee, betweene Hippos and Gerasa, whereas Iaboc entreth the same Sea betweene Ephron and Phanuel. For the seuenth he nameth * Hippos, or Hippion, a Citie so called of a Colonie of Horsemen there garrisond by Herod, on the East side of the Galilean Sea, described hereafter in the Tribe of Manasse ouer Iordan. For the eighth Pella, which is also called Butis, and Berenice, seated in the South border of the Region ouer Iordan, called Perea. For the ninth Gelasa, which Iosephus takes to be Gerasa: and Gerasa is found in Cœlesyria by Iosephus, Hegesippus, and Stephanus: but by Ptolomie (whom I rather follow) in Phœnicia. The tenth and last, Plinie nameth Canatha, and so doth Suetonius and Stephanus, which Volaterran calls Gamala, but Hegesippus rightly Camala, a Citie in the Region of Basan ouer Iordan, so called, because those two Hills on which it is seated, haue the shape of a Camell. But the collection of these ten Cities, whereof this Region tooke name, is better gathered out of Brochard, Breidenbach, and Saligniac, which make them to bee these; Cæsaria Philippi, and Asor, before remembred, Cedes Nephtalim, Sephet, Corazin, Capharnaum, Bethsaida, Iotapata, Tiberias, and Scythopolis, or Bethsan. For all other Authors disagree herein and giue no reason for their opinion. One place of the Euangelist Saint Matthew makes it manifest, that this Region called Decapolitana, was all that Tract betweene Zidon, and the Sea of Galilee. For thus it is written: And he departed againe from the coasts of Tyrus and Zidon, and came vnto the Sea of Galilee, through the middest of the coasts of Decapolis: so that it was bounded by Damascus and Libanus on the North: by the Phœnician Sea, betweene Zidon and Ptolomais on the West: by the Hills of Gelbo and Bethsan on the South: and by the Mountaines Tracones, otherwise Hermon, Sanir, and Galaad, on the East: which is from East to West the whole bredth of the Holy Land: and from the North to the South, neere the same distance which may be each way fortie English miles.

Of Hamath.

BVt to looke backe againe towards Libanus, there is seated neere the foote thereof the Citie of * Hammath or Chammath, of which (as they say) the Countrey adioyning taketh name: the same which Iosephus calleth Amathitis, and Amathensis: [a] Iacobus Zeigler, Iturea. Iturea Regio tenet horealia tribus Nephthali, per montem Libanum vsq; Trachones. The Countrey of Iturœa, saith hee, containeth the North parts of the Tribe of Nephthali, along the Mount Libanus to Trachones. But herein following Strabo, who calls Trachonitis Iturœa, he mistakes the seate of this Region: and so doth Mercator. For indeed were Iturœa (which Hegesippus calls Perœa, and G. Tyrius, Batcar) the same with Traconitis, yet Traconitis it selfe is farre more to the East than Hammath in Nephtalim: for Traconitis lieth betweene Cæsaria Philippi, and the Mountaines Trachones: which the Hebrewes call Gilead: and this Hammath or Chammath is seated vnder Cæsaria, towards the Sea West-ward.

And it seemeth that this mistaking grew by confounding Emath or Hamath the great in Cœlesyria, beyond the Mountaines Trachones, which [b] Hierome vpon Amos calls Antiochia, with Hammath or Hamath the lesser in Phœnicia, and Nephtalim, which hee calleth Epiphania: for this Hammath, or in our translation Hamath, (and not that which is commonly called Emath, which 2. Chron. 8. 3. is set farre from the North border of Canaan in Syria Soba) is remembred in Numbers 34. v. 8. and Numbers 13. v. 22. and in Ezekiel 47. 16. In the first of which places it bordereth the Land of promise, these being the wordes: From Mount Hor you shall poynt (that is, direct or draw a line) vntill it come to Hamath: In the second place, thus: So they went vp, and searched out the Land from the Wilderneſſe of Sin, vnto Rehob to goe to Hamath: Then in Ezekiel: The West part also shall be the great Sea from the border, till a man come ouer against Hamath: that is, the coast of the Sea shall bee the West border from the Southermost part of the holy Land, till you come directly ouer against Hamath Northward: from whence if a line bee drawne to the Sea, it will touch the walls of Zidon: which is [c] the Northwest corner of the holy Land. Now that this Hamath or Hammath, which Moses also made the confine of the holy Land, is that of Nephthalim, both the reference which it hath to the West Sea, and the Citie of [d] Rehob adioyning prooue it: the other Hamath or Emath (being farre remoued and beyond the forenamed mountaines, which inclose all those Lands which Israel euer had possession of,) is that Emath, which is also called Iturœa, witnesse [e] Stella and Laicstan; and not that in Nephtalim, where [f] Ionathas Macchabæus attended the Armie of Demetrius, who fled from him, and remoued by night.

For though Traconitis be comprehended within Iturœa (and therefore it is said to be finitima Galileæ Gentium) yet it hath beginning ouer the mountaines Traconis, and so it stretcheth into the plaines of the Territory of Iturœa; whence Philip the brother of Herode was Tetrarch or President both of Iturœa and Trachonitis: both which are a Zeigler, in Nepthal.

* The Septuagint write it Ammath, Hierome Emath, Iosephus Amath, Ioſ. 19. v. 35. Chammath, c. 21. v. 32. Chammoth-Dor, in the first of Chron. 6. 76. Chammon; 2. King. 14. 8. Chammath-Iehuda, as Iunius reads it, whereas also for further distinction there is added (in Israel) to note that it was of old belonging to Iuda, though seated in Israel, that is, in the Kingdome of the tenne Tribes, the other Chamath, being in Syria Soba.

b So Hierome in his Comment in Amos cap. 6. ver. 2. where there is mention of Hamath the great, as it seemes, for distinction from the other in Nephthalim, though Matt Beroaldus reiecting Hierome, rather follow the opinion of Zeigler aboue mentioned, as indeede it cannot easily bee instified, that either one or other of these is either Antiochia or Epiphania, howbeit that the same Citie which Iosua 19. 35. is called Chammath, and placed in Nephthalim, was also called Chamath (whence the word Hamath and Emath, were framed) it may bee gathered partly because the other Hamath, 2. Chron. 8. 3. for distinction is called Chamath Tsoba, as this (as it may seeme by Ioſ. 21. 32.) was Chamath Dor, and Chamath Iuda, as wee haue noted, 2. Reg. 24. Secondly, because Num. 34. 8. and also Ezekiel 47. 16. Chameth in the North side of the holy Land, is placed too neer the West corner, to bee that Chamath-Tsoba: for in the line which should make the North border which begins at the great Sea, they make Moses to name neuer a place Eastward along all the bredth of the holy Land, vntill we come to Hermon (for so they expound Mount Hor, Num. 34. 7.) and beyond Hermon Eastward in this North side, they make him to name diuers Townes, first Chamath, then Tsedad, then Ziphron, and lastly, Chatsar henan, a thing most vnlikely: seeing Israel had little or nothing Eastward beyond Hermon. Therefore wee must needes expound Hor to be one of the Hills neere Sidon, and so those Townes, as they are named to lie in order on the North side of Asher, Nephthalim, and Manasses: and in like manner those in Ezekiel: first, Chetlon, then Chamath, and so in order, Berotha, Sibraim, Tsedad, Chauran, Chatsar-henan.

c Of which, Ioſ. 19. 35.

d Which Rehob, or Rechob, in Iosua 19. 28. is placed in Asher towards Zidon, in the confines of Nephthalim.

are ouer Iordan towards the East. But Chamath in Nephtalim, is on the west side of Iordan towards the Mediterran Sea.

The Countrie Ituræa was so called of Iethur one of the sonnes of Ismael, it is placed in the bounds of Cœlesyria and Arabia * the Desart.

The people of Iturei were valiant and warrelike men and excellent Archers. Of whom Virgil:

Ituræos Taxi torquentur in arcus.

Of Eugh the Ituræans bowes were made.

This Citie Chamath or Hamath in Nephtalim seemes to haue beene as ancient as the other in Ituræa, both built by Amatheus the eleuenth sonne of Canaan. Whether in the time of Dauid, this, or the other had Tohu for King, it is not certaine; for Hamath or Emath beyond the Mountaines, and Hammath in Nephtalim were both neighbours to Damascus: of whose subiugation Tohu reioyced, because Hadadeser whom the Damasceni came to helpe, was his enemie. This Tohu fearing the strength and prosperitie of Dauid, hearing of his approach towards his territorie, bought his peace with many rich presents, and with many ancient vessells of gold, siluer and brasse.

But it seemeth that Dauid in such great successe would not haue had peace with Tohu, if he had bin King of any place in Nephtalim, and therefore it is probable that he ruled in Tsoba: which Citie Salomon after his Fathers death made himselfe Master of, as a part of the lands (* in the larger and conditionall promise) allotted by God to the children of Israel.

But this Hammath of Nephtalim, in the end, and after diuers mutations and changes both of name and fortune, being as it hath beene said, possessed by Antiochus Epiphanes, it was called Epiphania.

While Saint Hierome liued, it remained a Citie well peopled, knowne to the Syrians by the name Amathe, and to the Greekes by Epiphania.

* That it doth properly belõg to Arabia, the name of Ietur Ismaels sonne, whose issue setled in the Arabiaes, may in part giue witnesse. Also the place of the 1. Chro. 5. 19. confirms it where Ietur is named among the Hagareus, against whom the Rubenites and Gadites made war, & whose country they possest in the time of Ieroboam, as their fore-fathers had done in the time of Saul after his conquest of the Amalekites, Chr. 1. cap. 5. vers. 10. wher the countrie is placed at the East of Gilead.

* Of the larger promise expresst Deut. 1. 7. where Euphrates is named for one of the bounds; see cap. 7. §. 2. Hieron. de Locis Hebr.

Of Reblatha and Rama, and diuers other Townes.

IN the border of Hamath or Emath towards Iordan standeth the Citie Reblatha, or Ribla, watered from the fountaine Daphnis: which falleth into the lake of Meron. Hereunto was Zedekias brought prisoner, after his surprize in the fields of Iericho: and deliuered to Nabuchodonosor: who to be auenged of Zedekia's infidelity, beyond the proportion of pietie, first caused the Princes his children to be slaine in his presence: and to the end that this miserable spectacle might bee the last that euer hee should behold in this world, and so the most remembred, hee commaunded both his eyes presently to be thrust out: and binding him in yron chaines, hee was led a slaue to Babylon, in which estate he ended his life. Of which seldome-exampled calamitie, though not in expresse words, Hieremie the Prophet fore-told him in Hierusalem not long before: But Ezekiel thus directly, speaking in the person of God, I will bring him to Babel to the Land of the Chaldaans, yet shall hee not see it, though hee shall die therein.

Hierem. 32. 34. &c. Ezek. 52.

There are besides these before remembred, many other strong Cities in Nephtalim, as that which is called [a]Cedes: there are two other of the same name, one in [b] Issachar, another in Iuda, of which Ios. 15. 23. and therefore to distinguish it, it is knowne by the addition of [c] Nephtalim, as Iudg. 4. romes time it was called Cidissus. Belforest greatly mistakes this Cedes, and confounds it with Cades in the Desart of Pharan.

After the King thereof among other of the Canaanites perished by the hand of Iosua, it was made a Citie of refuge, and giuen to the Leuites. Herein was Barac borne; who ouerthrew the Armie of the second Iabin of Hazor, at the Mount Tabor. It was sometime possest by Teglatphalassar, when hee wasted all Nephtalim: afterward by the Romans, and numbred for one of the ten Cities of the Decapolitan Region: When it had imbraced the Christian faith, it was honoured with a Bishops seate, but in time it fell with the rest into the power of the Saracens and Turkes, and by them it was demolished.

From Cedes some foure Italian miles towards the South-west, standeth Sephet, otherwise Zephet, which was also one of the ten Decapolitan Cities: a place exceeding strong, and for many yeeres the inexpugnable Fortresse of the Christians, and afterward of the Saracens; for from hence they conquered all the neighbour Cities of those Regions, both In-land and Maritimate neere it. Touching Rama of Nephtalim, seated North-ward neere Sephet: this is to be noted; that there are (*) diuers places of this name in Palestine, all situate on Hills: and therefore called Rama (Rama Hebræis excelsum; Rama with the Hebrewes is high.) Also that for this Rama Ios. 19. 36. they reade Arama, making the Article (which it hath in the Hebrew, as being a name of diuers Townes) to be a part of the word: whence casting away the aspiration, they reade Arama. From Sephet towards the West they place * Bethsemes, of which Ios. 19. 38. which defended it selfe against Nephtalim, Iud. 1. 33. but paid them tribute. On the other side of Sephet towards the East was Bethanath, who also kept their Citie from the Nephtalims.

Adioyning to which standeth Carthan [a] or Kiriathaijm a Citie of the Leuites, not farre from the Mountaine out of which the springs of Capharnaum arise, called Mons Christi: a place by our Sauiour often frequented: as also then when calling his Disciples together, hee made choise of twelue, which he called and ordained to bee his Apostles or Messengers: of which place or the acts therein done, there is often mention in the [b] Euangelists.

Adioyning to these are Magdalel, a place of strength, [c] and Masaloth, of which we reade that it was forced by Bacchides in the time of the [d] Macchabees: also (according to Adrichomius) one of the two Berothaes of Nephtalim. For Adrichomius maketh two of this name in this Tribe, [e] one neere Chamath in the North border, of which Ezek. 47. 6. another (vpon a weake coniecture out of Ioseph. ant. l. 5. c. 2.) he therefore placeth in this tract neere the waters of Merom; because the Kings that ioyned with Iabin against Iosua, which incamped at the waters of Merom, Ios. 11. 5. are by Iosephus said to haue incamped at the Citie Beroth in Galilee, not farre from Cedesa Superior, which is also in Galilee: all which may be true of that Beroth of which Ezek. seeing it is in that Galilee which is called the vpper Galilee or Galilee of the Gentiles. The same Adrichomius placeth the Region of Berim neere Abela (of which Abela or Abel-beth Mahacah we haue spoken alreadie) this he doth vpon a coniecture touching the place 2. Sam. 20. 14. where some reade Abel & Bethmahacah, & omnia loca Berim: but the better reading is, & omnes Berim, that is, with all the Berai: for Sheba being of Beniamin (in which Tribe also there is a Citie called Beroth or Beeroth) drew the men of that Citie after him.

To the North of Beroth of Nephtalim standeth Sebarim vnder Libanus, remembred by Ezek. 47. and Aroseth gentium, neere the waters of Merom or Samachonitis, the Citie of Sisara Lieutenant of the Armie of the second Iabin: from whence not farre off towards the Sea of Galilee, is Edrai, or Edrehi, a strong Citie: besides many others whereof I finde no particular storie of importance: as Ser in Iosua c. 19. v. 35. called Triddim-Tzer, and named for the first of their fenced Cities: whence they make two Cities, Assedim and Ser. Then Adama which they call Edama: also Hion which they call Ahion of which in the Bookes of Kings. Then the strong Citie of

As for Tithon and Helon, whereof the former they fetch out of Ezek. 47.16. and the latter out of Iosua 19.33. it may appeare by Iunius his Translation, that neither are to be taken for Cities: for the former he readeth Mediani, and for the latter Quercetum. The Citie of [b] Nephthalim which they make the native place of Tobie, and Naasson neere vnto it, they fetch out of the Vulgar Translation, Tob. 7.7. but in the Greeke Text there is no signe, neither of the one nor of the other.

§. V.

THE TRIBE OF ZABVLON.

OF Zabulon or Zebulon, another of the sonnes of Iacob by Lea, there were mustered at Mount Sinai 57400. able men, besides women, children, and aged vnable persons: all which dying in the Desarts, there entred the Holy Land of their issues 65000. fit to beare armes: who inhabited that part of Canaan, from Asher to the Riuer Chison: Southward, and from the Sea of Galilee to the Mediterran, East and West.

The Cities within this Tribe which border Asher, are Sicaminum on the Sea shore, of which Ioseph. Ant. 13.c.19. Debbaset of * which Ios. 19.11. Iekonam or Iokneham (whose King was [a] slaine by Iosua, and the Citie was giuen to the Leuites) and Gaba after called the Citie of Horsemen, of a Regiment there garrisond by Herode. Then the Citie which beareth the name of Zabulon, or the Citie of men, exceeding ancient and magnificent, [b] burnt to the ground by Cestius, Lieutenant of the Roman Armie. Adrichomius makes it the birth Citie of [c] Elon Iudge of Israel, because hee is called Zabulonita: not marking that in the same place he is said to be buried at Aialon.

To the East of this Citie of Zabulon is Cateth, of which Ios. 19.15. on the border of Asher: and beyond it the lesser [d] Cana of Galilee, where Christ conuerted Water into Wine: the native Citie of Nathaniel, and as it is thought of Simon Zelotes. Beyond it begin the Mountaines of Zabulon: and then the Citie of Cethron (in Zeigler, Ghiltron) which defended it selfe against Zabulon. Then Bersabe which standeth in the partition of the vpper and nether Galilee, fortified by Iosephus against the Romanes. Not farre from hence standeth Shimron of Meron whose King was slaine by Iosua.

Then Damna or Dimna, a Citie of the Leuites: then Noa or rather Neha, of which Ios. 19.13. Then Dothan or Dothain, where Ioseph found his brethren feeding their flocks: the same wherein Eliseus besieged by the Syrians, strooke them all blinde.

Beyond it towards the East they imagine [e] Amthar or Amathar: then Remmon of the Leuites. The last of the Cities on the North border of Zabulon is Bethsaida, one of the ten Cities of Decapolis, situate on the Galilæan Sea, and watered by the springs of Capharnaum, the native Citie of the Apostles, Peter, Andrew, and Philip. Herein Christ did many miracles, but these people being no lesse incredulous then the Capharnaims, pharnaims, and others, receiued the same curse of threatned miseries, as Woe bee vnto thee Bethsaida, &c.

Alongst the West border of Galilee, towards the South from Bethsaida, was the strong Castle of Magdalum, the habitation of Marie Magdalen, not long since standing.

And beyond it the strong and high seated Citie of Iotapata: fortified by Iosephus in the Roman Warre: but in the end after a long siege surprised by Vespasian: who slaughtered many thousands of the Citizens: and held 1200. prisoners, whereof Iosephus the Historian was one.

The last and greatest of the Cities on that* Sea and the Lake of Genezareth within Zabulon was that of Tiberias, from whence afterward the Galilean Sea also changed name, and was called the Sea of the Citie Tiberias, so named in honour of Tiberius Cæsar, it was one of the ten Cities, and the Metropolis of the Region Decapolitan, and the greatest and last of the lower Galilee. From hence our Sauiour called Matthew, from the toll or custom-house, to be an Apostle, and neere vnto it raised the daughter of Iairus from death: it was built (as Iosephus reports) by Herod the Tetrarch, the brother of Philip, in the beginning of the raigne of Tiberius Cæsar: in the most fruitfull part of Galilee; but in a ground full of Sepulchres: Quùm iuxta nostras leges (saith hee) ad septem dies impurus habeatur, qui in talibus locis habitet; Whereas by our law hee should bee seuen dayes held as vncleane, who inhabited in such a place: by which wordes, and by the whole place of Iosephus it appeares, that this Tiberias is not (as some haue thought) the same as the old Cinnereth, which was seated, not in Zabulon, but in Nepthalim.

Neere vnto this Tiberias, at Emaus, there were hot baths, where Vespasian the Emperour encamped against Tiberias: More into the Land toward the South-West is Bethulia, seated on a very high Hill, and of great strength, famous by the story of Holofernes and Iudeth, such as it is. Neere which standeth Bethleem of Zabulon: and adioyning vnto it, Capharath fortified by Iosephus against the Romans: and Iapha an exceeding strong place afterward forced by Titus: who in the entrance, and afterward in furie slew 15000. of the Citizens; and caried away aboue two thousand prisoners.

On the South side are the Cities of Cartha of the Leuites, and Gabara, of which Iosephus in his owne life, then Iasie according to Adrichomius (of which Ios. 19. 12.) for he thinkes that it is not that Iapha of which we spake but now out of Iosephus. Ideala of which Ios. 19. 15. Hierome calls it Iadela: vnder it Westward, Legio, (afterward a Bishops seate) and the Citie Belma, in ancient times exceeding strong, remembred Iudeth 7. 3. otherwise Chelma. Between Legio and Nazeret is the Citie Saffa or Saffra, the birth-Citie of Zebedaus, Alphaus, Iames and Iohn: Then Sepheris, or Sephora, according to Iosephus: Sephorum according to Brochard: which afterward, saith Hegesippus and Hierome, was called Diocæsaria; the Citie of Ioachim and Anna, the Parents of the Virgin Mary, it was walled by Herod the Tetrarch: and by him, as Iosephus speakes, made the head and defence of Galilee; in another place he saith Vrbium Galilææarum maxima Sepheris & Tiberias. This Sepheris greatly vexed Vespasian ere hee wanne it. Herod Antipas when he made it the Regall seate of the nether Galilee, and so rounded it with a strong wal, called it Autocratorida, which is as much to say as Imperiall, saith Iosephus; and it is now but a Castle called Zaphet.

To the South-West of this Sepheris or Diocæsaria was that blessed place of Nazareth, the Citie of Marie the Mother of Christ; in which hee himselfe was conceiued, it standeth betweene Mount Tabor, and the Mediterran Sea. In this Citie hee abode chiefly foure and twenty yeeres, and was therefore called a Nazarite, as the Christians afterward were for many yeeres. It was erected into an Archbishopricke in the following age. Neere vnto it are the Cities Buria (afterward well defended against the Turkes) and Nahalal of which Ios. 19. 15. and Iud. 1. 30. where it is called Nahalal: and Ios. 21. 35. where it is a Citie of the Leuites, neere the Sea; adioyning to the Riuer of Chison is Sarid, noted in Iosua for the vttermost of Zabulon.

* The names of the chiefe Cities seated about this Sea, or lake, throgh which Iordan runneth, were Capernaum, Tiberias, Bethsaida, Gadara, Tarichea, and they adde Cinnereth, which in foretimes gaue name to the Lake and Countrie. Matth. 9. Luc. 5. *Iosep. In this Territorie of Zabulon there are diuers small Mountaines: but Tabor is the most renowned, by the Apparition of Moses and Elias: and by the Transfiguration of Christ in the presence of Peter, Iames, and Iohn: vnto whom Moses and Elias appeared; in memorie wherof on the top of the Mountaine, the Empresse Helen built a sumptuous Chappell.

The chiefe Riuer of Zabulon is Chison, which rising out of Tabor, runneth with one streame Eastward to the Sea of Galilee, and with an other streame Westward into the great Sea. This Riuer of Chison where it riseth, and so farre as it runneth Southward, is called Chedumim or Cadumim: and for mine owne opinion, I take it to bee the same which Ptolomie calleth Chorseus: though others distinguish them: and set Chorseus by Cæsaria Palæstinæ. There is a second Torrent or Brooke that riseth in the Hills of Bethulia, and falleth into the Sea of Galilee by Magdalum: and the third is a branch of a riuer rising out of the Fountaines of Capharnaum, which falleth also into the same Sea, and neere Magdalum: which Torrent they call Dotham, from the name of the Citie, from which it passeth Eastward to Bethsaida, and so ioyning with Iordanis parnus, which runneth from the Valley of Iephthael which Iosua reckoneth in the bounds of Zabulon, it endeth in the Sea of Galilee.

THE TRIBE OF ISACHAR.

THE next adioyning Territorie to Zabulon, to the South and Southwest, was Isachar, who inhabited a part of the neather Galilee, within Iordan: of whom there were increased in Ægypt, as appeared by their musters at Mount Sinai 54400. able and warlike men, who leauing their bodies with the rest in the Desarts, there entred the Holy Land, 64300.

The first Citie of this Tribe neere the Sea of Galilee, was Tarichea, distant from Tiberias eight English mile, or somewhat more, a Citie wherein the Iewes (by the practice of a certaine mutinous vpstart, Iohn the sonne of Leui) tooke armes against Iosephus the Historian, then Gouernour of both Galilees. This Citie was first taken by Cassius, and 3000. Iewes carried thence captiue; and afterward with great difficultie by Vespasian: who entred it by the Sea side, hauing first beaten the Iewes in a sea-fight vpon the Lake or Sea of Galilee: he put to the sword all sorts of people, and of all ages: sauing that his furie being quenched with the Riuers of bloud running through euery street, he reserued the remainder for slaues and bond-men.

Tarichea in Sueton.

Next to Tarichea is placed Cession, or Cisbion, of the Leuites, and then Isachar, remembred in the first of Kings, c. 4. v. 17. then Abes or Ebets, Ios. 19. 20. and Remeth of which Ios. 19. 21. otherwise Ramoth. 1. Chron. 6. 73. or Iarmuth, Ios. 21. 29. this also was a Citie of the Leuites, from whose Territorie the Mountaines of Gilboe take beginning: and range themselues to the Mediterran Sea, and towards the West as farre as the Citie of Iezrael, betweene which and Ramoth, are the Cities of Bethpheses, or Bethpasses, according to Ziegler, and Enadda, or Hen-chadda: neere which Saul slew himselfe: vnder those Aphec or Apheca, which Adrichomius placeth in Isachar: betweene which and Suna, he saith, that the Philistims incamped against Israel, and afterward against Saul: a Land thirstie of bloud, for herein also, saith hee, the Syrians with two and thirtie Reguli assisting Benhadad, incountered Achab: and were ouerthrowne and slaughtered: to whom the King of Israel made a most memorable answere, when Benhadad vaunted before the victorie: which was, Tell, BENHADAD, Let not him that girdeth his harneis boast himselfe, as he that putteth it off: meaning that glorie followed after victorie, but ought not to precede it. Vnder Aphec towards the Sea they set the Citie of Esdrelon, in the plaines of Galilee, called also the great field of Esdrelon, and Maggedo: in the border whereof are the ruines of Aphec to be seene, saith Brochard, and Breidenbach: After these are the Cities of Casaloth, of which, 1. Macchab. 9. 2. Anem or Hen-Gannim of the Leuites, and Seesima or Shahatsima, the West border of Isachar, of which Ios. 19. 22. 1. Chron. 6. 73. Ios. 21. 29.

From the Castle of Pilgrimes the Sea maketh a great Bay towards the North, and the farthermost shore beginneth Mount Carmel, not farre from the Riuer Chison: where Elijah assembled all the Prophets, and Priests of Baal, and prayed King Achab and the people assembled, to make triall whether the God of Israel, or the Idoll of Baal, were to be worshipped, by laying a sacrifice without fire on the Altar: which done, the Priests of Baal prayed, and cut their owne flesh after their manner, but the fire kindled not, while Elijah in derision told them that their God was either in pursuite of his enemies not at leisure, or perchance a-sleepe, &c. but at the prayer of Elijah his fire kindled, notwithstanding that he had caused the people to cast many Vessells of water thereon: by which miracle the people incensed, slew all those Idolaters on the bankes of Chison adioyning.

At the foote of this Mountaine to the North standeth Caiphas, built, as they say, by Caiphas the high Priest. It is also knowne by the name of Porsina and Porphyria, sometime a Suffragane Bishops seate. Returning againe from the Seacoast towards Tiberias by the bankes of Chison, there are found the Citie of Hapharaim or Aphraim, and the Castles of Mesra, and Saba: of which Brochard and Breidenbach: and then Naim on the Riuer Chison: a beautifull Citie while it stood, in the Gates whereof Christ raised from death the widdowes only sonne.

Then Seon or Shion named Iosua 19. betweene the two Hills of Hermon, in Isachar: beyond it standeth Endor, famous by reason of the Inchauntresse that vndertooke to raise vp the body of Samuel at the instigation of Saul.

Beyond it stands Anaharath and Rabbith named Ios. c. 19. v. 19. 20. Then Dabarath as it is named, Ios. 21. 28. or Dobratha, as it is named, 1. Chron. 6. 72. This Citie (which stretcheth it selfe ouer Chison) was a Citie of refuge belonging to the Leuites.

Next to Daberath is Arbela situate, neere the Caues of those two Theeues which so greatly molested Galilee in Herodes time. It ioyneth on one side to the Mountaine of Isachar or Hermon, and on the other to the Valley of Iesrael: which valley continueth it selfe from Bethsan or Scythopolis, the East border of Isachar, euen to the Mediterran Sea: two parts whereof are inclosed by the Mountaines of Gilboe on the South, and by Hermon, and the Riuer Chison on the North. In these * plaines Gedeon ouerthrew the Madianites, and herein, they thinke, Saul fought against the Philistims: Achab against the Syrians, and the Tartars against the Saracens.

THE HALFE OF THE TRIBE OF MANASSE.

†. I.

Of the bounds of this halfe Tribe: and of Scythopolis, Salem, Thersa, and others.

THE next Tribe which ioyneth it selfe to Issachar towards the South, is the halfe of Manasse, on the West side of Iordan. Manasses was the first begotten of Ioseph, the eleuenth sonne of Iacob. His mother was an Ægyptian, the daughter of Putiphar, Priest and Prince of Heliopolis: which Manasses with his brother Ephraim, the grand-children of Iacob, were by adoption numbred amongst the sonnes of Iacob, and made vp the number of the twelue Patriarkes.

Of Manasse there were increased in Ægypt, as they were numbred at Mount Sinai, 32200. able men: all which being consumed in the Desarts, there entred of their issues, 52700. bearing armes. The Territory which fell on this one halfe of Manasse, was bounded by Iordan on the East, and Dora vpon the Mediterran Sea on the West, Iesrael on the North, and Mashmata is the South border.

The first and principall Citie which stood in this Territorie was Bethsan, sometime Nysa, saith Plinie, built by Liber Pater, in honour of his Nurse there buried, of the same name; which Solinus confirmes. Afterward when the Scythians inuaded Asia the lesse, and pierst into the South, to the vttermost of Cœlesyria, they built this Citie a-new, and very magnificent: and it had thereupon the name of Scythopolis, or the Citie of Scythians giuen it by the Greekes. Plin. lib. 5. c. 18.

These barbarous Northren people constrained the Iewes to fight against their owne Nation and kindred, by whose handes when they had obtained victorie, they themselues set on the Iewes which serued them, and slew them all. Stephanus makes it the vtmost towards the South of Cœlesyria: and Strabo ioynes it to Galilee. It is seated betweene Iordan and the Hills of Gilboe, in aulone ad montes acrabitenæ, saith Ziegler. But I finde it in the East part of the Valley of Iesrael neere Iordan: after that, Iordan streightneth it selfe againe into a Riuer: leauing the Sea or Lake Genezareth. Notwithstanding, Montanus describes it farre to the West, and towards the Mediterran Sea, neere Endor, contrarie to Stella, Laicstan, Adrichome, and all other the best Authors. This Citie was the greatest of all those of Decapolis: but the children of Manasse could not expell the Inhabitants thereof: and therefore called it Sane an enemie, or Beth-san, the house of an enemie.

Ouer the walls of this Bethsan the Philistims hung the bodie of Saul, and his sonnes, slaine at Gilboe. It had, while the Christian Religion flourished in those parts, an Archbishop, who had nine other Bishops of his Dioceese, numbred by Tyrius, in his 14. Booke and 12. Chapter: but the same was afterward translated to Nazareth. The later trauailers in those parts affirme, that there is daily taken out among the rubble and the ruines of that Citie, goodly pillers and other pieces of excellent marble, which witnesse the stately buildings, and magnificence which it had in elder times, but it is now a poore and desolate Village. Iudg. 1. Ios. 17. de Bell. sacr.

From Bethsan keeping the way by Iordan, they finde an ancient Citie called Salem, which Citie the ancient Rabbines, saith Hierome, doe not finde to be the same with Hierusalem: there being in the time of Hierome and since, a towne of that name, neere Hieron. in Epist. ad Euagr. & in Loc. Hebr.

neere Scythopolis before remembred, which if the place of Scripture Gen. 13.18. doe not confirme, where the Vulgar readeth tranſiuitq; in Salem vrbem Sichemorum (for which others reade, venit incolumis ad Ciuitatem Sechemum, making the word Shalem not to be a proper name, but an adiectiue) yet the place Iohn 3.13. where it is ſaid, that Iohn was baptizing in Ænon neere Salem, may ſomewhat ſtrengthen this opinion, and yet it is not vnlikely that this Salem of which S. Iohn ſpeaketh, is but contracted of Shahalim, of which in the Tribe of Beniamin, 1. Sam. 9.4. This word Iunius maketh to be the plurall of Shuhal: of which wee reade, 1. Sam. 13.17. for as for that which is added out of Cant. 6.12. of Shulammitis, as if it had been as much as a Woman of this Saleim, neere Ænon, it hath no probability.

This Citie Bezek by the place, Iud. 1.3. ſeemeth to haue been in Iuda. Ioſep. ant. 6.5.5. Sam. 1.c.11.

Not farre from thence where they place Salem, they finde Bezech the Citie of Adonibezet, Ioſephus calls it Bala, here it was that Saul aſſembled the ſtrength of Iſrael, and Iuda, to the number of 330000. when hee meant to relieue Iabeſh Gilead, againſt Naaſh the Ammonite: who would giue them no other conditions of peace, than to ſuffer their right eyes to be thruſt out. Neere Bezech is the Citie of Bethbera or rather Beth-bara, of which Iudg. 7.24. in the ſtorie of Gideon: and then Ephra or Hophra, wherein Gedeon inhabited: in the border whereof ſtood an Altar conſecrated to Baal: which he pulled downe and defaced: and neere it that ſtone, on which Abimelech the Baſtard ſlew his 70. brothers: a Heatheniſh cruelty, practiſed by the Turke to this day; and not farre hence, betweene the Village of Aſophon and Iordan, Ptolomæus Lathurus ouerthrew Alexander King of the Iewes: and ſlaughtered as Ioſephus numbreth them 3000. but according to Timagenes 50000. after which victory, as Ptolomie paſt by the Villages of the Iewes; he ſlew all their women: and cauſed the yong children to bee ſod in great caldrons, that the reſt of the Iewes might thereby thinke that the Ægyptians were growne to be men-eaters, and ſtrike them with the greater terrour.

Joſ. l. 13. c. 21. ant.

* This Aner Iunius vpon 1. Chron. 6.70. makes to bee the ſame with Tabanac, of which Ioſ. 21.25 Hierom names it from Aner the Confederate of Abraham, Gen. 14.13 Ioſua 12.17. 1. King. 14.

Towards the Weſt and on the border of Iſachar, they place the Cities of * Aner of the Leuites; and Abel-Meholа, which Iunius, Iudg. 7.22. placeth in Ephraim, it was the habitation of Heliſæus the Prophet, numbred among thoſe places, 1. Reg. 4.12. which were giuen in charge to Baana by Salomon, to whoſe charge alſo Tahanac belonged, a place of great ſtrength, which at the firſt reſiſted Ioſua, though their King was afterward hanged, and their Citie giuen to the Leuites.

In the bodie of this Territory of Manaſſe, but ſomewhat neerer Iordan, than to the Mediterran Sea, were three great Cities, to wit, Therſa, whoſe King was one of thoſe that Ioſua ſlew: which the Kings of Iſrael vſed for their Regall ſeate: till ſuch time as Samaria was built. From hence the wife of Ieroboam went to Achia to enquire of her ſonnes health: who knowing her, though ſhe were diſguiſed, told her of her ſonnes death.

Iudg. 9.v.54.

The ſecond was Thebes neere Samaria, of which name there are both in Ægypt, and Greece, of great fame: in the aſſault of the Tower of this Towne, whereinto the Citizens retired, the Baſtard Abimilec was wounded by a waighty ſtone, throwne by a Woman ouer the Wall, who deſpairing of his recouery, commanded his Page to ſlay him out-right, becauſe it ſhould not be ſaid that he periſhed by the ſtroke of a Woman. But others ſet this Citie in Ephraim neere Sichem or Neapolis.

Hier. Mac. 1.c.5

The third is Aerabata, of which the Territory adioyning is called Acrabatena, (one of the ten Toparchies or Gouernments in Iudæa) for which Hierome, 1. Macc. 5. reades Arabathena: but in the Greeke it is Acrabatine: Iſidore calls it Agrabat. This Citie had one of the largeſt Territories of all Paleſtine belonging to the Gouernour thereof. Ioſephus remembreth it often, as in his ſecond Booke of the Iewes Warres, c.11.25.28. and elſewhere.

The difference betweene a Tetrarchie and a Toparchie, was, that the firſt was taken for a Prouince, and the other for a Citie with ſome leſſer Territory adioyning, and a Tetrarch is the ſame with Præſes in Latine, and Preſident in Engliſh, being commonly the fourth part of a Kingdome: and thereof ſo called: Plinie nameth ſeuen-

teene Tetrarchies in Syria: the Holy Land had foure, and so hath the Kingdome of Ireland to this day, Lemster, Vlster, Connath, and Mounster. Euseb. in Chron.

To the South-west of Acrabata they place the Cities of Balaam or Bilham, and Gethremmon of the Leuites: but Iunius out of Ios. 21. 25. and 1. Chron. 6. 70. gathers that these two are but one: and that Ibleham Ios. 16. 11. is another name of the same Citie.

Then is Iesrael a Regall Citie, set at the foot of the Mountaines of Gilboe, towards the South-west: herein Iezabel by a false accusation caused Naboth to bee stoned, to the end shee might possesse his Vineyard adioyning to the Citie, which Naboth refused to sell, because it was his inheritance from his Father.

Ioram also was cast vnburied into the same field: for which his Mother Iezabel murthered Naboth. King. 2. cap. 2.

Toward the Sea from Iesrael is the Citie which they call Gaber: in whose ascent as Ahaziah King of Iuda fled from Iehu, when hee had slaine Ioram, hee was wounded with the shot of an arrow, of which wound hee died at Mageddo adioyning. The Scripture calls this Citie of Gaber, Gur. 2. King. 9. 27.

Then Adadremmon, neere vnto which the good King Iosias was slaine by Necho, King of Egypt, in a Warre vnaduisedly vndertaken. For Necho marched towards Assyria against the King thereof; by the commaundement of God: whom Iosias thought to resist in his passage. It was afterward called Maximianopolis.

A neighbour Citie to Adadremmon was Maggeddo, often remembred in the Scriptures; whose King was slaine among the rest by Iosua: yet they defended their Citie for a long time against Manasse. Iud. 1. c. 5. Ios. 12. 17. The Riuer which passeth by the Towne, may perhaps bee the same which Ptolomie calleth Chorseus: and not that of which wee haue spoken in Zabulon. For because this name is not found in the Scriptures, many of those that haue described the Holy Land delineate no such Riuer. Moore only sets it downe in his Geographie of the twelue Tribes: but the Riuer which passeth by Maggeddo hee vnderstandeth to bee but a branch, falling thereinto. Laicstan and Schrot make a great confluence of waters in this place: agreeable to this Scripture in the fifth of Iudges: Then fought the Kings of Canaan in Tanaac by the waters of Maggeddo. But these Authors, and with them Stella, giue it no other name then the Torrent so called.

But seeing that ancient Cosmographers stretch out the bounds of Phœnicia, euen to Sebaste or Samaria; and Strabo farre beyond it on the Sea-coast: And Iosephus calls Cæsaria Palæstinæ a Citie of Phœnicia, yea Laurentius Coruinus extendeth Phœnicia as farre as Gaza: seeing also Ptolomie sets downe Chorseus for the partition of Phœnicia and Iudea: this Riuer running East and West paralell with Samaria: it is very probable that this Torrent called Maggeddo, after the name of the Citie, which it watereth, is the same which Ptolomie in his fourth Table of Asia calleth Chorseus. The later trauailers of the holy Land call Maggeddo Subimbre at this day. Strab. l. 16. Iosep. l. 15. c. 13. Niger.

†. II.

Of Cæsaria Palæstinæ, and some other Townes.

FRom Maggeddo toward the West, and neere the Mediterran Sea, was that glorious Citie of Cæsaria Palæstinæ: first, the Tower of Straton: the same which Plinie calls Apollonia: though Ptolomie sets Apollonia elsewhere, and toward Egypt, betweene this Citie and Ioppe, to which Vespasian gaue the name of Flauia Colonia. It was by Herod rebuilt, who therein laboured to exceede all the workes in that part of the world. For besides the edifices, which hee reared within the Walls, of cut and polisht marbles, the Theater and Amphitheater, from whence he might looke ouer the Seas farre away, with the high and stately Towers and Gates: hee forced a Harborow of great capacitie, being in former times but an open Bay: and the winde blowing blowing from the Sea the Merchants haunting that Port, had no other hope, but in the strength of their cables and Anchors. This worke hee performed with such charge and labour, as the like of that kinde hath not beene found in any Kingdome, nor in any age: which, because the Materialls were fetcht from farre, and the waight of the stones was such as it exceedeth beliefe, I haue added Iosephus owne wordes

Iosep. l. 15. c. 13. of this worke: which are these: Hanc locorum incommoditatem correcturus, circulum portus circumduxit, quantum putaret magnæ classi recipiendæ sufficere: & in viginti vlnarum profundum, prægrandia saxa demisit: quorum plerag, pedum quinquaginta longitudinis, latitudinis verò octodecim, altitudine nouem-pedali: fuerunt quædam etiam maiora, minora alia; To mend this inconuenience of place (saith IOSEPHVS) hee compast in a Bay wherein a great fleete might well ride: and let downe great stones twentie fadome deepe: whereof some were fiftie foote long, eighteene foote broade, and nine foote thicke: some bigger, and some lesser. To this he added an arme or cawsie of two hundred foote long, to breake the waues: the rest he strengthened with a stone wall, with diuers, stately Towers thereon builded: of which the most magnificent hee called Drusus after the name of Drusus the sonne in law of Cæsar: in whose honour hee intituled the Citie it selfe, Cæsaria of Palæstine: all which he performed in twelue yeeres time. It was the first of the Easterne Cities that receiued a Bishop: afterward erected into

L. 14. c. 12. bell. Iacr. an Archbishopricke, commanding twentie others vnder it, saith Tyrius.

S. Hierome nameth Theophilus, Eusebius, Acacius, Euzorus, and Gelasius to haue beene Bishops thereof. In this Citie was Cornelius the Centurion baptized by S. Peter: and herein dwelt Philip the Apostle: S. Paul was heerein two yeeres prisoner, vnder the President Fælix, vnto the time and gouernment of Porcius Festus: by whom making his appeale, he was sent to Cæsar. Here, when Herod Agrippa was passing on to celebrate the Quinquennalia, taking delight to bee called a God by his flatterers, hee was stricken with an Angell vnto death, saith Iosephus.

To the North of Cæsaria standeth Dora, or Naphoth Dor, as some reade Ios. 1. 2: so called (saith Adrichomius) because it ioyneth to the Sea, whose King was slaine by Iosua. But Iunius for in Naphoth Dor, reades in tractibus Dor: and so the Vulgar, in regionibus Dor: although 1. Reg. 4. 11. for the like speech in the Hebrew it readeth omnis Nephath Dor: The Septuagint in the place of Iosua call it Nepheth-Dor, and in the other of the Kings, Nepha-Dor: but the true name by other places (as Ios. 12. 23. Iudg. 1. 27.) may seeme to bee Dor. It was a strong and powerfull Citie: and the fourth in account of those twelue Principalities or Sitarchies, which Salomon erected. Iunius vpon Macchab. 15. 11. placeth it betweene the Hill Carmel and the mouth of the Riuer Cherseus: for so some name the Riuer Chorseus, of which wee haue spoken already.

Into this Citie, for the strength thereof, Tryphon fled from Antiochus the sonne of Demetrius: where he was by the same Antiochus besieged with 120000. foote-men Macc. 1. 13. 15. and 8000. Horse: the same perfidious villaine that receiued 200. talents for the ransome of Ionathan Macchabæus (whom he had taken by treacherie) and then slew him: and after him slew his owne Master, vsurping for a while the Kingdome of Syria. It had also a Bishops seate of the Dioceese of Cæsaria.

Gul. Tyr. de Bell. sacr. l. 10. c. 6. From Cæsaria towards the South, they place the Cities of Capharnaum, Gabe, and Galgal: for besides that Capharnaum famous in the Euangelists, they find in these parts neere the West Sea, another of the same name. Of Gabe Hierome in locis Hebraicis. The famous Galgal or Gilgal, was in Beniamin: but this Gilgal, they say, it was whose King was slaine by Iosua.

Macc. 1. 7. v. 31. Then Antipatris so called of Herode, in honour of his Father: but in the time of the Macchabees it was called Caphar salama: in the fields whereof Iudas Macchabeus ouerthrew a part of the Armie of Nicanor, Lieutenant to Demetrius: an armie drawn into Iudæa by a traiterous Iew, called Alcimus: who contended for the Priest-hood, first vnder Bacchides, and then vnder Nicanor. To this was S. Paul carried prisoner from Hierusalem, conducted by 470. Souldiers, to defend him from the furie of the Iewes.

Iewes. In after-times the Armie of Godfrey of Bulion attempted it in vaine: yet was it taken by Baldwine. It was honoured in those dayes with a Bishops seate, but it is now a poore Village called Assur, saith Brochard. Neere vnto this Citie the Prophet Ionas was three dayes preserued in the bodie of a Whale.

Into the Land, from Antipatris and Cæsaria, standeth Narbata, whereof the Territorie taketh name: which Cestius the Romane wasted with fire and sword, because the Iewes which dwelt at Cæsaria fled thence, and carried with them the Bookes of Moses. Neere vnto it is the Mountaine of Abdia, the Steward of King Achab: wherein he hid an hundreth Prophets, and fed them, after which hee himselfe is said to haue obtained from God the Spirit of prophecie also.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Kingdome of Phœnicia.

§. I.

The bounds and chiefe Cities, and Founders, and Name, of this Kingdome: and of the invention of Letters ascribed to them.

BECAVSE these fiue Tribes, of Asser, Nephtalim, Zabulon, Issachar, and the halfe of Manasse, possest the better part of that ancient Kingdome of Phœnicia, to wit, of so much as lay to the South part of Anti-libanus: I haue therefore gathered a briefe of those Kings which haue gouerned therein: at least so many of them as time (which deuoureth all things) hath left to posteritie: and that the rest haue perished, it is not strange: seeing so many volumes of excellent learning in so long a race and reuolution, and in so many changes of Estates and Conquests of Heathen Princes, haue been torne, cast away, or otherwise consumed.

The limits of this Kingdome, as touching the South parts, are very vncertaine: but all Cosmographers doe in effect agree, that it takes beginning from the North, where that part of Syria, which is called Casiotis, ends: most of them bounding it by Orthosia, to the North of Tripolis. Ptolomie makes it a little larger, as reaching from the Riuer Eleutherus, that falls into the Sea at the Iland of Aradus, somewhat to the North of Orthosia, and stretching from thence alongst the coast of the Mediterran sea, as farre as the Riuer of Chorseus, which seemes to be that which the Iewes call the Torrent, or Riuer of Maggeddo. Plinie extends it farther and comprehends Ioppe within it: Coruinus and Budæus, Ioppe and Gaza. Phœnicia apud priscos appellata (saith BVDÆVS) quæ nunc Palæstina Syriæ dicitur; It was called Phœnicia of old (saith hee) which now is called Palæstina of Syria.

Ptol. 4. Tab. Asiæ.

Plin. lib. 5. c. 19.

Strabo comprehends in this Countrey of Phœnicia, all the Sea side of Iudæa, and Palæstina, euen vnto Pelusium, the first Port of Ægypt. On the contrary Diodorus Siculus foldeth it vp in Cœlesyria, which hee boundeth not. But for my selfe I take a middle course, and like best of Ptolomies description, who was seldome deceiued in his owne Art. It had in it these famous Maritimate Cities (besides all those of the Ilands)

Strab. l. 16. Budæ. de Ass. l. 4.

Ilands) to wit, Aradus, Orthosia, Tripolis, Botrys, Byblus, Berytus, Sidon, Tyre, Ptolemais (or Acon) Dora, and Cæsaria Palestinæ: and by reason of the many Ports and goodly Sea-townes, it anciently commanded the Trades of the Easterne world: and they were absolute Kings of the Mediterran Sea.

The ancient Regall Seate of those Princes was Zidon, built by Zidon the first sonne of Canaan: and the people then subiect to that people were called Zidonians: the same state continuing euen vnto Iosuas time. For till then it is probable that there was but one King of all that Region; afterward called Phœnicia: which Procopius also confirmeth in his second Booke of Vandall Warres. But in processe of time the Citie of Tyre adioyning became the more magnificent: yet according to the Prophet, it was but a Daughter of Zidon, and by them first built and peopled.

Esay. 23. 19

But after the death of Moses, and while Iosua yet gouerned Israel, Agenor an Ægyptian of Thebes, or a Phœnician bred in Egypt, came thence with his sonnes Cadmus, Phœnix, Cyrus, and Cilix, (say Cedrenus and Curtius) and built and possest the Cities of Tyre and Zidon: to wit, the new Tyrus, and brought into Phœnicia (so called after the name of his second Sonne) the vse of letters: which also Cadmus in his pursuite after his sister Europa taught the Græcians. For Taurus King of Crete, when he surprised Tyre, had stollen her thence: of which the Poets deuised the fable of Iupiters transformation into a Bull, by whom that stealth was also supposed to be made. Pomponius Sabinus makes Belus the first King of Phœnicia: and findes Cadmus his successour: whom he calleth his grand-child: and it seemeth that Belus was the Father of Agenor, and not Neptune: because the successors of Dido held that name alwayes in reuerence, making it a part of their owne, as Asdrubal, Hannibal: which memorie Virgil also toucheth in these Verses:

F. 17. 20

Hic Reginagrauem gemmis auroq́; popoſcit
Implenstq́; mero pateram: quam BELVS & omnes
A BELO ſoliti.

The Queene anon commands the waighty bowle 30
(Waightie with precious stones and massie gold)
To flow with wine. This Belus vs'd of old,
And all of Belus Line.

Whether this Belus were Father or Grand-father to Agenor, the matter is not great. But it seemeth to me by comparing of times, that Belus was Ancestor to these Phœnicians, and preceded Agenor. For were Belus, or Iupiter Belus, the sonne of Neptune by Libya, the Daughter of Epaphus, or were he the Sonne of Telegonus, according to Eusebius; yet it is agreed that Cecrops then ruled in Attica: and in the end of Cecrops time, saith S. Augustine, Moses left Ægypt: Agenors successour liuing at once 40 with Iosua. Now that Agenor returned about the same time into the Territory of Zidon, I cannot doubt: neither doe I denie, but that he gaue that Region the name of Phœnicia, in honour of his Sonne. But in stead of the building of Tyre, and Zidon, it is probable that he repaired and fortified both: and therefore was called a Founder, as Semiramis and Nabuchodonosor were of Babylon.

For bee it true that Agenor was of the same Nation, and brought vp in Ægypt: where he learnt the vse of letters (Ægypt flourishing in all kind of learning in Moses time) or were he by Nation an Ægyptian: yet is it very likely that either he came to saue his owne Territory: or otherwise to defend the coast of Canaan, from the Israelites: who were by Moses led out of Ægypt, to the great losse and dishonour of 50 that Nation: and by Iosua conducted ouer Iordan, to conquer and possesse the Canaanites Land. For though the Ægyptians, by reason of the losse which they receiued by the hand of God, in the Red Sea, and by the ten plagues cast on them before that, and by the slaughter of so many of the Male children at the same time, could not hinder the Hebrewes from inuading Canaan by Land: which also they knew had so many powerfull Nations to defend it: the Deserts inter-jacent, and the strong Edomites, Moabites, Emorites, and Ammonites their borderers: yet Ægypt hauing such Vessells, or Ships, or Gallies, as were then in vse: did not in all probabilitie neglect to Garrison the Sea coast, or assist Agenor with such forces, as they had to spare; and which they might performe with the greater facilitie, in that the Philistims which held the shores of Canaan, next adioyning vnto them, were their Friends and Confederates.

Now as it appeareth by the course of the storie, those Cities of Phœnicia, which Agenor was said to haue built (that is, to haue fortified and defended against Iosua, and against the Tribes after him, as Zidon, Sor, or Tyre, by Iosua called the strong Citie, Accho afterward Ptolomais, Aczib and Dor) were all that Phœnicia had in those dayes. C. 19. v. 29.

That the Kings of Phœnicia were mightie, especially by Sea, it appeareth, first by their defence against Israel: secondly by this, that Dauid and Salomon could not master them: but were glad of their alliance: thirdly, that one of their Cities, though they were then but Reguli, defended it selfe 13. yeeres against a King of Kings, Nabuchodonosor: and that Alexander the great (who being made victorious by the prouidence of God, seemed vnresistable) spent more time in the recouerie of Tyre; than in the conquest of all the Cities in Asia.

Other opinions there are, as that of Berosus out of Iosephus, who conceiues that Tyre was founded by Tyras the sonne of Iaphet. And for the Region it selfe, though Callisthenes deriue it ab arbore dactylorum; and the Greekes from the word Phonos, of slaughter, because the Phœnicians slew all that came on their coasts, yet for my selfe I take it that Phœnix the sonne of Agenor gaue it that name. But that either Agenor in Phœnicia, or Cadmus his sonne in Greece, were the Inuentors of Letters, it is ridiculous: and therefore the dispute vnnecessarie.

The Æthiopians affirme that Atlas, Orion, Orpheus, Linus, Hercules, Prometheus, Cadmus, and others, had from them the first light of all those Arts, Sciences, and ciuill Policies, which they afterward profest, and taught others: and that Pythagoras himselfe was instructed by the Libyans: to wit, from the South and Superior Ægyptians: from whom those which inhabited neerer the out-let of Nilus, as they say, borrowed their Diuinitie and Philosophie: and from them the Greekes, then barbarous, receiued Ciuilitie. Againe, the Phœnicians challenge this inuention of Letters and of Learning: acknowledging nothing from the Ægyptians at all; neither doe they allow that Agenor and his sonnes were Affricans; whence Lucan.

Mansuram rudibus vocem signare figuris.

Phœnicians first (if fame may credit haue)
In rude Characters dar'd our wordes to graue.

And that Cadmus was the sonne of Agenor, and was a Phœnician, and not an Ægyptian, it appeareth by that answere made by Zeno; when hee in a kinde of reproch was called a stranger and a Phœnician:

Si patria est Phœnix, quid tum? nam CADMVS & ipse Athen. 1. Dipnos.
Phœnix; cui debet Græcia docta libros.

If a Phœnician borne I am, what then?
CADMVS was so: to whom Greece owes
The Bookes of learned men.

Ioseph. contra Appionem.

Out of doubt the Phœnicians were very ancient: and from the Records and Chronicles of Tyre, Iosephus the Historian confirmes a great part of his Antiquities. The Thracians againe subscribe to none of these reports: but affirme constantly, that the great Zamolxis flourished among them: when Atlas liued in Mauritania: Nilus and Vulcan in Ægypt: and Ochus in Phœnicia. Yea, some of the French doe not blush to maintaine, that the ancient Gaules taught the Greekes the vse of Letters, and other Sciences. And doe not we know that our Bardes and Druids are as ancient as those Gaules, and that they sent their sonnes hither to bee by them instructed in all kinde of learning?

Lastly, whereas others bestow this inuention on Moses, the same hath no probabilitie at all, for hee liued at such time as learning and arts flourished most, both in Ægypt, and Assyria, and he himselfe was brought vp in all the learning of the Ægyptians, from his infancie.

But true it is that letters were inuented by those excellent Spirits of the first age, and before the generall floud: either by Seth, or Enos, or by whom else God knowes; from whom all wisedome and vnderstanding hath proceeded. And as the same infinite God is present with all his Creatures, so hath hee giuen the same inuention to diuers Nations: whereof the one hath not had commerce with the other; as well in this as in many other knowledges: for euen in Mexico, when it was first discouered, there was found written Bookes after the manner of those Hieroglyphicks, anciently vsed by the Ægyptians, and other Nations: and so had those Americans a kinde of Heraldrie; and their Princes differing in Armes and Scutchions, like vnto those vsed by the Kings and Nobilitie of other Nations. Iura naturalia communia, & generalia, &c. Iurisc. Naturall Lawes are common and generall.

§. II.

Of the Kings of Tyre.

BVt whatsoeuer remaineth of the storie and Kings of Phœnicia (the bookes of Zeno, Sachoniatho, Mnaseas, and others of that Nation, being no where found) the same is to be gathered out of the Scriptures, Iosephus, and Theophilus Antiochenus.

Agenor liued at once with Iosua, to whom succeeded Phœnix, of whom that part of Canaan, and so farre towards the North as Aradus, tooke the name of Phœnicia: what King succeeded Phœnix it doth not appeare: but at such time as the Græcians besieged Troy, Phasis gouerned Phœnicia.

In Hieremies time and while Iehoiakim ruled in Iuda, the Tyrians had a King apart: for Hieremie speaketh of the Kings of Zidon, of Tyre, of Edom, &c. as of seuerall Kings. chap. 27. v. 3.

In Xerxes time, and when he prepared that incredible Armie wherewith hee inuaded Greece, Tetramnestus ruled that part of Phœnicia, about Tyre, and Zidon: who commanded, as some Writers affirme, Xerxes fleete, or rather, as I suppose, those 300. Gallies, which himselfe brought to his aide: for at this time it seemeth, that the Phœnicians were Tributaries to the Persian: for being broken into Reguli, and pettie Kings in Hieremies time, they were subiected by Nabuchodonosor; of whose conquests in the Chapter before remembred, Hieremie prophecied.

Tennes, though not immediately, succeeded Tetramnestus: remembred by D. Stculus in his 14. Booke.

Strato, his successor, and King of Zidon, Alexander Macedon threw out, because of his dependancie vpon Darius, and that his Predecessors had serued the East Empire against the Græcians. But diuers Kings, of whom there is no memorie, came betweene Tennes and Strato. For there were consumed 130. yeeres and somewhat more betweene Xerxes and Alexander Macedon. And this man was by Alexander esteemed eſteemed the more vnworthie of reſtitution, becauſe (ſaith Curtius) hee rather ſubmitted himſelfe by the inſtigation of his Subiects (who foreſaw their vter ruine by reſiſtance) than that hee had any diſpoſition thereunto, or bare any good affection towards the Macedonians. L.4.

Of this Strato, Athenæus out of Theopompus reporteth, that hee was a man of ill liuing: and moſt voluptuous; alſo that hee appointed certaine games and prizes for Women dancers, and ſingers: whom he to this end chiefly inuited, and aſſembled: that hauing beheld the moſt beautifull and liuely among them, hee might recouer them for his owne vſe and delights. Of the ſtrange accident about the death of one Strato King of theſe coaſts, S. Hierome and others make mention: who hauing heard that the Perſians were neere him with an Armie too waightie for his ſtrength, and finding that hee was to hope for little grace, becauſe of his falling away from that Empire, and his adhering to the Ægyptians: hee determining to kill himſelfe, but fainting in the execution, his wife being preſent wreſted the ſword out of his hand and ſlew him: which done ſhee alſo therewith pierced her owne bodie, and died. Athen.l.12.c.13 Hieron.l.1.cont. Iouin.

After Alexander was poſſeſt of Zidon, and the other Strato driuen thence, Hee gaue the Kingdome to Hephæſtion, to diſpoſe of: who hauing receiued great entertainement of one of the Citizens, in whoſe houſe he lodged, offered to recompence him therewith; and willingly offered to eſtabliſh him therein: but this Citizen no leſſe vertuous than rich, deſired Hephæſtion that this Honour might bee inferred on ſome one of the bloud and race of their ancient Kings: and preſented vnto him Balonymus, whom Curtius calls Abdolominus, IVSTINE Abdolomius, and Plutarch Alynomus: who at the very houre that hee was called to this regall Eſtate, was with his owne handes working in his Garden, ſetting hearbes, and rootes, for his reliefe and ſuſtenance: though otherwiſe a wiſe man and exceeding iuſt.

Theſe were the ancient Kings of Zidon: whoſe eſtate being afterward changed into Popular or Ariſtocraticall: and by times and turnes ſubiected to the Emperours of the Eaſt: there remaineth no farther memorie of them, than that which is formerly deliuered in the Tribe of Aſſer.

The Kings of Tyre, who they were before Samuels time, it doth not appeare: Ioſephus the Hiſtorian, as is ſaide, had many things wherewith hee garniſhed his Antiquities from the Tyrian Chronicles: and out of Ioſephus, and Theophilus Antiochenus, there may be gathered a deſcent of ſome twentie Kings of the Tyrians, but theſe Authors; though they both pretend to write out of Menander Epheſius, doe in no ſort agree in the times of their raignes; nor in other particulars.

Abibalus is the firſt King of the Tyrians, that Ioſephus and Theophilus remember: whom Theophilus calls Abemalus: the ſame perchance that the ſonne of Sirach mentioneth in his fourtie and ſixth Chapter, ſpeaking of the Princes of the Tyrians. c.46.

To this Abibalus, Suron ſucceeded, if hee be not one and the ſame with Abibalus. Dauid (ſaith Euſebius out of Eupolemus) conſtrained this Suron to pay him Tribute, of whom alſo Dauid complaineth *Pſal.*83. Prep.Euang.l.9. c.4.

Hiram ſucceeded Suron, whom Ioſephus calls Irom, and Theophilus ſometime Hieromenus, ſometime Hieromus, but Tatian and Zonaras Chiram. He entred into a league with Dauid, and ſent him Cedars with Maſons, and Carpenters, to performe his buildings in Hieruſalem: after he had beaten thence the Iebuſites. The ſame was hee that ſo greatly aſſiſted Salomon: whom he not only furniſhed with Cedars, and other Materialls towards the raiſing of the Temple, and with great ſummes of money, but alſo he ioyned with him in his enterprize of the Eaſt India, and of Ophir: and furniſhed Salomon with Mariners and Pilots: the Tyrians being of all Nations the moſt excellent Nauigators: and lent him 120. talents of gold. Of this Hiram there is not onely mention in diuers places of Scripture, but in Ioſephus in his Antiquities the 7. and 8. chap. 2. & 3. in Theophilus his 3d booke, in Tatianus his Oration againſt the Grecians: and in Zonaras Tome the firſt. This Prince ſeemed to be very mighty and magnificent, he deſpiſed the 20. townes which Salomon offered him: he defended himſelfe againſt 2.Sam.5.&c. 2.Sam.c.5. 1.King.c.1.9.10 1.Chron.14. 2.Chron.2.8.9.

that victorious King Dauid and gaue his Daughter in marriage to Salomon, called
1. King. 11. the Zidonian: for whose sake he was contented to worship Asteroth, the Idoll of the Phœnicians. Hiram liued 53. yeeres.

Theoph. 17. yeeres. Baleastartus whom Theoph. Antiochenus, calleth Bazorus, succeeded Hiram, King of Tyre and Zidon, and raigned 7. yeeres according to Iosephus.

Abdastartus the eldest sonne of Baleastartus, gouerned 9. yeeres, and liued but 20. yeeres according to Iosephus: but after Theophilus he raigned 12. yeere, and liued 54. who being slaine by the foure sonnes of his owne Nurce, the eldest of them held the Kingdome 12. yeeres.

Astartus brother to Abdastartus, recouered the Kingdome from this Vsurper, and raigned 12. yeeres.

Ioseph. 54. Theoph. 58. Astarimus, or Atharimus, after Theophilus, a third brother followed Astartus, and ruled 9. yeeres, and liued in all 54.

Theoph. Phelles the fourth sonne of Baleastartus, and brother to the three former Kings, slew Astarimus, and raigned 8. Moneths; liued 55. yeeres.

Ithobalus (or Iuthobalus, in Theophilus) son to the third brother Astarimus, who was the chiefe Priest of the Goddesse Astarta, which was a dignitie next vnto the King, reuenged the death of his father, and slaughtered his Vncle Phelles: and raigned 32.
Ioseph. 32. Theoph. 12. yeeres, the same which in the first of Kings chap. 16. is called Ethbaal, whose Daughter Iezabel, Achab married.

1. King. 16. v. 31 Ioseph 6. yeeres Theoph. 26. Badezor or Bazor the sonne of Ithobalus or Ethbaal, brother to Iezabel, succeeded his Father, and raigned 6. yeeres, and liued in all 45.

Ioseph. 9. Theoph. 29. Mettimus succeeded Badezor, and raigned but 9. yeeres, (saith Iosephus) he had two sonnes Pygmalion and Barca, and two Daughters Elisa and Anna.

Pygmalion raigned after Mettimus his Father 40. yeeres, and liued 56: In the 7. yeere of whose raigne, Elisa sailed into Affrica, and built Carthago, 143. yeeres and 8. Moneths, after the Temple of Salomon: which by our accompt was 289. yeeres after Troy taken, and 143. before Rome: and therefore that fiction by Virgil of Æneas and Dido must be farre out of square. For Pygmalion couetous of Sicheus his riches, who had married his sister Elisa, slew him traiterously as hee accompanied him
Iustin. l. 11. Virgil. l. 1. in hunting: or if wee beleeue Iustine and Virgil, at the Altar: whereupon Elisa fearing to be despoiled of her husbands treasure, fled by Sea into Affrica as aforesaid: whom when Pygmalion prepared to pursue, he was by his Mothers teares, and by threates from the Oracle arrested. Barca accompanied his sister, and assisted her, in the erection of Carthage: and from him sprang that noble Familie of the Barcæ in Affrica, of which race descended many famous Captaines, and the great Hannibal. Seruius interprets this name of Dido by Virago, because of her man-like acts, others from Iedidia, a surname of Salomon.

Eluleus succeeded Pygmalion: and raigned 36. yeeres: the same that ouerthrew the fleete of Salmanassar, in the Port of Tyre: notwithstanding which hee continued his siege before it on the Land side fiue yeeres, but in vaine.

After Eluleus, Ethobales gouerned the Tyrians, who vaunted himselfe to bee as wise as Daniel: and that he knew all secrets (saith Ezekiel) of whom the Prophet writeth at large in his 28. Chapter: out of whom it is gathered, that this Prince died, or was slaine in that long siege of Nabuchodonosor: who serrounded and attempted Tyre 13. yeeres together, ere he preuailed.

Baal followed Ethobales, and raigned 10. yeeres a tributarie, perchance, to Nabuchodonosor: for after his death it was gouerned by diuers Iudges, succeeding each other: Firſt, by Ecnibalus, then by Chelbis, Abarus the Priest, Mittonus, and Geraſtus, who held it among them some 7. yeeres, and odde Moneths: after whom Balatorus commanded therein as a King for one yeere: after him Merbalus sent from Babylon 4. yeeres: after him Irom sent thence also, 20. yeeres. In the 17. of whose raigne Cyrus beganne to gouerne Persia.

§. III.

§. III.

Of BOZIVS his conceit that the Edumæans inhabiting along the Red Sea, were the Progenitors of the Tyrians, and that the Tyrians from them receiued and brought into Phœnicia the knowledge of the true GOD.

OF the great mutations of this Kingdome and State of the Tyrians, mixed with a discourse of diuers other Nations, there is one Bozius that hath written a Tract at large, intituled de ruinis Gentium. And although the great, and many alterations found in this and other Cities, yea in all things vnder Heauen, haue proceeded from his ordinance who onely is vnchangeable, and the same for euer; yet whereas the said Bozius, inforcing heerehence, that the prosperitie and ruine of the Tyrians were fruits of their imbracing or forsaking the true Religion, to proue this his assertion, supposeth the Tyrians to haue beene Edumæans, descended from Esau, Iacobs brother: first, it can hardly be beleeued that Tyre, when it flourished most in her ancient glorie, was in any sort truely deuout and religious. But to this end (besides the proofe which the Scriptures giue of Hirams good affection when Salomon built the Temple) he brings many coniecturall arguments: whereof the strongest is their petigree and descent: it being likely in his opinion, that the posteritie of Esau receiued from him by Tradition the Religion of Abraham and Isaac. That the Tyrians were Edumæans, he endeuours to shew, partly by weake reasons, painefully strained from some affinitie of names, which are arguments of more delight than waight: partly by authoritie. For Strabo, Herodotus, Plinie, and others witnesse, that the Tyrians came from the Red Sea, in which there were three Ilands, called Tyrus, Aradus, and Sidon: which very names (as he thinketh) were afterwards giuen to the Cities of Phœnicia. Considering therefore that all the coast of the Red Sea, was (in his opinion) vnder the Edumæans: as Elah and Esiongaber; or vnder the Amalekites, who descended of Amalec the Nephew of Esau, whose chiefe Citie was Madian, so called of Madian the sonne of Abraham by Cethura, whose posteritie did people it: the consequence appeares good (as he takes it) that the Tyrians originally were Edomites: differing little or nothing in Religion from the children of Israel. Hereunto hee addes that Cadmus and his Companions brought not into Greece the worship of Astartis, the Idoll of the Sidonians. That the Parents of Thales and Pherecydes being Phœnicians, themselues differed much in their Philosophie from the Idolatrous customes of the Greekes. That in Teman, a Towne of the Edumæans, was an Vniuersitie, wherein as may appeare by Eliphas the Temanite, who disputed with Iob, Religion was sincerely taught.

Boz. de ruin. Gent. l. 5. c. 7.

Such is the discourse of Bozius, who labouring to proue one Paradoxe by an other, deserues in both very little credit. For neither doth it follow, that if the Tyrians were Edumæans, they were then of the true Religion, or well affected to God and his People: neither is it true that they were Edumæans at all. In what Religion Esau brought vp his children it is no where found written, but that himselfe was a prophane man, and disauowed by God, the Scriptures in plaine termes expresse. That his posteritie were Idolaters, is directly proued in the fiue and twentieth Chapter of the second booke of Chronicles. That the Edomites were perpetuall enemies to the House of Israel, saue only when Dauid and some of his race, Kings of Iuda, held them in subiection, who knowes not? or who is ignorant of Dauids vnfriendly behauiour amongst them, when first they were subdued? Surely it was not any argument of Kindred or Alliance, betweene Tyrus and Mount Seir, that Hiram held such good correspondence with Dauid: euen then when Ioab slew all the Males of Edom: neither was it for their deuotion to God, and good affection to Israel, that the Edomites were so ill intreated. It seemeth that the pietie and ancient wisedome of Eliphaz the Themanite was then forgotten, and the Edumæans punished, for being such as Dauid in his owne dayes found them. Although indeed the Citie of Teman whence Eliphaz came to reason with Iob, is not that in Edumæa, but another of the same name, lying East from the Sea of Galilee, and adioyning to Hus, the Countrie of Iob: and to Sueh the Citie of Bildad the Suhite, as both such Chorographers who best knew those parts, doe plainely shew, and the holy Text makes manifest. For Iob is said to haue exceeded in riches; and Salomon in wisedome, all the people of the East; not the inhabitants of Mount Seir, which lay due South from Palestina. True it is that Eliphaz the sonne of Esau had a sonne called Teman: but that Fathers were wont in those dayes to take name of their sonnes, I no where finde. And Ismael also had a sonne called Thema: of whom it is not vnlike that Theman in the East had the name: for as much as in the seuenth Chapter of the booke of Iudges, the Midianites, Amalekites, and all they of the East are called Ismaelites. And he that well considers how great and strong a Nation Amalec was, which durst giue battaile to the Host of Israel, wherein were 600000. able men, will hardly beleeue that such a people were descended from one of Esau his grand-children. For how powerfull and numberlesse must the forces of all Edom haue beene: if one Tribe of them, yea one Familie of a Tribe had beene so great? surely Mount Seir and all the Regions adioyning could not haue held them. But wee no where finde that Edom had to doe with Amalec: or assisted the Amalekites: when Saul went to roote them out. For Amalec is no where in Scripture named as a Tribe of Edom: but a Nation of it selfe, if distinct from the Ismaelites. The like may be said of Midian, that the Founder thereof being sonne to Abraham by Cethura, doubtlesse was no Edomite. And thus much in generall for all the Seignorie of the Red Sea-coast, which Bozius imagines the Edumæans to haue held: if the Edomites in after-times held some places as Elan and Esiongaber on the Red Sea shore, yet in Moses time, which was long after the building of Tyre, they held them not. For Moses himselfe saith, that Israel did compasse all the borders of Edom: within which limits had Midian stood, Moses must needs haue knowne it: because he had sojourned long in that Countrie: and there had left his Wife and Children, when he went into Ægypt.

But coniecturall Arguments, how probable soeuer, are needlesse in so manifest a case. For in the 83. Psal. Edom, Amalec, and Tyre, are named as distinct Nations: yea the Tyrians and Sidonians being one people, as all good Authors shew, and Bozius himselfe confesseth, were Canaanites, as appeares, Gen. c. 10. v. 15. & 19. appointed by God to haue beene destroyed, and their Lands giuen to the children of Asser Ios. 29. because they were euer Idolaters, and of the cursed seede of Canaan, not Cousins to Israel, nor professors of the same Religion. For though Hiram said, Blessed be God that hath sent King DAVID a wise sonne, wee cannot inferre that hee was of Dauids Religion. The Turke hath said as much of Christian Princes, his confederates. Certaine it is that the Sidonians then worshipped Astaroth; and drew Salomon also to the same Idolatrie.

Whereas Hiram aided Salomon in building the Temple, hee did it for his owne endes, receiuing therefore of Salomon great prouision of Corne, and Oile, and the offer of twentie Townes or Villages in Galilee. And if wee rightly consider things, it will appeare that Hiram, in all points, dealt Merchant-like with Salomon, Hee allowed him Timber, with which Libanus was, and yet is ouer-pestered: being otherwise apt to yeeld silkes: as the Andarine silkes which come from thence, and other good commodities. For Corne and Oile, which hee wanted, hee gaue that which hee could well spare to Salomon. Also gold for Land: wherein Salomon was the wiser: who hauing got the gold first, gaue to Hiram the worst Villages that hee had: with which the Tyrian was ill pleased. But it was a necessarie police which inforced Tyrus to hold league with Israel. For Dauid had subdued Moab, Ammon, Edom, the Aramites, and a great part of Arabia, euen to Euphrates: through which Countries the Tyrians were wont to carrie and recarrie their Wares on Cammells, to their fleetes on the Red Sea; and backe againe to Tyrus: ſo that Salomon being Lord of all the Countries through which they were to paſſe, could haue cut off their Trade.

But the Iſraelites were no Sea-men, and therefore glad to ſhare with the Tyrians in their aduentures. Yet Salomon as Lord of the Sea-townes, which his Father had taken from the Philiſtims, might haue greatly diſtreſſed the Tyrians, and perhaps haue brought them euen into ſubiection. Which Hiram knowing, was glad (and no meruaile) that Salomon rather meant as a man of peace to employ his Fathers treaſure, in magnificent workes, than in purſuing the conqueſt of all Syria. Therefore hee willingly aided him, and ſent him cunning workmen, to increaſe his delight in goodly buildings, imageries, and inſtruments of pleaſure.

As theſe paſſages betweene Salomon and Hiram, are no ſtrong Arguments of pietie in the Tyrians: ſo thoſe other prooles which Bozius frames negatiuely vpon particular examples, are very weake. For what the Religion of Cadmus was, I thinke, no man knowes. It ſeemes to me, that hauing more cunning than the Greekes, and being very ambitious, hee would faine haue purchaſed diuine honours: which his Daughters, Nephewes, and others of his houſe obtained, but his owne many misfortunes beguiled him of ſuch hopes, if hee had any. Thales and Pherecydes are but ſingle examples. Euery ſaluage Nation hath ſome whoſe wiſedome excelleth the Vulgar, euen of ciuill people. Neither did the morall wiſedome of theſe men expreſſe any true knowledge of the true God. Only they made no good mention of the Gods of Greece: whome being newly come thither, they knew not. It is no good argument to ſay, that Cadmus and Thales being Tyrians, are not knowne to haue taught Idolatrie, therefore the Tyrians were not Idolaters. But this is of force, That Carthage, Vtica, Leptis, Cadiz, and all Colonies of the Tyrians (of which, I thinke, the Ilands before mentioned in the Red Sea to haue been, for they traded in all Seas) were Idolaters, euen from their firſt beginnings: therefore, the Tyrians who planted them, and to whom they had reference, were ſo likewiſe.

This their Idolatry from Salomons time on-wards is acknowledged by Bozius, who would haue vs thinke them to haue been formerly a ſtrange kinde of deuout Edomites. In which fancie he is ſo peremptory, that he ſtileth men of contrary opinion, impios politicos, as if it were impiety to thinke that God (who euen among the Heathen, which haue not knowne his name, doth fauour Vertue and hate Vice) hath often rewarded morall honeſtie, with temporall happineſſe. Doubtleſſe this doctrine of Bozius would better haue agreed with Iulian the Apoſtata, than with Cyril. For if the Aſſyrians, Greekes, Romanes, and all thoſe Nations of the Gentiles, did then proſper moſt, when they drew neereſt vnto the true Religion: what may bee ſaid of the foule Idolatry which grew in Rome, as faſt as Rome it ſelfe grew: and was inlarged with ſome new ſuperſtition, almoſt vpon euery new victory? How few great battailes did the Romanes winne, in which they vowed not either a Temple to ſome new God, or ſome new Honour to one of their old Gods? yea, what one Nation, ſaue onely that of the Iewes, was ſubdued by them, whoſe Gods they did not afterward entertaine in their Citie? Onely the true God, which was the God of the Iewes, they reiected, vpbraiding the Iewes with him, as if hee were vnworthy of the Romane Maieſtie: ſhall we herevpon enforce the lewd and fooliſh concluſion, which Heathen writers vſed againſt the Chriſtians in the Primitiue Church: That ſuch Idolatrie had cauſed the Citie of Rome to flouriſh, and that the decay of thoſe abominations did alſo bring with it the decay of the Empire? It might well be thought ſo, if proſperitie were a ſigne or effect of true Religion. Such is the blind zeale of Bozius, who writing againſt thoſe whom he falſely termes impious, giues ſtrength to ſuch as are impious indeede. But ſuch indiſcretion is vſually found among men of his humour; who hauing once either fooliſhly imbraced the dreames of others, or vainely faſhioned in their owne braines any ſtrange Chimera's of Diuinitie, condemne all ſuch in the pride of their zeale, as Atheiſts and Infidels, that are not tranſported with the like intemperate ignorance. Great pittie it is that such madde Dogges are oftentimes incouraged by those, who having the command of many tongues, when they themselues cannot touch a man in open and generous opposition, will wound him secretly by the malicious vertue of an Hypocrite.

CHAP. IX.

Of the Tribe of EPHRAIM, and of the Kings of the tenne Tribes, whose head was EPHRAIM.

§. I.

Of the memorable places in the Tribe of EPHRAIM.

Psal. 59. 78. 108 Par. 25.

HAVING now past ouer Phœnicia, we come to the next Territory adioyning: which is that of Ephraim: sometime taken per excellentiam for the whole Kingdome of the tenne Tribes. Ephraim was the second sonne of Ioseph, whose issues when they left Ægypt were in number 45000. all which dying in the Desarts (Iosua excepted) there entred the Holy Land of their children growne to bee able men 32500. who sate downe on the West side of Iordan, betweene Manasse, and Beniamin: who bounded Ephraim by the North and South; as Iordan, and the Mediterran Sea, did by the East and West.

The first and chiefe Citie which Ephraim had, was Samaria, the Metropolis of the Kingdome of Israel, built by Amris or Homri King thereof, and seated on the top of the Mountaine Somren, which ouer-looketh all the bottome, and as farre as the Sea-coast. It was afterward called Sebaste, or Augusta, in honour of August. Cæsar. This Citie is often remembred in the Scriptures: and magnificent it was in the first building; for as Brochard obserueth, the ruines which yet remaine, and which Brochard found greater then those of Hierusalem, tell those that behold them, what it was when it stood vpright: for to this day there are found great store of goodly marble pillars, with other hewne and carued stone in great abundance, among the rubble.

It was beaten to the ground by the Sonnes of Hircanus the high Priest: restored and built by the first Herod the sonne of Antipater: who to flatter Cæsar called it Sebaste. Herein were the Prophets Helisæus, and Abdias buried: and so was Iohn Baptist. It now hath nothing but a few Cottages filled with Grecian Monkes.

Neere Samaria toward the South, is the Hill of Bethel, and a towne of that name: on the top of which Mountaine Ieroboam erected one of his golden Calues, to bee worshipped: with which he seduced the Israelites.

Sichar. Ioh. 4. 5. Maborthan. Ioseph. 11. ant. 14.

In sight of this Mountaine of Bethel, was that ancient Citie of Sichem; after the restauration called Neapolis, now Peloſa, and Napolosa: It was destroyed by Simeon and Leui, in reuenge of the rauishment of their sister Dina: and after that by Abimelec cuened euened with the ſoyle. Ieroboam raiſed it vp againe: and the Damaſcens a third time caſt it downe.

Vnder Sichem toward the Sea ſtandeth Pharaton or Pirhathon on the Mountaine Amelec, the Citie of Abdon Iudge of Iſrael. And vnder it Betheron of the Leuites, built as it is ſaid by Sara, the Daughter of Ephraim. Neere to this Citie Iudas Maccha-baus ouerthrew Seron and Lyſias, Lieutenants to Antiochus. This Citie had Salomon formerly repaired and fortified. *Iudg.*12.15. 2.*King.*13.

Betweene Betheron and the Sea, ſtandeth Samir, of which *Ioſ.*10. And Saron whoſe King was ſlaine by Ioſua: it is alſo mentioned Acts 9.35. and of this Saron the Valley taketh name, which beginning at Cæſarea Palaſtina, extendeth it ſelfe alongſt the coaſt as farre as Ioppe, ſaith Adrichome. Though indeed the name Sarona is not particularly giuen to this Valley, but to euery fruitfull plaine Region; for not onely this Valley is ſo called, to wit, betweene Cæſarea and Ioppe, but that alſo betweene the Mountaine Tabor and the Sea of Galilee: for ſo S. Hierome vpon the fiue and thirtieth Chapter of Eſay interprets the word Saron: and ſo doth the ſame Father in his Commentaries vpon Abdia, reade Saron for Aſſaron: vnderſtanding thereby a Plaine neere Lidda: which Lidda in his time was called Dioſpolis, or the Citie of Iupiter, one of the Toparchies of Iudæa, the fift in dignitie (or the third after Plinie) where Saint PETER (non ſua ſed Chriſti virtute) cured Æneas. Niger calls all that Region from Anti-libanus to Ioppe Sarona. This Ioppe was burnt to the ground by the Romanes, thoſe Rauens and ſpoylers of all Eſtates, diſturbers of Common-weales, vſurpers of other Princes Kingdomes; who with no other reſpect led than to amplifie their owne glory, troubled the whole world: and themſelues, after murthering one another, became a prey to the moſt ſaluage and barbarous Nations. *Ioſ.*12.18. *Act.*6. *Luc.*23. *Niger.Comm.*4. *Aſiæ.fol.*503.14.

In Dioſpolis (ſaith Will. of Tyre) was S. George beheaded, and buried: in whoſe honour and memorie Iuſtinian the Emperour cauſed a faire Church to bee built ouer his Tombe, theſe be Tyrius his wordes: Relicta à dextris locis maritimis Antipatride, & Ioppe, per latè patentem planitiem Eleutheriam pertranſeuntes, Liddam quæ eſt Dioſpolis, vbi & egregij Martyris GEORGII vſque hodiè Sepulchrum oſtenditur, peruenerunt, eius Eccleſiam quum ad honorem eiuſdem Martyris pius & orthodoxus Princeps Romanorum, AVGVSTVS IVSTINIANVS multo ſtudio & deuotione prompta ædificari præcepe-rat, &c. They hauing left (ſaith he) on the right hand, the Sea Townes Antipatris, and Ioppe, paſſing ouer the great open plaine of Eleutheria, came to Lidda, which is Dioſpolis: where the ſumptuous Tombe of the famous Martyr S. GEORGE is at this day ſhewed; whoſe Church, when the Godly and Orthodoxe Prince of the Romanes, High and Mightie IVSTINIAN had commanded to bee built, with great earneſtneſſe and preſent deuotion, &c. Thus farre Tyrius, by whoſe teſtimonie we may coniecture that this S. George was not that Arrian Biſhop of Alexandria; but rather ſome better Chriſtian: for this of Alexandria was ſlaine there in an vprore of the people, and his aſhes caſt into the Sea, as Ammianus Marcellinus reports. And yet alſo it may bee, that this Georgius was a better Chriſtian, than hee is commonly thought: for his wordes of the Temple of GENIVS, How long ſhall this Sepulchre ſtand? occaſioned the vprore of the people againſt him: as fearing leſt hee would giue attempt to ouerthrow that beautifull Temple. This alſo Marcellinus reports; who though hee ſay that this Georgius was alſo deadly hated of the Chriſtians, who elſe might haue reſcued him: yet hee addeth that his aſhes, with the aſhes of two others, were therefore caſt into the Sea, leſt if their Reliques had been gathered vp, Churches ſhould bee built for them, as for others. But for my part, I rather thinke that it was not this Georgius, whoſe name liues in the right honourable Order of our Knights of the Garter, but rather another, whom Tyrius, aboue cited, witneſſeth to haue been buried at Lidda or Dioſpolis. The ſame alſo is confirmed by Vitriac. S. Hierome affirmes that it was ſometime called Tigrida, and while the Chriſtians inhabited the Holy Land, it had a Biſhop Suffragan. Of this Saint George ſee more aboue in this ſecond Booke. C.7.§.3.†.5. *L.*12.c.11. *Salig.Tom.*6.c.4

Neere to Lidda or Dioſpolis ſtandeth Ramatha of the Leuites, or Aramathia: afterward ward Rama, and Ramula, the native Citie of Ioseph, which buried the body of Christ. There are many places which beare this name of Rama; one they set in the Tribe of Iuda neere Thecua in the way of Hebron; another in Nephtalim, not farre from Sephet; a third in Zabulon, which, they say, adioyneth to Sephoris; a fourth, which they make the same with Silo; and a fifth, which is this Rama, in the Hils of Ephraim, called Rama-Sophim, where Samuel liued; and wherin he is buried.

See in the Tribe of Beniamin, cap. 12. §. 1.

Sam. 1. c. 25. v. 5

From hence to the North alongst the coast are Helon, or Aialon of the Leuites, of which 1. Chron 6. Apollonia, of which Iosephus in his Antiquities, and in the Warre of the Iewes. Also Balsalisa (for which Iunius, 2. Reg. 4. 42. reades planities Shalisæ) they place hereabout in this Tribe of Ephraim; but Iunius vpon 1. Sam. 6. where we reade of the Land of Shalisha, findeth it in Beniamin.

Ant. 13. 21. de Bell. Ind. 1. 6.

On the other side of the Mountaines of Ephraim standeth Gosna, one of the Toparchies or Cities of gouernment, the second in dignitie, of which the Countrey about it taketh name.

Then Thamnath-sara, or according to the Hebrew, Thimnath-Serach: one also of the ten Toparchies or Præsidencies of Iudæa, which they call Thamnitica; a goodly Citie and strong, seated on one of the high Hills of Ephraim; on the North of the Hill called Gaas; which Citie and Territory Israel gaue vnto their Leader Iosua; who also amplified it with buildings, neere which he was buried. His Sepulchre remained in S. Hieroms time, and ouer it the Sunne ingrauen, in memory of that greatest of wonders, which God wrought in Iosua's time.

Iudg 2. 9. It is called Thimnath Chores. Ios. 19. 50.

In the places adioyning standeth Adarsa, or Adasa; where Iudas Maccabeus with 3000. Iewes ouerthrew the Armie of Nicanor, Lieutenant of Syria; neere to Gaser or Gezer which Iosua tooke, and hung their King; a Citie of the Leuites. It was afterward taken by Pharao of Ægypt; the people all slaine, and the Citie razed; Salomon rebuilt it.

Maccab. 1. 7. 40.

To the East of this place is the Frontier Citie of Iesleti, of which Ios. 16. 3. otherwise Pelethi, whence Dauid had part of his Prætorian Souldiers, vnder the charge of Benaia. Then that high and famous Mountaine and Citie of Silo, whereon the Arke of God was kept so many yeeres, till the Philistims got it.

To this they ioyne the Citie of Machmas or Michmas: in which Ionathas Macchabæus inhabited, a place often remembred in the Scriptures. It standeth in the common way from Samaria towards Hierusalem: and is now called Byra.

See in Beniamin. Maccab. 1. 9. v. vlt.

Then the Village of Naioth where Saul prophecied; and neere it Ephron, one of those Cities which Abijah recouered from Ieroboam; after the great ouerthrow giuen him. Then Kirsaim of the Leuites, of which Iosua 21. 22. which Iunius thinkes to be the same with Iokmeham, of which 1. Chro. 6. 28. As for Absaloms Baalasor, which they finde hereabout, Iunius reades it the Plaine of Chatzor; and finds it in the Tribe of Iuda; as Ios. 15. wee reade of two Chatzors in that Tribe; one neere Kedesh v. 23. and the other the same as Chetzron v. 25.

King. 1. c. 4. and see Rana in Beniamin.

In this Tribe also they finde the Citie of Mello; whose Citizens, they say, ioyned with the Sichemites in making the Bastard Abimelec King: adding that for the building thereof with other Cities, Salomon raised a Tribute vpon the people. But it seemes that Mello or Millo is a common name of a strong Fort or Cittadell: and so Iunius for domus Millo, reades incolæ munitionis, and for Salomo ædificabit Millo, he reades ædificabat munitionem, and so the Septuagint reade τὴν ἄκραν in that place. And without doubt the Millo which Salomon built, cannot be that of Sichem, but another in Hierusalem.

The other Cities of marke in Ephraim, are Taphuach, whose King was slaine by Iosua; and Ianoach or Ianoah spoyled by Teglatphalassar; Pekah then gouerning Israel; with diuers others, but of no great fame.

The Mountaines of Ephraim sometime signifie the greatest part of the Land of the Sonnes of Ioseph, on the West of Iordan: seuerall parts whereof are the Hill of Samron or Samaria, 1.Reg.16.24. * the Hill of Gahas, Iudg.2.9. the Hill of Tſalmon or Salmon, Iudg.9.48. the Hills of the Region of Tſuph or Tſophim, Iudg.9.5. where Rama-Tſophim ſtood, which was the Citie of Samuel.

Samron

The great plentie of fruitfull Vines vpon the ſides of the Mountaines, was the occaſion that Iacob in the Spirit of Prophecie, Geneſ.49.22. compared Ioſephs two branches, Ephraim and Manaſſe, to the branches of a fruitfull Vine planted by the Well ſide, and ſpreading her [a] Daughter-branches along the Wall: which Allegory alſo Ezekiel c.22. in his Lamentation for Ephraim (that is, for the tenne Tribes, whoſe head was Ephraim) proſequutes: as alſo in his Lamentation for Iuda, hee followeth the other Allegorie of Iacob, Gen.49.9. comparing Iuda to a Lyon. Vpon the top of one of the higheſt of theſe Hills of Ephraim, which ouer-looketh all the plaines on both ſides of Iordan, they finde the Caſtle called Dok: which they make to bee the ſame with Dagon, of which Ioſeph. 1.Bell.Iudg.c.2. in which Caſtle as it is 1.Maccab.16 Ptolomie moſt traiterouſly, at a banquet, ſlewe Simon Maccabeus his Father-in-Law.

Among the Riuers of this Tribe of Ephraim, they name Gaas, remembred in the ſecond of Samuel, c.23.v.30. where though Iunius reade Hiddai ex vna vallium Gahaſi: yet the Vulgar and Vatablus read Hiddai of the Riuer of Gaas. Alſo in this Tribe they place the Riuer of Carith, by which the Prophet Elias abode during the great droughth: where he was [b] fed with the Rauens: and after that the Riuer was dried vp, he trauailed (by the Spirit of God guided) towards Sidon: where he was relieued by the poore Widow of Zarepta, whoſe dead ſonne he reuiued, and increaſed her pittance of Meale and Oyle: whereby ſhe ſuſtained her life.

* Alſo the Hill of Phinehas, where Eleazar the high Prieſt the ſon of Aaron, was buried, Ioſ.24.33. And the two tops of Hils, Gerizim wher the bleſſings, & Hebal where the curſings were to be read to the people: of which Deut.11 & 27. & Ioſ.8.

a It ſeemeth that Iacob in this prophecie the rather vſeth the word Daughters for branches, thereby the more plainely to ſignifie Colonies: which in the Hebrew phraſe are called Daughters of the Metropolis: as in Ioſua and eliwhere oftē.

§. II.

Of the Kings of the ten Tribes from IEROBOAM to ACHAB.

OF the firſt Kings of Iſrael, I omit in this place to ſpeake: and reſerue it to the Catalogue of the Kings of Iuda: of whom hereafter.

Touching the acts of the Kings of the ten Tribes, but briefly, beginning after the diuiſion from Iuda and Beniamin, now it followeth to ſpeake. The firſt of theſe Kings was Ieroboam, the ſonne of Nebat, an Ephrathite of Zereda, who being a man of ſtrength and courage, was by Salomon made ouer-ſeer of the buildings of the Millo or Munition in Hieruſalem, for as much as belonged to the charge of the Tribes of Ephraim and Manaſſe: and ſo many of them as wrought in thoſe workes. During which time as he went from Hieruſalem, hee encountred the Prophet Ahijah: who made him know that he was by God deſtinied to be King of Iſrael: and to command ten of the twelue Tribes. After this fearing that thoſe things might come to Salomons knowledge, hee fled into Ægypt to Shiſhak, whom Euſebius calleth Oſochores, whoſe Daughter hee married: the Predeceſſour of which Shiſhak (if not the ſame) did likewiſe entertaine Adad the Idumean, when he was carried yong into Ægypt from the furie of Dauid, and his Captaine Ioab; which Adad, the King of Ægypt married to his Wiues ſiſter Taphnes; vſing both him and Ieroboam as inſtruments to ſhake the Kingdome of Iudæa; that himſelfe might the eaſilier ſpoile it, as he did: for in the fifth yeere of Rehoboam, Shiſhak ſackt the Citie of Hieruſalem, and carried thence all the treaſure of Dauid and Salomon, and all the ſpoiles which Dauid tooke from Adadezer of Soba, with the preſents of Tohu, King of Hamath, which were of an ineſtimable value. 1.Reg.14.

This Ieroboam after the death of Salomon became Lord of the ten Tribes: and though he were permitted by God to gouerne the Iſraelites, and from a meane man exalted to that ſtate: yet preferring the policies of the world before the ſeruice and honour of God (as fearing that if the Tribes vnder his rule ſhould repaire to Hieruſa- lem to doe their vsuall Sacrifices, they might bee drawne from him by degrees) he erected two golden Calues, one in Dan, and another in Bethel, for the people to worship (an imitation of the Ægyptian Apis, saith S. Ambrose, or rather of Aarons Calfe in Horeb) further he made election of his Priests out of the baseſt and vnlearned people. This King made his chiefe seate and Palace at Sichem: He despised the warning of the Iudæan Prophet, whome Iosephus calleth Adon, and Glycas Ioel: His hand there-after withered, and was againe restored: but continuing in his Idolatry, and hardened vpon occasion that the Prophet returning was slaine by a Lyon, Ahijah makes him know, that God purposed to roote out his posteritie.

Ambrose vpon the 1. Chap. of the Epistle to the Romanes.

1. King. 11. 12. 13. 14. 15. Chron. 13.

He was afterward ouerthrowne by Abia King of Iuda, and died after he had gouerned two and twenty yeeres; whom Nadab his sonne succeeded: who in the second yeere of his reigne, together with all the race of Ieroboam was slaine, and rooted out by Baasha, who reigned in his stead: so Nadab liued King but two yeeres.

Baasha the sonne of Ahijah, the third King after the partition, made warre with Asa King of Iuda: hee seated himselfe in Thersa: and fortified Rama against Iuda, to restraine their excursions. Hereupon Asa entertained Benhadad of Damascus against him, who inuaded Nephtalim, and destroyed many places therein: the meane while Asa carried away the Materials, with which Baasha intended to fortifie Rama; but being an Idolater, he was threatned by Iehu the Prophet, that it should befall his race, as it did to Ieroboam: which afterward came to passe: He ruled foure and twentie yeeres and died.

1. Kin. 15. & 16

To Baasha succeeded Ela his sonne, who at a feast at his Palace of Thersa, was in his cups slaine by Zambris after he had reigned two yeeres: and in him the prophecie of Iehu was fulfilled.

Zambris succeeded Ela, and assumed the name of a King seuen dayes; But Ambris in reuenge of the Kings Murther, set vpon Zambris, or Zimri; and inclosed him in Thersa, and forst him to burne himselfe.

1. King. 16.

Ambris or Homri succeeded Ela, and transferred the Regall seate from Thersa to Samaria: which he bought of Shemer, built, and fortified it. This Ambris was also an Idolater, no lesse impious than the rest: and therefore subiected to Tabremmon, King of Syria; the Father of Benadad according to Eusebius, Nicephorus, and Zonaras: but how this should stand, I doe not well conceiue; seeing Benadad the Sonne of Tabremmon was inuited by Asa King of Iuda, to assaile Baasha King of Israel, the Father of Ela who forewent Ambris. This Ambris raigned twelue yeeres, sixe in Thersa, and sixe in Samaria, and left two children, Achab and Athalia.

§. III.

Of ACHAB and his Successors, with the captiuitie of the ten Tribes.

ACHAB or Ahab succeeded Omri, who not onely vp-held the Idolatrie of Ieroboam, borrowed of the Ægyptians: but hee married Iezabel the Zidonian: and as Ieroboam followed the Religion of his Ægyptian Wife: so did Achab of his Zidonian: and erected an Altar and a Groue to Baal in Samaria. He suffered Iezabel to kill the Prophets of the most high God. GOD sent famine on the Land of Israel. Achab met Elias: Elias preuailed in the triall of the Sacrifice, and killeth the false prophets: and afterward flieth for feare of Iezabel.

Benadad, not long after, besieged Samaria: and taken by Achab, was by him set at libertie: for which the Prophet (whom Glycas calleth Micheas) reproueth him: afterward hee caused Naboth by a false accusation to bee stoned. Then ioyning with Ioſaphat in the warre for the recouerie of Ramoth, hee was ſlaine as Michæas had foretold him.

Iosaphat

Hee had three ſonnes named in the Scripture, Ochozias, Ioram, and Ioas: beſides ſeuentie other ſonnes by ſundry wiues and Concubines.

Ochozias ſucceeded his father Achab. The Moabites fell from his obedience: hee bruiſed himſelfe by a fall: and ſent for counſaile to Beel-zebub the God of Acharon. Eliah the Prophet meeteth the meſſenger on the way: and miſliking that Ochozias ſought helpe from that dead Idoll, asked the meſſenger, If there were not a God in Iſrael? Ochozias ſendeth two Captaines, and with each fiftie ſouldiers to bring Eliah vnto him, both which with their Attendants were conſumed with fire. The third Captaine beſought mercie at Eliahs hands, and hee ſpared him, and went with him to the king; auowing it to the king that he muſt then die, which came to paſſe in the ſecond yeere of his raigne.

Beelſe-bub was the ſame with Belus and Pluto, ſaith Vigenere vpon Liui. 2. Kings 1.

Ioram the brother of Ochozias by Iezabel, ſucceeded: He allured Ioſaphat king of Iuda, and the king of Edom to aſſiſt him againſt the Moabites, who refuſed to pay him the tribute of 20000. ſheepe. The three kings wanted water, for themſelues and their horſes, in the Deſarts. The Prophet Eliſha cauſeth the ditches to flow. The Moabites are ouerthrowne: their king flieth to Kirharaſeth, and being beſieged, according to ſome Expoſitors, burnt his ſonne on the walles as a Sacrifice, whereat the three kings moued with compaſſion returned and left Moab, waſting and ſpoyling that Region. Others, as it ſeemes with better reaſon, vnderſtand the Text to ſpeake of the ſonne of the king of Edom, whom they ſuppoſe in this irruption to haue beene taken priſoner, by the Moabites, and that the king of Moab ſhewed him ore the walls, threatning, vnleſſe the ſiege were diſſolued, that he would offer him in ſacrifice to his Gods. Whereupon the king of Edom beſought thoſe of Iuda and Iſrael to breake off the ſiege for the ſafetie of his ſonne: which when the other kings refuſed to yeeld vnto, and that Moab according to his former threatning had burnt the king of Edoms ſonne vpon the rampire, that all the aſſailants might diſcerne it, the king of Edom being by this ſad ſpectacle inraged, forſooke the partie of the other kings; for want of whoſe aſſiſtance the ſiege was broken vp. 2. King. 3.

After this the king of Aram ſent to Ioram, to heale Naaman the Captaine of his Armie of the leprouſie. The anſwere of Ioram was; Am I God to kill, and to giue life, that hee doth ſend to heale a man from his leprouſie? adding, that the Aramite ſought but matter of quarrell againſt him. Eliſha hearing thereof, willed the king to ſend Naaman to him; promiſing that hee ſhould know that there was a Prophet in Iſrael, and ſo Naaman was healed by waſhing himſelfe ſeuen times in Iordan. Eliſha refuſed the gifts of Naaman. But his ſeruant Gehazi accepted a part thereof: from whence the ſellers of ſpirituall gifts are called Gehazites, as the buyers are Simonians of Simon Magus. 2. King. 5.

Afterward Benhadad king of Aram or Damaſcus, hauing heard that this Prophet did diſcouer to the king of Iſrael whatſoeuer the Aramite conſulted in his ſecreteſt councell, ſent a troupe of horſe to take Eliſha: all whom Eliſha ſtrooke blinde, and brought them captiues into Samaria: Ioram then asking leaue of the Prophet to ſlay them, Eliſha forbade him to harme them: but cauſed them to be fed and ſent backe to their owne Prince in ſafetie.

The king of Aram notwithſtanding theſe benefits, did againe attempt Samaria, and brought the Citizens to extreme famine. Ioram imputeth the cauſe thereof to the Prophet Eliſha. Eliſha by prayer cauſed a noiſe of Chariots and armor to ſound in the ayre, whereby the Aramites affrighted, fled away, and left the ſiege; an act of great admiration as the ſame is written in the ſecond of Kings. After this, when Azael obtained the kingdome of Syria by the death of his Maſter, Ioram entring vpon his frontire tooke Ramoth Gilead: in which warre he receiued diuers wounds, and returned to Ieſrael to be cured. But whileſt hee lay there, Iehu (who commanding the armie of Ioram in Gilead, was anoynted king by one of the children of the 2. King. 7.

Prophets sent by Elisha) surprized and slew both him and all that belonged vnto him, rooting out the whole posteritie of Ahab.

Iehu who raigned after Iehoram, destroyed not onely the race of his foregoers, but also their Religion; for which hee receiued a promise from God, That his seede should occupie the Throne vnto the fourth generation. Yet hee vpheld the idolatrie of Ieroboam, for which hee was plagued with grieuous warre, wherein he was beaten by Hazael the Aramite, who spoiled all the Countries to the East of Iordan:
Pag.86. in which warre he was slaine, saith Cedrenus: whereof the Scriptures are silent. Iehu raigned 28. yeeres.

Ioachaz or Iehoahaz the sonne of Iehu succeeded his father, whome Azael and his sonne Benhadad often inuaded, and in the end subiected, leauing him onely 50. horse, 2.King.13. 20. chariots, and 10000. foot; and as it is written in the Scriptures, he made them like dust beaten into powder. Ioachaz raigned 17. yeeres.

After Ioachaz Ioas his sonne gouerned Israel, who when hee repaired to Elisha the Prophet as he lay in his death-bed, the Prophet promised him three victories ouer the Aramites: and first commaunded him to lay his hand on his bowe, and Elisha couered the kings hands with his, and bad him open the window westward (which was toward Damascus) and then shoot an arrow thence out. He againe willed him to beate the ground with his arrowes, who smote it thrice, and ceased: The Prophet then told him, that hee should haue smitten fiue or sixe times, and then hee should haue had so many victories ouer the Aramites as hee gaue strokes. And so it succeeded with Ioas, who ouerthrew the Aramites in three battells, and recouered the Cities and Territorie from Benhadad the sonne of Azael, which his father Ioachaz had lost. He also ouerthrew Amazia king of Iuda, who prouoked him to make the 2.King.14. warre, whereupon hee entred Hierusalem, and sacked it with the Temple. This Ioas raigned sixteene yeeres and died; in whose time also the Prophet Elisha exchanged this life for a better.

Ieroboam the third from Iehu, followed Ioas his father, an Idolater as his predecessors; but hee recouered all the rest of the lands belonging to Israel, from Hamath which is neere Libanus, to the dead Sea, and raigned one and fortie yeeres.

Zacharias the fift and last of the house of Iehu, slaine by Shallum his vassall, who raigned in his stead, gouerned six moneths. Shallum held the kingdome but one moneth, being slaughtered by Menahem of the Gadites.

Menahem who tooke reuenge of Shallum, vsed great crueltie to those that did not acknowledge him: ripping the bellies of those that were with child. This Menahem
2.King.16.19. being inuaded by Phul, bought his peace with ten thousand talents of siluer, which he exacted by a Tribute of fiftie shekels from euery man of wealth in Israel. Menahem gouerned twentie yeeres.

Pekahiah or Phaceia, or after Zonaras Phacesia, succeeded, and after hee had ruled two yeeres, hee was slaine by Phaca or Pekah the Commaunder of his armie, who raigned in his place. In this Pekahs time Phulassar or Tiglat-Phylassar inuaded the kingdome of Israel, and wan Iion, Abel-Bethmaaca, Ianoach, Kedesh, Hasor, and Gi-
2.King.15.29. lead, with all the Cities of Galilee, carrying them captiues into Assyria: he was drawn in by Achas king of Iudaa against Pekah and Rezin, the last of the Adades. For Achas being wasted by Pekah of Israel and by Rezin of Damascus, did a third time borrow the Church riches, and therewith ingaged the Assyrian, who first suppressed the Monarchie of Syria and Damascus, and then of Israel: and this inuiting of the great Assyrian, was the vtter ruine of both States, of Israel and of Iudaa. Pekah raigned twentie yeeres.

Then Hoshea or Osea, who slew Pekah, became the vassall of Salmanassar; but hoping to shake off the Assyrian yoke, he sought aide from So, or Sua, or Sebicus king of Egypt: which being knowne to the Assyrian, he cast him into prison, besieged Samaria, and mastred it: carried the ten idolatrous Tribes into Niniuie in Assyria, and into Rages in Media, and into other Easterne Regions, and there dispersed them:

and

and re-planted Samaria with diuers Nations, and chiefly with the Cuthæ (inhabiting about Cutha a Riuer in Perſia, or rather in Arabia Deſerta) and with the people Catanei bounding vpon Syria, and with thoſe of Sepharuaijm (a people of Sephar in Meſopotamia vpon Euphrates, of whoſe conqueſt Senacherib vaunteth) alſo with thoſe of Ana: which were of the ancient Auins who inhabited the Land of the Philiſtims in Abrahams time, dwelling neere vnto Gaza, whom the Caphtorims rooted out: and at this time they were of Arabia the Deſart, called Hauæi, willing to returne to their ancient ſeates. To theſe he added thoſe of Chamath or Iturea, the ancient enemies of the Iſraelites, and ſometime the Vaſſalls of the Adads of Damaſcus, which ſo often afflicted them. And thus did this Aſſyrian aduiſe himſelfe better than the Romanes did. For after Titus and Veſpaſian had waſted the Cities of Iudæa, and Hieruſalem, they carried the people away captiue: but left no others in their places, but a very few ſimple labourers, beſides their owne thin Garriſons, which ſoone decaied: and thereby they gaue that dangerous entrance to the Arabians and Saracens, who neuer could be driuen thence againe to this day.

CHAP. X.

Of the memorable places of DAN, SIMEON, IVDA, RVBEN, GAD, and the other halfe of MANASSE.

§ I.

Of DAN, where of Ioppe, Gath, Accaron, Azotus, and other Townes.

NOw following the coast of the Mediterran Sea, that portion of Land assigned to the Tribe of Dan, ioyneth to Ephraim, whereof I spake last: of which familie there were numbred at Mount Sinai 62700. fighting men, all which leauing their bodies with the rest in the Deserts, there entred the Holy Land of their sonnes 66400. bearing armes. The first famous Citie in this V.46. Tribe on the Sea coast was Ioppe, or Iapho, as in the 19. of Iosua: one of the most ancientest of the World, and the most famous of others on that coast, because it was the Port of Hierusalem. From hence Ionas imbarked himselfe when hee fled from the seruice of God, towards Tharsis in Cilicia. In the time of the Macchabees this Citie receiued many changes: and while Iudas Macchabæus gouerned the Iewes, the Syrians that were Garrison in Ioppe, hauing their fleet in the Port, inuited 200. prin- Macc.2.12. cipall Citizens aboord them, and cast them all into the Sea: which Iudas reuenged by firing their fleet, and putting the companies which sought to escape to the sword.

It was twice taken by the Romanes, and by Cestius the Lieutenant vtterly burnt and ruined. But in the yeare of Christ 1250. Lodonick the French King gaue it new Walls and Towers: It is now the Turkes, and called Iaffa. There are certaine Rocks in that Port, whereunto it is reported that Andromeda was fastned with chaines: and from thence deliuered from the Sea-Monster by Perseus. This fable (for so I take it) L.3.1.15.de bel. Iud.Solin.c.47. Plin.l.5.c.9. is confirmed by Iosephus, Solinus, and Plinie. Marcus Scaurus during his office of Ædileship, shewed the bones of this Monster to the people of Rome. S. Hierome vpon Ionas speakes of it indifferently.

The next vnto Ioppe was Iamnia, where Iudas Macchabæus burnt the rest of the Sy- 2.Macc.12. rian fleet: the fire and flame whereof was seene at Hierusalem 240. furlongs off. It De Bell. sacr. had sometime a Bishops seate, saith Will. of Tyre; But there is no signe of it at this time that such a place there was.

After Iamnia is the Citie of Geth or Gath, sometime Anthedon, saith Volaterran. And F.244. so Montanus seemes to vnderstand it. For he sets it next to Ægypt, of all the Philistim Cities, and in the place of Anthedon. But Volaterran giues neither reason nor authoritie for his opinion; for Ptolomie sets Anthedon farre to the South of Ioppe: And Geth was the first and not the last (beginning from the North) of all the great Cities of the Philistims: and about sixteene miles from Ioppe; where S^t. Hierome in his time found a great Village of the same name. It was sometime the Habitation and Hieron.in Micheam. Seminarie of the Anakims: strong and Giant-like-men, whom Iosua could not expell, nor the Danites after him: nor any of the Israelites, till Dauids time: who slew Goliath, as his Captaines did diuers others not much inferiour in strength and stature vnto Goliath.

Roboam

Roboam the Sonne of Salomon rebuilt Geth: Ozias the sonne of Amazia destroied it againe. It was also laid waste by Azael King of Syria. Pelke the fourth King of Hierusalem, built a Castle in the same place out of the old ruines. Whether this Geth was the same that Will. of Tyre in the holy Warre calls Ibylin, I much doubt: the errour growing by taking Gath for Anthedon. L.21.c.18.

Not farre from Geth or Gath standeth Bethsemes or the house of the Sunne. In the fields adioyning to this Citie (as is thought) was the Arke of God brought by a yoke of two Kine, turned loose by the Philistims: and the Bethsemites presuming to looke therein, there were slaine of the Elders 70. and of the people 50000 by the ordinance of God. After which slaughter and the great lamentation of the people: it was called the great * Abel, saith S^t. Hierome. Benedictus Theologus finds three other Cities of this name; one in [a] Nepthalim: another in Iuda: and another in Isachar. Hierome finds a fifth in Beniamin. Sam.1.c.6.v.18.

Keeping the Sea-coast, the strong Citie of Accaron offereth it selfe, sometime one of the fiue Satrapies, or Gouernments of the Philistims. S^t. Hierome makes it the same with Cæsaria Palæstinæ. Plinie confounds it with Apollonia: It was one of those that defended it selfe against the Danites and Iudæans. It worshipped Beel-zebub the God of Hornets or Flies. To which Idoll it was that Ahaziah King of Israel sent to enquire of his health: whose Messengers Eliah meeting by the way caused them to returne, with a sorrowfull answere to their Master. This Citie is remembred in many places of Scripture.

* Or rather not the citie it selfe, but the great stone in the field, vpon which stone the Philistims set the Arke, the change being easie from Eben or Aben, which signifieth a stone, to Abel which signifieth mourning.

Christianus Schrot placeth Azotus next to Geth, and then Accaron or Ekron. This Azotus or Asdod was also an habitation of the Anakims, whome Iosua [b] failed to destroy, though he once possest their Citie. Herein stood a sumptuous Temple dedicated to the [c] Idoll Dagon: the same Idoll which fell twice to the ground of it selfe, after the Arke of God was by the Philistims carried into their Temple; and in the second fall it was vtterly broken and defaced. Neere it was that famous [d] Iudas Machabæus slaine by Bacchides and Alcimus, the Lieutenants of Demetrius. Afterward it was taken by Ionathas: and the rest of the Citizens being put to the sword, all that fled into the Temple of Dagon, were with their Idoll therein consumed with fire: neere which also he ouerthrew Apollonius.

[a] See in Nepth. c. 7. §. 4. † 6. 2. King. 1.

[b] It was besieged by Psammetichus the father of Pharao Neco for 29 yeers together whence Ieremy 25.v.20. speaks of the residue of Asdod, to wit, the greatest part hauing perished in this siege.

[d] *Macc.*1.c.9. *Macc.*1.c.10. *Ios.*19.41. *Iud.*13.25, &c. 18.v.2.

Gabinius the Romane rebuilt it. It had a Bishops seate while Christianitie flourished in those parts. But in S^t. Hieromes time it was yet a faire Village. And this was the last of the Sea-Townes within the Tribe of Dan.

The Cities which are within the Land Eastward from Azotus, and beyond the Fountaine of Æthiopia, wherein Philip the Apostle baptized the Eunuch, are Tsorah, or Sarara, and Esthaol, and betweene them Castra Danis neere Hebron: though this place where Sampson was borne, may seeme by the words Iud. 18. 12. to bee in the Tribe of Iudah, as the other also were bordering Townes betweene Dan and Iuda.

After these within the bounds of Iuda, but belonging to the Danites, they finde Gedor, or as it is 1. Mac. 15. Cedron, which Cendebæus the Lieutenant of Antiochus fortified against the Iewes, and neere which himselfe was by the Macchabees ouerthrowne. 1. *Macc.*15.16.

Then Modin the Natiue Citie of the Macchabees: and wherein they were buried, on whose Sepulcher the seuen Marble Pillars, which were erected of that heighth as they serued for a marke to the Sea-men, remained many hundreds of yeeres after their first setting vp, as Brochard and Breidenbach witnesse.

There are besides these the Citie of Cariathiarim, that is, the Citie of the woods: seated in the border of Iuda, Beniamin, and Dan, wherein the Arke of God remained twentie yeeres in the house of Aminadab: till such time as Dauid carried it thence to Hierusalem: Of this place (as they say) was Zacharias the sonne of Barachias, or Ieboida, who was slaine betweene the Temple and the Altar: also Vrias whom Ioachim King of Hierusalem slaughtered as we finde in Ieremie. Many other places which Alias Cariathbaal and Baal, or Baalpharosim 1. *Sam.*7.1. & 2 *Sam.*6.2. 2. *Chron.*24.22. *Mat.*23.33. *Ier.*26.20.

they place in this Tribe, rather as I take it vpon presumption than warrant, I omit: as that of Caspin taken with great slaughter by Iudas Machabæus: and Lachis, whose King was slaine by Iosua, in which also Amazias was slaine: The same which Senacherib tooke, Ezechias raigning in Iuda.

2. Macc. 12. 13. Ios. 12. 11. 2. Reg. 14. 19.

Of other Cities belonging to this Tribe, see in Iosua c. 19. from the Verse 41. where also it is added that the Danites portion was too little for their number of Families: and therefore that they inuaded Leshem, and inhabited it: which Citie after amplified by Philip the brother of Herod Antipas, was called Cæsarea Philippi, as before, and made the Metropolis of Iturea, and Trachonitis: of which coasts this Philip was Tetrarch: but of this Citie see more in Nepthalim. In this Tribe there are no Mountaines of fame.

It hath two Riuers or Torrents: the Norther-most riseth out of the Mountaines of Iuda: and passing by Modin, falleth into the Sea by Sachrona. The other hath the name of Sorek or Sored, whose bankes are plentifull of Vines which haue no seedes or stones: The wine they yeeld is red, of excellent colour, taste, and sauour, &c. In this Valley of Sorek, so called from the Riuer, inhabited Dalila whom Sampson loued.

§. II.

THE TRIBE OF SIMEON.

THe Tribe of Simeon takes vp the rest of the Sea-coast of Canaan, to the border of Ægypt: who being the second Sonne of Iacob by Lea, there were increased of that familie while they abode in Ægypt, as they were numbred at Mount Sinai, 59300. able men, all which ending their liues in the Desarts, there entred the Land of Promise of their issues 22200. bearing armes, who were * in part mixed with Iuda, and in part seuered, inhabiting a small Territorie on the Sea-coast, belonging to Edumæa, of which the first Citie adioyning to Dan, was Ascalon.

* And therefore no maruel that diuers places named, Ios. 15. in the large portion of Iuda be reckoned in this Tribe: see Ios. 19. v. 1. & 9. where thus much is expressly noted. Volat. Geog. l. 11 fol. 244.

The Reguli or pettie Kings thereof were called Ascalonitæ: of which Volaterran out of Xanthus, in the Historie of the Lydians, reports, that Tantalus and Ascalus were the sonnes of Hymenæus: and that Ascalus being imployed by Aciamus King of the Lydians, with an Armie in Syria, falling in loue with a yong Woman of that Countrie, built this Citie and called it after his owne name: the same hath Nicolaus in his Historie, saith Volaterran.

Diodorus Siculus in his third Booke remembreth a Lake neere Ascalon, wherein there hath beene a Temple dedicated to Derceto, the Goddesse of the Syrians: hauing the face of a Woman and the bodie of a Fish: who, as I haue said before, in the storie of Ninus, was the Mother of Semiramis, fained to be cast into this Lake, and fed and releeued by Doues. And therefore was the Doue worshipped both in Babylonia and Syria, of which Tibullus the Poet:

Alba Palæstino sancta Columba Syro.

The white Doue is for holy held, in Syria Palæstine.

It was one of the chiefest and strongest Cities of the Philistims. It bred many learned men (saith Volaterran) as Antiochus, Sosus, Cygnus, Dorotheus the Historian, and Artemidorus who wrote the storie of Bithynia.

Vol. vi supra.

In Ascalon, as some say, was that wicked Herod borne, that seeking after our Sauiour, caused all the Male-children of two yeeres old and vnder to be slaine. In the Christian

Christian times it had a Bishop, and after that when it was by the Saladine defaced, Richard King of England, while he made Warre in the holy Land, gaue it a new wall and many buildings. Eius muros cum SALADINVS diruisset, RICHARDVS Anglorum Rex instaurauit, saith Adrichomius. Adrich. in Trib. Simeon.

In Dauids time it was one of the most renowned Cities of the Philistims: for hee nameth Gath and Ascalon onely, when hee lamenteth the death of Saul, and Ionathane, not speaking of the other three. Tell it not in Gath, nor publish it not in the streetes of Ascalon: It is now called Scalone. Gabinius restored it as hee did Azotus and Gaza. 2.*Sam.*1.

Next to Ascalon stood Gaza or Gazera, which the Hebrewes call Hazza, the Syrians Azan: of Azonus (as they say) the sonne of Hercules. Other prophane writers affirme, that it was built by Iupiter. Pomp. Mela giues the building thereof to Cambyses the Persian: because belike hee rebuilt it, and Gaza in the Persian tongue is as much to say as Treasure. This Gaza was the first of the fiue Satrapies of the Philistims: and the South bound of the Land of Canaan towards Ægypt. But this Citie was farre more ancient than Cambyses, as it is proued by many Scriptures. It was once taken by Caleb: but the strength of the Anakims put him from it. At such time as Alexander Macedon inuaded the Empire of Persia, it receiued a Garrison for Darius: in despight whereof it was by the Macedonians after a long siege demolished, and was called Gaza of the Desart. Vol.l.11. Steph. de Vrb. Iud.1.6.16. 1.King.6.&alib.

Alexander Ianneus King of the Iewes surprised it: and slew 500. Senators in the Temple of Apollo which fled thither for Sanctuarie: but this Gaza was not set vp in the same place againe, to wit, on the foundations which Alexander Macedon had ouer-turned, but somewhat neerer the Sea side: though the other was but two mile off. It was a Towne of great account in the time of the Machabees, and gaue many wounds to the Iewes till it was forst by Simon: of which hee made so great account as he purposed to reside therin himselfe, and in his absence left John his Sonne and Successour to be Gouernour. In Brothard his time it was still a goodly Citie, and knowne by the name of Gazara. Iosep.13.ant.19. Macc.1.15. Broch.Itin.7.

At the very out-let of the Riuer of Besor, standeth Maioma the Port of Gaza: to which the priuiledge of a Citie was giuen by the great Constantine, and the place called Constance after the name of the Emperours Sonne. But Iulian the Apostata soone after fauouring the Gazeans, made it subiect vnto them, and commanded it to be called Gaza maritima. Hist.trip.l.6.c.4. Niceph.10.hist. cap.4.

On the other side of Besor, standeth Anthedon, defaced by Alexander Ianneus, restored by Herod, and called Agrippias, after the name of Agrippa, the fauourite of Augustus. Iosep.13.ant.19. 21.

Then Raphia, where Philopater ouerthrew the great Antiochus: and beyond it Rhinocura, whose Torrent is knowne in the Scriptures by the name * of the Torrent of Ægypt, till the Septuagint conuerted it by Rinocura: to difference it, *Es.*27.12. giuing the name of the Citie to the Torrent that watereth it. Plinie cals it Rhinocolura; and Iosephus, Rhinocorura: [a] Epiphanius reports it as a Tradition, that at this place the world was diuided by lots, betweene the three Sonnes of Noah. Iosep.13.ant.19. 21.14.&c.

* Iunius calls it Vallis Ægypti the name of the streame seemes to be Shichor. See in Asser, Chap. 7.§.3.†.8. in the margent a Epiph. tom.2. in refut. Manich & in Ancorato.

Within the Land and vpon the Riuer of Besor they place Gerar: which the Scripture placeth betweene Kadesh and Shur, *Gene.*20.1. That it was neere to the Wildernesse of Beer-shebah, it appeares *Gene.*20.31. and therefore no maruaile that as elsewhere Beer-shebah, so sometime Gerar, bee made the South bound of Canaan. It was of olde a distinct Kingdome from the Philistim Satrapies, the Kings by one common name were called Abimelechs; Saint Hierome saith that afterward it was called Regio salutaris; the healthie Countrie: so that it was no maruaile that Abraham and Isaac liued much in these parts. Of King Asa's conquest of the Cities about Gerar, see 2.Chron. 14.14. Gene.10.19.

More within the Land was Siceleg or Tsiglak, which was burnt by the Amalekites, when Dauid in his flying from Saul to the Philistims had left his carriages there, but 1.*Sam.*30.

but Dauid followed them ouer the Riuer of Beſor, and put them to the ſlaughter, and recouered the prey.

Ioſep. 10, 11. 12. Next Dabir ſometime Cariath-Sepher, the Citie of Letters, the Vniuerſitie, as they ſay, or Academie of old Paleſtine. In S^t. Hieromes time it ſeemes it had the name of Daema: Ioſua 15. 49. it is called Vrbs Sanne: from the name, as it ſeemes, of ſome of the Anakims, as Hebron was called Vrbs Arbahi. For euen hence alſo were theſe Ioſ. 11. v. 21. Giants expelled. It was taken chiefly by Othoniel, incouraged by Calebs promiſe of his Daughter in marriage: but that Ioſua and the Hoaſt of Iſrael were at the ſurpriſe, it appeares Ioſ. 10. 39. This Citie Ioſ. 21. 15. is named among thoſe which out of Simeon and Iuda were giuen to the Leuites. And hence it ſeemes they attribute it to this Tribe.

Beſides theſe, there are many others in the Tribe of Simeon, but of leſſe fame, as Haiin, of which Ioſ. 19. 7. which alſo Ioſ. 21. 16. is reckoned for one of the Cities of the Leuites, giuen out of the portion of Iuda and Simeon (for which Iunius thinkes Haſham is named 1. Chron. 6. 59. though * in the place of Ioſua theſe two are diſtinguiſhed) alſo Tholad ſo named 1. Chron. 4. 29. for which Ioſua 19. 4. wee haue Eltholad. Chatzar-Suſa ſo named Ioſua 19. 5. for which Ioſua 15. wee haue Chatzar-Gadda, both names agreeing in ſignification: for Gadda is Turma, and Suſa Equitatus.

* And alſo 1. Chron. 4. 32.

In the ſame places of Ioſua and of the Chronicles Chorma is named, which they thinke to be the ſame with that of which Numb. 14. 45. to which the Amalekites and Canaanites purſued the Iſraelites. But that Chorma cannot bee in Simeon, nor within the Mountaines of Edumæa. For Iſrael fled not that way: but backe againe to the Campe, which lay to the South of Edumæa, in the Deſart.

Deut. 1.

The ſame places alſo name Beerſheba in this Tribe: ſo called of the Oath betweene Abraham and Abimelec: neere vnto which Hagar wandred with her Sonne Iſmael. It was alſo called the Citie of Iſaac, becauſe hee dwelt long there. While the Chriſtians held the Holy Land, they laboured much to ſtrengthen this place, ſtanding on the border of the Arabian Deſart, and in the South bound of Canaan. It hath now the name of Gibelin. The other Cities of Simeon which are named in the places of Ioſua, and of the Chronicles, aboue noted, becauſe they helpe vs nothing in ſtorie, I omit them. In the time of Ezekia King of Iuda, certaine of this Tribe being ſtreightned in their owne Territories, paſſed to * Gedor, as it is 1. Chron. 4. 39. (the ſame place which Ioſ. 15. 36. is called Gedera and Gederothaima) which at that time was inhabited by the iſſue of Cham: where they ſeated themſelues: as alſo fiue hundred others of this Tribe, deſtroied the Reliques of Amalec in the Mountaines of Edom, and dwelt in their places.

Gen. 21. 31.

* As it ſeemes in the Land of Iuda. See in the firſt Paragraphe of this Chapter in the Cities of Dan. Iud. 16. 3.

The Mountaines within this Tribe are few, and that of Sampſon the chiefeſt: vnto which he carried the Gate-poſt of Gaza. The Riuers are Beſor, and the Torrent of Ægypt called Shichor, as is noted in Aſſer.

THE

§. III.

THE TRIBE OF IVDA.

OF Iuda the fourth Sonne of Iacob by Lea, there were multiplied in Ægypt 74600. all which (Caleb excepted) periſhed in the Deſarts. And of their ſonnes there entred the Land of Canaan 76500. bearing armes: Agreeable to the greatneſſe of this number was the greateſt Territorie giuen, called afterward Iudæa: within the bounds whereof were the portions allotted to Dan and Simeon included. And many Cities named in theſe Tribes, did firſt, as they ſay, belong vnto the children of Iuda: who had a kind of Soueraignтie ouer them: as Succoth, Cariathiarim, Lachis, Bethſemes, Tſiglag, Beerſheba, and others. The multitude of people within this ſmall Prouince (if it be meated by that ground giuen to this Tribe onely) were vncredible, if the witneſſe of the Scriptures had not warranted the report. For when Dauid numbred the people, they were found fiue hundred thouſand fighting men.

The Cities of Iuda were many. But I will remember the chiefeſt of them: beginning with Arad, or Horma, which ſtandeth in the entrance of Iudæa from Idumæa: whoſe King firſt ſurpriſed the Iſraelites as they paſſed by the border of Canaan towards Moab, and tooke from them ſome ſpoiles, and many priſoners: who being afterward ouerthrowne by the Iſraelites, the ſonnes of Keni, the Kinſmen of Moſes, obtained a poſſeſſion in that Territorie: who before the comming of the Iſraelites, dwelt betweene Madian and Amalek. Num.21.v.3. Ioſ.12.v.14. Iud.1.v.16.

Following this Frontier towards Idumæa and the South, Aſcenſus Scorpionis, or Acrabbim is placed, the next to Arad: ſo called becauſe of Scorpions, which are ſaid to be in that place: from which name of Acrabbim, Hierome thinks that the name of the Toparchie called Acrabathena was denominated: of which we haue ſpoken in Manaſſes. On the South ſide alſo of Iudæa they place the Cities of Iagur, Dimona, Adada, Cedes, Aſhna, Iethnam, and Aſor or Chatſor, moſt of them Frontier Townes. Num.34.4. Deut.8.15.

And then Ziph: of which there are two places ſo called: one beſides this in the body of Iuda, of which the Deſart and Forreſt adioyning tooke name: where Dauid hid himſelfe from Saul. After theſe are the Cities of Eſron, Adar, Karkah and Aſemona, or Hatſmon, of no great fame.

Turning now from Idumæa towards the North, we finde the Cities of Danna, Shemah, Amam, the other Aſor, or Chatſor, Behaloth, and the two Sochoes: of all which ſee *Ioſ.*15. alſo Carioth by *Ioſua c.*15. *v.*25. called Kerioth: whence Iudas the Traitor was called Iſ-carioth, as it were a man of Carioth. Then Hetham the abode of Sampſon which Reboboam reedified. Beyond theſe towards the North border, and towards Eleutheropolis, is the Citie of Iethar, or Iatthir, belonging to the Leuites. In Saint Hieromes time it was called Iethira: and inhabited altogether with Chriſtians: neere vnto this Citie was that remarkeable battaile fought betweene Aſa King of Iuda, and Zara King of the Arabians, who brought into the field a Million of fighting men: and was notwithſtanding beaten and put to flight: Aſa following the victorie as farre as Gerar, which at the ſame time he recouered. *Iudg.*15.8. 1. *Chron.*11.6. Iun. out of the 1. *Chron.*4.32. notes that this Hetham though it were within the bounds of Iuda belonged to Simeon. *Ioſ.*15.48. Hieron.in loc. Hebr.

Not farre from Iether, ſtandeth Iarmuth, whoſe King was ſlaine by Ioſua, and the Citie ouerturned. Next vnto it is Mareſa the natiue Citie of the Prophet Michæa: Betweene it and Odolla, Iudas Macchabæus ouerthrew Gorgias: and ſent thence ten thouſand Dragmas of ſiluer to be offered for Sacrifice. *2.Macc.*12.35.

Odolla or Hadullam it ſelfe was an ancient and magnificent Citie, taken by Ioſua, and the King thereof ſlaine. Ionathas Macchabæus beautified it greatly. Then Ceila or Keila afterward Echela, where Dauid ſometime hid himſelfe: and which afterward *Gen.*38.*v.*1. *Ioſ.*12.15. *1.Sam.*23.1.

afterward he deliuered from the assaults of the Philistims: neere which the Prophet Abacuc was buried: whose monument remained and was seene by S^t. Hierome.

Neere it is Hebron sometime called the Citie of Arbah, for which the Vulgar hath Cariatharbe: the reason of this name they giue as if it signified the Citie of foure: because the foure Patriarchs, Adam, Abraham, Isaac, and Iacob, were therein buried, but of Adam it is but supposed: and it is plaine by the places Iosua 14. 14. and 15. 13. and 20. 11. that Arbah here doth not signifie foure, but that it was the name of the Father of the Giants called Anakim, whose sonne as it seemes Anak was: and Achiman, Sheshai, and Talmai (whom Caleb expelled Ios. 15.) were the sonnes of this Anak, Num. 13. 23. The name of Anak signifieth Torquem, a chaine worne for ornament: and it seemes that this Anak inriched by the spoiles which himselfe and his Father got, wore a chaine of gold, and so got this name: and leauing the custome to his posteritie, left also the name: so that in Latine the name of Anakim may not amisse be expounded by Torquati.

The Citie Hebron was one of the ancientest Cities of Canaan, built seuen yeeres before Tsoan or Tanis in Ægypt: and it was the head and chiefe Citie of the Anakims, whom Caleb expelled: to whom it was in part giuen, to wit, the Villages adioyning, and the rest to the Leuites. It had a Bishop in the Christian times, and a magnificent Temple built by Helen the Mother of Constantine.

Not farre hence they finde Eleutheropolis or the free Citie, remembred often by S^t. Hierome. Then Eglon whose King Dabir associated with the other foure Kings of the Amorites, to wit, of Hierusalem, Hebron, Iarmuth, and Lachis, besieging the Gibeonites, were by Iosua vtterly ouerthrowne. From hence the next Citie of fame was Emaus, afterward Nicopolis, one of the Cities of Gouernment or Præsidencies of Iudæa. In sight of this Citie Iudas Macchabæus (after he had formerly beaten both Apollonius and Seron) gaue a third ouerthrow to Gorgias Lieutenant to Antiochus.

Euseb. in Chron. Broch. Itin. 6.

In the yeare 1301. it was ouer-turned by an earth-quake, saith Eusebius. In the Christian times it had a Bishops seate of the Dioceese of Cæsaria of Palæstine.

From Emaus toward the West Sea there are the Cities of Nahama, Bethdagon, and Gader or Gedera, or Gederothaima, of which and of Gederoth * Ios. 15. v. 36. & 41. Then Azecha, to which Iosua followed the slaughter of the fiue Kings before named, a Citie of great strength in the Valley of [a] Terebinth or Turpintine, as the Vulgar readeth 1. Sam. 17. 2. whence (as it seemes) they seat it neere vnto Soco, and vnto Libna of the Leuites. It reuolted from the subiection of the Iewes while Ioram the sonne of Iosaphat ruled in Hierusalem: And next vnto this standeth Maceda, which Iosua vtterly dispeopled.

* Also 1. Chron. 4. 39. as is aboue remembred in the Tribe of Simeon.

[a] Iunius for in Valle Terebinthi hath in valle querceti. Vatablus keeps the Hebrewe reading in valle Elah.

Iosep. 13. ant. 9. Macc. 1. 6.

On the other side of Emaus towards the East standeth Bethsur, otherwise Bethsora, and Bethsor: one of the strongest and most sought for places in all Iuda. It is seated on a high Hill; and therefore called Bethsur (the house on the Rocke, or of strength.) It was fortified by Roboam, and afterward by Iudas Macchabæus. Lysias forst it, and Antiochus Eupator by famine: Ionathas regained it: and it was by Simon exceedingly fortified against the Syrian Kings.

Genes. 53. 48.

Bethleem is the next vnto it within sixe miles of Hierusalem, otherwise Lehem: sometime Ephrata; which name, they say, it had of Calebs wife, when as it is so called by Moses before Caleb was famous in those parts Gen. 38. 16. Of this Citie was Abessan or Ibzan, Iudge of Israel, after Iephtah, famous for the thirtie Sonnes and thirtie Daughters, begotten by him. Elimelec was also a Bethlemite, who with his wife Naomi sojourned in Moab during the famine of Iuda in the time of the Iudges, with whom Ruth the daughter in law of Naomi returned to Bethleem: and maried Booz, of whom Obed, of whom Isai, of whom Dauid. It had also the honour to be the native Citie of our Sauiour Iesus Christ; and therefore shall the memorie thereof neuer end.

In Zabulon of Galilee there was also a Citie of the same name: and therefore was this of our Sauiour called Bethleem Iuda.

From Bethleem some foure or fiue mile standeth Thecua, the Citie of Amos the Prophet:

Prophet: and to this place adioyning is the Citie of Bethzacaria, in the way between Bethſura and Hieruſalem: on whoſe Hills adioyning the glorious gilt ſhields of Antiochus ſhined like lamps of fire in the eies of the Iewes. The Citie of * Bezek was alſo neere vnto Bethleem, which Adoni-bezec commanded; who had during his raigne tortured 70. Kings, by cutting off the ioynts of their Fingers and Toes: and made them gather bread vnder his Table: but at length the ſame end befell himſelfe by the ſonnes of Iuda, after they had taken him priſoner. 1.*Macc.*6.32. *Ioſeph.Ant.*12. c.14. 1.*Macc.*6.v.36. *See in Manaſſ. c.7.§.7.†.1. *Iudg.*1.v.6.& 7

The reſt of the Cities in this part (moſt of them of no great eſtimation) wee may paſſe by vntill we come to the magnificent Caſtle of Herodium, which Herod erected on a Hill, mounting thereunto with 200. Marble ſteps, exceeding beautifull and ſtrong. And towards the Dead Sea, and adioyning to the Deſart of Ieruel, between it and Tekoa, is that cliuus floridus, where in the time of Iehoſaphat, the Iewes ſtood and lookt on the Moabites, Ammonites, and Edomites, maſſacring one another, when they had purpoſed to ioyne againſt Iuda: neere which place is the Valley of bleſſing, where the Iewes the fourth day after, ſolemnely came and bleſſed God for ſo ſtrange deliuerance. *Ioſep.*14.*ant.*22. 2.*Chro.*20.v.16. & 26.

Now the Cities of Iuda which border the Dead Sea, are theſe; Aduran beautified by Roboam: and Tſohar which the Vulgar calleth * Segor: ſo called becauſe Lot in his praier for it vrged that it was but a little one: whence it was called Tſohar, which ſignifieth a little one: when as the old name was Belah, as it is *Gen.*14.2. In the Romans times it had a Garriſon, and was called (as they ſay) Pannier: in Hieromes time Balezora. Then Engaddi or Hen-gaddi, firſt Aſaſonthamar: neere vnto which are the Gardens of Balſamum, the beſt that the world had called Opobalſamum: the moſt part of all which Trees Cleopatra Queene of Ægypt ſent for out of Iudæa, and Herod who either feared or loued Anthonie her huſband, cauſed them to be rooted vp and preſented vnto her: which ſhee replanted neere Heliopolis in Ægypt. This Citie was firſt taken by Chedorlaomer, and the Amorites thence expelled. It was one of the moſt remarkable Cities of Iudæa: and one of the Præſidencies thereof. 2.*Chron.*11. *Some call it Bal-ſaliſa and Vitula conſiſtens. See in *Gad c.*10.§.5. poſt principium in Haroher. *Gen.*19.20. Hieron. in Oſe. Hebr. Chatſatſou-thamar. 2.*Chron.*20.2. *Gen.*14.7.

The reſt of the Cities are many in the In-land, and among them Ieſrael; not that which was the Citie of Naboth, of which alreadie: but another of the ſame name, the Citie of Achinoam, the wife of Dauid, the mother of that Ammon, whom Abſalom ſlew: alſo as ſome thinke the Citie of Amaſa, Abſaloms Lieutenant, and the commander of his Armie. But this ſeemeth to be an errour grounded vpon the neereneſſe of the words, Iſrael and Ieſrael: and becauſe the 2.*Sam.*17.25. Amaſaes father is called a Iiſraelite, who firſt of the *Chron.*2.17. is called an Iſmaelite: indeede the Hebrew Orthographie ſheweth that Amaſaes Father is not ſaid to be of the Citie Ieſrael, but an Iſraelite in Religion, though otherwiſe an Iſmaelite. 1.*Reg.*21. 2.*Sam.*17.25.

In this Tribe there were many high Hills or Mountaines, as thoſe of Engaddi vpon the Dead Sea: and the Mountaines of Iuda, which begin to riſe by Emaus, and end neere Taphna, and theſe part Iuda from Dan and Simeon. Of others which ſtand ſingle there is that of Hebron: at the foote whereof was that Oake of Mambre, where the three Angells appeared to Abraham, which S^t. Hierome calleth a Fir-tree; and ſaith, that it ſtood till the time of Conſtantine the yonger. There is alſo that Mountaine called Collis Achilla, on the South ſide of Ziph: on the top whereof the great Herod, incloſing the old Caſtle, erected by Ionathas Macchabæus, and called Maſſada, garniſhed it with ſeuen and twentie high and ſtrong Towers: and therein left Armour and furniture for an hundreth thouſand men; being as it ſeemeth a place vnacceſſable, and of incomparable ſtrength. Hieron. in loc. Hebr.& quæſt. Hebr. *Ioſep.*14.Ant. c.20.

In the Valley afterward called the Dead Sea, or the Lake Aſphaltitis, this Countrie had foure Cities, Adama, Sodom, Seboim, and Gomorra, deſtroied with fire from Heauen for their vnnaturall ſinnes.

§. IIII.

THE TRIBE OF REVBEN and his Borderers.

†. I.

The seates and bounds of Midian, Moab, and Ammon, part whereof the Reubenites wanne from SEHON King of Hesbon.

ON the other side of the Dead Sea, Reuben the eldest of Iacobs sonnes inhabited: of whose children there were numbred at Mount Sinai 46000. who dying with the rest in the Desarts, there remained to possesse the Land promised 43700. bearing armes. But before wee speake of these or the rest that inhabited the East side of Iordan, something of their borderers: to wit, Midian, Moab, and Ammon, whose land in our writers are confusedly described, and not easily distinguished. And first wee are to remember that out of Abrahams kindred came many mightie Families: as by Isaac and Iacob the Nation called Israel, and afterward Iewes: by Esau or Edom the Idumæans: by Ismael the eldest sonne of Abraham, the Ismaelites: and by Keturah his last wife the Midianites. And againe by Lot, Abrahams brothers sonne, those two valiant Nations of the Moabites, and Ammonites: all which being but strangers in the Land of Canaan (formerly possest by the Canaanites, and by the Families of them descended) these issues and alliances of Abraham, all but Iacob, whose children were bred in Ægypt, inhabited the frontier places adioyning.

Esau and his sonnes held Idumæa, which bounded Canaan on the South. Ismael tooke from the South-east part of the Dead Sea; stretching his possession ouer all Arabia Petræa, and a part of Arabia the Desart, as farre as the Riuer of Tigris, from Sur to Hauilah.

Moab tooke the rest of the coast of the Dead Sea, leauing a part to Midian, and passing ouer Arnon, inhabited the plaines betweene Iordan and the Hills of Abarim or Arnon, as far North as Essebon, or Chesbon.

Ammon sate downe on the North-east side of Arnon, and possest the Tract from Rabba afterward Philadelphia, both within the Mountaines of Gilhead, and without them as far-forth as Arroer, though in Moses time he had nothing left him in all that Valley: for the Amorites had thrust him ouer the Riuer of Iaboc, as they had done Moab ouer Arnon. As these Nations compassed sundrie parts of Canaan, so the border betweene the Riuer of Iaboc and Damascus was held by the Amorites themselues, with other mixt Nations: all which Territorie on the East side of Iordan, and on the East side of the Dead Sea, was granted by Moses to the Tribes of Reuben, Gad, and halfe Manasse; whereof that part which Moab had, was first possest by the Emims a Nation of Giants weakned and broken by Chedorlahomer, after expulsed by the Moabites, as before remembred. That which the Ammonites held, was the Territorie and ancient possession of the Zamzummims or Zuræi, who were also beaten at the same time by Chedorlahomer, Amraphel, and the rest: and by them an easie way of conquest was prepared for the Ammonites.

Iosua. 13.

Num. 21. v. 24.

Gen. 14.

Now where it is written that Arnon was the border of Moab, the same is to bee vnderstood according to the time when Moses wrote. For then had Sehon or his Ancester beaten the Moabites out of the plaine Countries, betweene Abarim and Iordan, and driuen them thence from Hesbon ouer Arnon, and this happened not long before before Moſes arriuall vpon that border, when Vaheb gouerned the Moabites. For he that ruled Moab when Moſes paſt Arnon, was not the ſonne of Vaheb, but his name was Balac the ſonne of Zippor. And it may be that thoſe Kings were electiue, as the Edumæans anciently were.

Now all that part of Moab betweene Arnon and Iordan, as farre North as Eſſebon was inhabited by Reuben. And when Iſrael arriued there out of Ægypt, it was in the poſſeſſion of Sehon, of the race of Canaan by Amoreus: and therefore did Iephtah the Iudge of Iſrael iuſtly defend the regaining of thoſe Countries againſt the claime of the Ammonites: becauſe (as hee alleaged) Moſes found them in the poſſeſſion of the Amorites, and not in the handes of Moab or Ammon: who (ſaith Iephtah) had three hundred yeeres time to recouer them, and did not: whence he inferreth that they ought not to claime them now. Iudg. 11.

And leſt any ſhould maruaile why the Ammonites in Iephtah his time ſhould make claime to theſe Countries: whereas Moſes in the place Numb. 21. verſe 26. rather accounts them to haue beene the ancient poſſeſſion of the Moabites then of the Ammonites: it is to bee noted that Deut. 3. 11. when it is ſaid that the yron bed of Og was to be ſeene at Rabbath, the chiefe Citie of the Ammonites, it is alſo ſignified, that much of the Land of Og, which the Iſraelites poſſeſſed, was by him or his Anceſtors got from the Ammonites, as much of Sehons was from the Moabites.

And as the Canaanite Nations were ſeated ſo confuſedly together that it was hard to diſtinguiſh them: ſo alſo were the ſonnes of Moab and Ammon, Midian, Amalek, and Iſmael. Yet the reaſon ſeemeth plaine enough why Ammon commanded in chiefe, in Iephtahs time; for ſometime the one Nation, ſometime the other of all thoſe borderers acquired the Soueraignetie: and againe that one part of the Land which Gad held, namely within the Mountaines of Galaad, or Gilhead, and as farre South as Arroer belonged to the Ammonites. And therefore taking aduantage of the time, they then ſought to recouer it againe. Yet at ſuch time as Moſes ouerthrew Sehon at Iahaz, the Ammonites had loſt to the Amorites, all that part of their poſſeſſion which lay about Arroer, and betweene it and Iaboc: Sehon and Og two Kings of the Amorites hauing diſplanted both Moab and Ammon of all within the Mountaines. For it is written in the one and twentieth of Numb. v. 24. that Iſrael conquered the Land of Sehon from Arnon vnto Iaboc, euen vnto the children of Ammon, ſo as at this time the Riuer of Iaboc was the South bound of Ammon, within the Mountaines, when as anciently they had alſo poſſeſſions ouer Iaboc which at length the Gadites poſſeſt, as in the thirteenth chapter of Ioſua verſ. 25. it appeares.

Ioſ. 13. verſ. 25. Iunius notes that the one halfe of the Land of Hammon which in this place of Ioſua is ſaid to haue beene giuen to the Gadites, was taken firſt from the Ammonites by Sehon: but the place Deu. 3. 11 proueth that aſwell Og, as Sehon, had gotten Lands out of the hands of the Ammonites.

†. II.

Of the memorable places of the Rubenites.

THe chiefe Cities belonging to Reuben were theſe, Kedemoth, for which the Vulgar, without any ſhew of warrant, readeth Iethſon. The Vulgar or Hierome followed the Septuagint thoſe two verſes 36. and 37. and 21. Ioſ. being wanting in the old Hebrew Copies, and the Septuagint read Kedſon for Kedmoth, which Kedſon by writing ſlipt into Iethſon. Ioſ. 21. 37.

This Citie which they gaue to the Leuites, imparts her name to the Deſart adioyning: from whence Moſes ſent his Embaſſage to Sehon. In the ſame place of Ioſua where this Kedemoth is mentioned, the Vulgar for Betſer & villa eius, reades Boſor in ſolitudine Miſor, without any ground from the Hebrew: whence Adrichomius makes a Towne called Miſor, in the border betweene Reuben and Gad. Farther from Kedemoth neere the Dead Sea (for the Countrie betweene being Mountainous hath fewe Cities) they place two Townes of note, Laſa or Leſbah of which Geneſis 10. verſ. 19. the Greekes call it Callirhoe: neere Deut. 2. 26. It was a marginall note out of the 3. Deut. where the 70. kept the word Miſor, ſignifing a plaine which after crept into the Text, which there is a Hill, from whence there floweth Springs both of hot and cold, bitter and sweete water, all which soone after their rising, being ioyned in one streame, doe make a very wholesome bath, especially for all contractions of sinews: to which Herod the elder, when hee was desperate of all other helpe, repaired, but in vaine. Others say that these Springs arise out of the hills of Macherus in this Tribe.

Acosta. l. 3.

The like fountains are found in the Pyrenyes: and in Peru, called the Baths of the Inga's or Kings. The other towne is Macherus the next between Lasa and Iordan: of all that part of the world the strongest In-land Citie and Castle, standing vpon a mountaine euery way vnaccessible. It was first fortified by Alexander Iannæus, who made it a frontier against the Arabians: but it was demolished by Gabinius, in the warre with Aristobulus, saith Iosephus. It was thither (saith Iosephus) that Herod sent John Baptist, and wherein hee was slaine: his armie soone after being vtterly ouerthrowne by Aretas king of Arabia, and himselfe after this murther neuer prospering. Not farre from Macherus was Besor or Bozra, a towne of refuge, and belonging to the Leuites, and neere it Liuias vpon Iordan, which Herod built in honour of Liuia the mother of Tiberius Cæsar.

As for the Torrent Setim, which in this place Adrichomius dreames of, reading Ioel 3. 18. irrigabit torrentem Setim: The vulgar hath torrentem spinarum: and Iunius vallem Cedrorum: expounding it not for any particular place in Canaan: but for the Church, in which the iust being placed, grow as the Cedars, as it is Psal. 92. 13.

The plaine Country hereabout, by Moses called The Plaines of Moab, where he expounded the Booke of Deuteronomie to the people, a little before his death, is in the beginning of the same booke precisely bounded by Moses. On the South it had the great Desart of Paran: where they had long wandred. On the East it had Chaseroth, and Dizahab (of which two the former is that Gazorus, of which Ptolomie in Palæstina, the later was a Tract belonging to the Nabathæi in Arabia Petræa, where was * Mezahab, of which Gen. 36. 39.) by the Geographers called Medaua and Medaba. On the West it had Iordan: and on the North it had Laban (in Iunius Edition, by the fault of the Print, Lamban Deuteron. 1. 1.) the same which the Geographers call Libias: and some confound it with Liuias, of which euen now wee spake.

Also on the same North side towards the confines of Cælesyrea, it had Thophel: whereabout sometime Pella of Cælesyria stood: which was in the region of Decapolis, and as Stephanus saith, was sometime called Butis. It is also noted in Moses to be ouer against or neere vnto Suph, for which the Vulgar hath the red Sea, as also Num. 2. 14. 40 it translateth the word Suphah in like manner: whereas in this place of Deuteronomie there is no addition of any word in the Hebrew to signifie the Sea: and yet the Scripture, when this word is so to be taken, vseth the addition of Mara, thereby to distinguish it from the region of Suph or Suphah: which doubtlesse was about these Plains of Moab towards the dead Sea: where the Country being full of reedes, was therefore thus called: as also the red Sea was called Mare Suph, for like reason.

(that some call Abel-sathaim and Bel-sathim) which is reckoned by Moses in that place of Numbers for the 42. and last place of the Israelites incamping in the time of Moses: This place is also called Sittim; which word if we should interpret, we should rather bring it from Cedars, than from Thornes, with

Toward the Eaſt of theſe plaines of Moab, they place the Cities, Nebo, Baal-Meon, Sibma and Hesbon the chiefe Citie of Sehon, and Elhahel, and Kiriathaima the ſeate of the Giants Emim. Of the two firſt of theſe Moſes ſeemes to giue a note that the names were to be changed: becauſe they taſted of the Moabites * Idolatrie. For Nebo (in ſtead of which Iunius Eſ. 46. 1. reades Deus vaticinus) was the name of their Idoll-Oracle, and Baal-meon is the habitation of Baal. Of the ſame Idoll was the Hill Nebo in theſe parts denominated: from whoſe top; which the common Tranſlators call Phaſgah, Moſes before his death ſaw all the Land of Canaan beyond Iordan. In which ſtorie Iunius doth not take Phaſgah or Piſgah, for any proper name: but for an appellatiue, ſignifying a Hill: and ſo alſo Vatablus in ſome places; as Num. 21. 20. where he noteth that ſome call Piſgah that top which looketh to Iericho, and Hair as it looketh to Moab, which opinion may be ſomewhat ſtrengthened by the name of a Citie of Reuben mentioned Ioſ. 13. 20. called Aſhdoth-Piſga, which is as much as decurſus Piſga: to wit, where the waters did runne downe from Piſga. In the ſame place of Ioſua there is alſo named Beth-peor, as belonging to Reuben: ſo called from the Hill Peor: from whence alſo Baal the Idoll was called Baal-Peor, which they ſay was the ſame as Priapus: the chiefe place of whoſe worſhip ſeemes to haue beene Bamoth-Baal, of which alſo Ioſ. 13. in the Cities of Reuben: for which Num. 22. 41. they reade the high places of Baal (for ſo the word ſignifieth) to which place Balaak firſt brought Balaam to curſe the Iſraelites.

Of diuers places bordering Reuben belonging to Midian, Moab or Edom.

THere were beſides theſe diuers places of note ouer Arnon, which adioyned to Reuben: amongſt which they place Gallim, the Citie of Phalti: to whom Saul gaue his Daughter Michol from Dauid: but Iunius thinkes this Towne to be in Beniamin: gathering ſo much out of Eſay 10. verſ. 29. where it is named among the Cities of Beniamin. With better reaſon perhaps out of Numb. 21. v. 19. wee may ſay that Mathana and Nahaliel were in theſe confines of Reuben: through which places the Iſraelites paſt after they had left the Well called Beer: Then Deblathaim which the Prophet Hieremie threatneth with the reſt of the Cities of Moab.

Madian alſo is found in theſe parts, the chiefe Citie of the Madianites in Moab: but not that Midian or Madian by the Red Sea; wherein Iethro inhabited. For of the Madianites there were two Nations, of which theſe of Moab became Idolaters, and receiued an exceeding ouerthrow by a Regiment of twelue thouſand Iſraelites, ſent by Moſes out of the plaines of Moab: at ſuch time as Iſrael beganne to accompanie their Daughters: their fiue Kings with Balaam the South-ſayer were then ſlaine: and their Regall Citie with the reſt deſtroyed. The other Madianites ouer whom Iethro was Prince, or Prieſt, forgate not the God of Abraham their Anceſtor; but relieued and aſſiſted the Iſraelites in their painefull trauailes, through the Deſarts: and were in all that paſſage their guides. In the South border of Moab adioyning to Edom, and ſometime reckoned as the chiefe Citie of Edom, there is that Petra which in the Scriptures is called Selah, which is as much as rupes or petra. It was alſo called Ioctheel, as appeares by the place 2. Reg. 14. It was built (ſaith Ioſephus) by Recem, one of thoſe fiue Kings of the Madianites ſlaine as before is ſayde: after whom it was called Recem: Now they ſay it is called Crac and Mozera.

The Soldans of Ægypt, for the exceeding strength thereof, kept therein all their treasures of Ægypt and Arabia: of which it is the first and strongest Citie: the same perhaps which Plinie and Strabo call Nabathea, whence also the Prouince adioyning tooke name: which name seemes to haue been taken at first from Nabaioth the sonne of Abraham by Kethura. For Nabathea is no where vnderstood for all Arabia Petræa, (at least where it is not misunderstood) but it is that Prouince which neighboureth Iudæa. For Pharan inhabited by Ismael, whose people Ptolomie calleth Pharanites, in stead of Ismaelites, and all those Territories of the Cusites, Madianites, Amalekites, Ismaelites, Edomites, or Idumæans, the Lands of Moab, Ammon, Hus, Sin, and of Og King of Basan, were parts of Arabia Petræa: though it be also true, that some part of Arabia the Desart belonged to the Amalekites, and Ismaelites: all which Nations the Scriptures in the first of Chronicles the fifth calleth Hagarims of Hagar.

This Citie Petra, Scaurus besieged with the Roman Armie; and finding the place in shew impregnable, he was content by the perswasion of Antipater, to take a composition of monie, and to quit it. Yet Amasias king of Iuda (after he had slaughtered 10000. of the Arabians in the valley called Salinarum) wanne also this Citie. S. Hierome finds Ruth the Moabite to be naturall of this Citie. In the time when the Christians held the Kingdome of Hierusalem, it had a Latine Bishop, hauing before beene vnder the Greeke Church. It is seated not far from Hor where Aaron died, and on the other side towards the North is the riuer of Zared or Zered, by which Moses incamped in the 38. Station. Adrichome describeth the waters of Memrim, or rather Nemrim, in his Map of Reuben, not far hence, and betweene Zared and Arnon: and so he doth the Valley of Saue: but the waters of Nimra or Beth-Nimra (for which it seemes Adrichomius writ Nemrim) refresh the plaines of Moab: and the confluence of those waters of Nimra are in the Tribe of Gad. Saue also cannot be found in this place, that is, to the South of Arnon, and vnder Midian. For after Abraham returned from the pursuite of the Assyrian and Persian Princes, the King of Sodom met him in the Valley of Saue, or Shaueh, which is the Kings Dale, where Absalom set vp his Monument, as it seems, not farre from Hierusalem. And at the same time Melchizedec King of Salem also incountred him. But Abraham comming from the North, and Melchizedec inhabiting, either neere Bethsan otherwise Scythopolis in the halfe Tribe of Manasse, or in Hierusalem (both places lying to the West of Iordan) could not incounter each other in Arabia: and therefore Saue which was also called the Kings Dale, could not be in these parts.

Of the Dead Sea.

NOw because the Sea of Sodom or the Dead Sea, called also the Lake of Asphaltitis, and the salt Sea (in distinction from the Sea of Tiberias which was fresh water) also the Sea of the Wilderneſse, or rather the Sea * of the plaines, is often remembred in the Scriptures, and in this storie also, therefore I thinke it not impertinent, to speake somewhat thereof. For it is like vnto the Caspian Sea, which hath no out-let or disburthening. The length of this Lake Iosephus makes 180. furlongs (which make two and twentie miles and a halfe of ours) and about 150. in breadth which make eighteene of our miles and somewhat more. Plinie makes it a great deale lesse. But those that haue of late yeeres seene this Sea, did account it (saith a Weissenburg) eight Dutch miles (which is two and thirtie of ours) in length: and two and a halfe of theirs (which is ten of ours) in breadth. Of this Lake or Sea Tacitus maketh this report: Lacus est immenso ambitu, specie maris, sapore corruptior, grauitate odoris accolis pestifer: neque vento impellitur, neque pisces aut suetas aquis volucres patitur, incertum vnde superiecta vt solido ferantur periti imperiti, manibus perinde attolluntur,

* So Iunius reades for the Hebrew Haraboth euery-where, and so also the edition of Vatablus, Deuter. 3. 17. though Deuter. 4. 44. it hath mare solitudinis as also 2. Reg. 14 25. the reason of this name seemes to be, because it ioynes to the plaines of Moab which are called Harboth 9. 2. whence Moab Deut. 34. 1. as also wee haue Cesuloth in Harbath, that is in the plaines, to wit, of Zabulon. 1. Maccab. Adrichomius imagines a City in Zabulon called Araba. a Descr. terr. Sancta.

tolluntur, &c. That it is very great, and (as it were) a Sea of a corrupt taſte: of ſmell infectious, and peſtilent to the borderers. It is neither moued nor raiſed by the winde: nor indureth fiſh to liue init, or fowle to ſwimme in it. Thoſe things that are caſt into it, and the vnskilfull of ſwimming, aſwell as the skilfull, are borne vp by this water. At one time of the yeere it caſteth vp Bitumen: the Art of gathering which, Experience (the finder of other things) hath alſo taught. It is vſed in the trimming of ſhips, and the like buſineſſes.

And then of the Land, hee ſpeaketh in this ſort: The fields not farre from this Lake, which were ſometime fruitfull and adorned with great Cities were burnt with lightning: of which the ruines remaine, the ground looking with a ſad face as hauing loſt her fruitfulneſſe: for whatſoeuer doth either grow or is ſet thereon, be it fruits or flowers, when they come to ripeneſſe, haue nothing within them, but moulder into aſhes: Thus farre Tacitus. And it is found by experience, that thoſe Pomegranates and other Apples or Oranges, which doe ſtill grow on the bankes of this curſed Lake, do looke faire and are of good colour on the out-ſide, but being cut haue nothing but duſt within. Of the Bitumen which this Lake caſteth vp, it was by the Greekes called Aſphaltitus. Veſpaſian deſirous to be ſatisfied of theſe reports, went of purpoſe to ſee this Lake, and cauſed certaine Captiues to be caſt into it, who were not onely vnskilfull in ſwimming, but had their handes alſo bound behind them, and notwithſtanding they were carried on the face of the waters, and could not ſinke.

†. V.

Of the Kings of Moab, much of whoſe Countrie within Arnon REVBEN poſſeſt.

OF the Kings of Moab, whoſe Countrie (within Arnon) Reuben poſſeſt (though not taken from Moab but from Sehon the Amorite) few are knowne. Iunius in the 21. of Numbers verſe 14. nameth Vaheb, which ſeemeth to bee the Anceſtor or Predeceſſor of Balac, the ſonne of Zippor: which Balac ſent for Balaam to curſe Iſrael. For fearing to contend with Moſes by armes by the examples of Sehon and Og, hee hoped by the helpe of Balaams curſings or inchauntments, to take from them all ſtrength and courage, and to caſt on them ſome peſtilent diſeaſes. And though Balaam at the firſt moued by the Spirit of God, bleſt Iſrael contrarie to the hope and deſire of Moab: yet being deſirous in ſome ſort to ſatisfie him, and to doe him ſeruice, he aduiſed Moab to ſend Madianitiſh Women among the Iſraelites: hoping by them, as by fit inſtruments of miſchiefe, to draw them to the Idolatrie of the Heathen: but in the end he receiued the reward of his falling from God, and of his euil counſaile, and was ſlaine among the reſt of the Princes of Midian. *Num.*21.22.23.24. *Ioſ.*24.

After theſe times the Kings of the Moabites are not named: ſauing that wee finde in the firſt of Chron. the fourth, that Iokim, and the men of Chozeba, and Ioaſh, and Sareph, all being of the iſſue of Iuda, ſometime had the Dominion in Moab: but as it is written in the ſame Verſe, Theſe alſo are ancient things: to wit, as ſome expound it, the particulars of theſe mens Gouernments are no where extant or remaining: or as others, hæc prius fuere, theſe Families of Iuda were once thus famous: but now their poſteritie chuſe rather to abide in Babylon, and bee Clay-workers to the King there. *v.*22.

Then we finde Eglon King of Moab, who with the helpe of Ammon, and Amalec, maſtered Iſrael and commanded them eighteene yeeres: which Eglon, Ehud ſlew in his owne houſe, and afterward 10000. of his Nation. What name the King of Moab had vnto whom Dauid fled fearing Saul, it doth not appeare: or whether it were the ſame againſt whom Saul made Warre, it is not manifeſt, for neither are named. *Iudg.*3. 1.*Sam.*22.

med. But in respect that this Moabite was an enemie to Saul, he receiued Dauid, and relieued him: knowing that Saul sought his life.

1. Sam. 14.

2. Sam. 8. 1. Chron. 18. Psal. 60. v. 10.

After this, Dauid himselfe entred the Region of Moab, but not likely in the same Kings time: for he slaughtered two parts of the people, and made the third part tributarie: whereupon it was said of DAVID, Moab is my wash-pot, ouer Edom will I cast my shoe: meaning that hee would reduce them to such an abiection, and appoint them for base seruices: And that he would tread downe the Idumæans.

The next King after Dauids time, of the Moabites, whose name liueth, was Mesha: who falling from Iuda, (perhaps in remembrance of the seueritie of Dauid) fastened himselfe to the Kings of Israel, and paied tribute to Ahab 100000. Lambes, and 200000. Rammes, with the woll: who reuolting againe from Israel after the death of Ahab, was inuaded by Iehoram: with whom ioyned the Kings of Iuda and Idumæa: and being by these three Kings prest and broken, he fled to Kir-hareseth, as is elsewhere shewed. There is also mention made of the Moabites without the Kings name: when that Nation, assisted by the Ammonites and Idumæans, inuaded Iehoshaphat: and by reason of some priuate quarrells among themselues, the Moabites and Ammonites set vpon the Idumæans, and slaughtered them: and then one against another; so as Iehoshaphat had a notorious victorie ouer them all, without either bloud or wound. Also in the time of Hieremie the Propher, there was a King of Moab which is not named, which was after Mesha of Moab many descents: for Mesha lived with Iehoram, and this Moabite in Zedekias time, fourteene Kings of Iuda comming betweene, who wasted three hundred and odde yeeres.

§. V.

Of the memorable places of the Gadites, and the bordering places of Ammon.

THe Territorie adioyning to Reuben, is that of Gad: whereof all that part which ioyned to the Mountaines, was sometime in the possession of the Ammonites, as farre to the South as Aroer. Of the children of Gad the seuenth sonne of Iacob by Zelpha, the hand-maid of Lea, there parted out of Ægypt, and died in the Desarts 45550. and of their sonnes there entred the Land promised 45000. bearing armes: from the halfe Tribe of Manasse the Riuer of Iaboc diuided them: from Reuben the Cities of Hesbon, Elhele, and Aphec.

Gen. 30. Num. 1. 32. 26. Ios. 13.

The chiefe Citie of Gad was Aroer: which they make to be the same with Ar, or Rabbath Moab, the great or commanding Moab. But the learned Iunius, attending diligently to those wordes of Moses, Deut. 2. 36. Ab Harahero, quæ est in ripa fluminis Arnon, & Ciuitate ipsa quæ est in flumine; Where the Citie in the Riuer is distinguished from the Citie vpon the banke of the Riuer, (as also in like manner Ios. c. 12. v. 2. and c. 13. v. 9.) thinketh that Haroher which doubtlesse belonged to the Gadites (as Num. 32. 34. it is said that they built it) was indeede seated neere Har of the Moabites, but diuerse from it. For that Har was neuer possest by Moses, it is plaine Deut. 2. 9. where God forbidding Moses to touch it, saith he hath giuen Har for an inheritance to the sonnes of Lot. Now that this Citie, which in diuers places is said to bee within and in the middle of the Riuer of Arnon (and so distinguished from Haroher, which is said in the same places to be on the banke of Arnon) is Har of the Moabites, the same Iunius proueth out of Num. 21. 15. where Arnon is saide to bee diuided into diuers streames, where or among which Har is seated: And the same is confirmed by the place of Ios. 13. 25. where Haroher is said to be seated before Rabbah: which Rabbah, as it seemes, cannot be the Rabbah of the Ammonites (for they seate not Haroher neere it, nor in sight of it) and therefore by Rabbah heere we must vnderstand Rabbah of Moab, which they make to be Ar or Har: and so wee must needes distinguish it from Haroher.

Esa. 15. Deut. 2.

Haroher. And as for Har* (which alſo gaue the name to the coaſt adioyning) it ſeemes it continued in the poſſeſſion of the Moabites after they had once expelled the Giant-like people called Emims, firſt weakened by Chedorlaomer and his Aſſociates: but Haroher by the interchange of times ſuffered many ancient changes, as being wonne from the Moabites by Sehon, and from him by the Iſraelites, and from them, as it ſeemes in the ſtory of Iephtha, by the Ammonites: and from the Ammonites againe by the Iſraelites vnder the conduct of Iephtha. In S. Hieromes time the greateſt part of this Citie periſhed by an earth-quake, as alſo Zoar, in which Lot ſaued himſelfe, in the deſtruction of Sodom, ſeated not farre hence: which they ſay was therefore called Vitula conſternans, becauſe as a wanton tumbling Heifer, ſhee was thrice ouerthrowne with earth-quake: for which cauſe alſo Hierome ſeemes to thinke that this Zoar was called Saliſſa, or Bal-ſaliſſa, as if Bal had been a remainder of the old name Balah, or Belah, (of which Gen. 14.2.) and Saliſha which hath a ſignification of the ternarie number, had alluded to the three earth-quakes.

Brochard takes Haroher to bee Petra, but erroniouſly, as before it is noted; ſeeing that Petra was in the South border of Moab, adioyning to Edom, whereas Haroher is in the North-eaſt border. Betweene Haroher and Iordan they ſeate Dibon, which is attributed to the Gadites, becauſe they are ſaid to haue built it, Num. 32.34. though Ioſua 13.*v.*17. it is ſaid that Moſes gaue it to the Reubenites. Of this Citie among the reſt of Moab, both Eſay and Hieremie propheciedthat it ſhould periſh: and the Lakes about it runne with the bloud of the Inhabitants. It was a great Village neere Arnon in S. Hieromes time.

Keeping the bankes of Arnon, one of the next Cities of fame to Aroer, was Bethnimrah, of which Eſay propheciеth, That the waters thereof ſhould be dried vp: and all the vale of Moab withered. Not farre from Bethnimrah in this Tribe Adrichomius placeth Iogbeha, and Nobach or Nobe: of both which we reade in the ſtorie of Gedeon: and that Iogbeha was in Gad, built by the Gadites, it appeares Num. 32.35. and therefore Nobach alſo muſt needes be in theſe parts; but whether in Gad or Manaſſe it is not certaine: onely that it was anciently called Kenath, Moſes witneſſeth. NOBACH alſo (ſaith hee) went and tooke Kenath with her Townes, and called it Nobach of his owne name, where becauſe the verſes precedent ſpeake of the Manaſſites, and becauſe it is not likely that Moſes would haue ſeuered this ſeate of the Gadites from the reſt, of which he ſpake before, *v.34.35.36. therefore it may ſeeme that this Nobach was in that part of Manaſſe, which was in the Eaſt of Iordan: though Adrichomius place it in Gad. For whereas he ſuppoſeth it to be the ſame with Nob, which Saul deſtroyed, of this wee ſhall ſpeake [a] in the tribe of Beniamin. And as for that Karkor where Zebach and Salmunah reſted themſelues in their flight from Gedeon, to which place Gedeon marched through this Nobach and Iogbeha, though ſome place it in Gad, and make it the ſame with Kir-chares, of which Eſay 15. and 2.Reg. 3.25. yet there can bee no certaintie that it was in Gad: and if it bee the ſame with Kir-chares, it is certaine that it was a principall Citie held ſtill by the Moabites, and not in the Tribe of Gad.

In the body of this Tribe of Gad they place Hataroth: of which name the Scripture witneſſeth that two Cities were builded by the Gadites; the former ſimply called Hataroth, the later Hatroth-Shophan: for which later the Vulgar makes two Cities, Roth and Shophan: the name Hataroth, is as much as Corona.

In the Valley of the Kingdome of Sehon, together with Bethnimrah, of which wee haue ſpoken, *Ioſua c.*13.*v.*27. nameth Beth-haram and Succoth: the former, Num. 32.36. (where it is called Beth-Haram) together with Bethnimra, is ſayd to haue beene built by the Gadites, which (perhaps the rather, becauſe in Ioſua it is called Beth-Haram) ſome take to be Betaramptha, (of which [b] Ioſephus) after by Herod called Iulias. But whether this Betaramptha were corrupted from Beth-Haram, or from Beth-Aramatha, (of which Aramatha there is mention in [c] Ioſephus) or from Beth-Remphan (of which Remphan, an Idoll of thoſe Countries, wee reade, Act. 7.43. and to which Iunius referres the name of the Citie Repham, 1.*Macc.*37.) of this question it were hard to resolue. But touching Iulius (according to Iosephus sometimes Bataramptha) the same Iosephus placeth in the Region of Peræa, beyond Iordan, which Regio Peræa, as the Greeke word signifieth, is no more then Regio vlterior, the Countrie beyond the Riuer; and therefore they which labour to set downe the bounds of this Peræa, take more paines than needes. Fourteene Villages this Iulias had belonging vnto it, according to Iosephus. He makes it to haue been built by Herod Antipas, and named Iulias, in honour of the adoption of Liuia, Augustus his Wife, into the Iulian familie: by which adoption she was called Iulia. Another Iulias, hee saith, was built by Philip the brother of Herod, in the lower Gaulanitis, which, hee saith, is the same as Bethsaida.

Iunius

*Ant.*20.11.

*Iosep.Ant.*18.3. & *Bell.Iud.*2.8.

Vpon the Sea of Galilee neere to Iulias in Peræa, (that is, in the Region ouer Iordan) they finde Vetezobra, as it is called in Iosephus, for Beth-ezob, which is as much as domus hissopi. Of a noble woman of this Citie, which for safegard in the time of Warre with the Romanes, came with many others into Hierusalem, and was there besieged, Iosephus in the place noted, reports a lamentable History; how for hunger shee ate her owne child, with other Tragicall accidents hereupon ensuing.

Ioseph.de Bell. Iud.l.7.c.8.

Of Succoth (which we said *Ios.*13. is placed with Beth-haran, in the Valley of the Kingdome of Sehon) it is plaine by the story of Gedeon that it is neere vnto Iordan: where it is said, that as hee was past Iordan with his three hundreth, wearie in the pursuit of Zebah and Salmunah, hee requested reliefe of the men of Succoth: who denying him, and that with contempt, in Gedeons returne were by him tortured, as it seemes vnder a threshing Carre of Tribulum, betweene which and their flesh he put Thornes to teare their flesh as they were prest and trod vnder the Tribulum, and after which sort also Dauid vsed some of the Ammonites, though not with Thornes, but with yron teeth of the Tribulum. As for the name of Succoth, which signifieth such Tabernacles as were made in haste, either for Men or Cattel, Moses, *Gen.*33.17. witnesseth that the originall of the name was from such harbours, which Iacob in his returne from Mesopotamia built in that place: as also the place beyond the Red Sea, where the children of Israel, as they came from Rameses in Ægypt, had their first Station, was vpon like reason called Succoth: because there they set vp their first Tabernacles or Tents: which they vsed after for fortie yeeres in the Wildernesse. In remembrance whereof, the Feast of Succoth, or Tabernacles was instituted.

*Exod.*12.37.

*Leuit.*23.43.

Other foure Cities of Gad are named, *Ios.*21.38. Ramoth in Gilehad, Machanaïm, Chesbon, and Iahzer, all of them by the Gadites giuen to the Leuites, of which Iahzer, as Chesbon or Hesbon was a chiefe Citie of Sehon, whence *Num.*32.1. his Countrie is called the Land of Iahzer. It was taken by Moses, hauing first sent spies to view it. In the first of the Chronicles it is made part of Gilehad. In later times (as it may be gathered by the prophecie of Esay, touching Moab) it was possessed by the Moabites: to which place of Esay also Hieremie in a like prophecie alludes. It was at length regained (but as it seemes from the Ammonites) by Iudas Macchabæus: as it is, 1.*Mac.*5.8. where Iunius out of Iosephus reades Iahzer, though the Greeke hath Gazer. For Gazer or Gezer (as hee gathereth out of Iosua 16.3. & 8. and *Iud.*1.29.) was farre from these Countries of Sehon, seated in the West border of Ephraim, not possessed by the Israelites, vntill Salomons time, for whom the King of Ægypt wan it from the Canaanite, and gaue it him as a Dowrie with his Daughter.

*Num.*21.32. 1.*Chron.*27.31. *Esai.*6.8. *Hierem.*48.92.

Of Chesbon it may bee maruelled that in the place of Iosua, and 1.*Chron.*6.81. it should be said to haue been giuen to the Leuites by the Gadites, seeing Iosua 13.*v.*17. it is reckoned for a principall Citie of the Reubenites: Adrichomius and such as little trouble themselues with such scruples, finding Casbon, 1.*Macc.*5.36. among the Cities of Gilehad, taken by Iudas Macchabæus, makes two Cities of one: as if this Casbon had been the Chesbon of Gad: and that of Reuben distinct from it: but the better reconciliation is, that it being a bordering Citie, betweene Gad and Reuben, was common to both, and that the Gadites gaue their part to the Leuites: for so also it seemeth that that in like reaſon Dibon is ſaid in one place built by the Gadites, and in another giuen to Reuben, as before is noted. Of Machanaijm, which word ſignifieth a double Armie, we reade *Gen.*32.2. that it was therefore ſo called, becauſe the Angels of God in that place met Iacob in manner of another Hoſte or company, to ioyne with his for his defence: as alſo Luke 2.13. we reade of a multitude of the Hoſte of Heauen, which appeared to the ſheep-herds, at the time of our Sauiours birth: and ſo vnto the Godly King Oſwald of Northumberland, when hee was ſoone after to ioyne battaile with the Pagan Penda of middle-England, Beda reports, that the like comfort appeared: whence the field where the battaile was fought in the North-parts of England, is called Heauen-field. In this Citie of Machanaijm Dauid abode during the rebellion of Abſalom: and the ſame for the ſtrength thereof Abner choſe for the ſeat of Iſhboſeth, during the warre betweene Dauid and the houſe of Saul.

Of the fourth Towne which was Ramoth in Gilehad, we reade often in the Scripture, for the recouering of which King Achab loſt his life. Iunius thinkes that Ramatha-Mitſpæ, of which Ioſua 13.26. was this Ramoth in Gilehad. Concerning the place where Laban and Iacob ſware one to the other, as it was called Gilehad, which is as much as a witneſſing heape, becauſe of the heape of ſtones which Laban and his ſonnes left for a monument; ſo alſo that it was called Mitſpah, which ſignifieth ouer-looking (becauſe there they called God to ouer-ſee and be witneſſe to their couenant) it is plaine by the place, *Gen.*31.49. that in theſe parts there was not onely a Towne, but likewiſe a Region called Mitſpa, it appeares, *Ioſ.*11.3. where we reade of the Chiuuites vnder Hermon, in the Countrie of Mitſpa, * the Towne of Mitſpa, as it ſeemes both by this place, and in the eighth verſe following, beeing not in the Hill Countrie, but in the valley. But ſeeing that Iephta the Iudge of Iſrael, who after hee came home from Tob, (whither his brethren had driuen him) dwelt in this Towne of Mitſpa, who doubtleſſe was of the Tribe of Manaſſe, and thence at firſt expelled by his brethren, it may ſeeme that they doe not well which place this Towne of Mitſpa rather in Gad, than in Manaſſe. By Iudas Macchabeus this Towne of Mitſpa (whether in Gad or in Manaſſe) was vtterly ſpoyled and burnt, and all the males of it ſlaine: for it was then poſſeſt of the Ammonites.

* Of other townes of this name, ſee in the Tribe of Beniamin.

*Iud.*11.36.

1.*Macc.*5.35.

Betweene Succoth (of which we haue ſpoken) and the Riuer Iaboc was that Peniel or Penuel, which name ſignifieth Locum faciei Dei; A place where the face of God was ſeene: ſo called for memorie of the Angels appearing to Iacob, and wreſtling with him there: the churliſhneſſe of which Citie, in refuſing to relieue Gideon, was the cauſe that in his returne hee ouerthrew their Tower, and ſlew the chiefe Aldermen thereof. To theſe places of the Gadites, they adde Rogelim, the Citie of that great and faithfull ſubiect Barzillai, as it ſeemes, not farre from Mahanaim, where he ſuſtained King Dauid, during Abſaloms rebellion. To theſe they adde the Townes of Gaddi, Arnon, and Alimis, of which Gaddi, being in Hebrew no more then Gaddita, is ignorantly made a name of a place. Arnon alſo no where appeares to bee the name of a Towne, but ſtill of a Riuer. Alimis Adrichomius frames of ἐν Αλίμοις, 1.*Macc.*5.26. ſo that the name ſhould rather be Alema, but Iunius out of Ioſephus reades Malla, for this in Alimis: and vnderſtanding Malla to bee put for Millo, and to be as much as Munitio, (as we haue ſhewed touching the Millo of the Sichemites) hee takes this Malla, to be Mitſpa Moabitarum, of which 1.*Sam.*22.3. As for that Mageth which Adrichomius findes in this Tribe of Gad, it is that Mahacath, which Moſes noteth to be as farre as the furtheſt of Manaſſes, out of the bounds of this Tribe. So alſo Dathema, of which 1.*Mac.*5.10. (which Iunius takes to bee [a] Rithma, of which *Num.*33.18. a place of ſtrength in the Territory of the Ammonites) and in like maner Minnith, and Abel vinearum, though by ſome they be attributed to the Gadites, or to their borders, yet they are found farther off. For of the two laſt we reade in Iephta's purſuit of the Ammonites: ſeated as it ſeemes by that place of the booke of Iudges, the former of them in the South border, and the other in the Eaſt border, both farre remoued from the Gadites. But the chiefe Citie of the Ammonites was neerer, and not farre from from the borders of Gad. It is called in the Scriptures sometime Rabbath, as Deut. 3. 11. but more often Rabba. It is supposed to bee that * Philadelphia which Ptolomie findes in Cœlosyria. Hierome and Calistus in Arabia. It was conquered by Og from the Ammonites: but as it seemes neuer possest by the Israelites, after the ouerthrow of Og, but left to the Ammonites: whereupon at length it became the Regall seate of the Ammonites, but of old it was the possession of the Zamzummims: which is as much to say, as men for all manner of craft and wickednesse infamous. The same were also called Raphaim, of whom was Og, which recouered much of that which the Ammonites had got from his Ancestors: who hauing been first beaten by the Assyrians, and their assistants (as the Emims in Moab, and the Horims in Seir had beene) were afterward the easier conquered by the Ammonites, as the Emims were by Moab, and the Horims by the Idumæans. Yet did the races of Emoreus, of whom these Giants were descended, contend with the Conquerours for their ancient inheritance: and as Sehon of Hesbon had dispossest Moab, so had Og of Basan the Ammonites, and betweene them recouered the best part of all the Valley, betweene the Mountaines and Iordan. For this Og was also master of Rabba or Philadelphia: And in the possession of the one or the other of these two, Moses and Israel found all those Cities and Countreys which were giuen to Reuben, Gad, and the halfe Tribe of Manasse. So that though it were 450. yeeres since that these Zamzummims or Raphaims were expelled, yet they did not forget their ancient inheritance: but hauing these two Kings of one kinred, and both valiant and vndertaking men, to wit, Og and Sehon, both Amorites, they recouered againe much of their lost possessions, and thrust the sonnes of Lot ouer the mountaines, and into the Desarts. And as the Kings or Captaines of Persia and Assyria, (remembred [a] in the 14. of Genesis) made way for Ammon, Moab, and Edom, so by that great conquest which Moses had ouer those two Amorites, Og and Sehon, did the Moabites and Ammonites take opportunity to looke backe againe into those plaines, and when the Reubenites, Gadites, and Manassites forsooke the worship of the liuing God, and became slothfull and licentious, they taking the aduantage inuaded them, and cast them out of their possessions: and were sometime their masters, sometime their tributaries, as they pleased or displeased God: and according to the wisedome and vertue of their Commanders.

In this Citie of Rabba, was the yron bed of Og found, nine cubites of length, and foure of breadth. The Citie was taken in Dauids time, and the inhabitants slaine with great seuerity, and by diuers torments. At the first assault thereof Vrias was shot to death, hauing been by direction from Dauid appointed to bee imployed in the leading of an assault, where he could not escape: wherein also many of the best of the Armie perished: and wherein Dauid so displeased God, as his affaires had ill successe afterward, euen to his dying day. From hence had Dauid the waightie and rich crowne of gold, which the Kings of Ammon ware: or which as some expound it, was vsed to be set on the head of their Idoll, waighing a talent, which is 60. pound waight after the common talent. In the time of Christians it had a Metropolitan Bishop, and vnder him twelue others.

The Mountaines which are described within this Tribe, and that of Manasse, with a part of Reuben, are those which Ptolomie calleth the hilles of Hippus, a Citie of Cœlosyria: and Strabo Trachones*: the same which continue from neere Damascus vnto the Desarts of Moab: and receiue diuers names, as commonly mountaines do, which neighbour and bound diuers Countries: For from the South part, as farre Northwards as Astaroth, the chiefe Citie of Og, they are called Galaad or Gilead, from thence Northward they are knowne by the name of Hermon, for so Moses calleth them: The Sidonians name them Shirion, but the Amorites Shenir, others Seir: of which name all those Hilles also were called, which part Iudæa and Idumæa: and lastly, they are called Libanus, for so the Prophet Hieremie makes them all one, calling the high mountaines of Galaad, the head of Libanus. These mountaines are vere fruitfull, and full

*Other names of this Citie according to Stephanus were Ammana and Astarte: but in this later perhaps he mistooke, which might seem to be the same Astaroth one of the chiefe Cities of Og, of which in that which remaineth to be spoken of Manasses, Adrichomius sayes, it was also called Vrbs aquarum, because of the riuer Iabocs winding about it, but in the place 2. Sam. v. 27. whence he gathers this opinion, Iunius reads intercepi ab vrbe aquam, if we must read with others, cepi vrbem aquarum, yet it cannot be taken of Rabba it selfe, but of some Fort adioyning.

§. VI.

Of the Ammonites, part of whose Territories the Gadites wanne from Og the King of Basan.

THis Tribe of Gad possest halfe the Countrie of the Ammonites, who together with the Moabites, held that part of Arabia Petræa called Nabathæa, as well within as without the mountaines of Gilead: though at this time when the Gadites wan it, it was in the possession of Sehon and Og, Amorites: and therefore Moses did not expell the Ammonites, but the Amorites, who had thrust the issues of Lot ouer the mountaines Trachones or Gilead, as before. After the death of Othoniel the first Iudge of Israel, the Ammonites ioyned with the Moabites against the Hebrewes, and so continued long. Iephta Iudge of Israel had a great conquest ouer one of the Kings of Ammon, but his name is omitted. In the time of Samuel they were at peace with them againe. Iud. 10.

Afterward wee find that cruell King of the Ammonites, called Nahas: who besieging Iabes Gilead, gaue them no other conditions but the pulling out of their right eyes. The reason why he tendred so hard a composition, was (besides this desire to bring shame vpon Israel) because those Gileadites vsing to carrie a Target on their left armes, which could not but shadow their left eyes, should by losing their right, be vtterly disabled to defend themselues: but Saul came to their rescue, and deliuered them from that danger. This Nahas, as it may seeme, became the confederate of Dauid, hauing friended him in Sauls time, though Iosephus thinkes that this Nahas was slaine in the battaile, when Saul raised the siege of Iabes, who affirmeth that there were three Kings of the Moabites of that name. 1. Sam. 11. Iosep. l. 6. Ant. c. 5. &c. 2. Sam. 10. 4. 18.

Hanun succeeded Nahas: to whom when Dauid sent to congratulate his establishment, and to confirme the former friendship which he had with his Father, he most contemptuously and proudly cut off the Ambassadours garments to the knees, and shaued the halfe of their beards. But afterward notwithstanding the aydes receiued from the Aramites subiect to Adadezer, and from the Reguli of Rehob, and Maacah, and from Istob, yet all those Arabians, together with the Ammonites, were ouer-turned: their chiefe Citie of Rabba, after Philadelphia, was taken, the Crowne which weighed a talent of gold was set on Dauids head, all such as were prisoners, Dauid executed with strange seueritie; for with Sawes and Harrowes hee tare them in pieces, and cast the rest into Lime-kills. Istob, that is the men of Thob: Thob is a small Territorie vnder Arnon hills. Rehob is another betweene Hazor & Sidon, in the North bound of Canaan, Num. 13. 22. of which see in the tribe of Asser. Hiere. 40. & 41.

Iosaphat gouerning Iuda, they assisted the Moabites their neighbours against him, and perished together. Osias made them Tributaries, and they were againe by Iotham inforst to continue that Tribute, and to increase it, to wit, a hundreth talents of siluer, ten thousand measures of wheat, and ten thousand of barley: which the Ammonites continued two yeeres. 2. Chron. 20. 2. Chron. 36. 2. Chron. 26. 2. Chron. v. 27.

The fift King of the Ammonites, of whose name we reade was Baalis, the confederate of Zedechia: after whose taking by Nabuchodonosor, Baalis sent Ismael of the bloud of the Kings of Iuda, to slay Gedaliah, who serued Nabuchodonosor.

Of the other halfe of MANASSE.

THe rest of the Land of Gilead, and of the Kingdome of Og in Basan, with the Land of Hus, and Argob, or Trachonitis (wherein also were part of the small Territories of * Batanea, Gaulonitis, Gessuri, Machati, and Auranitis) was giuen to the halfe Tribe of Manasse ouer Iordan, of which those three later Prouinces defended themselues against them, for many ages. But Batanea Ptolomie setteth farther off, and to the North-East, as a skirt of Arabia the Desart: and all these other Prouinces before named with Perea, and Iturea, he nameth but as part of Cœlosyria; as farre South as Rabba or Philadelphia: likewise all the rest which belonged to Gad, and Reuben, sauing the Land neere the Dead Sea, he makes a part of Arabia Petræa: for many of these small Kingdomes take not much more ground then the County of Kent.

Basan, or after the Septuagint, Basanitis, stretcheth it selfe from the Riuer of Iabok to the [a] Machati and Gessuri: and from the Mountaines to Iordan, a Region exceeding fertile; by reason whereof it abounded in all sorts of Cattell. It had also the goodliest woods of all that part of the world: especially of Oakes, which beare mast (of which the Prophet Zacharias, Howle, O yee Oakes of Basban) and by reason hereof they bred so many Swine, as [b] 2000. in one Herd were carried head-long into the Sea, by the vncleane spirits which Christ had cast out of one of the Gadarens. It had in it threescore Cities walled and defenced: all which, after Og and his sonnes were slaine, Iair descended of Manasse conquered, and called the Countrie after his owne name, Anoth Iair, or the Cities of Iair.

The principall cities of this halfe Tribe (for I will omit the rest) are these; Pella sometimes [c] Butis, otherwise Berenice; by Seleucus King of Syria, it is said to haue been called Pella, after the name of that Pella in Macedon: in which both Philip the Father, and his Sonne Alexander the Great were borne. It was taken, and in part demolished by Alexander Iannæus King of the Iewes: because it refused to obey the Iewes lawes: but it was repaired by Pompey, and annexed to the Gouernement of Syria. It is now but a Village, saith Niger. Carnaim by the Riuer of Iaboc, taken by [d] Iudas Macchabæus: where he set on fire the [e] Temple of their Idols: together with all those that fled thereinto for Sanctuary; and neere it they place the Castle of Carnion, of which 2. Macc. 12. 22. Then the strong Citie of [f] Ephron neere Iordan: which refusing to yeeld passage to [g] Iudas Macchabeus, was forced by him by assault, and taken and burnt with great slaughter.

Iabes Gilead, or Iabesus, was another of the Cities of this halfe Tribe, which being besieged by Nahas [h] King of the Ammonites, was deliuered by Saul, as is [i] elsewhere mentioned. In memorie whereof these Citizens [k] recouered, embalmed, and buried the bodies of Saul and his Sonnes: which hung despightfully ouer the walls of Bethsan or Scythopolis. [l] Gaddara or Gadara, is next to be named, seated by Plinie on a Hill neere the Riuer Hieromiace, which Riuer Ortelius seemes to thinke to bee Iaboc. At the foote of the Hill there spring foorth also hot baths, as at Macherus. Alexander Iannæus after ten moneths siege wanne it, and subuerted it. Pompey restored it: and Gabinius [m] made it one of the fiue Courts of Iustice in Palæstine. Hierusalem being the first, Gadara the second, Emath or Amathus the third, Hierico, and Sephora in Galilee, the fourth and fift. The Citizens impatiently bearing the tyranny of Herod, surnamed Ascalonita, accused him to Iulius Cæsar of many crimes: but perceiuing that they could not preuaile, and that Herod was highly fauoured of Cæsar, fearing the terrible [n] reuenge of Herod, they slew themselues: some by strangling, others by leaping ouer high Towers, others by drowning themselues.

To the East of Gadara they place Sebei, [o] in which Iosephus ant. 5. 13. saith, Iephtha Sepultus eſt in Ciuitate ſua Gilehad*, (for in vna Ciuitatum Gilehad) imagine Gilehad to be the name of a Citie, and to be the ſame with Sebei. In like manner following the Vulgar, 1. Macc. 5.26. where it readeth Caſphor for Chesbon; the ſame Adrichomius imagineth it to be ampla & firma Gilehaditarum Ciuitas, ſo of one Citie Hesbon or Chesbon, which they call Eſſebon, the chiefe Citie of Sehon, in the Tribe of Reuben, he imagineth two more: this Caſphor in Manaſſes, and a Citie in Gad which he calleth Casbon, of which we haue admoniſhed the Reader heeretofore. Of Gamala (ſo called, becauſe the Hill on which it ſtood, was in faſhion like the backe of a Cammell) which Ioſephus placeth not farre from Gadara, in the lower Gaulanitis ouer againſt Tarichea, which is on the Weſt ſide of the Sea or Lake of Tiberias, ſee this Ioſephus in his fourth booke of the Iewiſh warre: where he deſcribes the place by nature to bee almoſt inuincible: and in the ſtorie of the ſiege, ſhewes how Veſpaſian with much danger of his owne perſon, entring it, was at firſt repulſed, with other very memorable accidents: and how at length after the comming of Titus, when it was taken, many leaping downe the rocks with their wiues and children, to the number of fiue thouſand, thus periſhed: beſides foure thouſand ſlaine by the Romans: ſo that none eſcaped, ſaue onely two women that hid themſelues.

Cap.1.& 3.

About foure miles Weſt from Gadara, and as much Eaſt from Tiberias (which is on the other ſide of the Lake) Ioſephus placeth Hippus, or Hippene, whence Ptolomie giues the name to the hills that compaſſe the plaines in which it ſtandeth: ſo that it may ſeeme to haue beene of no ſmall note. It is ſeated farre from the hill Countrie: on the Eaſt of the Lake, as alſo Plinie noteth lib.5.cap.15. It was reſtored by Pompey: after by Auguſtus added to Herods Tetrarchie: It was waſted by the Iewes, in the beginning of their rebellion: when by many maſſacres of their Nation, they were inraged againſt their borderers.

Ioſeph. Bell. Iud. l.2.c.19.

The next Citie of note, but of more ancient fame, is Edrehi or Edrai, wherein Og King of Baſan chiefly abode, when Moſes and Iſrael inuaded him: and neere vnto this his Regall Citie, it was that he loſt the battaile and his life. It ſtood in S. Hieromes time: and had the name of Adar or Adara. Not farre from theſe Townes neere Iordan, in this valley ſtood Geraſſa or Gergeſſa, inhabited by the Gergeſites, deſcended of the fift ſonne of Canaan. Of theſe Gergeſites we reade Mat.8.28. that Chriſt comming from the other ſide of the Lake of Tiberias, landed in their coaſts: where caſting the Diuels out of the poſſeſſed, hee permitted them to enter into the herd of Hogs: in which ſtorie for Gergeſites or Gergeſins, S. Luke and S. Marke haue Gadarens: not as if theſe were all one (for Gergeſſa or Geraſſa is a diſtinct Towne in theſe parts from Gadera) but the bounds being confounded, and the Cities neighbours, either might well be named in this ſtorie. This Citie receiued many changes and calamities: of which Ioſephus hath often mention. For beſides other aduentures, it was taken by L. Annius Lieutenant to Veſpaſian: and 1000. of the ableſt yong men put to the ſword, and the Citie burnt. In the yeere 1120. it was rebuilt by Baldwine King of Damaſcus: and in the ſame yeere recouered by Baldwine de Burgo King of Hieruſalem: and by him vtterly razed. Neere vnto Geraſa is the village of Magedan, or after the Syriake Magedu, or after the Greeke Magdala, where the Phariſees and Sadducees deſired of our Sauiour a ſigne from heauen: the ſame place or ſome adioyning to it, which S. Marke calleth Dalmanutha. By the circumſtances of which ſtorie it appeares that this coaſt lay betweene the Lake of Tiberias and the Countrie of Decapolis. Brochard makes both theſe places to be one: and findes it to be Phiale, the fountaine of Iordan according to Ioſephus: but this Phiale is too farre from the Sea of Galilee, and from Bethſaida, to be either Magdala or Dalmanutha. For as it appeares by the ſtorie, not far hence towards the North was the Deſart of Bethſaida, where Chriſt filled 5000. people with the fiue Barley loaues and two Fiſhes.

On the North of this Bethſaida they place Iulias, not that which was built by Herod, but the other by Philip, which boundeth the Region Trachonitis towards the South. It was sometime a Village, and not long after the birth of Christ it was compassed with a wall by Philip the Tetrarch of Iturea and Trachonitis: and after the name of Iulia, the wife of Tiberius, called Iulias, as hath beene farther spoken in the Tribe of Gad: where it was noted that Iosephus makes this Iulias, to be the same as Bethsaida. Vpon the East side of the same Lake of Tiberias stands Corozaim, or Corazim, of which Christ in Matthew; Woe be vnto thee Corazim.

Ioseph.18.aut.3. & alibi.

But the principall Citie of all these in ancient time was Asteroth: sometime peopled with the Giants Raphaim: and therefore the Countrie adioyning called the Land of Giants, of whose race was Og, King of Basan. In Genesis this Citie is called Asteroth of Carnaim, whence 1. Mac. 5. 26 it is called simply Carnaim, as Ios. 13. 21. it is called Asteroth without the addition of Carnaim. The word Carnaim signifieth a paire of Hornes, which agree well with the name of their Idoll Astoreth, which was the Image of a sheepe, as it is elsewhere noted, that Astaroth in Deut. signifieth sheepe. Others from the ambiguitie of the Hebrew take Karnaim, to haue beene the name of the people which inhabited this Citie: and expound it heroes * radiantes. For of old the Raphai which inhabited this Citie (Gen. 14. 5.) were Giant-like men, as appeares by comparing the words Deut. 3. 11. Og ex residuo gigantum, with the words Ios. 13. 12. Og ex reliquijs Raphaeorum: but if the Karnaim (or Karnaijm) were these Raphai, the word would not haue beene in the duall number: neither would Moses in the place of Genesis haue said the Raphai in Asteroth of the Karnaim, but either the Raphai in Asteroth of the Raphai, or some other way fittest for perspicuitie: for this naming of both thus in the same clause, distinguisheth one from the other.

* Because Horne when it is polished shineth: hence it is that the verb of this Nowne is sometime Lucere: as it were corneum esse: whereupon the Vulgar, *Exod.*34.29. reading cornutam corneam, or lucidam faciem, gaue occasion to the fabulous painters to paint Moses with Hornes. *Iudith.*1.8. 1.*Cant.*5.

Not farre from Asteroth Adrichomius out of Brochard and Breidenbachius placeth Cedar, in the way out of Syria into Galilee, foure miles from Corazin. This Citie (saith hee) is remembred in the Canticles, and in the booke of Iudith, and there are that of this Citie vnderstand Dauid in his 120. Psalme: and heere the Sepulchre of Iob is yet to be seene, saith Breidenbach.

Now concerning the Texts which hee citeth, it is so that the Greeke hath Galaad in stead of the word Cedar, which the Vulgar doth vse in that place of Iudith, and ioyneth Carmel and Galilee. The Canticles and the 120. Psalme doe rather proue that Cedar was not heereabout, than any way helpe Adrichomius. For that they speake of Scenitæ Cedareni, it is apparent, and as euident by the place in the Canticles that they were decolores, much more than any vnder the Climates of the land of Canaan: whence Iunius out of Lampridius and Plinie placeth them in Arabia Petræa, farre from these parts. Touching the Sepulchre of Iob, it is certaine that the Arabians and Saracens (holding those places) faine many things to abuse the Christians, and to get money. Further, it may well be affirmed that many (if not all) the historicall circumstances of Iob are so obscure, that we should rather by finding his Countrie seeke to get some knowledge of him, than by any presumptions founded vpon him, inferre what his Countrie was, and build vnto him a Citie by coniecture.

Rup. Lyran. Oleast. in Gen. Bell. in Com. lib.1.de ver. Dei. S. Amb. sup. Ep. ad Rom. Aug. de ciui. Dei l.18.c.4. Chrys. Hom.2. De patientia Iob. Greg. com. in Iob.

Of Iob himselfe whether he were the same Iobab remembred in the 36. of Genesis, descended from Esau, and King also of Idumæa, though Rupertus, Lyranus, Oleaster, and Bellarmine are of another opinion, yet S. Ambrose, Augustine, Chrysostome, and Gregorie, with Athanasius, Hyppolitus, Irenæus, Eusebius Emissenus, Apollinaris, Eustachius & other, cited by S. Hierom in his 126. Epist. to Euagrius, take him for the same.

For ου and αυ are often changed one into the other: whence they vsed Austitis for Oustitis, &c. Hence also by Iunius and others it is called Ausanitis, & so as it seemes they reade it in the Septuagint. *Iun. in Gen.*10. 23.

The Land of Huts or Hus wherein Iob dwelt is from the Greeke οὖς, which the Septuagint vse for the word Huts, translated by the Vulgar sometime Hus, as Iob 1.*v.*1. sometime Austitis, as Hieromc 25.20. This Land is placed by Iunius between Palæstina and Cœlesyria, besides Chamatha (or Hamath) vnder Palmyrene in the Countrie called by Ptolomie Trachonitis or Bathanæa, the bounds of which Countries are confounded with Basan in this halfe Tribe of Manasses. And that this Land of Hus was thus seated, it may in part bee gathered out of the place of Ieremie the 25. 20. where hee reckons the Husbites among the promiscuous borderers of the Israelites, whom hee therefore calleth promiscuous or miscellaneam turbam, because their bounds were not onely ioyned but confounded, and their Seigniories mingled one with the other, but of this place the wordes of Hieremie, Lamentations 4. 21. speaking of the same propheſie, of which hee ſpeaketh in the fiue and twentieth Chapter, muſt needes be expounded: as Iunius reades them, diſtinguiſhing the Land of Hus from Edom: O filia Edomi, ô quæ habitas in terra Hutzi; O Daughter of Edom, O thou which dwelleſt in the Land of Hus. Now becauſe the Vulgar doth not ſo diſtinguiſh, but readeth Filiæ Edom quæ habitas in terra Hus; Daughter of Edom which dwelleſt in the Land of Hus: Hence, as it ſeemes, ſome of the learned haue thought that Iob was an Edomite, as we haue ſaid, and King of Edom, which if they vnderſtand by it Idumæa or Edom, ſo called in Moſes time, they are greatly miſtaken, making this Land of Hus to be in Edumæa. For it Deut.3.9. is very probable that Eſau when hee firſt parted from Iacob, did not ſeate himſelfe in Edom, or Seir, which lieth on the South border of Iudæa, but inhabited Seir farre to the Eaſt of Iordan, and held a part of thoſe Mountaines otherwiſe called Galaad, and Hermon, which by corruption the Sidonians call Shirion, and the Amorites Shenir for Seir, and from this his habitation did Eſau incounter Iacob when he returned out of Meſopotamia, who paſſed by the very border of Eſau his abiding. It is true that at ſuch time as Moſes wandred in the Deſarts, that the poſteritie of Eſau inhabited Seir to the South of Iudæa: for it is like that the Amorites who had beaten both Ammon and Moab, did alſo driue the Edomites out of thoſe parts, who thence-forward ſeated themſelues to the South of Iudæa, bordering the Deſart Paran, and ſtretched their habitations ouer the Deſarts as farre as Hor where Aram died.

Now for this Hus which gaue the name to a part of the Land of Trachonitis, whether it were Hus the ſonne of Aram, as Iunius thinkes in his note vpon Gen. 10. 23. or rather Hus the ſonne of Nachor, Abrahams brother, the queſtion is doubtfull. For my part I rather incline to thinke, that it was Hus the ſonne of Nachor: partly becauſe theſe Families of Aram ſeeme long before to haue beene loſt: and partly becauſe in Iob c. 32. 2. Elihu the fourth of Iobs friends, which ſeemes to be of Iobs owne Countrie, is called a Buzite, of Buz, the brother of Hus, the ſonne of Nachor: as alſo Hieremie 25. in the ſame continuation (though ſome other Nations named between) where Hus is ſpoken of, there Buz is alſo named. Neither doth it hinder our coniecture, that in the place of Iob 32. Elihu the Buzite is ſaid to bee of the Familie of Ram: (which Iunius expounds to bee as much as of the Familie of Aram) for that by this Aram we are not to vnderſtand Aram the ſonne of Sem, Iunius himſelfe maketh it plaine, both in his annotation vpon the beginning of his booke, where he ſaith that one of Iobs friends (which muſt needes be this Elihu) was of the poſteritie of Nachor (as alſo in this place he confeſſeth ſo much expreſly) and in as much as hee readeth not è familiâ Aram, or Ram, but è familia Syra; like as elſewhere Laban who ſprung of Nachor is called a Syrian. Whence the Septuagint call him ex regione Auſitide.

As for the other three of Iobs friends (of whom by this note of Elihu his being of the Syrian Familie, or of the Familie of Nachor) it is implied that they were of other kindreds; as alſo by the Septuagints addition, that this Elihu was of the Land of Hus, or Auſitis, it is implied that they thought onely Elihu to haue beene of Iobs owne Countrie. See Sixtus Senenſis.

Franciſcus Brochard the Monke, in his deſcription of the holy Land in the iourney from Acon Eaſtward, findeth Suetha, and Theman on the Eaſt of the Sea of Galilee: both very neere to the Land of Hus: whereof the one may ſeeme to haue denominated Bildad the Shuchit; the other Eliphaz the Themanite: two of the three friends of Iob, of the which Iob 2. 11. But Iunius thinks that the Shuchits were inhabitants of Arabia the Deſart, deſcended of Shuach the ſonne of Abraham and Ketura: of whom Gen. 52. 2. perhaps, ſaith he, the ſame whom Plinie calls Saccæi. So alſo he thinketh the Themanites of whom Eliphaz was, to haue beene of Arabia the Deſart: and Eliphaz himſelfe to haue beene of the poſteritie of Theman the ſonne of Eliphaz, which was the ſonne of Eſau. And ſo alſo Nahamah whence Tſophar the third of Iobs friends (which in this place of Iob. c. 2. v. 11. are mentioned) is by the ſame learned expoſitor thought either to be named of Thimnath by transposition of letters (which Thimnah Gen. 36.40. is named among the sonnes of Esau that gaue denomination to the places where they were seated) or else to bee the same Nahamah, which Ios. 15. 41. is reckoned for a Citie of Iuda in the border, as he thinkes, of Edom. And yet I denie not but that neere to the Land of Hus, in Basan, as it seemes, in the Tribe of Manasses, there is a Region which at least in latter times was called Suitis, or of some like name. For this is euident by the Historie of Willelmus Tyrius, which reports of a Fort in this Region of Sutta or Suites (as hee calls it diuersly) of exceeding great strength and vse for the retaining of the whole Countrie: which, in the time of Baldwine the second King of Hierusalem, was with great digging through rocks recouered by the Christians: hauing not long before been lost to the great disaduantage of the Countrie, while it was in the handes of the Saracens. The situation of this Fort is by Tyrius described to be sixeteene miles from the Citie Tiberias, on the East of Iordan: by Adrichomius foure miles North-ward from the place where Iordan enters the Lake Tiberias at Corazin.

De Bell. Sacr. l. 22. c. 15. & 21.

Other Cities of this part of Manasses named in the Scripture are these: Golan, Beheshthera, Mitspa of Gilead, and Kenath, which after the comming of the Israelites was called Nabach. Of Nobach or Kenath, and Mitspa of Gilehad, we haue spoken by occasion among the Cities of Gad: The two other were giuen to the Leuites, and Golan made one of the Cities of refuge: from which Golan wee haue both Gaulanitis superior and inferior, oft in Iosephus. Beheshthera is accounted the chiefe Citie of Basan by some, but the writers corrupting the name into Bozra, it is confounded with Betser or Bozra of Reuben, and with Bozra of Edom. Argob is oft named for a Region in this Tract, and hence Hierome hath Arga, a name of a Citie placed by some about the waters of Merom (as they are called by Iosua) which make the Lake Samachonitis, as Iosephus calls it. This Lake being as it were in the midst betweene Cæsaria Philippi and Tiberias, through which as through the Lake of Tiberias, Iordan runneth, boundeth part of this halfe Tribe on the West. When the snow of Libanus melteth, it is very large, saith Brochard: otherwise more contract, leauing the marish ground on both sides, for Lyons and other wild beasts, which harbour in the shrubs that plentifully grow there.

Ios. 21.27. Deut. 4.43.

Adioyning to this Lake in this Countrie of Manasses, Iosephus names two places of strength fortified by himselfe in the beginning of the Iewes rebellion: Seleucia the one, and Sogane the other. In the North side of this halfe Tribe of Manasse, and in the North-east, the Scripture nameth diuers bordering places toward Damascus, as Tsedad, Chauran, and Chatsar-Henan, lying in a line drawne from the West; of which three Cities we reade Ezek. 47. 15. with which also agrees the place Numb. 34. 8. where for Chauram, betweene Tsedad, and Chatsar-Henan, Ziphron is named. From this Chauram is the name of Auranitis regio, in Iosephus and Tyrius, whose bounds (as also the bounds of Gessur and Mahachath or Macati, which were likewise borderers to Manasses toward the North-east) are vnknowne: only that Gessur was of might, it appeares in that Dauid married Maacha the Daughter of Tholmey King of Gessur; by whom he had the most beautifull, but wicked, and vnfortunate Absalon.

CHAP. XI.

The Historie of the Syrians the chiefe borderers of the Israelites that dwelt on the East of Iordan.

§. I.

Of the Citie of Damascus and the diuers fortunes thereof.

DAMASCVS of all other in this border, and of that part of the world, was the most famous, excelling in beautie, antiquitie, and riches, and was therefore called the Citie of ioy or gladnes; and the House of pleasure; and is not onely remembred in many places of Scripture, but by the best Historians and Cosmographers. The Hebrewes, saith Iosephus, thinke it to haue been built by Hus the sonne of Aram: of which opinion S. Hierome vpon Esai seemeth to be: though in his Hebrew questions hee affirmeth that it was founded by Damascus, the sonne of Eliezer Abrahams Steward, a thing very vnlikelie, seeing the citie was formerly knowne by that name, as appeares by Abrahams calling this his Steward Eliezer of Damasco. Dauid was the first that subiected it to the Kingdome of Iuda, after the ouerthrow of Adadezer their King, but in Salomons time, Rezon recouered it againe, though he had no title at all or right to that principalitie: but Dauid hauing ouerthrowne Hadadezer king of Sophena, (otherwise Syria Soba or Zobah) Razon or Rezon with the remainder of that broken armie, inuaded Damascena, and possest Damascus it selfe, and became an enemie to Salomon all his life. Iosephus. I. 14. In Isai. 17. Gen. 15. 2. 1. Reg. 11. v. 40.

The next King of Damascus was Adad the Edomite, who flying into Ægypt from Dauid, and Ioab, when they slew all the males in Edom, was there entertained, and married Taphnes the King of Ægypts wiues sister: of whom Taphnes in Ægypt was so called. This Adad returning againe, became an enemie to Salomon all his life, and (as some writers affirme) inuaded Damascus, and thrust Rezon thence-out. In the line of Adad that Kingdome continued nine descents (as heereafter may be shewed in the catalogue of those Kings of Syria) to whom the Assyrians & then the Grecians succeeded. This citie was exceeding strong, compassed with waters from the riuers of Abanah, and Parphar: whereof one of them prophane writers call Chrysorrhoas the golden riuer. Iunius takes it for Adonis. The countrey adioyning is very fruitfull of excellent wines and wheats, and all manner of excellent fruits. It had in it a very strong Castle, built as it seemes by the Florentines, after it became Christian: the lillies being found cut in many marbles in that Citadell. Against this Citie the Prophets Amos, Esai, Hieremy and Zacharias, prophecied that it should be taken, burnt, demolished, and made a heape of stones. In the time of the last Rezon and tenth King of the Damascens, Teglatphalassar inuited by Achaz king of Iuda, carried away the naturals of Damascus into the East: leauing of his owne nation to inhabit it. After that it was vtterly ruined by the Babylonians, saith Hieremie vpon Esai: which thing was performed by Salmanasar, according to Iunius in his note vpon that place, fiue yeeres after the prophecie. In time it was restored by the Macedonians, and the Ptolomies; but long after when Syria fell into the handes of the Romans, it was taken by Metellus and Lollius. In the time of the Christians it had an Archbishop: S. Hierome liuing, as he affirmeth vpon the Actes, it was the Metropolis of the Saracens: 1. Reg. 11. 2. Reg. 5. Herold. 6. Bell. Sacr. 1. 3. 8. 10. & 17. 49. & 9. 2. Reg. 16. Esai. 17. Ioseph. ant. 4.

being taken by Haomar their King from the Romanes, in the yeere of our redemption 636. And in the yeere 1147. Conrad the third, Emperour of Rome, Lewes King of Fraunce, Baldwine the third King of Hierusalem, Henry Duke of Austrea, brother to Conrad, Frederick Barbarossa afterward Emperour, Theoderick Earle of Flaunders, and other Princes assembled at Ptolomais Acon, on the sea coast, determined to recouer Damascus: but being betrayed by the Syrians, they failed of the enterprize.

In the yeere 1262. Halon the Tartar incompast it, and hauing formerly taken the King, brought him vnder the walls, and threatned extreme torture vnto him, except the Citizens rendred the place: but they refusing it, the King was torne asunder before them, and in fine the Citie taken, Agab the sonne of Halon was by his father made King thereof.

Herold. Bell. Sac. 4. c. 14.

In the yeere 1400. Tamberlaine Emperour of the Parthians, inuaded that region, and besieged the citie with an armie of 1200000. (if the number be not mistaken) He entred it and put all to the sword, filling the ditch with his prisoners, those that retired into the Castle which seemed a place impregnable, hee ouertopped with another Castle adioyning: he forbare the demolishing of the citie in respect of the beautie of the Church, garnished with 40. gates or sumptuous porches. It had within it 9000. lanternes of gold & siluer: but while he inuaded Ægypt, they againe surprized Damascus. Lastly in his returne after three moneths siege hee forst it: the Mahometans prostrating themselues with their priests, desired mercie: But Tamberlaine commaunding them to enter the Church, he burnt them, and it, to the number of 30000. and did so demolish it, as those that came afterwards to see their houses, knew them not by the foundations. And as a Trophey of his victorie he raised three towers with great Arte, builded with the heads of those whom hee had slaughtered. After this it was restored and repossest by the Soldane of Ægypt, with a garrison of Mammalukes: And in the yeere 1517. Selimus Emperour of the Turkes wrested it out of the hands of the Ægyptians: in whose possession it now remaineth inhabited with Mahometans, and Christians, of all neighbouring nations.

§. II.

Of the first Kings of Damascus, and of the growing vp of their power:

NOw bee it that Damascus were founded by Hus the sonne of Aram, or by Damascus the sonne of Eliezer Abrahams steward, we finde no relation of their Kings, or Common wealth till Dauids time. For it stood without the boundes of Canaan: and therefore neglected by Moses, Iosua, and the Iudges, as impertinent to that Storie: But were it so that it had some reguli, or pettie Kings ouer it, as all the Cities of those parts had, yet none of them became famous for ought that is left to writing, till such time as Dauid ouerthrew Adadezer prince of Sophena or Syria Zoba: the same Nation which Plinie calleth Nubai, inhabiting betweene Batanea and Euphrates. Now the better to vnderstand the storie of those Syrian Princes, whom soone after the Kings of Damascus made their vassals, the reader may informe himselfe, That on the North-east parts of the holy land there were three chiefe principalities whereof the Kings or Commaunders greatly vexed or disturbed the State or Commonwealth of Israel, namely Damascus or Aram, Sophena or Syria Zoba, and Chamath, or Chamath-Zoba, of which these were the Princes in Dauids and Salomons times: Razon or Rezon of Damascus, Adadezer of Syria Zoba, and Toha of Chamath. But it seemeth that Damascus was one of the cities subiect to Adadezer when Dauid inuaded him, though when Saul made warre against Zoba, Damascus was not named. And as Iosephus affirmeth, the leader of those succours, which were leuied and sent to Hadad-Hezer from Damascus, had the name of Adad: who was in that battaile slaine with 22000. Aramites of Damascus: whereof, as of the ouerthrow of Adadezer, Rezon, the Comander of his his armie, taking aduantage, made himselfe King of Damascus: Adadezer and Adad of Damascus being both slaine. About the same time Toha King of Chamath or Iturea, hearing that his neighbour and enemie Adadezer was vtterly ouerthrowne, sendeth for peace to Dauid, and presenteth him with rich gifts, but in dolo saith S. Hierome; it was craftily done of him. Now to the North of the Holy Land, and to the West of Damascus, the Tyrians and Zidonians inhabited: but they for the most part were in league and peace with the Iudeans and Israelites. But to returne to the kings of Syria, I meane of Syria, as it is taken in the Scriptures, containing Damascena, Soba or Zoba, and Chamath, or Iturea, to which I may adde Geshur, because it is so accounted in the 2. of Sam. 15. as ioyning in the Territorie to Damascus (for Syria at large is farre greater, of which Palestina it selfe is but a Prouince, as I haue noted in the beginning of this Tract.) It is not agreed among the Historians of former times, nor of our later writers, who was the first of those Adads of Syria Zoba, and Damascus. 1.*Reg.*11.

Some acount Rezon, other Adad of Idumea: of whome it is written in the first of Kings, that Dauid hauing inuaded that Region, and left Ioab therein to destroy all the male children thereof: Adad of the Kings seed, fled into Ægypt; and was there married to Taphnes the Queenes sister, as before, who hearing of Dauids death, and of the death of his Captaine Ioab (whom indeed all the bordering Nations feared) he turned againe, and as Bunting thinketh, this Adad did expell Rezon out of Damascus; and was the first of the Syrian Kings. To mee it seemeth otherwise. For as I take it, Adadezer the sonne of Rehob, whom Saul inuaded, was the founder of that Principalitie: and the first of Adads, who forsaking his Fathers name, as hee grew powerfull, tooke vpon him the style of Adad, the great God of the Assyrians, saith Macrobius, which signified oneneſſe or Vnitie. I also finde a Citie called Adada in the same part of Syria: of which, whether these Princes tooke the name, or gaue it, I am ignorant. For Adad-ezer, Ben-adad, Eli-adad were the same in name, with the differences of Ezer, Ben, and Eli, adioyned. And that Adadezer was of greatest power, it appeareth first, because it is against him, that Dauid vndertooke the warre: secondly, because he leuied 22000. Aramites out of the Territory of Damascus: as out of his proper Dominions: for had the Damascens had a King apart, it is probable that the Scriptures would haue giuen vs his name; thirdly, because Syria Zoba, of the most of which Adadezer was King, was an exceeding large Territory, and contained of Arabia the Desart as farre as to Euphrates, according to Plinie: and the greatest part of Arabia Petræa according to Niger. Whosoeuer was the first, whether Adadezer, or Adad of Idumea, Rezon was the second: Who was an enemie to Israel all the dayes of SALOMON. Besides the euil that Adad did, the euil that Hadad did, seemeth to be referred to Hadad of Idumea, lately returned out of Ægypt: to wit, 23. yeeres after he was carried thither. 2.*Sam.*8.3. and 12. 1.*Sam.*14.47. *Plin.*l.6.c.28. 1.*Reg.*11.

The third king of Damascus, and of Zobah both, was Hezion, to Hezion succeeded Tabrimmon, or Tabremmon, to him Benhadad, as is proued in the first of Kings. For Asa King of Iuda the sonne of Abiam, the sonne of Roboam, the sonne of Salomon, being vexed and inuaded by Baasha, the successour of Nadab, the sonne of Ieroboam, sent to Benhadad the sonne of Tabrimmon the sonne of Hezion, King of Aram, that dwelt at Damascus, to inuade Israel (while Baasha sought to fortifie Rama against Asa: thereby to blocke him vp, that he should not enter into any of the Territories of Israel) who according to the desire of Asa, hauing receiued his presents, willingly inuaded the Countrie of Nepthalim, and tooke diuers Cities, and spoiles thence: Asa in the meane while carrying away all the Materials, which Baasha had brought to fortifie Rama withall, and conuerted them to his owne vse. 1.*King.*15.18. 1.*Reg.*15.v.18.

This Benhadads Father Tabremmon was in league with Asa: and so was his Father Hezion; for Asa requireth the continuance of that friendship from Benhadad, his sonne: though it seemeth that the gold and siluer sent him out of the Temple, was the most forcible argument. And that this Tabremmon inuaded Israel, before the enterprize of his sonne Benhadad, it is coniectured. For Benhadad when he was prisoner with Achab, spake as followeth. The Cities which my Father tooke from thy Father, I will restore: 1.*Reg.*20.v.34.

restore: and thou shalt make streetes or keepers of the borders, for thee in Damascus: as my father did in Samaria. And herein there ariseth a great doubt (if the argument it selfe were of much importance) because Tabremmon was Father indeede to Benhadad which inuaded Baasha, at the request of Asa; But this Benhadad that twice entred
1.Reg.15. vpon Achab, and was the second time taken prisoner, was rather the sonne of Benhadad, the first of that name, the confederate of Asa and Abiam, as before, than the sonne of Tabremmon. For betweene the inuasion of Benhadad the first, in Baasha time, and the siege of Samaria, and the ouerthrow of Benhadad by Achab, there past 49. yeeres, as may be gathered out of the raignes of the Kings of Israel. So that if we allow 30. yeeres of age to Benhadad, when hee inuaded Baasha, and after that 49. yeeres, ere he was taken by Achab, which make eighty lacking one; it is vnlikely that Benhadad at such an age would make warre. Besides all this, the first Benhadad came with no such pompe; but the second Benhadad vaunteth, that hee was followed with 32. Kings: and therefore I resolue, that Benhadad the sonne of Tabremmon inuaded Baasha and Omri, and Benhadad the second inuaded Achab, at whose hands this Benhadad receiued two notorious ouerthrowes: the first at Samaria, by a sally of 700. Israelites: the second at Aphec, where, with the like number in effect the Israelites slaughtered
1.Reg.20. 100000. of the Aramites; besides 27000. which were crusht by the fall of the wall of Aphec. And this Benhadad, Achab againe setteth at liberty: to whom hee rendreth those townes, that his father had taken from the Predecessour of Achab, but being returned, he refuseth to render Ramoth Gilead, a frontier towne, and of great importance. Now three yeeres after (for so long the league lasted) Ramoth not be-

2.Reg.5. had healed him, yet hee picketh quarrell against Ioram: and when Ioram by Elizeus

2.Reg.6. as is aforesaid. After Benhadad besiegeth Samaria againe, and being terrified thence Ant.l.8.c.8. sour Azael were worshipped for Gods by the Syrians to his time, for the sumptuous Temples which they built in Damascus. The Syrians also boasted much of their antiquity, ignorant, saith hee, that scarce yet 1100. yeeres are compleate since their warres with the Israelites.

Hazael or Azael, the first King of the race of the Adads of Damascus, was anointed by Elisha, or Elizeus, when he was sent by Benhadad to the Prophet, to know whether Benhadad should recouer his present sickneſſe: Hee waged warre with Ioram; who receiued diuers wounds at the encounter at Ramoth in Gilead: from whence returning to be cured at Iesrael, he and the King of Iuda, Ahaziah, or Ochozias, are slaine by Iehu, as before is said. After the death of Ioram, Azael continued the warre against Iehu, and wasted Gilead, and all those portions of Gad, Reuben, and Manasse, ouer
2.Reg.12.17. Iordan. Hee then inuaded Iuda, and tooke Gath, but by gifts from Ioas hee was auerted from attempting Hierusalem: for hee presented him all the hallowed things

For Asa did present Benhadad
1.Reg.15. with those treasures, when he inuited him to warre vpon Baasha King of Israel. And notwithstanding this composition betweene Ioas and Azael, yet a part of his Armie spoyled the other Prouinces of Iudea, and slaughtered many principall extremitie, as he left him but fifty horsemen, tenne Chariots, and tenne thousand footemen of all his people.

§. III.

Of the later Kings, and decay and ouerthrow of their power.

AFter Hazael, Benhadad the second, or rather the third of that name, the sonne of Hazael, reigned in Damascus: who fought against Israel, with ill successe: for Ioas King of Israel, the sonne of the vnhappy Ioachaz, as he was foretold by Elisha the Prophet, beat Benhadad in three seuerall battels: and he lost all those Cities to Israel, which his Father Hazael had taken violently from Ioachaz. 2.*Reg.*13. *Ioseph.ant.c.*9.

After this Benhadad the sonne of Hazael, there succeeded three others of the same name, of whom the Stories are lost, onely Nicholaus Damascenus cited by Iosephus, makes mention of them: and in one of these Kings times it was that Ieroboam the second, the sonne of Ioas recouered Damascus it selfe, to Iudah saith the Geneua, but better in IVNIVS, vtq; recuperabat Damascum, & Chamatham Iehudæ pro Israele; that is, And how he recouered for Israel, Damascus and Chamatha of Iudea; for these Cities sometimes conquered by Dauid, did of right belong to the Tribe of Iuda. *Ioseph.Ant.l.*7. *c.*6. 2.*King.*14.28.

And it is likely that this conquest vpon the Adads was performed: the first of these three Adads then liuing, of whom there is no Story. For when as Ieboas the King of the ten Tribes had thrice ouercome the Syrians in the time of Benhadad the sonne of Hazael, and had recouered the Cities which Hazael had wonne from Israel; and so left his Kingdome to his sonne Ieroboam the second, it seemeth that this Ieroboam without delay, and hauing nothing else left for him to enterprize, instantly followed his fathers good fortune, and inuaded Damascus.

Razin, or Rezin, after Iosephus Rases, after Zonaras Raason, the 10. Adad, maketh league with Pekah, or Phacas King of Israel, against Achaz King of Iuda; both carrie away a great number of prisoners. After this they both besiege Achaz in Hierusalem: but in vaine. Then Adad alone inuadeth Elath, and beating out the Iewes, maketh it a Colonie of Syrians. Wherefore Achaz brought Tetglaphalassar against Razin, who tooke him, and beheaded him, and wonne Damascus: with whom ended the line of the Adads and the Kingdome of Damascus: the Assyrians becomming masters both of that and Israel. These Adads as they reigned in order are thus reckoned. 2.*King.*16.5. *Es.*7. *Ioseph.Ant.l.*9. *c.*12.

1. Adadezer the sonne of Rehob.
2. Rezin the sonne of Eliadad, or Razin.
3. Hezion.
4. Tabremmon.
5. Benhadad, who inuaded Baasha.
6. Benhadad the second, taken prisoner by Achab.
7. Hazael, whom Elisha foretold, with teares, of his aduancement; the same who ouerthrew Ioram King of Israel, at Ramoth Gilead.

And that there was a second Hazael which preceded Benhadad the third, it is not improbable, because that Hazael which tooke Geth, and compounded the warre with Ioas, made the Expedition thirty yeeres, and perchance more, after the first Hazael which stifled his master Benhadad, and had slaine Ioram the sonne of Achab King of Israel. For Ioas began to reigne in the 7. yeere of Iehu King of Israel; and after he had reigned 23. yeeres, the Temple was not yet repaired, after which (and how long wee know not) it is said that Hazael tooke Geth, and turned his face towards Ierusalem. It is also some proofe that Hazael which tooke Geth, was not the same with Hazael that murdered Benhadad, because he could not at that time but be of good yeeres, being as it seemeth the second person in the kingdome, and Commander of Benhadads men of warre. To this Hazael, be he the first or second, succeeded

8 Ben-

8 Benhadad the third, whom Ioash King of Israel thrise ouerthrew.

9 Resin or Rezin the last, who ioyned with Pekah King of Israel, against Iuda, at which time Achaz King of Iuda waged for his defence Teglatphalassar.

Now betweene Benhadad the third, and Rezin the last, Nicholaus Damascenus findes three other Kings of the Adads, which make twelue in all.

For the rest of the Princes of Syria, which were but reguli, as those of Emath, and Gessur, we finde that Tohu was King of Emath or Chamath in Dauids time, to whom he sent his sonne Ioram with presents, after Dauids victory against Adadezer. Also Senacherib speaketh of a King of Emath, but names him not.

§. IIII.

Of other lesser Kingdomes of the Syrians, which being brought vnder the Assyrians, neuer recouered themselues againe.

OF Gessur wee finde two Kings named; to wit, Talmai, and his Father Ammihur. To Talmai, whose daughter Dauid married, it was that Absalon fled, who was his maternall grandfather. Of the Kings of Sopheva or Syria, Soba or Cœlosyria, there are two named, Rehob or Rochob the Father of Adadezer, and Adadezer himselfe, and it is plaine that after his death the seat of the Kings of Soba was transferred to Damascus, a Citie better fitting their greatnesse. After Rezin became Lord of both Principalities. And the race of these Kings of Syria, (which became so potent, and ioyned Soba, Damascus, Emath, and the Desart of Arabia with other Prouinces into one, vnder Rezin the second of the Adads) as it began with Dauid, so it ended at once with the Kingdome of Israel. For Ahaz King of Iuda waged the Assyrian Teglatphalassar against Pekah King of Israel, and against Rezin the last King of Damascus: which Teglath first inuaded Damascena, and the region of Soba, and tooke Damascus it selfe, and did put to death Rezin the last, carrying the inhabitants captiue. This was the second time that the Assyrians attempted Israel. For first, Phul Belochus entred the borders thereof (Menahem gouerning Israel) who stopt the enterprize of Phul with a thousand talents of siluer: for this Phul Belochus, whose pedigree wee will examine hereafter, being scarce warme as yet in his seate at Babylon, which hee, with the helpe of his companion Arbaces, had wrested from Sardanapalus: hauing besides this King of Syria in his way, who seemed to be a great and strong Prince, was content to take the composition of a thousand talents of the King of Israel for that present time. But his sonne Teglath following the purpose of his Father Belochus, and finding so excellent an occasion, as the warre begun betweene Israel and Iuda, Pekah commaunding in the one, and Achaz in the other, his neighbour Rezin being also wrapt in that warre, and wasted in strength thereby, did willingly accept the offer of Achaz King of Iuda, his impresta and entertainement. So, first attempting Damascus, which lay in his path towards Israel, hee carried it (as is before remembred) and then with great ease possest himselfe of the Cities of Nephthalim; leading with him a great part of the people captiue. And his sonne Salmanassar, whom Ptolomie calleth Nabonassar, after the reuolt of Hosea, forced Samaria: and rent that Kingdome asunder. So as the line and race of Ninus in Sardanapalus, whom Belochus supplanted; the race and Monarchie of the Syrian Adads in Rezin: whom Teglath slaughtered; the Kingdome of Israel in Hosea, whom Salmanassar ouerturned; happened neere about a time: that of Ninus in the dayes of Belochus, and the other two in the dayes of Teglatphalassar, and Salmanassar his sonne. For Sardanapalus perished, Osia ruling Iuda; and the other two Kingdomes were dissolued, Achaz yet liuing.

Lastly, the Kingdome of Iuda it selfe, being attempted by Sennacherib, the sonne of Salmanassar in vaine, and preserued for the time by God miraculously, was at length length vtterly ouerturned. Hierusalem and the Temple burnt 132. yeeres after the captiuitie of Israel, and Samaria: the destruction of Israel being in the ninth yeere of Hosea: that of Iuda in the eleuenth of Zedechia. Now the Emperours of Assyria and Babylon held also the Kingdome of Syria, from the eight yeere of Salmanassar, to the last of Baltassar, *whom Herodotus calleth Labynitus: in all about 200. yeeres. After these the Persians from Cyrus to Darius their last King, held Syria about 200. yeeres. 3603. 3811.

Then Alexander Macedon tooke this among other Prouinces of the Persian Empire, and his successours the Seleucidæ reigned therein, till it became subiect vnto the power of the Romanes, from whom it was wrested long after by the Saracens, and remaineth now in possession of the Turke, as shall bee shewed in due place. Thus much of the nations bordering vpon the Israelites, with whom they had most to doe both in warre and peace, being the only people, whose History in those ancient times carried an assured face of trueth.

CHAP. XII.

Of the Tribe of BENIAMIN, and of Hierusalem.

§. I.

Of diuers memorable places in the Tribe of Beniamin, whereof Hiericho, Gilgal, Mitspa, Bethel, Rama, Gobah and Gibha.

OF the Tribe of Beniamin, the twelfth and yongest sonne of Iacob, whom hee had by Rachel, there were mustred at Mount Sinai 35000. able bodies: all which perishing in the Deserts, there entred the holy Land of their Issues 45600. fit to beare Armes: and these had their Territory on this side Iordan, betweene Iuda and Ephraim: The Cities within this Tribe neerest Iordan, are Lod, Hadid, and Ono: of which Lod and Ono were built by Shemed a Beniamite: they were all three reinhabited with Beniamites, after the returne out of Captiuitie, as is mentioned, Nehem. 11.35. and Esd. 2.35. where Adrichomius reading Lod, Hadid, Ono, makes besides Hadid in Nehemia, a Citie called Lodhadid: This Hadid or Chadid was rebuilt by Simon Macchabæus. 1.Chron.8.12. Macc.12.38.

Samarim or Tsemaraim, named of Tsemary, one of the sonnes of Canaan, was another of their Cities; and further into the Land standeth Iericho, one of the Toparchies, and the last of Iuda; seated in a most fruitfull valley, adorned with many palme trees: and therefore elsewhere called the citie of Palmes. From the time of IOSVA, who vtterly destroyed it, it lay waste vntill the time of Achab: in whose dayes Chiel of Bethel laid the new foundation of it, in the losse of Abiram his eldest sonne, and built the gates of it in the losse of his youngest sonne Segub: according to the curse of IOSVA: in which and other respects, Hos. 12.14. calleth IOSVA a Prophet. In after-times it was destroyed by Vespasian, and rebuilt by Adrian. 1.*Reg.*17.36. *Ios.*6.29. *1.Chron.6.60. This Halmon is called Halmeth, whence they make a new Citie Almath, as if this Tribe had giuen fiue Cities to the Leuites.

To the Southeast of Iericho stood Halmon of the Leuites, of which *Ios.*21.18. To the South Betharaba, of which *Ios.c.*15. *and c.*18. Then that Gilgal of which there is so so much mention in the Scripture, where Iosua first ate of the fruits of the land, circumcised all those borne in the Desarts, and celebrated the Passeouer.

The reason of the name, or rather a memorable application of the Etymologie of this name (for it seemes by the place, Deut. 11. 30. that the name was knowne before the comming of the Israelites into Canaan) is noted Ios. 5. 9. Ob deuolutionem probri Ægyptiaci, because their fore-skinnes (the people beeing there circumcised) were tumbled downe the Hill: which from thence was called Collis præputiorum. This Gilgal was also called Geliloth, as appeares by comparing the places, Ios. 15. 7. and 18. 17. for it was in the borders of Iordan; of which Ios. 22. 13. and Geliloth signifieth borders. * It stood (though in some distance) directly Eastward, ouer against the two Hills Garizim and Hebal: vpon the one of which the blessings, and on the other the cursings were to be read to the people, both beeing the mountaines of Ephraim. Further, for the situation of this Gilgal, it is to be noted, that both it, and Mitspa of Beniamin (of which also wee reade oft in the Scripture) were seated about the midst of the length of the land of Canaan: for which reason * Samuel chose these two places, to either of which hee came yeerely to giue iudgement to the Israelites; of which two, Gilgal (as is said) was neere Iordan on the East side of this Tribe; and Mitspa neere the West Sea, towards the land of the Philistims.

The third place, which is named with these two, whither also Samuel vsed yeerely to come, is * Bethel: which also was seated in this Tribe of Beniamin. But to returne to Gilgal which was the first place, where the Arke resided, after they past ouer Iordan (from whence it was carried to Silo, and thence to Kiriath-ieharim, & at length to Hierusalem) here in Gilgal it was that Iosua pitched vp the twelue stones, which were taken out of the channell of Iordan, when it was drie, that the Israelites might passe ouer it: by which Storie, as it is set downe Ios. 4. it appeares, that the same day that they passed ouer Iordan; they lodged at Gilgal. At the same Gilgal, to omit many other memorable things, it was that Samuel hewed Agag the King of the Amalekites in pieces. And as for Mitspa, whither also Samuel came yeerely to giue Iudgement, there also were often the greatest meetings held: as that for the reuenge of the Leuites wife against Gibha, and the Beniamites, Iud. 20. 1. and another against the Philistims, 1. Sam. 7. 12. Thither also Iudas Maccabæus gathered the Iewes, (when Hierusalem was possest by the Heathen) as it is 1. Macc. 3. 47. in which place this reason of their meeting is added; Quia locus Orationi fuerat Mitspa antea Israeli. Touching this Mitspa, to auoid confusion, it is to bee remembred, that the Scriptures mention foure places of this name: Mitspa of Iuda, of which Ios. 15. 38. * Mitspa of Gilead, of which we haue spoken already in the Tribe of Gad: Mitspa of the Moabites, where Dauid for a while held himselfe, commending his parents to the King of Moab, 1. Sam. 22. 3. and lastly, this chiefe Mitspa of the Beniamites. And as in this place the chiefe meetings were held both before Hierusalem was recouered from the Iebusites, and also in the time of the Macchabees (as we haue said) when Hierusalem was held by the wicked vnder Antiochus, so also in the time of Hieremie, after the destruction of the Temple by the Chaldeys, Gedaliah whom Nabuchodonosor left in Iewry, as Gouernour ouer those that were left in the land, held his abiding in this place: vntill (to the great hurt of the Iewes) he was slaine by the treason of Ismael, one of the royall bloud of Iuda, as it is Hierem 14.

Neere vnto this Mitspa, the * Scripture mentioneth Beth-car, after called Aben-Hezer, that is, the Stone of helpe: where Samuel pitched vp the pillar or Stone, for a Trophy against the Philistims.

Touching Bethel which (as it seemes) was the third place where Samuel held his chiefe meetings for the ministring of Iustice, that it was anciently called Luz, and how it was taken by the issue of Ioseph (though it belonged to the portion of Beniamin, as it is Nehem. 11. 31. and Ios. 18. 22.) and how another Citie called Luz * neere adioyning to it, was built by the man of the Citie which shewed the entrance to the Spies, as it is Iudg. 1. and of the occasion of the name from Iacobs vision: and how

Ieroboam

* Deut. 11. 30.
* 1. Sam. 7. 15.
* Iunius in this place, for Bethel reads Domum Dei fortis, and interprets it, Kiriath-ieharim where the Arke abode. For (saith he) by the Law, Exod. 23. 17. the greatest meetings in their annuall feasts were to be, where the Arke was, but this place doth not speake of festiuall, but of iudiciall meetings: and besids the Priests did vse to bring the Arke to their great meetings whersoeuer they were, as appeares 1. Sam. 12. v. 11. & c. 14. v. 18. neither is it easie to expound Bethel otherwise then for the Citie Bethel: though Iunius also take it for the place where the Arke was, 1. Sam. 10. 3.
* It was no other than this Mitspa of Gilead, of which Ios. 11. 8. as appeares by that which is added Versus orientem, for Iosua notes the three quarters North, West, and East, to which hee followed the Canaanites, though Adrichomius & others out of this place imagine a Mitspa or Maspha (as they write it) in the Tribe of Asser.
* 1. Sam. 7. 11. Ios. 16. 1.

Ieroboam, by erecting one of his calues heere, of Bethel (which ſignifieth the houſe of God) made it * Beth-auen, that is, the houſe of Vanitie, *Hoſ.*4.15. and 10.5. as alſo other memorable things of this place, they are ſo well knowne, out of the Hiſtories of the Scripture, that we may well paſſe them ouer.

The territorie of Bethel, which at the firſt belonged to the Kingdome of the tenne Tribes, from the time of the great victorie of Abia againſt Ieroboam (of which 2. Chr. 13.) was taken from them, and adioyned to the Kingdome of Iuda: and ſo it continued, as appeares by the Storie of Ioſhua: which performed the Prophecies againſt the altar of Bethel, 2. Reg. 23. whence thoſe coaſtes 1. Macc. 11. 34. are called Apharema, which Greeke word ſignifieth as much as, A thing taken away, to wit, from the tenne Tribes. It was one of the three Seigniories or Præfectures which Demetrius in his Epiſtle mentioneth, as added by him to the Dition of the Iewes, out of the Samaritan Country. A part of it, as appeares 2. Chron. 13. 19. was Hephrauin, which Ioſ. 18.23. is called Hophram, belonging to this Tribe of Beniamin.

Not farre from this Bethel, in this Tribe, we finde three other Cities often mentioned in the Scriptures, Rama, Gibha, and Gebah. Of the name Rama, * it is noted alreadie, in the deſcription of Ephraim, that there were many townes ſo called, becauſe of their high ſituation. But whereas they finde out Rama in the Tribe of Iuda (as it ſeemes becauſe Mat. 2. it appeares that it bordered Bethlehem) and alſo out of Brochard and Breidenbach make Silo to haue beene called Rama, and finde yet another Rama in Zabulon; theſe three haue no warrant in the Scripture. Of Rama in the Tribe of Aſſer, as it ſeemes, wee haue teſtimonie Ioſ. 19.29. and of another in Nephthalim, Ioſ. 19.36. of a third Rama, where Samuel dwelt in Mount Ephraim 1. Sam. 25.1. which more often is called * Ramatha, and 1. Sam. 1. 1. Ramathaim Tſophim: for which the Septuagint haue Aramathaim-ſophim, taking the Article affixed in the beginning, for a part of the word, whence they thinke Ioſeph of Arimathæa Matt. 27.57. was denominated.

Of a fourth Rama we reade 2. Reg. 8. 29. which is Ramoth in Gilehad. The firſt, which is moſt often mentioned, is Rama of Beniamin, ſeated as wee ſaid, neere Bethel the vttermoſt South-border of the Kingdome of the tenne Tribes: for which cauſe Baaſha in the time of Aſa King of Iuda, fortified it, to hinder thoſe that did flie from him to Aſa. Of this Rama or Ramatha I ſhould rather thinke Ioſeph was, that buried Chriſt: becauſe it was neerer to Hieruſalem, and after the captiuitie belonged to Iudæa, as it appeares Eſd. 2. 26. where in that it is ioyned with Gebah, it is plaine that he ſpeaketh of that Rama with whoſe ſtones (after Baaſha had ceaſed to build it) Aſa (as it is 1. Reg. 25.22.) built Gebah adioyning to it: both being in Beniamin. And as Rama was the South-border of the tenne Tribes, ſo was Gebah the North-border of the Kingdome of Iuda: whence 2. Reg. 23.8. wee reade that Ioſiah through all his Kingdome, euen from Gebah, which was the North-border, to Beer-ſheba which was the South-border, deſtroyed the places of Idolatry.

The third Citie Gibha which was the Citie of Saul (the wickedneſſe of which Citie in the time of the Iudges had almoſt vtterly rooted out this Tribe) Adrichomius confounds with Gebah, making one of two (as they are euidently diſtinguiſhed Eſai. 10.27. of which word]* Gibha, in another forme Gibbath, he imagineth Gabaath another Citie in this Tribe, making two of one. The vicinitie of this citie alſo to Rama of Beniamin, appears Iud. 19.13. where the Lenite with his wife not able to reach to Rama, tooke vp his lodging at Gibha. By that place of 1. Sa. 22.6. it ſeemes that there was in this Gibha ſome towre or Citadell called Rama: where Iunius reades in excelſo, for in Rama: but it may be that the name of the Kings place in this citie, was Rama: as it ſeemes that in Rama of Samuel, the name of the chiefe place where Samuel with the Colledge of Prophets abode, was Naioth. The great Citie of Hai ouerthrowne by Ioſ. which Ioſ. 7.2. is placed neere Beth-auen vpon the Eaſt of Bethel, was in this Tribe, as is proued Nehe. 7.10.30. though it be not named by Ioſua c. 18. for it was burned by him and laid deſolate, as it is Ioſ. 8.28. In ſolitudinem in tumulum perpetuum; Another Citie

* Borrowing the name of a neighbour towne in the confines of the Kingdomes of Iuda and Iſrael betweene Hai and Bethel. Ioſ. 7.2. and 18.12.

* See c. 9. §. 1.

* Of this Ramatha I vnderſtand the place 1. Macc. 11. 34. where it is named for one of the three Præfectures which Demetrius yeelds to the Iewes out of the country of Samaria, this lying toward the Eaſt to Iericho: and Lydda toward the Weſt: and Apherama (of which euen now we ſpake) lying in the midſt between the two other. A ſixt Rama it ſeemes there was in the Tribe of Simeon toward the South, which Ioſ. 19.8. is called Rama of the South, and otherwiſe Baalath-beer.

* Gibha in conſtruction, that is, Gouerning a genitiue caſe is Gibbath: whence the Vulgar out of the Septuagint reade Ioſ. 24.33 Gibaath Phinees. for which Iunius hath Collis Phincaſi (for this word is oft times an Appellatiue ſignifying a Hill) but Adricomius taking notice of this, builds his Citie Gabaath vpon this Text & placeth it in Beniamin, when as the words adioyned, note that this Hill was in the Mountains of Ephraim.

Citie of chiefe note reckoned Ios. 18.25. in this Tribe was Gibhon, the chiefe Citie of the Heuites: whose cunning to bind the Israelites by oath to saue their liues, is set downe Ios. 9. whence they were reckoned among the * Nethinæi or Proselites: and were bound to certaine publique seruices in the house of God: which oath of sauing these Gibeonites, broken in part after by Saul, was by God punished by a famine 2. Sam. 21.1. This Gibeon or Gibhon with Almon and Iebah (of both which wee haue spoken) and with Hanothoth the natall place of Hieremie the Prophet, were said Ios. 21.28. to be giuen to the Leuites by the Beniamites. Neere to this Hanothoth was Nob, as appeares. 1. Reg. 2 26. where Ebiathar the Priest, which was of Nob before it was destroyed by Saul, is sent to his grounds at Hanothoth: It is reckoned in the Tribe of Beniamin, Nehem. 9. 31. and though in the time of Saul the residing place of the Arke was at Kiriath-iearim: yet by the lamentable tragedie of bloudshed, which Saul raised in this place (as it is set downe 1. Sam. 21. and 22.) in the iudgement of Iunius, it is proued that the Tabernacle was there for a time.

* The word Nethinim or Nethinei, is as much as dati (as it were a Deo dati) or as Iunius expounds it deditiij, it is vsed, 1. Chr. 9. 2. and in Esdras and Nehemias often.

Micmas also in this Tribe Nehem. 9. 31. was a place of fame, of which Esai. 10.28. where also he nameth Gallim, and Migron in this Tribe. In Micmas Saul had his Campe 1. Sam. 13. 2. (when he left Gibha to Ionathan) and there also was Ionathan Macchabæus his aboad. 1. Macc 9. 73. Of Giscala in Galilee Iosephus makes often mention, but of any heere in Beniamin, which they make the natall place of S. Paul, whence (they say) when it was taken by the Romans, hee sailed with his parents to Tharsis, of this I finde no good warrant. Other places of lesse importance I omit, and come to the Citie of Hierusalem, and the Princes and Gouernours of this Citie: A great part whereof was in the Tribe of Beniamin, whence Ios. 18.28. it is named among the Cities of Beniamin.

§. II.

Of diuers memorable things concerning Hierusalem.

AT what time Hierusalem was built (which afterward became the Princesse of all Cities) it doth not appeare. Some there are who imagine that Melchisedec was the founder thereof in Abrahams time. But * according to others, that Citie out of which Melchisedec incountred Abraham (in his returne from the ouerthrow of the Assyrian and Persian Kings or Captaines, when Lot was made prisoner) standeth by the riuer of Iordan, in the halfe Tribe of Manasse bordering Zabulon, which was also called Salem, and by the Greekes Solima.

* See in the hither halfe of Manasse.

Hierusalem (whensoeuer or by whomsoeuer built) was a principall Citie in Iosua his time: yet not so renowned as Hazor the Metropolis (in those dayes and before) of all the Canaanites. Adonizedek (whom Iosua slew) was then King of Hierusalem. That it was belonging to the Iebusites it is manifest: for how long soeuer they held it before Moses time, they were Masters and Lords thereof almost 400. yeeres after him: euen till Dauid wanne it: and therefore in all likelihood, it was by the Iebusæi (the children of Iebusæus the sonne of Canaan) built; after whom it was called Iebus. And so much did that Nation relie on the strength of the place, as when Dauid attempted it, they bragged that their lame, and blinde, and impotent people should defend it.

2. Sam. 5. v. 6.

Dauid, after he had by Gods assistance possest it, and turned out the Iebusites, gaue it an exceeding great increase of circuit: strengthened it with a Citadell or Castle: and beautified it with many Palaces, and other buildings: changing the name from Iebussalem, the Citie of the Iebusites, to Hierusalem, which the Greekes call Hierosolima. After Dauids time Salomon amplified, beautified and strengthened it exceedingly. For besides the worke of the Temple, which was no lesse admirable than renowned among all Nations, the Palaces, gates, and walles, could not any where in the world bee exampled: and beſides that it had 150000. inhabitants, the women and children not accounted. The ditch had 60. foote of depth, cut out of the very rocke: and 250. foote of breadth: whereof the like hath ſeldome beene heard of, either ſince or before.

After the death of Salomon, and that the Kingdome of the Iewes was cut aſunder, Shiſhac King of Ægypt, and his predeceſſour, hauing bred vp for that purpoſe, Adad the Idumæan, and Ieroboam, Salomons ſeruant; and both married to Ægyptians: the State by the one diſturbed, by the other broken: Siſhac firſt inuaded the Territorie of Iuda, entred Hieruſalem, and ſackt it, and became Maſter not onely of the riches of Salomon, but of all thoſe ſpoiles which Dauid had gotten from Adadezer, Tohu, the Ammonites, and other Nations. It was againe ſackt and a part of the wall throwne downe by Ioas King of Iſrael; while Amaſia the twelfth King thereof gouerned Iuda. 2.*Chron.*12. 2.*King.*14. 2.*King.*16.

Not long after Achaz the fifteenth King of Iuda impoueriſhed the Temple, and preſented Teglatphalaſſar with the treaſures thereof. And Manaſſe the ſonne of Ezekiah, the ſonne of Achaz, by the vaunts made by Ezekiah, to the Embaſſadors of Merodach, loſt the remaine, and the very bottome of their treaſures. It was againe ſpoiled by the Babylonians, Ioakim then reigning. But this vngratefull, Idolatrous, and rebellious Nation, taking no warning by theſe Gods gentle corrections and afflictions, but perſiſting in all kinde of impietie, filling the Citie euen to the mouth with innocent bloud, God raiſed vp that great Babylonian King Nabuchodonoſor, as his ſcourge and reuenger, who making this glorious Citie and Temple with all the Palaces therein, and the walles and towers which imbraced them, euen and leuell with the duſt, carried away the ſpoiles with the Princes and people, and cruſht them with the heauie yoake of bondage and ſeruitude full 70. yeeres, inſomuch as Sion was not onely become as a torne and plowed-vp field, Hieruſalem a heape of ſtone, and rubble, the mountaine of the Temple as a groue, or wood of thornes and briers, but (as Hierome ſpeaketh) Euen the birds of the ayre ſcorned to flie ouer it, or the beaſts to tread on that defiled ſoile. 1.*Chron.*5.26. 2.*King.*25. 2.*King.*19. 2.*Par.*18. *Mich.*3. Hier. 25.26.29.

Then 70. yeeres being expired, according to the Prophecie of Daniel, and the Iewes by the grace of Cyrus returned: the Temple was againe built, though with interruption and difficultie enough: and the Citie meanely inhabited, and without walls or other defences, for ſome 60. and odde yeeres, till Nehamia by the fauour of Artaxerxes rebuilt them. Then againe was the Temple and Citie ſpoiled by Bagoſes, or Vagoſes, the Lieutenant of Artaxerxes: after by * Ptolomæus the firſt; then by Antiochus Epiphanes: and againe by Apollonius his Lieutenant. By Pompey it was taken long after, but not deſtroyed, nor robbed, though Craſſus in his Parthian expedition tooke as much as he could of that which Pompey ſpared. Hier. to 3. *trad. * The firſt of the Egyptian Kings after Alexander Macedon, who diſſembling his Religion, came vp to Hieruſalem to offer Sacrifice. *Ioſ.*12. *ant.*1.

But the damages which it ſuſtained by the violence of ſacrilegious Tyrants, were commonly recompenſed by the induſtrie or bountie of good Princes, the voluntary contribution of the people, and the liberalitie of ſtrangers. Before the captiuitie, the people of the land through the exhortation of godly Kings, made many and large offerings to repaire the Temple of Salomon. The wrong done by Ptolomæus Lagi to the ſecond Temple, was requited by the bountie of his ſonne Ptolomæus Philadelphus. The miſchiefe wrought by Antiochus Epiphanes and his followers, was amended partly by the great Offerings which were ſent to Hieruſalem out of other Nations. Finally all the loſſes, which either the Citie or Temple had endured, might well ſeeme forgotten in the reigne of Herod that vſurping and wicked, but magnificent King, who amplified the Citie, new built the Temple, and with many ſumptuous workes did ſo adorne them, that hee left them farre more ſtately and glorious than they had beene in the dayes of Salomon. M.T.C. pro Cylla.

§. III.

Of the destruction of Ierusalem by the Romans.

IN this flourishing estate, it was at the comming of our Saviour Christ Iesus: and after his death and ascension, it so continued about 40. yeeres. But then did Titus the Roman, being stirred vp, by God, to be the reuenger of Christ his death; and to punish the Iewes sinfull ingratitude, incompasse it with the Roman armie, and became Lord thereof. Hee began the siege at such time as the Iewes, from all parts, were come vp to the celebration of the Passeouer: so as the Citie was then filled with many hundreds of thousands of all sorts; and no manner of prouision or store for any such multitudes. An extreme famine, with the ciuill dissension, oppressed them within the walles; a forcible enemie assailed them without. The Idumæans also, who lay in wait for the destruction of the Iewes Kingdome, thrust themselues into the Citie, of purpose to betray it: who also burnt the Temple, when Nabuchodonosor tooke it. And to be short, there perished of all sorts, from the first besieging to the consummation of the victorie, eleuen hundred thousand soules: and the Citie was so beaten downe, and demolished, as those which came afterward to see the desolation thereof, could hardly beleeue that there had beene any such place or habitation. Onely the three Herodian towres (workes most magnificent, and ouertopping the rest) were spared, as well for lodgings for the Roman garrisons, as that thereby their victorie might bee the more notorious and famous: for by those buildings of strength and State remaining, after-ages might iudge what the rest were; and their honour be the greater and more shining that thereouer became victorious.

Esd.1.c.4.v.45.

After this; such Iewes as were scattered heere and there in Iudæa, and other Prouinces, beganne againe to inhabite some part of the Citie; and by degrees to rebuild it, and strengthen it as they could, being then at peace, and tributaries to the Roman State: but after 65. yeeres, when they againe offered to reuolt, and rebell, Ælius Adrianus the Emperour slaughtered many thousands of them, and ouerturned those three Herodian Towres, with all the rest, making it good which Christ himselfe had foretold; That there should not stand one stone vpon another, of that vngratefull Citie. Afterward, when his furie was appeased, and the Prophecie accomplished, he tooke one part without the wall, wherein stood Mount Caluarie, and the Sepulchre of Christ, and excluding of the rest the greatest portion, hee againe made it a Citie of great capacitie, and called it after his owne name, Ælia Capitolia. In the gate toward Bethel, he caused a Sowe to be cut in marble, and set in the front thereof, which he did in despight of the Iewes Nation: making an Edict, that they should not from thencefoorth euer enter into the Citie, neither should they dare so much as to behold it from any other high place ouertopping it.

Gul.Tir.Bel.Sa. l.14.c.12.

But the Christian Religion flourishing in Palæstina, it was inhabited at length, by all Nations, and especially by Christians; and so it continued 500. yeeres.

Onuphrius Chro.

It was afterward in the 636. yeere after Christ, taken by the Ægyptian Saracens, who held it 400. and odde yeeres.

G.Tir.l.18.c.5. 18.19.&c.

In the yeere 1099. it was regained by Godfrey of Buillon, by assault, with an exceeding slaughter of the Saracens, which Godfrey, when hee was elected King thereof, refused to be crowned with a Crowne of gold, because Christ, for whom hee fought, was therein crowned with thornes. After this recouery, it remained vnder the successours of Godfrey 88. yeeres: till in the yeere 1197. it was regained by Saladine of Ægypt: and lastly, in the yeere 1517. in the time of Selim, the Turkes cast out the Ægyptians, who now hold it, and call it Cuzumbaret, or the Holy Citie. Neither was it Ierusalem alone that hath so oftentimes beene beaten downe and made desolate, but all the great Cities of the world haue with their inhabitants, in seuerall times and ages, suffered the same shipwracke. And it hath beene Gods iust will, to the end others might take warning, if they would, not onely to punish the impietie impietie of men, by famine, by the sword, by fire, and by slaverie; but hee hath reuenged himselfe of the very places they possest; of the walls and buildings, yea of the soyle and the beasts that fedde thereon.

For, euen that land, sometime called holy, hath in effect, lost all her fertilitie, and fruitfulnesse; witnesse the many hundreds of thousands which it fedde in the dayes of the Kings of Iuda and Israel; it being at this time all ouer, in effect, exceeding stony and barraine. It also pleased God, not onely to consume with fire from heauen, the Cities of the Sodomites; but the very soile it selfe hath felt, and doth feele the hand of God to this day. God would not spare the beast that belonged to Amalek, no not any small number of them to be sacrificed to himselfe, neither was it enough that Achan himselfe was stoned, but that his moueables were also consumed and brought to ashes.

§. IIII.

Of the vaine and malicious reports of Heathen writers, touching the ancient Iewes.

OF the originall of the Iewes, prophane writers haue conceiued diuersly and iniuriously. Quintilian speakes infamously of them, and of their leader; who (saith he) gathered together a pernitious Nation. Diodore and Strabo make them Ægyptians. Others affirme that while Isis gouerned Ægypt, the people were so increased, as Ierosolymus, and Iudas ledde thence a great multitude of that Nation, with whom they planted the neighbour Regions; which might be meant by Moses and Aaron: for the name of Moses was accidentall, because hee was taken vp and saued out of the waters. But Iustine, of all other most malicious, doth derive the Iewes from the Syrian Kings; of whom, Damascus, saith hee, was the first: and to him succeeded Abraham, Moses, and Israel. He againe supposeth (somewhat contrary to himselfe) that Israel had tenne sonnes, among whom hee diuided the land of Iuda; so called of Iudas his eldest, who had the greatest portion. The yongest of the sonnes of Israel hee calleth Ioseph: who being brought vp in Ægypt, became learned in magicall Arts, and in the interpretations of Dreames, and signes prodigious, and this Ioseph (saith hee) was father to Moses: who with the rest, by reason of their foule diseases, and lest they should infect others, were banished Ægypt. Further, hee telleth how these men thus banished, when in the Desarts they suffered extreme thirst and famine, and therein found relicfe the seuenth day, for this cause euer after obserued the seuenth day, and kept it Holy; making it a Law among themselues, which afterward became a branch of their Religion. Hee addeth also that they might not marrie out of their owne Tribes, lest discouering their vncleanesse, they might also bee expelled by other Nations, as they were by the Ægyptians. These and like fables hath Iustine. Iustin. l. 36.

Cornelius Tacitus doth as grosly belie them, in affirming, That in the inmost Oratorie of their Temple, they had the golden head of an Asse, which they adored. But herein Tacitus forgetteth himselfe, hauing in the fift booke of his owne Historie truely confessed of the Iewes, that they worshipped one onely God: and thought it most prophane to represent the Deitie by any materiall figure, by the shape of a man, or any other creature; and they had therefore in their Temples, no Image or representation, no not so much as in any Citie by them inhabited. Somewhat like this hath Alexander Polyhistor, in Stephanus; who also makes Iudas with Idumæa, the first parents of the Iewes.

Claudius Iolaus drawes them from Iudæus, whose parents were Sparton and Thebis; whence it came that the Spartans or Lacedæmonians challenged kindred of the Hebrewes: but they did it as descended of Abraham, saith Iosephus. Some of these re- Cited by Stephanus in Iudæa.

ports seeme to haue been gathered out of diuine letters; though wrested and peruerted, according to the custome of the Heathen. For so haue they obscured and altred the Storie of the Creation, of Paradise, of the Floud; and giuen new names to the children of Adam in the first age: to Noah and his sonnes, in the second: and so to Abraham, Isaac, and Iacob, Moses, and the rest of the fathers, and leaders of the Hebrewes: all which fainings, as touching the Iewes and their originals, Iosephus against Appion, and Tertullian haue sufficiently answered. For that the Hebrewes were the Children of Arphaxad and Heber, no man doubteth: and so Chaldæans originally, taking name either of Heber, the sonne of Sale, or else (saith Montanus) of wandring, as is before remembred. And therefore doth Stephanus, the Greeke Grammarian, deriue the Hebrewes or Iewes, from Abrahon; hauing mistaken the name of Abraham, who was the sonne of Heber, in the sixt descent. Their ancient names were first changed by the two grand-children of Abram: for after Iacob, otherwise Israel, the chiefe part were called Israel, another part after Esau or Edom, Edomites; at length the remnant of Iacob, being most of the Tribe of Iuda, honoured the name of Iudas, the sonne of Iacob, and became Iudæans or Iewes: as also for a time in the name of Ephraim the sonne of Ioseph, the chiefe of the Patriarches of the ten Tribes; the rest of the tenne Tribes were comprehended: but were first rooted out when the Kingdome of Israel fell. The Iudæans continued their names, though they suffered the same seruitude not long after, vnder Nabuchodonosor.

Tert. in Apol.

Caleb. f. 63.

The gouernement which this Nation vnder-went, was first paternall: which continued till they serued the Ægyptians. They were secondly ruled by their Captaines and leaders, Moses and Iosua, by a policie Diuine. Thirdly, they subiected themselues to Iudges. Fourthly, they desired a King, and had Saul for the first: Of whom and his successours, before wee intreate, wee are first to speake of their Gouernment vnder Iudges, after the death of Iosua: with somewhat of the things of Fame in other Nations about these times.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the memorable things that happened in the world, from the death of IOSVA to the Warre of Troy: which was about the time of IEPHTHA.

§. I.

Of the inter-regnum after IOSVA's death: and of OTHONIEL.

WHEN Iosua was now dead, who with the aduice of the 70. Elders, and the high Priest, held authoritie ouer the people, and ordered that Common-weale: It pleased God to direct the Tribe of Iuda (in whom the Kingdome was afterward established) to vndertake the Warre against the Canaanites, ouer whom (with Gods fauour, and the assistance of Simeon) they became victorious.

In the first attempt which they made, they not only slew ten thousand, but made Adonibezek prisoner: the greatest and cruellest Commander, both of the Canaanites and Perizites. This tyrants crueltie as else-where hath been signified, they returned in the same kinde vpon his owne head: and so by the torments which hee now felt in his owne person (before no otherwise knowne vnto him but by his malicious imagination) made him confesse and acknowledge Gods iust iudgement against himselfe.

The tribes of Iuda and Simeon did also master and possesse during this inter-regnum (or as some thinke, before the death of Iosua) the Cities of Azotus, Askalon, Ekron and Hierusalem, which they burnt, and the Iebusites afterward reedified. They tooke also the Cities of Hebron, Debir, or Kiriathsepher, and Zephath, afterwards Horma. And although it bee not set downe in expresse words that any one person commanded in chiefe ouer the people, as Moses and Iosua did: yet it seemeth that Caleb was of greatest authoritie among them: and that hee with the aduice of Phinees directed and ordered their warres. For if any thinke that they proceeded without a chiefe, the good successe which followed their vndertakings witnesseth the contrarie. And it was Caleb euen while Iosua gouerned, as appeares Ios. 10. 39. that propounded the attempt of Debir, to the rest of the Captaines: for the performance of which enterprise, he promised his Daughter Achsah: which hee performed to Othoniel his yonger brother after the conquest: whose behauiour in that seruice was such, as (next vnto the ordinance of God) it gaue him the greatest reputation among them, and may be esteemed the second cause of his preferment and election for their first Iudge soone after. But while those of Iuda made warre with their borderers, from whom they onely recouered the mountainous Countries (for they could not driue out the inhabitants of the Valleys, because they had Chariots of yron) Iud. 1. 19. The rest of the Tribes sought also to enlarge and establish their owne Territories: in which warre they laboured with variable successe: for as the house of Ioseph recouered Bethel, or Luz, from the Hittites, so did the Amorites recouer from Dan all the plaine Countries, and forst them to saue themselues in the Mountaines. Iud. 1. 25. Iud. 1. 32. And now the Israelites vnmindfull of Gods benefits, and how often he had miraculously a-fore-time defended them, and made them victorious ouer their enemies (the Elders being also consumed, who better aduised them in the Inter-regnum) did not only ioyne themselues in marriage with the Heathen Nations: but (that which was more detestable) they serued the Idols of Baal, and Astaroth, with other the dead gods of the Canaanites and Amorites. And therefore did the Lord God whom they had prouoked with their Idolatrie, deliuer them into the handes of the Aramites of Mesopotamia: whom Chushan Rishathaim at that time commanded. But after they had felt the smart of Gods displeasure against them eight yeeres, it pleased him to haue compassion on his people, and to raise vp Othoniel to bee their Iudge and Leader: who by God assisted, deliuered his brethren from oppression: and inforst the Aramites to returne into their owne Desarts, and into Mesopotamia adioyning, after which the Israelites had peace fourtie yeeres, during all the time of Othoniels gouernment. This Othoniel is thought by Tostatus to haue been the yonger brother of Caleb, for as much as in the booke of Iudges he is twice called Othoniel the Sonne of Cenaz, Calebs yonger brother. Others doe rather interpret those wordes (Calebs yonger brother) as if they signified the meaneft of his kinred. Indeed it is not likely, that Calebs Daughter should marrie with her owne Vncle; yet it followes not therefore that Othoniel should haue beene the meaneft of the kinred. Wherefore we may better thinke that he was the Nephew of Caleb, (as some learned men expound it) and as the very words of Scripture seeme to enforce. For Caleb was the sonne of Iephunneth, and Othoniel the sonne of Cenas, Calebs yonger brother; that is, he was not brother to Caleb, but his yonger brothers sonne; to whom it was not only lawfull, but commendable to marrie with his Cosin German Calebs daughter.

Iud. 3. 10.

How long it was from the death of Iosuah to the gouernment of Othoniel, it cannot be found: but it seemes to haue been no short time. For many Warres were made in that space against the people of the Land. Laish was then taken (as is thought) by the Danites; and the best writers are of opinion, that betweene the times of Iosua and Othoniel that ciuill warre brake out betweene the Beniamites and the rest of Israel, for the forcing to death of the Leuites wife. For it is written that in those dayes there was no King in Israel, but euery man did that which was good in his owne eyes. And as Iuda led the people against the Canaanites during the Interregnum, so was hee commanded to doe against Beniamin, euen by the Lord God, whose direction they craued, as wanting a Iudge to appoint what should bee done, which sheweth it to haue been when Iosuah was dead, and before the gouernment of Othoniel, especially considering, that all other times wherein they wanted Gouernours, were spent vnder such oppression of strangers, as would haue giuen them no leaue to haue attended such a ciuill Warre, if their power had been as great, as it was in the menaging of this action, wherein they so weakned the body of their estate, by effusion of bloud, that in many ages they could not bring into the field such numbers as formerly they had mustered against their bordering enemies.

§. II.

Of the memorable things of this Age in other Nations: and of the difficultie in the computation of times.

THere liued in this Age of Othoniel, Pandion or Pandareus, according to Homer, the fift King of Athens: who beganne to rule in the twentieth yeere of Othoniel, and gouerned fortie yeeres. Hee was Father to Eriethes: his Daughters were Progne and Philomela, so greatly mentioned in fables.

Cadmus also about this time obtained Thebes: of whose Daughter Semele was borne Dionysius, or Liber Pater: vnder whome Linus the Musician liued. In his time time alſo the Cities of Melus, Paphus, and Thurſus, were built.

Ida and Dactylus flouriſhed in this age, who are ſaid to haue found out the vſe of iron: but Geneſis hath taught vs the contrary, and that Tubalcain long before wrought cunningly both in iron and braſſe. Not long after this time, Amphion and Zethus gouerned Thebes: whom diuers Chronologers finde in Ehuds time. But S. Auguſtine making a repetition of thoſe fables, which were deuiſed among the Græcians and other Nations, during the gouernment of the Iudges, begins with Triptolemus, of whoſe parentage there is a little agreement. Vues vpon the thirteenth Chapter of S. Auguſtine de Ciuitate Dei, and the eighteenth booke, hath gathered all the opinions of this mans progenie, where he that deſires his pedigree may finde it. Lactantius and Euſebius make him native of Attica: and the ſonne of Eleuſius King of Eleuſina: which Eleuſius by carefull induſtrie had fed the people of that Territorie in the time of a great famine. This, when vpon the like occaſion Triptolemus could not performe, fearing the furie of the people, he fled thence by Sea in a kinde of Galley or long Boat, which carried in her Prowe a grauen or carued Serpent; who becauſe he made exceeding great ſpeed to returne and to relieue his people with Corne, from ſome neighbour Nation: it was fained by the Poets, that his Coach was carried by Serpents through the ayre.

Gen. 4. 22. Whence came the name of Vulcan by Aphereſis of the two firſt letters. Aug. de Ciuit. Dei, l. 18. c. 13.

Whether the times of theſe Kings which liued together with Othoniel, and after him with the reſt of the Iudges and Kings of Iſrael and Iuda, be preciſely ſet downe, I cannot auow; for the Chronologers, both of the former and latter times, differ in many particulars, to examine all which would require the whole time of a long life: and therefore I deſire to be excuſed, if in theſe compariſons I erre with others of better iudgement. For whether Euſebius and all that follow him, or his oppoſites (who make themſelues ſo conuerſant with theſe ancient Kings, and with the very yeere when they beganne to rule) haue hit the marke of time of all other the fartheſt off and moſt defaced, I cannot but greatly doubt. Firſt, becauſe the Authors themſelues, from whom the ancienteſt Chronologers haue borrowed light, had nothing for the warrant of their owne workes, but coniecture: Secondly, becauſe their owne diſagreement and contention in thoſe elder dayes, with that of our owne age among the labourers in times, is ſuch, as no man among them hath yet ſo edified any mans vnderſtanding, ſaue his owne, but that he is greatly diſtracted, after what patterne to erect his buildings.

This diſagreement is found not onely in the raignes of Heathen Kings and Princes; but euen in computation of thoſe times which the indiſputable authoritie of holy Scripture hath ſummed vp, as in that of Abrahams birth; and after in the times of the Iudges and the oppreſſions of Iſrael, in the times from the egreſſion to the building of Salomons Temple, in the Perſian Empire, the ſeuentie Weekes, and in what not? Whereſoeuer the account of times may ſuffer examination, the arguments are oppoſite, and contentions are ſuch, as for ought that I ſee, men haue ſought by ſo many wayes to vncouer the Sunne, that the dayes thereby are made more darke, and the clouds more condenſt than before: I can therefore giue no other warrant, than other men haue done in theſe computations: and therefore that ſuch and ſuch Kings and Kingdomes tooke beginning in this or that yeere, I auow it no otherwiſe than as a borrowed knowledge, or at leaſt as a priuate opinion: which I ſubmit to better iudgements. Nam in priſcis rebus veritas non ad vnguem quærenda; In ancient things we are not to require an exact narration of the truth, ſayes Diodore.

§. III.

§. III.

Of EHVDS time, and of PROSERPINA, ORITHYA, TEREVS, TANTALVS, TITYVS, ADMETVS, and others that liued about those times.

AFter the death of Othoniel, when Israel fell backe to their former Idolatrie, God incouraged Moab to inuade and suppresse them: to performe which he ioyned the forces of Ammon, and Amalec vnto his owne, and so (as all kinde of miseric readily findeth out those whom God hath abandoned, or for a time with-drawne his helpe from, thereby to make them feele the difference betweene his grace and his displeasure) these Heathen neighbouring Nations had an easie conquest ouer Israel: whom God himselfe exposed to those perils: within which they were so speedily folded vp. In this miserable estate they continued full eighteene yeeres vnder Eglon King of the Moabites, and his confederates. Yet as the mercies of God are infinite, he turned not his eares from their crying repentance: but raised vp Ehud the sonne of Gera to deliuer them: by which weake man, though maimed in his right hand, yet confident in the iustnesse of his quarrell, and fearing that the Israelites were too few in numbers to contend with the Head of those valiant Nations, hee resolued to attempt vpon the person of Eglon, whom if he could but extinguish, he assured himselfe of the following victorie: especially giuing his Nation no time to reestablish their gouernment, or to choose a King to command, and direct them in the Warres. According to which resolution, Ehud went on as an Embassadour to Eglon, loaden with presents from the Israelites, as to appease him, and obtaining priuate accesse vpon the pretence of some secret to be reuealed, he pierst his body with a Poniard, made of purpose with a double edge: and shutting the doores of his closet vpon him, escaped.

It may seeme that being confident of his good successe, hee had prepared the strength of Israel in readinesse. For suddenly after his returne, he did repasse Iordan, and inuading the Territorie of Moab, ouerthrew their Armie consisting of 10000. able and strong men: whereof not any one escaped. After which victory, and that Samgar his Successour had miraculously slaine 600. Philistims with an Oxe goade: the Land and People of Israel liued in peace vnto the end of fourescore yeeres from the death of Othoniel, which terme expired in the Worlds yeere 2691.

In the dayes of Ehud, Naomi with Elimelech her husband, and with her two sonnes, trauailed into Moab, and so the storie of Ruth is to be referred to this time. About the beginning of the fourscore yeeres which are giuen to Ehud, it was that Orcus King of the Molossians: otherwise Pluto, stale Proserpina, as shee walked to gather flowers in the fields of Hipponium in Sicilia: or (according to Pausanias) by the Riuer Cephisus, which elsewhere he calleth Chemer, if he meane not two distinct Riuers. This stealth being made knowne to Pyrithous, with whom Hercules and Theseus ioyned themselues, they agreed together to recouer her: but Pluto or Orcus (whom others call Aidonius) had (as they say) a very huge Dogge, which fastened on Pyrithous, and tare him in pieces, and had also worried Theseus, but that Hercules speedily relcued him: and by strength tooke and mastered the Dogge Cerberus: whereof grew the fable of Hercules his deliuering of Theseus out of Hell. But Zezes, as I take it, hath written this storie somewhat more according to the truth. For Theseus and Pyritheus, saith he, attempted to steale Proserpina Daughter to Aidonius, King of the Molossians, who had Ceres to Wife, the mother of Proserpina. Proserpina being a generall name also for all faire women. This purpose of theirs being knowne to Aidonius, Theseus and Pyrithous were both taken; and because Pyrithous was the principall in this conspiracie, and Theseus drawne on by a kinde of affection or inforcement, the one was giuen for foode to Aidonius his great Dog Cerberus, the other held prisoner, till Hercules by the instigation of Euristheus deliuered him by strong hand. The Molossi which Stephanus writes with a ſingle (S) were a people of Epirus inhabititing neere the Mountaines of Pindus: of which Mountaines Oeta is one of the moſt famous, where Hercules burnt himſelfe. The Riuer of Acheron (which the Poets deſcribe to be in Hell) riſeth out of the ſame Hills. There is another Nation of the Moloſſi in Theſſali: but theſe are neighbours to the Caſſiopai, ſaith Plutarch in his Greeke queſtions.

The rape of Orithya the Daughter of Erictheus, King of Athens, taken away by Boreas of Thrace, is referred to the time of Ehud. The Poets aſcribe this rape to the North winde, becauſe Thrace is ſituate North from Athens. In his time alſo Tereus rauiſhed Philomela, of which the fable was deuiſed of her conuerſion into a Nightingale. For Tereus hauing married her ſiſter Progne, conducting Philomela from Athens to ſee her ſiſter, forſt her in the paſſage, and withall cut out her tongue, that ſhee might not complaine; perſwading Progne his Wife, that Philomela died in the mid-way: all which her brother in law's mercileſſe behauiour towards her, Philomela expreſſed by her needle vpon cloth, and ſent it Progne. In reuenge whereof Progne cauſed her onely ſonne Itys to be cut in pieces, and ſet before Tereus her huſband, ſo dreſt as it appeared to be ſome other ordinary foode: of which when he had eaten his fill, ſhee cauſed his head, hands, and feete, to bee preſented vnto him: and then fled away with ſuch ſpeede towards Athens where her Father Pandion yet liued, as the Poets fained, that ſhee was turned into a Swallow. The place where it was performed, Strabo findes to bee Daulis in Phocis: and the Tombe of Tereus, Pauſanias hath built neere the Rockes Mergi, in the Territory of Athens. By which, as alſo by the name Daulis, where theſe things are ſuppoſed to haue beene done (whence alſo Philomela is called Daulias ales) it appeares that it is true, which Thucydides notes by way of digreſſion in his Peloponneſian Warre, That this Tereus was not King in that which is now called Thracia, or in Odryſe, (as the Poets call him Odryſius) but that Phocis a Countrie in Greece not farre from Attica a Citie whereof is called Daulia, was in Pandions time inhabited by Thracians: of which this Tereus was King: whence Pandion, to haue amitie with his neighbours, made him his ſonne in law: as it is good to beleeue, ſaith Thucydides, that Pandion King of Athens made that alliance with a neighbour King, from whom hee might haue ſuccour, rather than with any Tereus, that ſhould haue held the Kingdome of Odryſe, which was greatly diſtant from thence. The occaſion that the Poets choſe a Swallow for Progne to be turned into, may ſeeme to haue beene partly becauſe, as Pauſanias ſayes; Daulide nec nidificant, nec habitant in tota circum regione Hirundines; As if a Swallow, remembring the wrong that was there done to her, and to her ſiſter, did for euer hate that place.

Neere this time Melampus (who is ſaid to haue vnderſtood the voyces of Birds and Beaſts) flouriſhed, being alſo eſteemed for an excellent Phyſician. Hee reſtored to their former health the Daughters of Pratus King of the Argiues, who (as the Poets pleaſe) were made mad by Iuno: and thinking themſelues to be Kine, fled into the Woods, fearing to be conſtrained to the Plough: for in thoſe Countries, where the ground was light, they did vſe often to plough with Kine.

In the 47. yeere of Ehud, Tros began to raigne in Dardania, and gaue it his owne name; about which time Phemone the chiefe Prieſt of Apollo in Delphos, deuiſed the Heroicall Verſe.

Of the ſame date was Tantalus, King of Lydia: whom Euſebius makes King of Phrygia: and alſo of that part of which the people were anciently Maones. Of Tantalus was deuiſed the fable that ſome Poets haue applied to the paſſion of loue: and ſome to the couetous that dare not inioy his riches. Euſebius calls this Tantalus the ſonne of Iupiter, by the Nymph Pleta: Diaconus and Didymus in Zezes, giue him another Mother. He was ſaid to be the ſonne of Iupiter: as ſome will haue it; becauſe he had that Planet in his aſcendent, betokening wiſedome and riches. It is ſaid that when he made a feaſt to the Gods, hauing nothing more precious: he cauſed his own Sonne to be ſlaine and dreſt for the banquet: of whom Ceres ate part of one of the ſhoulders;

shoulders: whereby was signified that those men which seeke after Diuine knowledge, preferre nothing on earth before it: no not the care of their owne children, of all else the most deareſt. And where it was deuiſed, that hee had alwayes Water and Fruit offered to his lips, and yet ſuffered the torment of hunger and thirſt, it was meant thereby, that though he abounded (by reaſon of his riches) in all delicacie of the world, yet his minde being otherwiſe and to higher deſires tranſported, he enioyed no pleaſure at all by the reſt. Of whom Ouid:

Quærit aquas in aquis, & poma fugacia captat
TANTALVS, hoc illi garrula lingua dedit.

Here TANTALVS in water ſeekes for water, and doth miſſe
The fleeting fruit hee catcheth at: His long tongue brought him this.

This puniſhment, they ſay, was inflicted vpon him, for that hee diſcouered the ſecrets of the Gods: that is, becauſe he taught wiſedome and vertue to mortall men: which ſtorie Cornelius Gallus hath elegantly expreſt in Verſe. Others expound this fable otherwiſe and ſay, That Tantalus, though he excelled in riches, yet being thirſtie of more abundance, was neuer ſatisfied. Of whom Horace againſt couetouſneſſe:

TANTALVS à labijs ſitiens fugientia captat
Flumina quid rides? mutato nomine de te Fabula narratur.

The thirſting TANTALVS doth catch at ſtreames that from him flee,
Why laugheſt thou? the name but chang'd, the tale is told of thee.

Others conceiue where it is fained of Tantalus, that he gaue the Nectar and Ambroſia of the Gods to vaine and vnworthy men, that he was therfore by them in that ſort puniſhed. Of which Natalis out of Pindarus:

Immortalitatem quòd furatus,
Cœtanijs conuiuis
Nectar Ambroſiamq; dedit.

Becauſe that ſtealing immortalitie,
He did both Nectar and Ambroſia giue
To gueſts of his owne age to make them liue.

Whereby it was meant, that the ſecrets of Diuinitie ought not to bee imparted to the vnpure Vulgar. For as the cleaneſt meates in a foule ſtomake, are therein corrupted, ſo the moſt high and reſerued myſteries are often peruerted by an vncleane and defiled minde.

Mark. 4. 11. To you it is giuen (ſaith Chriſt in MARKE) to know the myſterie of the Kingdome of God, but vnto them that are without, all things bee done in parables. So is it ſaid of him, that he expounded all things to his Diſciples apart. And therefore doth Gregorie Nazianzene inferre vpon a place of S. PAVL: Quod ſi PAVLO licuiſſet effari ea, quorum ipſi cognitionem cœlum tertium & vſque ad illud progreſſio ſuppeditauit, fortaſſe de Deo, nobis aliquid amplius conſtaret; If PAVL might haue vttered the things, the knowledge whereof the third heauens, and his going thither did bring vnto him, peraduenture we might know ſomewhat more of God.

Mark. 4. 34.

Greg. in Orat. de vetita ratione diſ. de Deo. 2. Cor. 12.

Pythagoras, ſaith Reuclin, thought it not the part of a wiſe man, Aſino lyram expenere, aut myſteria, quæ ita reciperet, vt Sus tubam, & fidem graculus, & vnguenta Scarabæus:

baus: quare silentium indixit discipulis, ne vulgo diuinorum arcana patefacerent, quæ meditando facilius, quàm loquendo apprehendantur; To set an Asse to a harpe, or to learne mysteries: which he would handle as a Swine doth a trumpet, or a Iay a viall, or Scarabies and vncleane flies soueraigne ointment. Wherefore he commanded silence to his disciples, that they should not disclose diuine mysteries to the common sort, which are easier learnt by meditation than by babbling. And therefore did the Ægyptians communicate their mysteries among their Priests in certaine Hieroglyphick letters, to the end that their secrets might bee hidden from the Vulgar: and that they might bestow the more time in the contemplation of their couered meanings.

But to proceede with the contemporaries of Aod, or Ehud, with him it is also said, that Tityus liued whom Apollo slew, because he sought to force his Mother Latona. Euphorion hath it thus, that Tityus was the Sonne of Elara, the Daughter of Orchomenus; which Elara being beloued of Iupiter, to auoid Iuno's reuenge, he hid Elara in the earth, where shee was deliuered of Tityus: whose Mother dying, and himselfe therein nourished, he was therefore called the sonne of the earth. Pausanias speaking of the graue of this Gyant, affirmes that his body occupied the third part of a furlong. But Tibullus hath a louder lie of his stature out of Homer.

Porrectusq; nouem TITYVS per iugera terræ, Hom. Od. 11.
Assiduas atro viscere pascit aues.

Nine furlongs stretcht lies TITYVS, who for his wicked deeds,
The hungrie birds with his renewing liuer daily feeds.

This Strabo doth thus expound; that Apollo killing this cruell and wicked Tyrant of Panopea, a Citie in Phocis, it was fained by the Poets to the terrour of others, that he was still eaten in Hell by birds, and yet still liued, and had his flesh renewed.

Admetus King of Thessalie liued also in this Age, whom it is said that Apollo first serued as a Herd-man, and afterward for his excellent wit was by him aduanced; but hauing slaine Hyacinthus, he crost the Hellespont, and fled into Phrygia: where together with Neptune, hee was entertained by Laomedon, and got his bread by working in bricke, for building of the walls of Troy, not by making the bricks leape into their places by playing on his Harpe: according to him in Ouid, which saith:

Ilion aspicies, firmataq; turribus altis
Mœnia, APOLLINEAE structa canore lyra.

Strong Ilion thou shalt see with walls and towers high Built with the harpe of wise APOLLO's Harmonie.

Thus the Poets: but others, that hee laboured with his hands, as hired in this worke. And that he also laboured at the building of the Labyrinth in Greece, all the Megariens witnesse, saith Pausanias. Paus. in Att.

In these daies also of Ehud, or (as some finde it) in the daies of Deborah, liued Perseus, the sonne of Iupiter and Danae, by whose Souldiers (as they sailed out of Peloponnesus, to seeke their aduenture on Africa side) Medusa, the Daughter and Successor of Phorcus, being weakely accompanied as shee hunted, neare the Lake Triton, was surprised and slaine: whose beautie, when Perseus beheld, he caused her head to be imbalmed, and carried into Greece: the beautie whereof was such and so much admired, and the beholders so astonished which beheld it, as thereof grew the fiction, that all that looked on Medusa's head, were turned into stones.

Triton a Lake of Africa, which Plinie calleth Pallantias. Didym. in pereg. Hist.

Cecrops, the second of that name and 7. King of Athens, and Acrisius the 13. or after Eusebius, the 14. King of the Argiues, began also their raignes, as it is said, in the time of this Iudge: of which the first ruled 40. yeares, and the second 31 yeares. Also Bellerophon liued in this age, being the sonne of Glaucus, the sonne of Sisyphus: who inticed by Antea or Sthenobia, the wife of Praetus of the Argiues, to accompanie her, but refusing it, shee accused him to her husband that he offered to force her: wherupon Praetus sent Bellerophon into Lycia, about some affaires of weight, between him and his Sonne in law Iobates: giuing secret order to Iobates to dispatch him: but Iobates thinking it dishonorable to lay violent hands on him, imployed him against Chimæra, a Monster, vomiting or breathing fire. Now the Gods (as the report is) pittying his innocencie, sent him the winged Horse Pegasus, sprung vp of the bloud of Meduſa, formerly slaine by the Souldiers of Perseus in Africa, to transport him, a horse that none other could master or bridle but Minerua: vpon which beast Bellerophon ouer-came Chimæra: and performed the other seruices giuen him in charge: which done, as he returned toward Lycia, the Lycians lay in ambush to haue slaine him: but being victorious also ouer all those, he arriued to Iobates in safetie: whom Iobates for his eminent vertues honoured, first with one of his Daughters: and afterward with his Kingdome: after which he grew so insolent, as he attempted to flie vp to heauen vpon his Pegasus: whose pride Iupiter disdaining, caused one of his stinging flies so to vexe Pegasus, as he cast off Bellerophon from his back, into the Valley of Cilicia, where he died blinde: of which burthen Pegasus being discharged (as the fable goeth) flew back to heauen: and being fed in Iupiters owne stable, Aurora beg'd him of Iupiter to ride on before the Sunne. This tale is diuersly expounded, as first by some, That it pleaseth God to relieue men in their innocent and vndeserued aduersitie, and to cast downe those which are too high minded: according to that which is said of Bellerophon: that when he was exposed to extreme hazard, or rather certaine death, he found both deliuerance and honor: but waxing ouer-proud and presumptuous in his glorious fortunes, he was againe throwne downe into the extremitie of sorrow, and euer-during miserie. Secondly by others, That vnder the name of Chimæra, was meant a cruell Pyrate of the Lycians, whose ship had in her prow, a Lyon, a Goate in the mid-ship, and a Dragon in the sterne, of which three beasts this Monster Chimæra was said to be compounded, whom Bellerophon pursued with a kinde of Galley of such swiftnesse, that it was called the flying Horse: to whom the inuention of sailes (the wings of a ship) are also attributed. Many other expositions are made of this tale by other Authors: but it is not vnlikely, that Chimæra was the name of a ship, for so Virgil calleth one of the greatest ships of Æneas.

Ion also, from whom the Athenians (being ignorant of the antiquitie of their parent Iauan) deriue their name of Iones, is said to haue beene about Ehuds time: Homer calls them Iaones, which hath a neere resemblance to the word Iauan. Perhaps it might be so that Ion himselfe tooke name from Iauan: it being a custome obseruable in the Histories of all times, to reuiue the ancient name of a fore-father, in some the principall of his issue.

The inuasion of India by Liber Pater, is by some reported as done in this age: but S. Augustine makes him farre more ancient: placing him betweene the comming out of Ægypt, and the death of Iosua.

About the end of the 80. yeares, ascribed to Ehud, and Samgar, Pelops flourished: who gaue name to Peloponnesus in Greece, now called Morea.

§. IIII.

Of DEBORA and her Contemporaries.

AFter Israel had liued in peace and plentie to the end of these 80. yeares, they againe began to forget the giuer of all goodnesse, and many of those being worne out, which were witnesses of the former miserie, and of Gods deliuerance by Ehud, and after him by Samgar, the rest began to returne to their former neglect of Gods commandements. For as Plentie and Peace are the parents of idle securitie; so is securitie as fruitfull in begetting and bringing forth both danger and subuersion: of which all estates in the world haue tasted by interchange of times. Therefore when their sinnes were againe ripe for punishment, Iabin King of Hazor, after the death of Ehud, inuaded the Territorie of Israel, and hauing in his seruice 900. yron Chariots, besides the rest of his forces, he held them in subiection twentie yeares, till it pleased God to raise vp Deborah, the Propheteſſe, who incouraged Barac to leuie a force out of Nepthalim, and Zabulon, to incounter the Canaanites. That the men of Nepthalim were more forward than the rest in this action, it may seeme to haue proceeded partly from the authoritie that Barac had among them, being of the same Tribe; and partly from their feeling of the common grieuance, which in them was more sensible, than in others, because Hazor and Haroseth the chiefe holds of Iabin, were in Nepthalim. So in the daies of Ieptha the Gileadites tooke the greatest care, because the Ammonites with whom the Warre was, presſed most vpon them, as being their borderers. Now as it pleased God by the left hand of Ehud to deliuer Israel from the Moabite: and by the counsaile and courage of a woman, to free them from the yoke of Canaan, and to kill the valiant Sisera by Iael the Kenites wife: so was it his will at other times, to worke the like great things by the weakest meanes. For the mightie Assyrian Nabuchodonosor, who was a King of Kings, and resistlesse, he ouerthrew by his owne imaginations, the causers of his brutish melancholy: and changed his matchlesse pride into the base humilitie of a Beast. And to approue that he is the Lord of all power, he sometime punisheth by inuisible strength, as when he slaughtered the Armie of Senacherib by his Angell: or as he did the Ægyptians in Moses time: sometime by dead bodies, as when he drowned Pharao by the waues of the Sea: and the Canaanites by haile-stones in the time of Iosua: sometimes by the ministerie of men, as when he ouerthrew the foure Kings of the East, Chedorlaomer, and his companions, by the houshold seruants of Abraham. He caused the Moabites and Ammonites to set vpon their owne confederate the Armie of the Edomites; and hauing slaine them to kill one another in the sight of Iehosaphat: and of the like to these a volume of examples may be gathered. And to this effect did Deborah the Propheteſſe speake vnto Barac in these wordes: But this iourney that thou takest, shall not be for thine honour, for the Lord shall sell SISERA into the handes of a Woman. In which victorie all the strength of the Canaanite Iabin fell to the ground, euen to the last man: in the end of which Warre it seemeth that Iabin himselfe also perished, as appeareth by the last Verse of the fourth of Iudges.

2 Chron. 20.

Iud. 4. 9.

After all which Deborah giueth thankes to God, and after the acknowledgment of all his powerfulnesse and great mercies, shee sheweth the weake estate whereinto Israel was brought for their Idolatrie by the Canaanites, and other bordering Nations, in these wordes: Was there a shield or speare seene among fortie thousand of Israel? she also sheweth how the Israelites were seuered and amased, some of them confined ouer Iordan, and durst not ioyne themselues to the rest; as those of Reuben in Gilead: that the Asherites kept the Sea-coast, and forsooke their habitations towards the Land, and the children of Dan who neighboured the Sea, crept into their ships for safetie, shewing thereby that all were dispersed, and all in effect lost. Shee then curseth the inhabitants of Meroz, who dwelling neare the place of the battaile (belike fearing the successe) came not out to assist Israel, and then blesseth Iael the wife of Heber the Kenite, who nailed Sisera in her Tent: shewing the ancient affection of that race to the Israelites. For though the Familie of Heber were inforced in that miserable time of subiection, to hold correspondencie with Iabin the Canaanite, yet when occasion offered them meanes, they witnessed their loue and faith to their ancient friends. Lastly, shee derideth the Mother of Sisera who promised her sonne the victorie in her owne hopes: and fancied to her selfe, and described the spoiles both of Garments and Maidens by him gotten. For conclusion, shee directeth her praises and thankes to God only victorious.

From the beginning of Iabins oppression to the end of that peace, which Deborah and Barac purchased vnto Israel, there passed 40. yeares. In which time the Kingdome of Argos which had continued 544. yeares was translated to Mycænæ: The translation of this Kingdome Viues out of Pausanias writeth to this effect: After Danaus, Lynceus succeeded in Argos, after whom the children of Abas the sonne of Lynceus diuide the Kingdome: of which Acrisius being eldest held Argos it selfe: Prætus his brother possest Ephyra or Corinth, and Tirynthos, and other Cities with all the Territorie towards the Sea, there being many monuments in Tirynthos, which witnesse Prætus possession, saith Pausanias.

Pau. in Corinthiacis.

Now Acrisius was foretold by an Oracle, that hee should be slaine by the sonne of his Daughter Danae: whereupon he caused her to be inclosed in a Tower, to the end that no man might accompanie her. But the Ladie being exceeding faire, it is fained that Iupiter turned himselfe into a golden shower: which falling into her lap, begat her with child: the meaning whereof was, that some Kings sonne, or other Worthie man, corrupted her keepers with gold: and enioyed her, of whom Perseus was borne; who when he grew to mans estate, either by chance (saith Ctesias) or in shewing his grand-father the inuention of the discus, or leaden ball, slew him vnwillingly. After this Perseus, to auoide the infamie of Patricide in Argos, changed Kingdomes with his Vncle Prætus: and built Mycænæ. This imprisonment of Danae, Sophocles reporteth otherwise: and that shee was inclosed in a brasen vault, vnder the Kings Hall with her Nurse and Keepers. Vpon this close custodie Horace hath this wittie obseruation.

The

The first Kings of the Argiues were these.

Inachus the first King, who beganne to raigne in the first yeare of Iacob, and the 61. of Isaac: from which time to the end of Sthenelus; Cadrus misreckoneth 400. yeares. This Kingdome before the translation, Eusebius accounteth to haue stood 544. yeares, others but at 417. Io was the Daughter of this Inachus: whom the Aegyptians called Isis.

Pheroneus,
Apis,
Argus,
Piras,
Phorbas,
Triopas,
Crotopus,
Sthenelus,
Danaus,
Lynceus,
Abas, Acrisius,
Pelops.

After the translation to Mycenæ, Mar. Scotus findes these Kings.

Perseus,
Sthenelus,
Eurystheus,
Atreus and Thyestes } The sonnes of Pelops by Hippodamia: Atreus by Europe had Agamemnon and Menelaus.
Agamemnon,
Aegysthus,
Orestes,
Tisamenus,
Penthilus and Cometes.

Of these Kings Mercator and Bunting leaue out the two first, and the last: beginning with Eurystheus: and ending with Penthilus. In Tisamenus time the Heraclidæ returned into Peloponnesus: of which hereafter.

The Contemporaries of Barac and Debora, were Midas who raigned in Phrygia: and Ilus who built Ilium: with others mentioned in our Chronologicall table, as contemporaries with Debora.

§. V.

Of GIDEON, and of DAEDALVS, SPHINX, MINOS, and others that liued in this Age.

DEBORA and Barac being dead: the Midianites assisted by the Amalekites infested Israel. For when vnder a Iudge who had held them in the feare of the Lord, they had inioyed any quiet or prosperitie: the Iudge was no sooner dead, than they turned to their former impious Idolatrie. Therefore now the neighbouring Nations did so master them in a short time (the hand of God being with-held from their defence) as to saue themselues, they crept into caues of the mountaines, and other the like places of hardest accesse: their enemies possessing all the plaines and fruitfull vallies: and in harvest time by themselues, and the multitude of their cattle, destroying al that grew vp: couering the fields as thick as grasse-hoppers: which seruitude lasted seuen yeares. Iud. 6.

Iud 6.v.5. Then the Lord by his Angell ſtirred vp Gideon the ſonne of Ioaſh, afterward called Ierubbaal: whoſe feare and vnwillingneſſe, and how it pleaſed God to hearten Iud.c.6.& 7. him in his enterprize, it is both largely and preciſely ſet down in the holy Scriptures: as alſo how it pleaſed God by a few ſelect perſons, namely 300. out of 32000. men, to make them know that he only was the Lord of Hoſts; Each of theſe 300. by Gideons appointment carried a trumpet, and light in a pitcher, inſtraments of more terrour than force, with which he gaue the great Armie of their enemies an alarum: who hearing ſo loud a noiſe, and ſeeing (at the crack of ſo many pitchers broken) ſo many lights about them, eſteemed the Armie of Iſrael to be infinite, and ſtrucken with a ſodaine feare, they all fled without a ſtroke ſtricken: and were ſlaughtered in great numbers: two of their Princes being made priſoners and ſlaine. In his returne the Ephramites began to quarrell with Gideon, becauſe he made warre without their aſſiſtance, being then greedie of glorie, the victorie being gotten: who (if Gideon had failed and fallen in the enterpriſe) would no doubt haue held themſelues happie by being neglected. But Gideon appeaſing them with a mild anſwere, followed after the enemie, in which purſuit being tired with trauaile, and wearie euen with the ſlaughtering of his enemies, he deſired reliefe from the inhabitants of Succoth, to the end, that (his men being refreſhed) he might ouer-take the other two Kings of the Midianites: which had ſaued themſelues by flight. For they were foure Princes of the Nations, which had inuaded and waſted Iſrael: to wit, Oreb and Zeeb, which were taken already, and Zebah and Salmunna which fled.

Gideon being denied by them of Succoth, ſought the like reliefe from the inhabitants of Penuel, who in like ſort refuſed to ſuccour him. To both of theſe places he threatned therefore the reuenge, which in his returne from the proſequution of the other two Princes, he performed: to wit, that hee would teare the fleſh of thoſe of Succoth with Thornes and Briars, and deſtroy the Inhabitants and Citie of Penuel: Now why the people of theſe two Cities ſhould refuſe reliefe to their bretheren the Iſraelites, eſpecially after ſo great a victorie: if I may preſume to make coniecture; it ſeemes likely, firſt that thoſe Cities ſet ouer Iordan, and in the way of all inuaſions, to be made by the Moabites, and Ammonites, and Midianites, into Iſrael, had either made their owne peace with thoſe Nations, and were not ſpoiled by them: or elſe they knowing that Zeba and Salmunna were eſcaped with a great part of their armie, might feare their reuenge in the future. Secondly, it may be laid to the condition and diſpoſitions of theſe men: as it is not rare to finde of the like humour in all ages. For there are multitudes of men, eſpecially of thoſe which follow the warre, that both enuie and maligne others, if they performe any praiſe-worthy actions, for the honour and ſafetie of their owne Countrie, though themſelues may bee aſſured to beare a part of the ſmart of contrarie ſucceſſe. And ſuch malitious hearts can rather be contented that their Prince and Countrie ſhould ſuffer hazzard, and want, than that ſuch men as they miſlike, ſhould be the authors or actors of any glorie or good to either.

Now Gideon, how or whereſoeuer it were that hee refreſhed himſelfe and his wearie and hungrie Souldiers, yet he followed the opportunitie, and purſued his former victorie to the vttermoſt: and finding Zebah and Salmunna in Karkor (ſuſpecting no farther attempt vpon them) he againe ſurpriſed them, & ſlaughtered thoſe 15000. remaining: hauing put to the ſword in the former attempt 120000. and withall he tooke Zebah and Salmunna priſoners: whom becauſe themſelues had exequuted Gideons bretheren before at Tabor, he cauſed them both to be ſlaine: or (as it is written) at their owne requeſt ſlew them with his owne hands: his Son whom he firſt commanded to doe it, refuſing it; and in his returne from the conſummation of this meruailous victorie, he tooke reuenge of the Elders of Succoth, and of the Citizens of Penuel: forgiuing no offence committed againſt him: either by ſtrangers or by his bretheren the Iſraelites. But ſuch mercy as he ſhewed to others, his owne children found ſoon after his death, according to that which hath been ſaid before. The debts of crueltie and mercie are neuer left vnsatisfied: for as he slew the 70. Elders of Succoth, with great and vnusuall torments, so were his owne 70. sonnes al, but one, murthered by his owne bastard Abimilec. The like Analogie is obserued by the Rabbines, in the greatest of the plagues which God brought vpon the Ægyptians, who hauing caused the male children of the Hebrewes to bee slaine, others of them to bee cast into the riuer and drowned: God rewarded them euen with the like measure, destroying their owne first borne by his Angell, and drowning Pharaoh and his armie in the red sea. And hereof a world of examples might bee giuen, both out of the Scriptures and other Histories.

In the end so much did the people reuerence Gideon in the present for this victorie, and their owne deliuerance, as they offered him the Soueraignetie ouer them, and to establish him in the Gouernment; which hee refused, answering; I will not reigne ouer you, neither shall my childe reigne ouer you, but the Lord shall, &c. But he desired the people that they would bestow on him the golden eare-rings, which euery man had gotten. For the Ismaelites, neighbours, and mixt with the Midianites, vsed to weare them: the waight of all which was a thousand and seuen hundred Shekels of gold, which makes of ours 2380. l. if we follow the account of the Shekle vulgar. And because he conuerted that gold into an Ephod, a garment of gold, blue silke, purple, scarlet, and fine linnen, belonging to the High Priest only, and set vp the same in his owne Citie of Ophra or Ephra, which drew Israel to Idolatrie, the same was the destruction of Gideon and his house. Iud.8.24. Exod.28. Iudg.8.28.

There was another kinde of Ephod besides this of the High Priests, which the Leuites vsed, and so did Dauid when he daunced before the Arke: and Samuel, while he was yet young, which was made of linnen onely.

Now if any man demaund how it was possible for Gideon with 300. men to destroy 120000. of their enemies, and afterward 15000. which remained, wee may remember that although Gideon with 300. gaue the first alarme, and put the Midianites in rout and disorder: yet all the rest of the armie came into the slaughter, and pursuite, for it is written; That the men of Israel being gathered together out of Nephtalie, and out of Asher, and out of Manasse, pursued after the Midianites: for this armie Gideon left in tents behinde him, when hee went downe to view the armie of his enemies, who with the noyse of his 300. trumpets came after him to the execution. Iud.7.vers.23.

There liued with Gideon, Ægeus, the sonne of Pandion, who reigned in Athens: Euristhens King of Mycenæ: Atreus and Thyestes the sonnes of Pelops, who bare dominion ouer a great part of Peloponnesus, and after the death of Euristhens, the Kingdome of Mycenæ fell into the hand of Atreus. This is that Atreus, who holding his brother in iealousie, as an attempter, both of his wife and crowne, slew the children of Thyestes, and causing their flesh to be drest, did therewith feast their father. But this crueltie was not vnreuenged. For both Atreus and his sonne Agamemnon were slaine by a base sonne of Thyestes, yea the grand-children, and all the linage of Atreus died by the same sword.

In Gideons time also those things were supposed to haue beene done, which are written of Dædalus and Icarus. Dædalus, they say, hauing slaine his Nephew Attalus, fled to Minos, King of Crete, for succour, where for his excellent workemanship he was greatly esteemed, hauing made for Minos a Labyrinth, like vnto that of Ægypt. Afterward he was said to haue framed an artificiall Cowe for Pasiphae the Queene, that she, being in loue with a faire Bull, might by putting her selfe into the Cow, satisfie her lust, a thing no lesse vnnaturall than incredible, had not that shamelesse Emperour Domitian exhibited the like beastly spectacle, openly before the people of Rome, in his Amphitheater; of purpose, as may seeme, to verifie the old fable. For so it appeares by those verses of Martial, wherein the flattering Poet magnifieth the abominable shew, as a goodly Pageant, in those vitious times.

Iunctam

Iunctam Pasiphaen Dicteo credite Tauro
Vidimus, accepit fabula prisca fidem.
Nec se miratur Caesar longeua vetustas
Quicquid fama canit, donat arena tibi.

But concerning that which is reported of Pasiphae, Seruius makes a lesse vnhoneſt construction of it, thinking that Dædalus was of her counsell, and her Pandar for the enticing of a Secretarie of Minos called Taurus, which signifieth a Bull, who begat her with child, and that she being deliuered of two sonnes, the one resembling Taurus, the other her husband Minos, it was fained that she was deliuered of the Monstrum Minotaur, halfe a Man and halfe a Bull. But this practise being discouered, and Dædalus appointed to be slaine, he fled out of Crete to Cocalus King of Sicil: in which passage he made such expedition, as it was fained that he fashioned wings for himselfe and his sonne to transport them. For whereas Minos pursued him with boats which had oares onely, Dædalus framed sailes both for his owne boate, and for his sonnes, by which he outwent those that had him in chase. Vpon which new inuention, Icarus bearing himselfe ouerbold, was ouerborne and drowned.

It is also written of Dædalus, that he made Images that could moue themselues, and goe, because he carued them with legs, armes and hands, whereas those that preceded him, could onely present the bodie and head of those men, whom they cared to counterfait, and yet the workemanship was esteemed very rare. But Plutarke, who had seene some of those that were called the Images of Dædalus, found them exceeding rude.

Herind. Plat. Paus. lib. 9. With Gideon also flourished Linus the Theban, the sonne of Apollo, and Terpsichore, who instructed Thamyris, Orpheus, and Hercules. Hee wrote of the Creation, of the Sunne and Moones course, and of the generation of liuing Creatures, but in the end he was slaine by Hercules his scholler with his owne harpe.

Strab. lib. Againe, in this age those things spoken of Sphinx and Oedipus, are thought to haue beene performed. This Sphinx being a great robber by sea and land, was by the Corinthian Armie, led by Oedipus, ouercome. But that which was written of her propounding of riddles, to those whom shee mastered, was meant by the rockie and vnaccessible mountaine neere Thebes, which she defended, and by Oedipus dissoluing her probleme his victorie ouer her. She was painted with wings, because exceeding swift, and with the bodie of a Lyon for her crueltie. But that which Palæphatus reports of Sphinx, were more probable, did not the time disproue it, for he calls her an Amaconite, and the wife of Cadmus: who when by her help he had cast Draco out of Thebes (neglecting her) he married the sister of Draco, which Sphinx taking in despightfull part, with her owne troope shee held the mountaine by Thebes, from whence she continued a sharpe warre vpon the Thebans, till by Oedipus ouerthrown. About this time did Minos thrust his brother out of Crete, and held sharpe warre with the Megarians and Athenians, because his sonne Androgeus was slaine by them. He possest himselfe of Megara, by the treason of Scylla, daughter of Nisus the King. He was long Master of the sea, and brought the Athenians to the tribute of deliuering him euery yeere seuen of their sonnes: which tribute Theseus released, as shall bee shewed, when I come to the time of the next Iudge Thala. In the end hee was slaine at Camerinus or Camicus in Sicilia, by Cocalus the King, while he pursued Dædalus: and was esteemed by some to be the first law-giuer to those Ilands. Arist. pol. l. 1.

To this time are referred many deeds of Hercules, as the killing of Antæus the gyant, who was said to haue 80. and odde cubites of length, which though Plutarke doth confirme, reporting that there was such a bodie found by Sertorius the Roman, in Lybia, where Hercules slew Antæus: yet for my selfe, I thinke it but a lowd lie. That Antæus was of great strength, and a cunning wrestler, Eusebius affirmeth: and because hee cast so many men to the ground, hee was fained to bee the sonne of the Earth. Eusebius in Chr. Plinie saith, that he inhabited neere the gardens Hesperides in Mauritania. S. Augustine

Auguſtine affirmes that this Hercules was not of Greece, but of Lybia: and the Hydra alſo which he ouercame, Plato expoundeth to be a ſubtle Sophiſter.

§. VI.

Of the expedition of the Argonauts.

ABout the eleuenth yeere of Gideon, was that famous expedition of the Argonauts: of which many fabulous diſcourſes haue beene written, the ſumme of which is this.

Pelias the ſonne of Neptune, brother by the mothers ſide to Æſon, who was Iaſons father, reigning in Iolcus a towne of Theſſalie, was warned by the Oracle of Apollo to take heede of him that ware but one ſhoe. This Pelias afterward ſacrificing to Neptune, inuited Iaſon to him, who comming haſtily, loſt one ſhoe in paſſing ouer a brooke: whereupon Pelias demaunded of him what courſe he would take (ſuppoſing he were able) againſt one of whom an Oracle ſhould aduiſe him to take heede: to which queſtion when Iaſon had briefly anſwered, that he would ſend him to Colchos, to fetch the golden fleece, Pelias immediatly commaunded him to vndertake that ſeruice. Therefore Iaſon prepared for the voyage, hauing a ſhippe built by Argus, the ſonne of Phryxus, by the Counſell of Pallas: wherein hee procured all the braueſt men of Greece to ſaile with him: as Typhis the Maſter of the ſhippe, Orpheus the famous Poet, Caſtor and Pollux the ſonnes of Tyndarus, Telamon and Peleus, ſonnes of Æacus, and fathers of Aiax and Achilles, Hercules, Theſeus, Zetes and Calais the two winged ſonnes of Boreas, Amphiaraus the great Southſayer, Meleager of Calidon that ſlew the great wilde boare: Aſcalaphus and Ialmenus or Almenus the ſonnes of Mars, who were afterwards at the laſt warre of Troy, Laertes the father of Vlyſſes, Atalanta a warlike virgine, Idas and Lynceus the ſonnes of Apharetis, who afterwards in fight with Caſtor and Pollux ſlew Caſtor, and wounded Pollux, but were ſlaine themſelues: Lynceus by Pollux, Idas by Iupiter with lightning.

Theſe and many other went with Iaſon in the ſhip Argo: in whoſe prowe was a table of the beech of Dodona, which could ſpeake. They arriued firſt at Lemnos; the women of which Iland, hauing ſlaine all the males, purpoſing to lead an Amazonian life, were neuertheleſſe contented to take their pleaſure of the Argonauts. Hence they came to the Country about Cyzicus: where dwelt a people called Doliones: ouer whom then reigned one Cyzicus: who entertained them friendly: but it ſo fell out, that looſing thence by night they were driuen by contrary winds back into his port, neither knowing that it was the ſame Hauen, nor being knowne by the Doliones, to be the ſame men: but rather taken for ſome of their bordering enemies: by which meanes they fell to blowes, inſomuch that the Argonautes ſlew the moſt part of the Doliones together with their King Cyzicus: which when by day light they perceiued, with many teares they ſolemnized his funerall. Then departed they againe and arriued ſhortly in Myſia, where they left Hercules and Polyphemus the ſonne of Elates, who went to ſeeke Hylas the darling of Hercules, that was rauiſhed by the Nymphes.

Poliphemus built a towne in Myſia, called Cios, wherein he reigned. Hercules returned to Argos. From Myſia the Argonautes ſailed into Bythinia, which then was peopled by the Bebryces, the auncient inhabitants of the Country, ouer whom Amycus the ſonne of Neptune was then King. He beeing a ſtrong man, compelled all ſtrangers to fight with him, at whorlebattes, in which kinde of fight hee had ſlaine many, and was now himſelfe ſlaine by Pollux. The Bebryces in reuenge of his death flew all vpon Pollux, but his companions reſcued him, with great ſlaughter of the people. They ſailed from hence to Salmydeſſus, a towne in Thrace (ſomewhat out of their way) wherein Phineus a Soothſayer dwelt, who was blinde and vexed with the the Harpyes. The Harpyes were ſaid to be a kinde of birds, which had the faces of women and foule long clawes, very filthy creatures, which when the table was furniſhed for Phineus, came flying in, and deuouring or carrying away the greater part of the victuals, did ſo defile the reſt, that they could not be endured. When therefore the Argonautes craued his aduiſe, and direction for their voyage: you ſhall doe well (quoth he) firſt of all to deliuer me from the Harpyes, and then afterwards to aske my Counſaile. Whereupon they cauſed the table to be couered, and meat ſet on; which was no ſooner ſet downe, then that preſently in came the Harpyes, and played their accuſtomed prancks: when Zetes and Calais the winged young men ſaw this, they drew their ſwords, and purſued them through the ayre; ſome ſay that both the Harpyes and the young men died of wearineſſe in the flight, and purſuit. But Apollonius ſaith that the Harpyes did couenant with the youthes, to doe no more harme to Phineus, and were thereupon diſmiſſed. For this good turne Phineus gaue them informations of the way, and aduertiſed them withal of the daungerous rockes, called Symplegades, which by force of windes running together, did ſhut vp the paſſage: wherefore he willed them to put a pigeon before them into the paſſage: and if that paſſed ſafe, then to aduenture after her: if not, then by no meanes to hazard themſelues in vaine. They did ſo, and perceiuing that the pigeon had only loſt a piece of her taile, they obſerued the next opening of the rockes, and then rowing with all their might, paſſed through ſafe, onely the end of the poope was bruiſed.

From thence forward, (as the tale goeth) the Symplegades haue ſtood ſtill: for the Gods, ſay they, had decreed that after the paſſage of a ſhippe, they ſhould be fixed. Thence the Argonautes came to the Mariandyni, a people inhabiting about the mouth of the riuer Parthenius; where Lycus the King entertained them courteouſly. Here Idmon a Soothſayer of their company was ſlaine by a wild boare; alſo heere Typhis died: and Aneaus vndertooke to ſteare the ſhip. So they paſſed by the riuer Thermodon, and mount Caucaſus, and came to the riuer Phaſis, which runnes through the land of Colchos. When they were entred the hauen, Iaſon went to Æetes the King of Colchos, and told him the Commaundement of Pelias, and cauſe of his comming, deſiring him to deliuer the golden Fleece, which Æetes, as the Fable goeth, promiſed to doe, if he alone would yoake together two brazen hooft bulls, and plowing the ground with them, ſowe dragons teeth, which Minerua had giuen to him, being part of thoſe which Cadmus did ſowe at Thebes. Theſe bulls were great and fierce, and breathed out fire: Vulcan had giuen them to Æetes.

Whileſt Iaſon was in a great perplexitie about this taske, Medæa the daughter of Æetes, fell into a moſt vehement loue of him, ſo farre foorth, that being excellent in Magique, ſhe came priuily to him, promiſing her helpe, if he would aſſure her of his marriage. To this Iaſon agreed, and confirmed his promiſe by oath. Then gaue ſhe to him a medicine wherewith ſhe bad him to anoint both his bodie and his armour, which would preſerue him from their violence: further ſhe told him, that armed men would ariſe out from the ground, from the teeth which hee ſhould ſowe, and ſet vpon him. To remedie which inconuenience, ſhee bad him throw ſtones amongſt them as ſoone as they came vp thicke, whereupon they would fall together to blowes, in ſuch wiſe that he might eaſily ſlay them. Iaſon followed her counſaile; whereto when the euent had anſwered, hee againe demaunded the Fleece. But Æetes was ſo farre from approuing ſuch his deſire, that hee deuiſed how to deſtroy the Argonautes, and burne their ſhip, which Medæa perceiuing, went to Iaſon, and brought him by night to the Fleece, which hung vpon an Oke in the groue of Mars, where they ſay it was kept by a Dragon, that neuer ſlept. This Dragon was by the Magique of Medæa caſt into a ſleepe: ſo taking away the golden Fleece, ſhe went with Iaſon into the ſhip Argo, hauing with her, her brother Abſyrtus.

Æetes vnderſtanding the practiſes of Medæa, prouided to purſue the ſhip, whom when when Medea perceiued to be at hand, ſhe ſlew her brother, & cutting him in pieces, ſhe ſcattered his limbs in diuers places, of which Æetes finding ſome, was faine to ſeeke out the reſt, and ſuffer his daughter to paſſe: the parts of his ſonne hee buried in a place, which thereupon he called Tomi; the Greeke word ſignifieth Diuiſion. Afterwards he ſent many of his ſubiects to ſeeke the ſhip Argo, threatning that if they brought not backe Medea, they ſhould ſuffer in her ſtead. In the meane while the Argonauts were driuen about the Seas, and were come to the Riuer Eridanus, which is Po in Italie.

Iupiter, offended with the ſlaughter of Abſyrtus, vexed them with a great tempeſt, and carried them they knew not whither; when they came to the Ilands Abſyrtides, there the ſhip Argo (that there might want no incredible thing in this Fable) ſpake to them, and ſaid, that the anger of Iupiter ſhould not ceaſe, till they came to Auſonia, and were cleanſed by Circe, from the murther of Abſyrtus. Now, they thereupon ſayling betweene the coaſts of Lybia, and Gallia, and paſſing through the ſea of Sardinia and along the coaſt of Hetruria, came to the Ile of Æea, wherein Circe dwelt, who cleanſed them. Thence they ſayled by the coaſt of the Syrens, who ſang to allure them into danger: but Orpheus on the other ſide ſang ſo well that he ſtayed them. Only Butes ſwamme out vnto them, whom Venus rauiſhed, and carried to Lylibæum in Sicilie to dwell.

Hauing paſt the Syrens, they came betweene Scylla and Charybdis, and the ſtragling rocks which ſeemed to caſt out great ſtore of flames and ſmoke. But Thetis and the Nereides, conueyed them ſafe through at the appointment of Iuno. So they coaſted Sicilie where the beeues of the Sunne were, and touched at Corcyra, the Iland of the Phæaces, where King Alcinous reigned. Meane while, the men of Colchos, that had beene ſent by Æetes in queſt of the ſhip Argo, hearing no newes of it, and fearing his anger, if they fulfilled not his will, betooke themſelues to new habitations: ſome of them dwelt in the mountaines of Corcyra, others in the Ilands Abſyrtides, and ſome comming to the Phæaces, there found the ſhip Argo, and demanded Medea of Alcinous: whereto Alcinous made anſwere, that if ſhee were not Iaſons wife, they ſhould haue her, but if ſhee were alreadie married, he would not take her from her huſband. Arete, the wife of Alcinous, hearing this, married them: wherefore they of Colchos not daring to returne home, ſtayed with the Phæaces; ſo the Argonautes departed thence, and after a while came to Crete. In this Iland, Minos reigned, who had a man of braſſe giuen to him (as ſome of the Fablers ſay) by Vulcan. This man had one veine in his bodie reaching from the necke to the heele, the end whereof was cloſed vp with a brazen naile, his name was Talus: his cuſtome was to runne thrice a day about the Iland for the defence of it. When hee ſaw the ſhip Argo paſſe by, hee threw ſtones at it, but Medea with her Magique deſtroyed him. Some ſay that ſhee ſlew him by potions, which made him mad; others, that promiſing to make him immortall, ſhee drew out the naile that ſtopt his veine, by which meanes all his bloud ranne out, and he died; others there are that ſay he was ſlaine by Paan, who wounded him with an arrow in the heele. From hence the Argonautes ſayled to Ægina, where they were faine to fight for freſh water. And laſtly, from Ægina they ſailed by Eubœa and Locris home to Iolcos, where they arriued, hauing ſpent foure whole moneths in the expedition.

Some there are, that by this iourney of Iaſon vnderſtand the myſterie of the Philoſophers ſtone, called the golden Fleece, to which alſo, other ſuper-fine Chymiſts draw the twelue labours of Hercules. Suidas thinkes that by the golden Fleece, was meant a booke of Parchment, which is of ſheepe-skin, and therefore called golden, becauſe it was taught therein how other metalls might bee tranſmuted. Others would ſignifie by Iaſon, wiſdome, and moderation, which ouer-commeth all perils: but that which is moſt probable is the opinion of Dercilus, that the ſtorie of ſuch a paſſage was true, and that Iaſon with the reſt went indeed to rob Colchos, to which they might arriue by boate. For not farre from Caucaſus there are certaine ſteepe falling falling torrents which wash downe many graines of gold, as in many other parts of the world, and the people there inhabiting vse to set many fleeces of woll in those descents of waters, in which the graines of gold remaine, and the water passeth through, which Strabo witnesseth to be true. The many rocks, straits, sands, and Currents, in the passage betweene Greece and the bottome of Pontus, are Poetically conuerted into those fierie bulls, the armed men rising out of the ground, the Dragon cast asleepe, and the like. The man of brasse, the Syrens, Scylla and Charybdis, were other hazards and aduentures which they fell into in the Mediterran sea, disguised, as the rest, by Orpheus, vnder poeticall morralls: all which Homer afterward vsed (the man of brasse excepted) in the description of Vlysses his trauailes, on the same Inland-seas.

§. VII.

Of ABIMELECH, THOLAH, and IAIR, and of the Lapythæ, and of THESEVS, HYPPOLYTVS, &c.

AFter the death of Gideon, Abimelech his base sonne begotten on a Concubine of the Sechemites, remembring what offers had been made to his father by the people, who desired to make him and his their perpetuall Princes, and as it seemeth, supposing (notwithstanding his fathers religious modestie) that some of his brethren might take on them the Soueraignrie, practised with the inhabitants of Sechem (of which his mother was natiue) to make election of himselfe, who being easily moued with the glorie, to haue a King of their owne, readily condescended: and the better to enable Abimelech, they borrowed 70. pieces of siluer of their Idoll Baalberith, with which treasure he hyred a company of loose and desperate vagabonds, to assist his first detestable enterprise, to wit, the slaughter of his 70. brethren, the sonnes of Gideon, begotten on his wiues, of which he had many, of all which none escaped but Iotham the youngest, who hid himselfe from his present furie: all which hee executed on one stone, a crueltie exceeding all that hath beene written of in any age. Such is humane ambition, a monster that neither feareth God (though all-powerfull, and whose reuenges are without date and for euerlasting) neither hath it respect to nature, which laboureth the preseruation of euery being: but it rageth also against her, though garnished with beautie which neuer dieth, and with loue that hath no end. All other passions and affections, by which the soules of men are tormented, are by their contraries oftentimes resisted or qualified. But ambition, which begetteth euery vice, and is it selfe the childe and darling of Satan, looketh only towards the ends by it selfe set downe, forgetting nothing (how fearefull and inhumane soeuer) which may serue it: remembring nothing, whatsoeuer iustice, pietie, right or religion can offer and alleadge on the contrary. It ascribeth the lamentable effects of like attempts, to the errour or weakenesse of the vndertakers, and rather praiseth the aduenture than feareth the like successe. It was the first sinne that the world had, and began in Angels: for which they were cast into hell, without hope of redemption. It was more auncient than man, and therefore no part of his naturall corruption. The punishment also preceeded his creation, yet hath the Deuill which felt the smart thereof, taught him to forget the one as out of date, and to practise the other, as befitting euery age, and mans condition.

Iudg.9.4.

Vers.5.

Iotham, the youngest of Gideons sonnes, hauing escaped the present perill, sought by his best perswasions to alienate the Sechemites, from the assisting of this mercilesse tyrant, letting them know, that those which were vertuous, and whom reason and religion had taught the safe and happie estate of moderate subiection, had refused to receiue as vnlawfull, what others had not power to giue, without direction from the King of Kings: who from the beginning (as to his owne peculiar people) had had appointed them by whom and how to bee gouerned. This hee taught them by the Olive, which contented it selfe with it's fatnesse, the Figge tree with sweetnesse, and the Vine with the good iuyce it had: the Bramble onely, who was most base, cut downe all the rest, and accepted the Soueraigntie. He also foretold them by a Prophetical spirit; what should befall them in the end, and how a fire should come out of the Bramble, and consume the Cedars of Libanon.

Now (as it is an easie matter to call those men backe whom rage without right led on) Gaal the sonne of Ebed withdrew the Citizens of Sechem, from the seruice of Abimelech: who therefore after some assaults entred the place, and mastered it; and in conclusion fired the towne, wherein their Idoll Baalbersith was worshipped, and put all the people of all sorts to the slaughter. Lastly, in the assault of the Castle or Tower of Teber, himselfe was wounded in the head with a stone throwne ouer the wall by a woman, and finding himselfe mortally brused, hee commaunded his owne page to pierce his bodie, thereby to auoid the dishonour of being slaine by so feeble a hand.

While Abimelech vsurped the Gouernment, the Lapithæ and Centaures made warre against the Thebanes. These Nations were descended of Apollo, and were the first in those parts that deuised to mannage horses, to bridle and to sit them: in somuch as when they first came downe from the mountaines of Pindus, into the plaines, those which had neuer seene horsemen before, thought them creatures compounded of men and horses; so did the Mexicans when Ferdinando Cortes the Spaniard first inuaded that Empire. Palephatus l. 1. de incredib.

After the death of Abimelech, Thola of Issachar gouerned Israel 23. yeeres, and after him Iair the Gileadite 22. yeeres, who seemeth to bee descended of Iair the sonne of Manasse, who in Moses time conquered a great part of Gilead, and called the same after his owne name, Haboth Iair. For to this Iair there remained thirtie of those Cities, which his ancester had recouered from the Amorites. Of these Iudges, because there is nothing else written, it is an argument that during all their times, Israel liued without disturbance and in peace. Deut. 3. 14. Num. 32. 41. Iudg. 10.

When Iair iudged Israel, Priamus beganne to reigne in Troy, who at such time as Hercules sacked Ilium, was carried away captiue with his sister Hesione into Greece, and being afterward redeemed for ransome, hee rebuilt and greatly strengthened, and adorned Troy; and so farre inlarged his Dominions, as hee became the supreme Lord in effect of all Asia the lesse. He married Hecuba the daughter of Cisseus King of Thrace, and had in all (saith Cicero) fiftie sonnes, whereof seuenteene by Hecuba, of whom Paris was one; who attempting to recouer his aunt Hesione, tooke Helena the wife of Menelaus the cause of the warre which followed. 2901. In Tusc.
